Charles since the siege of Nuz had in pay about a thousand men at armes, Neapolitans for the most part. The Earle of Campobasso commanded foure hundred, a partizan of the house of Anjou, against that of Arragon; and for this cause being banished his country, had always followed Duke René of Sicilia, or Nicholas sonne to John Duke of Calabro and Lorraine: after whose death Charles of Bourgogne entertained many of his servants: especially this Earle, a wicked man and of a corrupt conscience, who in the beginning of the warre of Lorraine entred into practice with Duke René (heire apparent to the house of Anjou, after the death of King René his Grand-father by the mother) promising to prolong the siege of Nancy, and cause defects in necessary things touching the siege. He might well doe it, having more authority in this army then any other Captaine. But behold another act of notable villany.

The Duke of Bourgogne had given him forty thousand ducats before-hand, to take his company. Passing at Lion, to goe into Italy, he grew familiar with a Physician, named Simon of Paüy, giving by him the King to understand, that for an hundred thousand Crownes in ready money, his company entertained, and a good Earle dome, at his request, hee would deliuer him the Duke of Bourgogne, and confirmes the same to Saint Pr, who then was Ambassador for the King in Piemont. Being returned, and his troope lodged in the Country of Marle, he reiterates his offer to the King, to kill the Duke whom he should come to the campe, if he desired not to haue him brought a prisoner into his hands, assuring himselfe to execute it easily: for (saith he) he is accustomed to visit his army, mounted vpon a Nag, and ill accompanied: Or if the King and the Duke should at any time fight a battell, he would turne to the King with his company.

Lewis abhorres the treachery of this wicked wretch, and to shew the Duke his frinds and royall disposition, hee giues him intelligence thereof by Centay. In the meane time Campobasso betrays the Bourguignon all he can from the warre of Lorraine, and makes the taking of Nancy, proue more difficult. The Duke is so much incensed therewith, as from inuiours words, he proceeds to blowes, and strikes him. A blow which the Earle willenue in his time. He dissembles for the present, and Charles either thinking the Neapolitane had forgotten this outrage, or supposing that his hired fouldier had bene bound not to reuenge it, or happily fearing if he lost him, his affaires would receive some dangerous checke, he entertaines him still in his seruice: yea (euen contrary to the Kings aduice) he loued, or made shew to loue him better, supposing that Lewis his intention was, to stir diuision betwixt him and his most trusty seruants. But let vs rather say, that hee which sounds, euen to the deepest thoughts of man, had by a iust iudgement, taken away all apprehension from this Prince, not to taste the wholesome counsels that were giuen him, with most apparent reasons. This proud presumption, like vnto Nemibath, made him conceiue a world of Chimeraes, and bring forth a shamefull confusion, as wee shall see hereafter.

He is now put vp with the new purchase of Lorraine, by the taking of Nancy, without possession of Saint Quintin, Han and Bohain, and with the Constables moueables, he would not make this the limits of his conquests. The Suiffes had incensed him, redressing of the countie of Ferrere for Sigismund Archduke of Austria. Moreover, they had spoiled James of Sauoy Earle of Rhomont, brother to the Prince of Orange of many places lying within their marches. These Noblemen were allied, and parakers to the Duke, and dar'd him on to reuenge. On the other side, the King desired to parke with him, after the manner of Piquigny, wishing him to lodge and refresh his troopes, tired both with the siege of Nuz, and the warre of Lorraine, and to grant a peace to this mountaine Nation, being poore but yet froward. But Charles prefers the violent passions of his ambition, before the honest and wholesome counsell of Lewis, and enters into Suifferland. The Cantons bearing of his approach, intreat for peace: they offer to yeeld vp the place in question, and by a second Ambassage, to renouance all alliances that should dislike him, especially the Kings: to seruise him against all men, yea against the King, with six thousand men, for what pay he would giue them, and as often as he would call them. If he did triumph over them by an absolute victory, there were no profit to be found, seeing the spurres of his horses, and the bits of his horses, were of more value then all their country.

A But here suffeth all accord, no prevention can stop this theme. He marcheth, and after this imaginary conquest of the Cantons, he passeth the Alpes, and takes hold of Italy, for that Frederic Prince of Tarentum; son to the King of Naples, was lately come to him, with hope to marry his daughter. Moreover, old King of Sicilia, brother of Anjou, and uncle to the King, (being his sonne John), and his Grand Child, who were deceased, promised to resigne vnto him his pretensions of Sicilia: to aduise him for his sonnes heire, and soome after to put ties his hands the Earle dome of Provence. But we shall see later the causes that moued him to this attempt: he passed about all things as for the goodly estate of Milan, where he presumed to haue great influence.

The Ambassadors being returned the Suiffes protest against his submission, and of their desire to pacifie all things, calling God and the world to witness, and then they prepare for their defence: Charles for the first fruits of his army, fortified with French and hand men from the Duke of Milan, and five thousand from the Duchesse of Sauoy, forsooke he lowes strangers before their own subjects, and the troubles of the mountaine, which hee con- coine a hatred and deuotion against them, hee takes Lorraine, a mountaine towne, seated vpon the Lake Lemans, with other places in the Country of Vaux, calling the Cantons for the most part to be hanged. Then he brings the whole body of his army, being about fifty thousand men, and five hundred pieces of Artillery of all sorts before Granfont, lying neare to the Lake of Yuerdun, which belonged to Rhomont, being defended by seven or eight hundred Suiffes of the Canton of Bernie. He battens, makes a breach, and gives an assault, with the losse of a hundred men. But the battérie continuing, the defendants (not able to hold the towne) flee it, and reuerge the Castle, where standing many towers beare downe, they compoind to haue their liues saved. An accord was then broken; for hee caused fourescore to be hanged (some write five hundred and twelue) hee shewes two hundred, and puts the rest in prison. A detestable cruelty, and to add vnto all the Cities vpon the Rhine, as they lend men to the Duke of Lorraine and the Suiffes to their aide.

Hee is nothing amazed therewith; but for the stately entertainment of Ambassadors that came vnto him from diuers Countreies, namely from Germany and Italy, hee shewes himselfe in his campe with incredible pompe and state: pavilions and rich tents, glittering armes, goodly standards, vessels of gold and silver, of inestimable value, rich apparell, exquisite Tapistry, Jewels, precious stones, and other costly ornaments: to conclude, the goodliest furniture that might beautifie a campe. The Suiffes not yet aduertised of the losse of Granfont, send foure or five thousand men to reuenge it: But too late. The Duke (contrary to the opinion of the best aduised) goes to meet them. They campe at the entry of the mountaine, hold the straits of hard access, and of great aduantage for the foot, and dangerous for the horse, where one man might kill fifty. But hee was (as the proverbe saies) mounted to the Pies nest, and God blinding his understanding, prepared an exemplary abatement of his pride. He sends a hundred archers before, to seize on a passage of the mountaine, who discover not an ambush of hor that kept it, the which suffer a part of the foreward to enter, whereas the battell could not succour them, when they charge with such resolution and fury, that with this terror the Bourguignons flee, and fall vpon the other part, which was yet in the plaine, which likewise turnes head towards the campe, the battell and reuerge seeing the foreward in rout, shrinke presently, and notwithstanding all the Dukes labour to stay them, they save their liues by flight. All informed of the small numbers of their enemies, who pursue them with all fury, Charles himselfe was forced to loyne with them that fled, abandoning both campe and artillery, to save their persons, staying in no place vntill he came to Iogne, fifteen or sixtene leagues from Granfont. A faster flight then the pursuit, for want of horses, so as the Duke in the midst of so great a terror, lost but seven men at armes, but very many foot. This happened the second day of March.

A day not so famous for the losse of men, as of spoile, esteemed at three millions, where with the Suiffes (not so cunning in those dayes as now) made themselves rich, although they were ignorant of the value of things. For a proofe of their gresse and rude ignorance the Original officers: that they did reare in peeces the goodliest and most sumptuous pavilions in the world, to appaile themselves. That a fouldier did sell a silver dish like better for two pence half pny. Another taking vp the case of the Dukes great Diamond, whereat whereat did hang a great pearle: the which he viewing put vp againe, and so cast it into a Cart, comming afterwards to fetch it, he sold it to a Priest for a florin worth twentie pence: the Priest fent it vnto their Lords, who gaue him fixe shillings. They hold it to be the goodliest in Christendome. Besides many others, they got three pearles of estimable value, the which they called the three brethren, with two other the most famous that could be found.

To conclude, whatsoever the Duke had of rich or sumptuous, he caused to be buried after him in ostentation, to shew his superfluous and fearefull greatnesse vnto his posterity. So the eternall God did signifie vnto Ezechias by Esay. That all the treasures of his house, silver and gold, his sweet perfumes, and precious oymment, with all his artillery, yea, all that was found in his treasures, all that was in his house, all that his fathers had gathered together, that day should be carried vnto Babylon: for that he had made a shew to the Ambassadors of Baggadad, Baladan, the sonne of Baladan King of Babylon.

Lewis fears the good successe of Charles.

Presently after this battell the Swisses recover their lost places, take downe their companions and bury them, and hang vp many Bourguignons with the same halckers: the King remained at Lion, attending the successe of the Bourguignons forces, fearing exceedingly, lest he should subdue the Cantons. He disposed of the house of Sauoy, as his owne: the Duke of Milan was his ally: he held Lorraine, and hoped for Provence, which succeeding his power extended from the Westerne Sea vnto the East: and France had had no issue out, but by the Dukes fauour, or by sea: for the preuenting whereof, Lewis sent often to the Duchesse of Sauoy his sister in law (being wholly at the dukes command) to Rene his vnckle, being much incensed against him, so as he would, feare heare his messengers, to the Princes and commonalties of Germany, who returne him an answer vnto the King, that if he warre not against him, we will make you peace, and marry our sister against him. This was it he feared, yet would he not breake the truce, neither haue Charles discouer the messages he sent. But now the Bourguignons shipwracke cheered him, grieved only at the small number that were slaine.

The Duke fears the King should breake the truce.

The Duke on his part was toucht with teare, and to preuent it, he sends Contray to the King, charged with humble and gracious speeches, contrary to his custome. Hee beseecheth his Maiesty to obferue the puce lloyally, excuseth himselfe that he did not assist either way neere vnto Auxerre, and promitteth to be there shortly, or wherefoeuer it should please the King. The King assures him of his demands, neither was it yet time to doe otherwise, but to keepe himselfe in the shade, whilest that Charles chafed. Lewis was well acquainted with the loyalty of the Dukes subiects, who would easily crosse him, seeing him oppressed with aduersitie. One mischiefe comes neuer alone: the losse, shame, and disfigurement, to see himselfe vanquished, layes him sicke in his bed. But behold a rough charge in prosperity friends come by hundreds, in aduersity they flie by thousands. When duke of Milan leads the dance, he was allied to Charles by reason of his practices in Italy, which being dissolued by his check, he sends a Citizen of Milan to the King, he desired him from making a peace with the Bourguignon, and to preuent it, he offers him a hundred thousand Ducats presently. The King detecting the inconstancy of this man, who three weekes before was estranged from him, hunting after the Bourguignons fortunes, with a great and solemn Ambassage: considering also, that their wiues were sisters, and his couetous proceeding: he reiects his money, reproacheth the little loue he bare his brother in law, but in the end he accepts of his alliance. Rene King of Sicilia seconded him. Charles had already (vpon the hope which this good old man gaue him) sent the Lord of Chastelauguion into Piedmont, with twenty thousand Crownes, to make a leaue of men, to take possession of that Earldome.

But vpon this defeat, he was happy to saue his person, and to lose but his sister, sent on for the King by Philip of Sauoy Earle of Breffe. Vpon this amazement, Lewis sends his vnckle, desires him to come, and to assure himselfe of good entertainment, else he would prouide by force. John Cisse Seneshall of Provence, an honest man, and of a good house in the Realme of Naples, perswaded his matter to this voyage, giuing the King no vnderstanding, that the treaty of Rene with the Bourguignon (the which he himselfe had procured) ended to no other end, but to let the King know the wrong he had done his vnckle, hauing taken from him the castles of Barre & Angiers, and intreated him ill in all his other affairs, and that he neuer had any will to performe the accord. A liberty of speech very pleasing unto Lewis, who from that time respected his vnckle, and they liued like good friends. Then Rene made a transaction with the King, that after his death the Earldome of Provence should returne to the King, and be incorporate to the Crowne.

Lewis reconciled to the King of Sicilia.

In doing whereof, the Queene of England, daughter to the said Rene, and widow to Henry the sixth, King of England, whom Edward held prisoner, was redeemed by the King, for fifty thousand crownes. For this cause she yeelded vnto the King all the right she might pretend to the said county, and for a certain pension which the King assigned her during her life. The Duchesse of Sauoy sent Montigni secretly, to reconcile her to the King, yet will she try the issue of the Dukes fortune. The Princes of Germany, and the Imperiall townes, who before were enforced to temporize, now shew themselves enemies, and turne from him.

Fredricke, Prince of Tarentum, grieved with the strange dissembling, touching the pretended marriage, leaues him: and soone after returning into France, he maries a daughter of Sauoy, the Queens sister. What then? Shall he flie to his Hollanders & Fleminges? But he knowes their inconstancy, and that they shall forsake not his flight: yet he sends his Chancellor Hugonnet, with twelve Commissioners, to require aide of men and money from his subiects, who returne with this resolution: That if the Duke their Lord were prisoner, they would mortgage and sell their liuinges to redeeme him: that to disswade him from the war, and draw him home into his countries, they would assist him with all their power. But to continue it, they are not reloued to doe any thing. To conclude, every bird had his pecke at this Owle. Euen as when a tempest overthrowes some great tree, every one tears off a branch. He yeelds not yet, but would be ashamed to confesse himselfe beaten by such a wretched people: and although all these crosses had wonderfully increased his sicknesse, and that heauinesse, melancholy, chollier, and other passions had altered his blood, with great prejudice to his health: yet he gathers together the peeces of his wracke, and within few months goes to field with his army. Hauing staied some space at Lauzan, he went the ninth of Iune to campe before Morat, a small towne two leagues from Berne, belonging to the Earle of Rhomont, who led the foreward. Anthony, battard of Bourgongne camped vpon the Lake with thirty thousand foot and horse. The Duke lodged in the mountaine, and Rhomont vpon the descent towards the Lake, with 12000 foot.

He besiegeth Morat.

The Cantons were sooner in armes at this shooke, then at the other: and if beefore they gaue him a light defeat, they shal now giue him a generall overthrow. In their league are numbered twenty townes, prelates, and commonalties: Zurich, Befne, Lucerne, Uri, Suize, Vnderual, Zug, Glaris, Fribourg, Soleurre, Basil, Chasthouze, Appenzel, Sangall, the Grisons, the Earle of Tocquebourg, the Abbot of Sangall, Valois, la Caffe, Dye, and the ten iurisdiccions of Malny. All these did furnish eleven thousand Pikes, ten thousand halberets, 10000 shot, and 4000 horse: and the King, who made war against the Bourguignon, at another mans cost, had vnder hand giuen the Duke of Lorraine meats to ioyn with six hundred men at armes. Moreover, the townes of Rhine, Songoy, and Ferrere, had sent a supply of three thousand men.

All these forces being ioyned, the two and twenty of Iune, beheld at the first encounter, the foreward is so violently charged, as the Earle of Rhomont is forced to save himselfe with ten or twelue horse. The Garison of Morat falls out, and ioynes with the Duke of Lorraines troopes; they charge the Bourguignons campe, force it, and overthrow him with a horrible slaughter of his men. He recouers Belanson by the swiftnesse of his horse, and from thence Riuere, in the county of Bourgongne. In this battaile died about eighteen thousand men (others say two and twenty thousand seven hundred) and of Swisses fiftie men only. At this day are seene the spoiles of this battaile, in a chapel, built where the battaile was fought, and filled with the bones of such as were slaine. The Swisses pursuing their victory, take all the places of the county of Rhomont, and along the Lake Lemane, euen vnto Geneva, which are at this day vnder the iurisdiction of Berne, and the Bishopp of Basil, & razed many places & castles vpon the Marches of the Franche countie. The duke of Lorraine, hauing a good share in this notable victory, with his French troopes, and some supplies from the confederates, recouers Vaudmont, Espinal, Nancy, and some other places by composition. Now is Charles of Bourgongne exceeding heavy, and for that the house of Sauoy had beent the chiefe motive of this shortly surpriseth, he Dukes of Savoy with her youngest Son.

Louis fetcheth at liberty.

Nancy taken by René, and besieged by Charles.

An assembly of Campy held.

warre: (whereof the first firebrand had bene for some carls laden with skins, taken by Rhomont from a Suisse) and doubting lest the would speedily be reconciled to the King, he sends to take her by force, and brings her to Roure near Dijon, with her youngest sonne since Duke of Savoy. Philibert the eldest, then Duke, was with the helpe of some servants of his house retired to Chamberi. The King, who neuer lets slip any advantage, and who politically builds vpon anothers shipwracke, treats with the Bishop of Geneva, a sonne of Sauey, a man of a free disposition, & gouerned by a Commander of Rhodet, both tractable, who deliuer into his hands the Castles of Chamberi, Montemelin, and another place, in the which were all the Duchesse Jewells. Shee seeing her selfe deprived of libertie, dissembles no longer, but sends Riverok, a Gentleman of Pichonay, to the King to mediate her peace; but with all the surety that might be: knowing well that it was dangerous to displease him, beseeching his Maestie to free her. René, a better brother than the had bene a sister, sends to deliuer her; by Charles of Amboise, Lord of Chaumont, Gouernour of Champagne, who brought her to Plessis by Tours; where the King was returned: who hauing rebounced the alliance of Bourgogne, recovered her children of the King, with the places, Jewells, and all things that belonged to her, and then conducted her home at his owne charge. But Charles, is he tired? So many graces, so many losses of men of war, places, friends, and treasure, haue all this daunted him, as he hath lost all courage. He is now solitary at Riuerok, sad, morose, and grieved, displeased in himselfe, wayward to his seruants, despised of his subjects, and hated of his friends, and hateful to all the world: he seeks neither comfort or counsel of any man, and his great austerity is the cause that no man dare giue it him. And doubtless these encounters were sufficient to make him lay aside armes; and humbly to acknowledge, that the scourge of God doth aduertise vs, that we are strayed from our duties, and to lift vp our eies, hands, and hearts to heauen, there to seeke for consolation, and among men, rather restoring that which we haue pulled from others vnjustly; then continuing obstinate in our reuenges.

But Nancy must be the place of his funerall, it was wonderful contradiotions for his passage to his other Signeuries; but his army being vtterly ouerthrowne, it was not possible to leaue new troopes so speedily, to succour the Lord of Beures, of the house of Cury, who defended it against the Lorain. Campobasso did diuert him, shewing that the ciuill war but slackly besieged, that it was needfull to breathe, and to refresh his spirits tyred with the forepassed toyles; & in the meane time continues his practices with Duke René, who pressed him still for succours, yet could he not arise vnill the day it was yielded, with his forces as he could get out of Flanders, Luxembourg, and Bourgogne. Hee beseegeth againe before it could be fortified and victualled, and within few daies brings it to such a famine. The Lorraine, not yet strong enough, attending such troops as came to him out of Germany, and Suisse, land, adventures a company of soldiers, carrying some victuals. They crosse through the Campe maintaining the skirmish, whilst that such a cold meale entred the towne. Cyffon, a gentleman of Prouence, and Steward to the Duke of Lorraine, was taken prisoner amongst others. Charles commands he should be hanged. This gentleman had bene the actor betwixt Campobasso, and Duke René. Seeing that he must of necessity die, he desires Charles to heare him, & that he would discover a matter which concerned his person. Charles answers in choller, that they were but foes, and Campobasso, fearing his tongue, doth hasten both the Duke and Prouost to this execution for (said he) by the law of armes, euery one that seeks to relente a place after the Canon hath played, and is taken, deserves death. Cyffon makes a new request, and the Duke sends to know what he would say. He refuseth to reuelate it but to the Duke himselfe, and as they returned with this answer to the Duke, Campobasso remaining at the chamber doore, where the Duke was writing with a Secretary, makes them believe that the Duke pleasure was, that they should dispatch him; and to Cyffon was hanged. He still continues his siege, and neither famine, losses, the season of the yeare, nor his weak army, nor the great succours which he sees comming to the Lorraine, nor the secret aide the King gaue vnto his enemy; neither Alphonse King of Portugal, his cousin Germane, who then attended some succours from the King at Paris, against the Castilian, and went expressly to him to mediate a peace, to be the sooner dispatched (for the King excused himselfe vpon the illne he feared of this war of Lorraine) could moue him.

Nancy retaken by the Duke René.

The integrity of the Suissein old time.

The battaile of Nancy.

Charles comes to Nancy.

A Nancy pressed with famine, was ready to compound, if Campobasso had not by secret intelligence renewed their spirits: when as beheld the Duke of Lorraine comes with an army of foureteeen or fifteene thousand men, French, Suisse, Germans and Lorraines, and lodgeth at Saint Nicholus of Varengeuille. Campobasso, notable to do the Bourgignon a greater dispiight, leaves him with nine-score men at armes with him, & the Lords of Ange & Montfort with six-score, & they go to René. A great maine for the Duke, whose troops were but bare and weak. Notwithstanding vpon the Suisse protestation, that they would not fight in the company of a traitor, the Duke sends him to Conde, a castle vpon the riuer of Moselle, a passage for victuals which came to Charles from the valley of Luxembourg & Meux. He takes this passage and stops it with trees and carts, to flay the sight of such as should think to saue themselves, foreseeing already the Bourgignons duertchur, hoping by this means to haue a share of the booty, and prisoners, as it happened indeed. But the foulest & most treacherous act of his tragedy is, that he left men furnished to begin the fight at the first charge, and others to obserue the Duke, & if he fled, to kill him. Charles, vnderstanding these newes, hearkeneth thereto (contrary to his custome) yet hee follows not the aduice of his counsell. The most experienced, counselled him to retire to Ponra Moufou, which he held yet, and to fortifie himselfe there, suffering them to victual all Nancy. They told him, that the Germans loued the ayre of their hot houses too well, that René would want money, so all would disband, without meanes to ioine together againe in long time: that their victualling could not be so plentifull, but it would be spent before the middle of winter, & in the meane time he should refresh his army, increase his troops, and furnish himselfe with all things necessary, seeing that he had money, which was the finew of war. A wise counsell, but Charles hasteth to his ruine. He had in his army but 4000 men, whereof not about 1200 were in case to fight, yet by the aduice of some foolish people hee will hazard a third battaile, exposing a handfull of men ill armed, and ill mounted, panting yet with the first and second encounters, against an army fresh, lusty, and glorious with two notable victories. The fifth of January, vpon twelfth Eue, René puts his army into battaile, neare vnto a lake at Neuville. The Germans and Suisse diuide themselves into two battallions: the Earle of Abstein, and the Gouernours of Zurich and Fribourg lead the one, the Aduoyers of Berne and Lucerne the other; the rest, both French and Lorraines, march vnder their ensignes: one battallion goes towards the riuer, the other takes the high-way from Neuville to Nancy.

The Duke of Bourgogne attends them firmly, in a place of strength & aduantage, hauing before him a little riuer, betwixt two strong heag-rows, neare to the hospital of Magon, & at the entry of this great high-way (where one of the battallions matched) Charles had planted the greatest part of his artillery, which shunders vpon the Suisse at their first approach, but with small hurt, being far off. This battallion leaves the high-way, & moueth vntowards the wood, coasting along the Dukes army. The duke takes his archers to run head, appointing two wings of men at armes, the one led by James Giliot, a Neapolitan, & another man and a valiant Captain, the other by the Lord of Lajain, lieutenant of Flanders. This battallion hauing gotten the aduantage, on the higher ground, stands firm: then like vnto a violent streame it falls vpon the Bourgignon army, & with a thundering toly of shot defeats the foot. At the same instant the other battallions charge Giliot squarons, who behaued him selfe like a wife & valiant Captain, but the horse seeing the foot men amazed, leaue all & flee after. The other wing, commanded by Lajain, maintains the fight, but vnable to withstand the violent shocke of the Suisse, in the end they giue way, and turne towards the bridge of Bridores, where was the greatest, few of their men that fled. This bridge is halfe a league from Nancy towards the Lionville, & Luxembourg; Campobasso had stopp the passage, so as all such as took that route, were either slaine or would, if any recovered the woods, the peasants beat them downe with leuts. A chad which continued from noone, vntill two houres with a night. Charles thinking to take himselfe, was ouerthrowne by a troope of men that followed him; discomfured by them; which the wayfarer Campobasso had left to obserue him, and vpon the way, hee was taken. The dead he was found among the dead, lying frozen in a ditch well knowne by many of his household seruants. He had three wounds, one with an halbard above the eare, which cutt vnto the teeth, the second with a pike, the third with the right hand, the fourth by the fundament. René caused him to be honourably buried in Saint Georges Church at Nancy.

Nancy. In this Battaille there died three thousand Bourguignons, and there were taken the Earle of Nassau, the Marquis of Rothelin, an English Earle, Anthony and Baldwin brethren, bastards to the Duke (whose ransoms the King did pay) and many gentlemen. The booty was small, but the victory of Granfon was yet fresh, & as they then did sing, He lost his goods at Granfon, his men at Morat, and his life at Nancy. Behold this great Nembroth, who made himselfe equal with Emperours, and yielded not to the great kings: before time the terror of Christendome, feared by his subiects, sought to by his neighbours, who had purchased to himselfe the surname of terrible, and warrior, driven with ambition, transported with the desire of anothers estate, now confounded with his owne greatnesse, who with his fall ruines his house. Doubtlesse, the daies of mortall man are like to graffe, he fades like the flower of the field, for the winds passing over it, it is no more, nor the place thereof knowne. Shame and destruction follow pride at the heeles. And the dooth judge by the effects, that the chiefe causes of his ruine were couetousnes, pride, and cruelty: couetousnesse, in that contrary to his honor and faith, he had deliuered the Constable, for the greedy desire he had to enioy Saint Quintin, Han, and Bobain, and some moorables: Pride, in that God hauing raised him to greater dignity then any of his predecessors, accompanied with many goodly and singular graces, yet he thought that the habitable earth could not prescribe limits to his conquests; attributing all to his owne force, and not to the power of the eternal; and the happie successe of his affaires to his owne iudgment: Cruelty, for that in the war of Liege, he had bathed himselfe in the blood of his poore Subiects, glutting his wrath with that sex and age whom the rigour of war doth easily pardon.

And what shall we say of the right hands he caused to be cut off, of those poore soulers at Nasse? Of the fires wherewith he hath wasted so much countrey? Of the Souldiers hanged at Granfon, after they had yielded vpon his faith giuen to the contrary; & of that had hanged a gentleman being taken in the war. He had good parts, valiant, painefull, diligent, desirous to entertaine men of merit, liberal, but with discretion, to the end the many might taste of his bounty. He gaue aduice privately, honoured strangers, and receiued Ambassadors with State. But since the battaille of Montlery, presuming by his only valor to haue forced a mighty King to leaue him the field, he conceiued to ouercome a presumption of himselfe, as neuer after would he beleue any other counsel but his owne: attributing the issue of his enterprises to his owne iudgment and industrie, without obliuiousness a constancy in his vnmeasured desires; as in the end it was his confusion. So the voice of the Eternall breaks downe the Cedars: yea, the Eternall beates downe the Cedars of Libanus. But let vs note the iudgment of God, that before Nancy he deliuered the Constable, and before Nancy he was betrayed by Cambisasso. And let vs obserue the like in our daies as we shall see hereafter. Eleven daies before this battaille, Galeas Duke of Milan was murdered in a Church by Andrew of Lampognio, a Milanoise, who leauing a Son very young, left withall many discords for the government of the Duchie, amongst many Noblemen, one amongst them called Robert of S. Severin, near kinsman to the Duke, banished from his house by the stronger faction, retired himselfe into France, hoping to persuade the King to attempt something against the State of Milan. Lewis taught by former experience, that the French haue alwaies lost easily and with shame, that which they had gotten with much paine and sweat in Italy, would not hearken vnto it, nor be so easily succors for the relief of the Florentines, being ancient friends & allies to the French, against whom Pope Sixtus, and Ferdinand King of Naples made war. But for that he would not seeme vnto abandon them, he sent the Lord of Argenton vnto them with some troopes leauied in the State of Milan, as we shall shortly see.

Galeas Duke of Milan murdered.

The practices of the Duke of Britany.

But what doth Francis Duke of Britany, hauing lost one of the chiefe supporters of his building? He sees, that three of the strongest heads of the Common-wealth are cut off, Charles Duke of Guienne, and Charles Duke of Burgongne; and he knows full well, that the King will not leaue this outrage vnreached vpon such its remaine. The peace made at the Abbey of victory had bene confirmed by the Estates of Britany, sworn by his Deputies renounced all pretension to this Duchie, but he forgets nothing, though hee sleepes. He is now freed from his most mortall enemy: by all probabilities he should hereafter employ his forces in Britany: he must therefore warrant himselfe with some notable support, and make some provision from the English.

Discouered by the Kings

A This negociation required much secrecy and silence, for Lewis was exceeding ielous, and discouered cunningly such practices. So as the subtilty were surprisid in their owne subtilties. Peter Landays Treasurer of Britany, was the man best acquainted with the dukes most secret intelligences, and vnder him, William Gueguen. For the dispatches for England hee vsed one Maurice Bromel, who for three yeares space was the messenger to carry letters betwixt the duke of Britany and the King of England. It chanced that Bromel passing at some port, discouered himselfe to a seruant of the Kings, who presently advertised his Maiesty. Lewis did cunningly make his profit of these aduentures: Yet must hee not rashly apprehend the companion, thinking it best to discouer more. The King tooke win this messenger, cunningly employes a certain man of Chierebourg in Normandy, who could counterfeite the Dukes hand, the King of England, and their Secretaries. This Agent for the King, treats with Bromel, and for a hundred crownes for every letter coming from either part, gets a promise of him, and a place appointed to deliuer the letters, and to receive his money. The Agent made copies, counterfeited their hands, and bringing them vp with a feale either counterfeite, or stolne by Bromel, he sent the copies into England, and brought the King the originals. In the end, two and twenty letters, what of the Duke and Edwards, fell into the Kings hands, without discouery.

And although the Duke fought to the English more to defend him at need, then to offend, yet would he maintaine himselfe in the Kings good fauour. For this effect, one day among others, he sent Chauwin his Chancellor, the Seneshall of Vannes and others of his Councell, to giue Lewis to vnderstand the deuotion he had to his seruice. At that time the King pursued his conquests vpon the heire of Bourgoigne, being ready to besiege Arras as we shall presently shew. Being ariued, they are all committed prisoners, and sequestered vnder diuers guards. After two dayes, the King sends for the Chancellor, reproacheth him, that hauing often conferred with him of the affaires of Britany, holding him for an honest man, he findes it strang, that he had alwaies so constantly assured him, that his master had no secret intelligence with the King of England, seeing that now the contrary was manifest. The Chancellor continues in this protestation, and for more assurance engageth his life; but twelue letters written by Gueguen and signed by the Duke, and ten others by Edwards, make him hang downe his head, and to confesse himselfe faulty. But for his owne particular, he protests of his innocency, & in case that he or his companions deputies, be found to haue bene acquainted with this intelligence, he will lose his life. The King is satisfied herewith, he returns them backe without any further audience, and giues them the originall, for a prooue against the Duke. He iustly complaines, that making shew to fauour him, he doth notwithstanding practise with the most ancient enemy of the crowne. That if he do not renounce all intelligence with the King of England, he will not take him for his friend. Chauwin being returned, makes his report deliues the Kings commandement, his answers, his countenance in speaking, the accents of his words, and the consequences that might ensue. He beseecheth the Duke to retire himselfe in priuate, and then to versifie his sayings, he laies vpon the table the two and twenty letters.

Lewis discouers the Duke of Britany Letters to his Chancellor.

The Duke amazed to see that plainly discouered, which hee thought to haue bene known but to two, sends for Landays & commands him vpon his life to tell him, by what means they might fall into the Kings hand; the which must needs proceed from one of the two. Landays knows the hands and seals, but cannot conceiue the residue: and all amazed he offers himselfe to prison, and to lose his life, if hee bee any way found guilty. Then he remembers that only Bromel had alwaies carried & re-carried these letters: they must kinde out him (being then employed in that action) & make him vnfold that doubt. He therefore sends after him in post, & takes him at Port-blanc, where he attende a winde to imbarke, and was brought to Nantes. His confession did absolve Landays, & he was cast into the Riuer in a Sack very secretly, left the King should be aduertised thereof, who sufficiently informed of the Dukes ill mind, turned his armes into Britany. But the war against Mary of Bourgoigne troubled him sufficiently, yet to proceed with some lawfull pretext, he would fortifie himself with a grant he obtained from the Lord of Boufflac, & of Nichole of Britany his wife, the only heire of Charles of Britany, Earle of Ponthieure: a house which in old time did quarrel for the succession of this Duchy, by the which transaction, in the yeere 1479, the 19 of Ianuary, they yielded vnto him all the rights they might pretend to the said Duchy. But it is now incorporate to the crowne, by a iuster title then by armes.

The Duke of Britany amazed to see his intelligences discouered.

By what means, Abbeville, Dourlans, Montreuil, Roye, Montdidier, Peronne, Han, Bohain, Saint Quintin, Tournai, Arras, Hesdin, Boulogne, Terouenne, Douay, and other places were reduced to the Kings obedience, and Bourgongne united to the Crowne.

The first intelligence the King received of the overthrow of Charles of Bourgongne, gave no assurance of his death; for by means of the posts he had newly established, he had speedy aduice. Thereupon he resolves to enter Bourgongne with the army he had in Champagne and Barrois, attending the Duke, and upon this sodaine terror to fall upon the country. And he imagined to have both right and means to do it: right, for rebellion and treachery committed against the Crowne; means, for that the flower of all the Nobility of Bourgongne was lost and all his forces dispersed. If happily the Duke lived, this would be his ruine. It was also, to keepe the Germanes and Suisses from the possession thereof, and to save the Province from ruine, loath to suffer a stranger to sit thereon, seeing it holds in souerainety of him.

In the meane time he giues away, (in case the Duke be dead) some lands which the Duke possessed, and sends the Admirall with the Lord of Argenton, with authority to open all pacques vpon the way; and if the Duke were dead, to receive into his obedience all such as would yeeld themselves. Vpon the first day of their journey they had certayne aduice by a messenger which the Lord of Craon sent to the King. Abbeville made them so to the rest. The Admirall, and Argenton had sent a man before, to treat with the leaders, who attending the coming of these Noblemen, there came forth to the number of foure hundred Lances. Being come forth, the people open the gates to the Lord of Tercy; and they spare the King those Crownes and pensions, which the Admirall by virtue of his warrant had promised the Capitaine. This was one of the Townes which Charles the seuenth, had deliuered by the treaty of Arras: the which should (for want of being male) returne to the Crowne.

Dourlans follows. They summon Arras, the King pretending this towne to be his by confiscation, for not performance of duties, and in case of refusal, they threaten force. The Lords of Rausseign and Cordes make answer to John of Vacquery (afterwards chief president of the Parliament at Paris; that the County of Artois appertained to Mary of Bourgongne, and came to her directly from Marguerite Countesse of Flanders, Artois, Bourgongne, Neuers, and Rhetel, married to Philip the first, Duke of Bourgongne, sonne to John, and younger brother to King Charles the fifth, beseeching him to maintain the truce made with Duke Charles deceased. So they returne without doing any thing, but only won some men, that soone after serued the King well: who (resolving to reduce such places by force, as should disobey his command) goes to Picardy. In this voyage, he causeth his Court of Parliament at Paris to come to Noyon, with the masters of Requests, and some Princes of the blood, to resolve vpon the processe of James of Armagnac Duke of Nemours, and Earle of March, prisoner in the Bastile at Paris, and taken in the year 75 at Carlat, by Peter of Bourbon Earle of Beaujeu, at what time the Dukes wife dyed, partly for griefe, and partly by child-birth. Shee was daughter to Charles of Anjou, Earle of Mayen. By which Court (being found guilty of high treason) he was condemned by a sentence pronounced by John Boulenger the first president, to lay his head vpon a scaffold at the Halles at Paris, on Munday the 3 of August: and was by the like grace buried at the Gray-Fryars, as the Constable had been. He was one of the chiefe of the war for the common weale, whom the King laboured to bring to his end all he could. Lewis is exceeding glad, to haue surmounted his most malicious aduersaries: the Duke of Guigne his brother, the Earle of Armagnac, the Constable, the Duke of Nemours. All the house of Anjou was dead, René King of Sicilia, John and Nicholas Dukes of Calabria, and their cousin the Earle of Mayen, afterwards Earle of Prouence, whose successions he had gotten.

But the more the house of Bourgongne exceeded all the rest in greatnesse and power, hauing with the helpe of the English, continually shaken the estate of this Realme, for the space of thirty two yeares vnder Charles the seuenth; and their subiects being alwayes ready to trouble this Crowne by Wars: so much the more pleasing was the death of their last Duke vnto him, knowing well, that being now freed of his greatest inember, he Townes in Picardy yeeld to the King.

A should hereafter finde greater ease. Yet he erred in his proceeding, not taking so good a course, as he had forecalt in the life of Charles of Bourgongne, in case he should die, for allying himselfe by the marriage of the Dauphin, his son, with the heire of Bourgongne, or at the least with some of his princes (for that there was a difference of age betwixt the) he had easily drawn vnto him the subiects of these large and rich Siegneuries, and had persued them from many troubles, the which haue afflicted both them and vs by the same means: and freeing them from warre, hee had greatly fortified his Realme, recouering with small toyle, that which he pretended to be his. The which he might easily effect: for the Bourgaignons were very humble, without support and without forces, nor able to make aboue fiftene hundred horse and foot, which were preferred at this generall overthrow.

But these are humane discourses, wherein hee had done better, then thus resolutely to haue sought the overthrow of that house, and by the ruine thereof, to purchase to himselfe friends in Germany or elsewhere, as he pretended, but without effect. Presently vpon his arrival, Han and Bohain yeelded. Saint Quintin takes it selfe, and calles in the Lord of Mouy. William Bischope, (borne at Molins in Niuernois, a man of bafe quality, but enriched and raised to great authority by Duke Charles,) Gouernour of Peronne, yeelds the place, and the Lord of Cordes inclines to the French party. They failed of their enterprise at Gand, but it succeeded at Tournay. The King had sent Master Oliver le Dain his Surgéon, borne in a village neere vnto Gand, not only to carry letters of credit to Mary of Bourgongne, (who then was in the possession of the Gantois, that suffered no man to speake vnto her, but in the presence of witnesses) perswading her to yeeld vnto the Kings protection, seeing that both by father and mother, shee was issued from the blood of France, (being well assured that he should hardly obtaine her) whilst that he provided her a husband fit for her quality, as also to worke some alteration in the City, they being discontented with the Priuiledges which Philip and Charles had taken from them, and the rigorous exactions they had made. Oliver hauing stayed some dayes at Gand, is called to the Towne-house to deliuer his charge. He deliueis his letter to the Infanta, assisted by the Duke of Cleues, the Bishop of Leege, and other great personages. She reads it, and they call him to deliuer his message. He answers, that he hath no charge but to speake to her in priuate. They reply: It was not the custome, especially to a yong Gentlewoman that was to marry. He insists, that he will deliuer nothing but to her selfe: they threaten him with force: he is amazed, and going from the Councell, (considering the quality of the person) they doe him some disgraces; and if he had not speedily escaped, he had beene in danger to haue had the riuier for his graue. Doubtlesse it is a great hazard, when matters of importance are managed by men of meane estate, and the people thinke themselves contemned, if they be treated with all by men of bafe quality. This barber knew something for to preuent this inconuenience, hee teamed himselfe Earle of Meulan, (others write of Melun) whereof he was Captain. But Lewis reposed great trust in two men of the same sort. Being gone from Gand, he retires to Tournay, the which lies vpon the frontiers of Hainault and Flanders, a strong and a goodly towne, but free, and at that time a neuter, feared fully to keepe those two Provinces in subiection. Oliver was there some dayes without respect, during the which hee corrupted thirty or forty men, and fraught with their promises, hee sent secretly to the Lord of Mouy, that at the breake of a certaine day appointed, he with his company and some other troopes, would be in the suburbs. He comes at the appointed time, and master Oliver with his men giues him entrance, to the content of the people, but not of the Gouernours, of the which hee sent seuen or eight to Paris, who departed not whilst that Lewis liued.

To speake truly, Oliver shewed both wit and valour in this stratagem; and for the action of Gand, he is not so much to be blamed, as he that employed him. Conde, a small towne betwixt Tournay and Valenciennes, cut off all victuals from the French, and hindered the victualing of Tournay. It was taken and burnt, for that it did but employ men which might serue elsewhere, and Tournay was sufficient to keepe the Country in obedience. It seemed that the prosperity of the Kings affaires and his great designs began to trouble his spirits: for prooue whereof, a Gentleman of Hainault (the Original doth not name him) associated with many others, offers to deliuer vp the principall Townes and places of the County. He talks with the King, who likes not of him, nor of the rest

he named. The reason is, they would sell a good peece of seruice very deare. Yet hee referred them to the Lord of Lude, bred vp from his youth with him. But Lude feasted with the same humour, transported with his private profit, demands at the first, what the townes would giue him to manage their affaires. So as the Hannuyer (who would haue no competitor in his gaine) departed without effecting of any thing, and the enterprise proued vaine. Without doubte God would not glut vs with felicity, and it is needfull to haue crosses, to make vs to know our felues. Moreover, it was not reasonable to vsurpe any thing vpon this Countie of Hainault, for that it holds of the Empire, and in regard of the ancient alliances betwixt the Emperours and our Kings, whereby they ought not one to take from another. And for prooue, Cambray, Quefnoy, le Conte, and some other places of Hainault, had willingly put themselves vnder the protection of Lewis, the which he deliuered as freely, with the forty thousand Crownes that they of Cambray had lent him, for the charges of the warre.

Ambassie to
gogne.

Whilest the King was resident at Peronne, an Ambassie comes to him from the Infanta of Bourgongne, consisting of the principall men about her: as namely, the Chancelier Hugonnet, a very wise man, and honourable: Himbercourt, a Gentleman experienced in matters of weight: Pierre, great Nobleman of Zealand: Cripture (otherwise called Gratise, or Grature) with other Ecclesiasticall and secular men. They intreat the King to retire his army, and that all controversies might be quietly ended, according vnto right and reason. They shew, that by the customes of France, and the ordinances of his Predecessors Kings, the women did succeed in the Counties of Flanders, Arthois and other Provinces thereof. That remaining but one onely daughter of the deceased Duke of Bourgongne, yong, and an Orphelin, he should rather protect, then oppress her. That the marriage of the Dauphin with her, should bee more proportionable, then with the daughter of England. And for the more credit, they brought a letter, written partly by Mary the Infanta of Bourgongne, and some part by the Dowager her mother-in-law, Sister to Edward King of England, and some part by Raufsein brother to the D. of Cleues, and neere kin man to the yong Lady, yet none of any credit but that of the Infanta. This letter gave authority to Hugonnet and Himbercourt, and said moreover: That Mary Duchesse of Bourgongne, was refused to gouerne her affaires by the aduice of four persons, the Dowager, Raufsein, Hugonnet, and Himbercourt. Mary beseecheth the King, that whatsoever it should please him to negotiate with her, should passe by their hands, and that he should not impart it to any other. The King (fore seeing that by the confusion of this people hee should fettle his affaires) meane cunningly to make his profit of this letter, but not thinking it should cost two so vertuous heads, in sowing diuision betwixt the Duchesse and her lubitors. Yet before he giues audience to these Ambassadors, he treats priuately with either of them, Hugonnet and Himbercourt, (whereof the first had all his liuing in Picardy, and the other in Bourgongne,) and they desirous to bee continued in their ancient authorities, giue care to the Kings offers: they promised to sence him, so as the aforesaid marriage might take effect.

Diuision betwixt Mary and the Granois.

The rest, whose Estates were not vnder the Kings command, would not tye themselves by promise, but with the alliance of the houses of France and Bourgongne. This was most expedient for the King, but the violent conditions they propounded, withdrew his loue much both from her and them in particular, supposing he should soon haue all, without accepting of a part by an accord. Moreover, he was possessed with a wonderful desire to conquer Arras. The Lord of Cordes might doe much, hee was Lieutenant in Picardy vnder the deceased Duke, Seneschall of Pontieu, Captain of Courtray, Boulongne and Hedin, Gouvernor of Peronne, Montdidier and Roy: he was yonger brother to the Lord of Greuceceur, and already did shew himselfe to be French, his estate lying within the territorie of Beauuais. The townes vpon the river of Somme, by the death of Charles, (the last issue male of the house of Bourgongne) returned to the King, and so de Cordes became the Kings Legee-man. His duty then bound him to yeelde vnto the King such other places as he commanded, but he was bound by oath to his Mistress seruice. A dispensation will false it. There is no hole but Lewis findes a pin for it. Vpon his motion to the Ambassadors, that the deliuerie of Arras would make the way plain for a good peace, and request, that they would be a meane to Cordes to open the City of Arras vnto him, (for in those dayes there were both walles and ditches betwixt the City

He doth it willingly, and sweares fealty to the King, who presently stoppes vp all approaches to the towne, then he goes to incampe before Hedin, leads de Cordes with him, whose men made a shew to defend the place, as ingaged by oath to their Lady: for their credits sake they endured the battery some dayes, then seeing their defences taken away, and their loope-holes battered, Rasse of Launoi giues care to his Capitaine, & yeelds the Towne. The King for his reward gaue him a chaine of twenty links, and euery link worth twenty Crownes in gold, and a good pension for his maintenance. The taking of Hedin, brought the King to Therouenne and Montreuil, the which easily yeelded to his obedience. Boulongne being summoned refuseth, but being battered, it yeelds the fifth or the sixth day. The towne belonged to Berrand de la Tour, Barle of Auvergne: the King finding it commodious for the State of his Realme, compounded, giuing him a sufficient recompence, and as new Lord of the Towne he did homage, without sword or spurres, bare-headed and on his knee, before the virgin Mary, offering (as a duty to the said Image) a heart of massie gold, weighing two thousand Crownes: vpon condition, that hee and his successors Kings after him, should hold the Countie of Boullen of the said Virgin, and doe homage vnto her Image, in the Church dedicated to her name, paying at euery change of a vassall, a heart of pure gold of the same weight.

Lewis purcha-
seth the Countie of Boullen, and doth ha-
mage for it.

C While the King remains at Boullen, those of Arras seeing themselves enuironed on all sides, write to their friends of Lille and Douay, to succour them with some numbers of men: and moreover, they send to the duchesse of Bourgongne, to furnish them with some succours, meaning to put themselves into her hands. The Deputies being two or three and twenty in number, make shew to goe to the King, to treat with him, and vnder this colour they obtaine a passe-port of the bastard of Bourbon, Admirall of France, But being discovered vpon the way to Flanders, they were taken, brought to Hedin, deliuered to the Prouost Marshall, condemned, and eighreene of them beheaded, the rest were saued by the Kings ariall. Amongst them that were executed, there was one Dardard of Bussie, borne at Paris, and married at Arras. The King had in former time offered him the place of a Councellor of the Court of Parliament at Paris then voyde, and since hee gaue him the office of Master of the accounts at Arras. He caused his head to be vnburi'd, and (as vpon a pole in the market place, with a red hood furled with mienier, like to the Councellors of the Parliament. A worthy punishment for so malicious an ingratitude.)

The Deputies of Arras taken and many of them executed.

There were some few horsemen at Douay, of the remainders of Nancy: they attire three hundred good and bad, and some few foot, and march at noone day in the sight of Arras. The Lords of Lude and Fou, with the company of the Marshall of Loheac, aduertised of their approach, goe to meet with them, they fight with them, kill and take in a manner all of them. The King at his ariall, called foure-score of these prisoners to be executed, to terrifie those few men of war that remained in the Countie. Some of them enter the town, but they were not able to stand out against so great forces. So as after a hard battery they yeeld by composition: That they should remain vnder the Kings obedience, as their Sovereigne, for want of better males, weapons and amunition, not performing: That the Souueraigns and Tribunes should be beleaued by the Kings officers, and deliuered by them to Mary the Duche of Bourgongne, until she had done homage and taken her oath of fealty to the King her Sovereigne Lord. During which time the Inhabitants should receive no garrison from the King. This was the fourth day of May.

Arras yielded.

These things thus concluded, the King sent the Cardmall of Bourbon, the Chancelor of Orlies, de Cordes Gouvernor of the Towne, and Gautier of Baylle of Vermandois, to take the oath of fealty of the Inhabitantes. But after this oath, holily and religiously receiued by the Deputies, who took their repast in the Monastery of St. Vast, behold an insolent troope of desperate people comes crying, Kill, Kill: yet they were but terrified, and fled themselves presently in the City. This tumult, together with the greedinesse of the Commanders, was the cause the composition was but ill observed: for in the presence of Laudard and Crispin, many good Citizens and other rich men were spoiled and slaine, and the City burnt with fire and sword, and the King, the which they say was afterwards restored, And to keep their memories in awe, the King transported most of the Inhabitantes of Arras, and planted it with a new Colony of French, commanding it should bee be called Ville Françoise. At the same time the King advertised, that the Flemings were in armes, and lodged a Blancosse, he sent to charge them, but they dislodge at the brunt thereof, yet not so speedily, but they leaue about 2000 men slaine at the first charge; and the like number in the chafe, being pursued eight Leagues within the County of Flanders. The French in their returne, razed Mont-Cassell, Fiennes, and some other places. The Gantois, whom the severe punishment of the Liegeois had kept in awe, now broke forth. They make a ward of their Duchesse, force her to restore their ancient priuiledges, which Philip & Charles had taken from them, and suddenly they resolve a deadly revenge, vpon such by whom they say they had been controlled. They lay hold vpon those whom they called their twenty and six Lawyers, whom Charles had established in the gouernment of the City, and puts them all, or the most part to death. They haue (say they) cut off ones head without any authority, for their power ended with the death of Charles. And moreover, they slew many good men within the City, that were wise and faithfull friends to Charles in his life. But they proceed yet farther.

The happy course of Lewis his conquests doth much amaze them, whereupon they assemble some forme of a Parliament, by aduice whereof they make a motion of peace to the King, by an Ambassage, giuing him to vnderstand, that the Infanta of Bourgonne is determined to gouerne herselfe hereafter by the aduice and counsell of the three Estates of her Countries: they request the King to desist from making war, and to appoint a day when they may quietly pacifie all controuersies. There was nothing at that time able to withstand the violence of the Kings army. The Low-Countries were left naked of soldiers, those which suruiued (being inconstant) had forsaken the Infantes service: Her was well acquainted with the inconstancy of this people, not able to digest any man of iudgement that had been in any authority with their deceased Prince. He knew, that his inclination was to loue the declining of their Lord, so as it were not with the prejudice of their Country. And therefore he fore-casts (if he might) to sow some seeds of diuision amongst them, whereby he should greatly incommber them. Hee Bayes the Ambassadors vpon their speech, That their Princesse would not conclude any thing without the consell of the three Estates of the County: whereunto hee replies, that they spake without warrant, and that he is duly informed, her meaning is to gouerne her affaires by priuie persons, who desired no peace. And vpon their protesting to the contrary, affirming that they were grounded vpon good instructions, the King opens Maries letters; brought by Hugonnet, Himbercourt, and other Ambassadors, at their first Ambassage, and they returne with no other dispatch then this letter.

Behold here a company vnexperienced in affaires, returne light with care, but fraught with reuenge and diuision: they make their report vnto their Lady, assisted with the Duke of Cleues, the Bishop of Legee, and many other great personages. They strike on the firing which they meane to play vpon: that the King had proued them liars, in that they maintained constantly, that the reuerend the gouernment of her affaires to the resolution of the States. And for proof, as they maintained the contrary, nor imagining her letter had beene produced, behold the Pensionary of Gand, a brutish man and without respect, drawes the said letter out of his bosome, and confounds this basefull Princesse before the whole Assembly. The Dowager, Rausseins, Hugonnet and Himbercourt were likewise present. The Duke of Cleues treated the marriage of his eldest sonne with the Infanta: hee sees himselfe now frustrate by the above-named, so as hee presently becomes a mortall enemy to Himbercourt, from whom hee expected fauour in this suite. The Bishop of Legee complained of many disorders committed by him at Legee, where hee had beene gouernment. The Earle of Saint Paul, some to him that was beheaded, loued neither Hugonnet nor Himbercourt, for they had deliuered his father to the Kings seruants. The Gantois, according to their humors, hated them deadly, for that they were men of other religion, and had beene good and loyall to their master.

To be short, the night after the letter was deliuered, Hugonnet and Himbercourt were tumultuously seized on, and deliuered to (suborned men of their Law: and for that they had caused the City of Arras to be yecked by the Lord of Corbie, as they said, vnto vpon certaine corruption in Iustice, and bribes which (they said) had beene receiued of them of the City of Gand, in a sute against a priuate man, and vpon many extortion in their charges, and other things contrary to the priuiledges of Gand, against the which

Hugonnet and Himbercourt condemned to be beheaded.

A (say they) who soeuer offends must die, these two required and graue personages, with a shadow of Law condemned by the Sheriffe of Gand, and notwithstanding their appeal before the King in his Court of Parliament at Paris, supposing that their expense and delay, might giue their friends meanes to procure their deliuey, they were most willingly put to death. Oh vniuſt, barbarous, and inhumane people! That thus should the earnest supplication of thy Princesse, being in the Towne-house, rather weeping and doling, preface before that mournfull scaffold, were note of sobe to pacifie, and keepe the liues of these two beataichfull seruaunts.

This execution ended, they sequestered from this poore Princesse, the Dowager and Rausseins, who had signed the Letter, they disposing absolutely of her. Posted without doubt, hauing not only lost so many good and great seruaunts; but also seen his selfe now in the tyrannical possession of the ancient persecutors of her house. A great corollie, to be commanded by such as should obey. Afterward they banished whom they pleased, placed and displaced officers after their owne appetites, chafe away indifferently all such as had best deferred of this house of Bourgonne. And to continue their popular fury, they deliuered out of prison Adolfe Duke of Guelldres, whom Charles had long detained, and making him their head, they made a leauey in Gand, Bruges, and Ypre, of about twelue thousand men, the which they sent to Tournay, and burnt the suburbs, and then they retire. But the garison issuing forth, put wings to their feet: so as Adolfe a valiant Prince of his person, turning head to fauour them that fled, and to make the retreat, was over-drowne and slaine, with a great number of his people with him. The Infanta was nothing grieved, for if this stratagem had succeeded for the first fruits of his armes, some hold they would haue forced her to marry this Adolfe.

But wee haue wandred long enough in Arthois and Flanders, let us retire a little into Bourgonne, and consider how this Duchy became French. John of Chaulen, Prince of Orange, was in great credit there. He possessed much land, both in the Duchy and County: he was a man of action, and much esteemed in the Country, and pretended some inheritances against the Lords of Chaugernon his Vncler. Charles of Bourgonne had giuen sentence in fauour of his aduersaries, and (as he said) to his great preiudice, for as he had twice left his seruice. Now the question is to win him againe. The King protesteth to iouch him in al those places which he pretends to belong vnto him, by the success of his grand-father, and to giue him good preferments in France. So he makes him in shew the head of that army which the Lord of Craon commanded, being Lieutenant general for the King in Bourgonne, whom the King trusted more then the Prince, being rather slight in the change of parties. Craon hauing commandement to enter into Bourgonne, sends the Prince of Orange before, to pacifie the Towne of Dijon. He wrought so perfectly, that Dijon and many other places, both of the Duchy and County, did willingly submit themselves to the French command. Auxonne and some other places of France continued still vnder the obedience of Mary of Bourgonne. Craon seeing himselfe in possession of these places, desired rather to hold them vnder the Kings authority, then to deliuer the to the Prince of Orange, notwithstanding the Kings promise and instance, who desired to gratifie this Prince, and yet would not discontent Craon, who commanded the forces. The Prince hauing to doe with a man that would yeeld nothing without good consideration, and seeing himselfe frustrate of his pretensions, he loynes with Chaftaignon his brother, and Claude of Vaudry, a braue Gentleman, raised some troopes, with the which hee draweth from the King the most part of the above named places, with as great facility, as if he had conquered them for him, and then follows the Infantes party, whose age and weaknesse, required a great support by some worthy alliance.

There was some speech of Charles the Dauphin, but hee was but nine yeares old. The Duke of Cleues laboured for his eldest son, the Emperor for his sonne Maximilian King of Romanes. Mary desired much the alliance of France, but the King had some great dislike, deliueyng her letters to the Gantois, the which she had secretly written: which caused the death of those two good men, and the banishment of her most affectionate seruants. Moreover, her Estate required a man to gouerne it. Shee would willingly haue married with the Earle of Angoulême, if the King had beene so pleased.

The humours of the heire of Cleues pleased her not, nor such as were about her. The Emperor kept (as a pawne) a Diamond with a letter, which the Infanta had written vnto him,

The reuolt of the Prince of Orange.

Marriage of
and Mary,

him, by her fathers command; whereby shee promisseth to accomplish the marriage, in forme, according to her fathers pleasure. He sends it to the duchesse, to auerre her mind, and promise, demanding if he would perfitt therein. She doth auouch the contents, and agrees to make it good. So Maximilian comes to Gand, & there the marriage was consummated. A marriage which should proue a fire-brand, to kindle (by their descendants, both within this Realme, and in many other chaires) the combustuous tumults and furies which haue followed, the which happily had been auoyded by a French alliance. But God hath otherways decreed. This marriage was consummated during the Orangeois reuolt in Bourgongne, the which continued some what long, by the support the Germanes gaue him in fauour of Sigismund of Austria Vncle to Maximilian, who (having his territories adioyning, and especially the County of Ferrette, (the which hee had retired by the Swiss means) would gladly haue gotten somewhat of his neighbours. But the indifferency of Sigismund, and the want of money to pay the Bourguignons, were a means that the King did more easily preuent the Prince of Orange his practices, who now called himself Lieutenant to the said Germanes. They supplied him with some troopes, with the which he recovered almost all the County, continuing his course, vntill that Craun came to besiege him in Grey, a small towne of the said County.

before Dole.

Chastaignon seeing his brother cooped vp, and the place ready to yeeld to Craun discretion, posts thither with all the forces he can, and comes to charge Crauns army in front, whilst that the besieged should set upon him behind. So charged both before and behind, he found the march hard: yet by the defeat of fourteen or fiftene hundred men, for the most part enemies, and the taking of Chastaignon, hee wonne the victory. Craun leads his army after this victory before Dole, the chiefe towne of the County: but for that he did presse it but slackly, and neglected his enemy, whose forces he knew to be small, he had ill successe: for in a fiercelly they slew many of his men, and carried away a great part of his artillery. This affront brought him in disgrace with the King, who fearing a more dangerous checke, hearing likewise complaints from all parts, of his great exactions and money vniustly taken, puts him from the government of Bourgongne, preferring in his place Charles of Amboise, Lord of Chaumont, a valiant, wise, and vigilant Capitaine. Loue preuaile more then force. He perswades the King to pacifie the Swisses and other Germanes, who followed the Prince of Orange, in fauour of the house of Austria: and to make the way more easie for the King, hee himselfe did pacifie the Commanders.

the Swisses.

Then began the Swisses first league with the Kings, the which hee effected by meane of twenty thousand franks he gaue yearely among the Cantons, and the like summe to be distributed among some Capitaines which he employed. And to please them, hee made himselfe a Bourgesse amongst them, and obtained the title of the first allied to their Common-weale. A title which the Duke of Sauoy pretended to bee due vnto him above all others. They likewise for their parts, promised to furnish sixe thousand men to seruise the King continually, for foure Germane Florins & a halfe a moneth, a number which continued alwayes vnto the death of Lewis. The Swisses are now vnder the Kings pay, and the Bourguignons partie much weakened, who assemble the Nobility of the Countrey together, vnder the Prince of Orange, and defeat the companies of Salezard and Cominghen neere vnto Grey. But Amboise (being fortified with men and artillery) takes Vaudemont, Semeur in Laxouis, Chastillon vpon Seine, Bar vpon Seine, Beaulne, and Rochfort neere vnto Dole, belonging vnto Vaudray. Thus having freed all the approaches to Dole, hee camps before it, batters it, makes a breach, giues an assault, and takes it. Some troopes of the townes last subdued thrust themselves into it, either to withstand it from spoile, or to haue a better share, but there enters such a multitude of franks, as it was impossible to faue it from sacke and fire. Yet the King repaired the ruines about the walles, building a great part of the wall towards the riuer of Doux, with a great trench, whereby a great part of the said riuer did run forth, inuironing that part of the wall: but this is nothing, in regard of the fortifications which haue bene since built, whereby it exceeds most of the Cities of Chriftendome, being famous at this day, in Sonate, Vniuersity and Armes.

Auxonne defered a long & sharp siege, but the wisdom of Amboise preuailed so well after the siege of Dole, that (giuing the chiefe offices of the towne, to such as demanded them)

A them) it was yeelded within five or sixe daies, and likewise the Castles of Lou, Saint Agnes vpon Salins, Champagnole, Arguel, and some others built vpon rocks. Beaufort, an Imperial towne, yeelded to the King (by his Lieutenant general) the like duties as they were accustomed to doe the Earle of Bourgongne. Thus Bourgongne being conquered, remained some time in the Kings quiet possession. A young horse hath need of a gentle hand, to make him taste the bit with delight. But Verduin and Beaulne not able to endure the command of the French, began first to kicke, yet by the Gouvernours discretion, they were speedily subdued and recovered from Simon of Quiney, who led a troope of sixe hundred men of foot and horse, Germanes and others, tumultuously assembled in Ferette and thereabouts, to put into the aboue-named places. Verduin was taken by assault, and subiect to the accustomed infolencies in the like prizes. Beaulne yeelded by composition, in the beginning of July, with liues and goods, faued, and for a fine they payed forty thousand crownes. These sudden exploits did so terrifie the other townes, as all kept themselves within their due obedience.

But how doth Edward King of England looke vpon this Theater, where our men play the petty Kings? And how doth he suffer the King without any opposition, to enlarge his estate by the taking of Arras, Boulongne, Hedin, and so many other Townes, and to be lodged many daies before S. Omer? In truth our Lewis had a quicke conceit, and very watchfull. He knew well that the English in general, were wonderfully inclined to war against this Realme, as well vnder colour of their ancient pretensions, as for the hope of gain, incited by many high deeds of armes, wherein they haue often had the aduantage, and of that long possession both in Normandy and Guicenne; where they had commanded three hundred and fifty yeares, vntill that Charles the seuenth dispossed them. That this baite might well perswade them to crosse his designs: these two mighty Princes neighbours, cannot see (without ialousie) the one to grow great by new conquests, and the other to be at quiet. He therefore entertaines Edward with sundry Ambassages, presents, and goodly speeches: causeth the pension of fifty thousand crownes, to be duly payed at London, and some sixteene thousand distributed among such as were in credit about him: so as the profit they drew from the iudicious bounty of Lewis, tyed their tongues, and blinded their eyes. Money was mucke to him in regard of a man of seruice, and he was pleased to vaunt, that the great Chamberlaine (whereof there is but one in England) the Chancellour, Admirall, Master of the horse, and other great Officers of England, were his Pensioners. So hee gaue vnto Howard foure and twenty thousand crownes in money and plate, besides his pension, in lesse then two yeares: and to Hastings great Chamberlaine, a thousand markes of siluer in plate at one time, as appears by their quittances, in the chamber of accompts at Paris.

The politicks liberality of Lewis.

Lewis had great need to vse this policy and bounty, for this yong Princess did infinitely presse Edward, who for her cause did often send to the king to demand a peace, or at the least a truce; and in the Court of England, there wanted not some to incense Edward, that seeing the term was expired, by the which Lewis should send for the Infanta of England, (whom they called Madam the Dauphine) he would deceiue him. Yet no respect, neither priuate nor publike, could moue Edward: hee was purifie, louing his pleasures, vnable to suffer paine, glorious of nine famous victories, and fraught with home-bred enemies: and about all the loue of fifty thousand crownes (so well payed in his Tower of London) kept him at home. Moreover, the Ambassadors that came from him, returned laden with rich presents, and alwaies with irrefolue answers, to win time; promising speedily to resolve the points of their demands, to their masters satisfaction.

The disposition of Edward King of England.

But let vs obserue another ingenious policy: Lewis neuer sent one Ambassadour twice vnto Edward, to the end, that if the former had happily treated of any thing that tooke not effect, the latter knew not what to answer, and so ignorance serued him for an excuse with delay of time. Moreover, he instructed his Ambassadors so well, as the assurance of the marriage they gaue to the King and Queene of England (the accomplishment whereof they both greatly desired) made them take hope for payment. Yet the King had neuer any such meaning: there was too great an inequality of age: and thus getting a moneth or two by mutuall Ambassages, he kept his enemy from doing him any harme, who (without the baite of this marriage) would neuer haue suffred the house of Bourgongne to be so oppressed. Another reason dissuaded Edward from embracing of Mariers quarrell.

Thereason
why Edward neglected Mary of Bourgoigne

She had refused to marry with the Lord Rivers, brother to the Queene of England. The which match was not equal, he being but a poore Baron, and thee the greatest heire of her time. And the better to keepe Edward quiet, the King inuited him to ioyne with him, and confessed that he should haue for his part the Prouinces of Flanders and Brabant, offering him to conquer for him, at his owne charge, foure of the greatest townes in Brabant, to entertaine him ten thousand English men for foure moneths, and to furnish him with artillery and carriages, so as Edward would come in person, and seize vpon Flanders, whilst that he employed his forces elsewhere. But Edward found that Flanders and Brabant were hard to conquer, and painfull to keepe: and also the English, by reason of the commodity of their traffike, had no will to this warre. Tan (said hee) since it pleaseth you to make me partaker of your victories, giue mee of those places you haue conquered in Flanders, Bonlogne, and some others: then will I declare my selfe for you, and assist you with men at your charge. A wife and discreet demand: but those places were no lesse conuenient for Lewis, who was loth to bear the burth, for another to get the biras.

It appeares, that Edward did wonderfully affect the alliance of France, and feared to giue the King any occasion to inuenge it: so as (some say) he caused his brother the Duke of Clarence to be put in prison, vpon colour that he would passe the seas, to succour the Dowager of Bourgoigne: for the which crime, he was condemned to haue his head cut off, and his body to be quartered, a punishment inflicted vpon traitors in England. But at the treaty of his mother, Edward did moderate this sentence, and gaue him the choice of what death he would, whereupon he was drowned in a Pipe of Malmesey. But this Duke was long in law to the Earle of Warwicke, whom Edward had slain in batell, as we haue said: and it seemes the greatest crime they could obiect against him, was the priuate hatred which, surpers commonly beare to those who they doubt might but crosse their tyrannicall vspations. But as we haue recreated our selues beyond the Sea, let vs now passe the Alpes, and see what is done there, suffering our warriors to enioy a truce vntill the next year. There were at that time two mighty families in Florence, the one of Medicis, the other of Pacis. These were supported by Pope Sixtus the fourth, & by Ferdinand King of Naples, to ouerthrow the absolute government of the City: they attempt to murder Laurence de Medicis, and al. his followers, and gaue for watch-word to the murderers, when as the Priest celebrating the high Masse, should say, Sanctus in the Church of S. Reparatus, where they should alight at a certaine day.

Laurence escaped, but being maimed of many of his members, hee saved himselfe in the Vestry. Julian his brother was slaine and some of their followers. Then came they to the Palace, to murder all those which had the government of the City, but being moured, they see that some of their men had abandoned them, so as they were not about foure or five, and which was worse, the gates were shut vpon them. The Senators (seeing these rascals thus banded) put their heads out at their windowes, they see this tumult, and heare Lames Pacis and others crying Liberta, Liberta, and Popolo, Popolo, (words to moue the people, and to make them follow their faction) but they mused not: so as Pacis and his companions fled from the place, and those that were entered were presently hanged at the bars of the Palace windowes. Francis Saluat Arch bishop of Pisa, hauing laid Mattheus a cuiraffe on his backe, was taken and hanged in the same habit. The Governours seeing the whole Towne to stand firme for them and the Medicis, they send presently to all the passages, to apprehend all such as should be found flying. Lames and Francis Pacis were presently taken, with another Capitaine of the Popes troops vnder the Earle Ieronimus, and hanged instantly, with other great personages to the number of fourscore: some grooms and other base people, were knockt down in the streets. Nicholas Cardinall of S. George, neptew to the Earle was a long time prisoner.

The King aduertised of this hurli-burly, sends the Lord of Argenton, both to take (in his Maiesties name) the homage which Bonne Duchesse of Milan, ought for the Duchy of Genoua, in the behalte of the yong Duke Iohn Galeas her sonne, and to receive the men at armes, which they had granted in fauour of the Medicis. The Pope aduersed of the execution done at Florence, doth excommunicate the Citizens and with the same breath commands his army to march, and to ioyne with that of Naples, being graced faire. It was commanded (for the Pope) by the Duke of Vrbis, Robert of Rimini, Comptaine of Pesaro, and many others: and for Ferdinando, by his two sonnes, the one Duke of Calabria,

A Calabria, the other Don Fredericke. They take many places about Florence, and almost ruine the whole State. There were few Commanders, of small experience, and weak forces. The Kings assistance did somewhat comfort them, being after much waile abso- lued and reconciled to the Church. As also to terrifie Pope, Lewis had called a Council of the French Church at Orleans for the restoring of the pragmatick Sanction in France, and to abolish the custome to cary money to Rome for the obtaining of Bulls: yet the Assembly brake off without any conclusion, and was referred to Lyons the next yeare, but without effect. Thus passe the affaires of this world, but many doe oppress him at the length. Our Lewis hath in a manner out-lined all his greatest enemies, and now hee begins to decline. Troubles, care and waywardnesse, call him mildly to his grave: the vigor of his spirits faile him, and hereafter we shall see a strange alteration in his humors. The truce ends, and seeing wee must returne to warre, let vs beginne it by some notable stratagem. The Arch-duke Maximilian hath now the Flemings hearts at his deuotion. To employ them, hee camps before Therouenne, with about twenty thousand Flemings, some Germane troopes, and three hundred English, led by Thomas Abbingham an English Capitaine. The Lord of Cordes Lieutenant General for the King in Picardy, assembles what troopes he can, out of the neighbour garisons, eight thousand francke archers, eleuen hundred men at armes, and makes haste to releue it. Maximilian vnderstanding of their approach, raiseth the siege, marcheth towards them, and affronts them at Guinegatte. Des Cordes was the stronger in horse, but the weaker in foot. The forwards ioyne without any slay, the Arch-dukes (being led by Kaufstein) doth not maintaine the fight, but is soone broken and chased euen vnto Aire by Cordes and Tori. The foot stand firme, supported by the Arch-duke himselfe, the Lord of Rhomont, the Earle of Nassau, & two hundred Gentlemen al on foot: the franck archers of the French, supposing that these footmen would flie with the fore-ward, fall vpon the baggage. The Duke doth charge them, forcing them to leaue their booty and fall to armes. The slaughter was great, but most of the enemies. Eleuen thousand Bourguignons were slaine, saith the History, and nine hundred prisoners, amongst the which was a Germane Earle, & the King of Polands sonne: of the French there died five thousand, and the small number of the Kings army, made the enemy continue master of the field, who gathering together the remainders of his troopes, tooke the Castle of Malaunoy by assault, where Capitaine Remonet (notwithstanding the faith which was giuen him when he yielded) was hanged. For satisfaction hereof, fifty of the above-named prisoners, were hanged by ten in a place, ten where Remonet was executed, ten before Douay, ten before Saint Omer, ten before Arras, and ten before Lille. Des Cordes did runne rashly to this battell and without the Kings commandement: who was somewhat amazed with the first news, thinking they had concealed the truth, and that it was quite lost for him. If it be so (said hee) farewell all my latter conquests: he was not accustomed to lose, but alwaies very happy, being loth to hazard much in fight. But if any Capitaine had meanes to tell him a good place, hee was a liberall purchaser at what price soeuer: but the seller must afterwards take heede of his Gospill the Hermit the Controulour of his house.

This blam made Lewis relouie to treat a peace with Maximilian, so as it might bee profitable vnto him; and that he might thereby curbe the Arch-duke, and by the helpe of his owne subiects, so as afterwards he should haue no meanes to annoy him. For this effect the King seeks to the Gantois, that by their mediation, a mariage might be made betwixt Charles the Dauphine, and the daughter of the said Arch-duke, vpon condition to leaue the Counties of Bourgoigne, Auxerre, Malfon, and Chatolais, and to quit him Arthois, reseruing Arras in the estate hee had settled it, the City commanding the Towne, the which hereafter should bee held of the Crowne by the Bishop. As for the Duchie of Bourgoigne, the Earledome of Boulogne, the Townes lying vpon Somme, and other places in Picardy there was no mention. The Gantois (and by their soliciting, those of Bruges with some other chiefe Townes of Flanders and Brabant, who desired rather to suppress, then to fortifie their new Lord) gaue eare to this transaction, ill intreating Maximilian and his wife all they could, being loth to submit themselves to his command: first, for that he was a stranger; secondly, for that they knew more iudicious Princes, but not any more couetous then his father, whose sonne was seasoned with the same base couetousnesse, which caries with it great contempt. treatingeased with a truce, attending the conclusion of a generall peace. In the meane time our Lewis applies himselfe to order his Realme, to reforme Iustice, and the Court of Parliament; (especially for the tediousnesse of suites) one of the principall points for the which he hated it) but without any diminution of the number of his officers, nor of their authority. Moreover, he desired to bring into all the Countreies his obedience, one custome, one waight, and one measure, to suppress those horse-leeches the practitioners, and the Merchants fraud. He had wonderfully oppressed his people, yet awfully; and neither admonitions nor supplications could procure any reliefe: the motion must come from himselfe, he is now wholly addicted therunto, but sometime a burning feuer tending to fury, sometimes a cold palsey, sometimes the trouble of the humors, sometimes his speech fayling, sometimes some other fits or distemperatures of mind deturbs him from his good humor. To reach vs, neuer to deferre that which will to morrow, which we may presently performe: for wee ought to feare, that God will not giue vs the will and meane to doe well, when we haue once neglected it. All these ordinary infirmities made him froward and vnpleasing to his house hold seruants, causing him to take their seruices well meant in euill part. And being one day at Forges neere vnto Chinon, about dinner time, troubled with his ordinary fits, as hee would haue drinke towards the windowes, they hindred him: vpon his first recovery, hee chafed away at those that had by force stayed his approach to the windowes: neither would hee ever after admit them to his presence, holding themselves happy to enioy their offices. His iudgement being troubled, it made him thinke, that this manner of proceeding did derogate from his authority, which he sought to maintaine about all things, neither would hee be disobeyed in any thing, doubting lest in the end they should controll him in the gouernment of his affaires, as distract of his wits. Vpon his amendment after any infirmity, hee would still know what expeditions and dispatches they had made. Hee tooke the letters; and made shew to reade them, although he had no knowledge, or very little. Yet must they please him in all things, being dangerous to offend him. This first fit continued about fifteene dayes, at the end whereof hee recovered both speech and iudgement. He lets the Cardinal of Balue at liberty, (a prisoner since the yeare 1468.) at the request and p[er]suade of Cardinal Saint Peter ad Vincula, Legate in France, being sent to mediate a peace betwixt Lewis and Maximilian, and to sollicite them to succor the Christians oppressed vnder the Turkes persecutions, whom the King satisfied with hope and good words.

But being come to Peronne, and hauing giuen Maximilian and the Flemings intelligence of his arrival, they would not admit him, and so his voyage proved fruitlesse. Neither admonitions nor requests could euer moue the King to deliuer Balue, & now a simple drawes him to it, seeking an absolution for that hee had detained him so long in prison. And as hee feels his strength and senses to decay, so ieaalousie and distrust (very latent vnto him) increased daily, and apprehending death, hee feared lest his owne subjects should hasten it by some new practices. In this perturbation, hee remembers that Jules Duke of Bourbon had followed the D. of Guienne in the warre of the Common-weale; and that he might ioyne with the Duke of Britany, to raise vp new troubles and to shorten his dayes. He appoints certaine Commissioners ill-affected to the house of Bourbon, who not able directly to touch the Dukes person, they summon his Chancellor, his Attorney Generall, the Captaine of his Guards, and other principall Officers, to appeare in person, before the Court of Parliament at Paris. Being examined and heard, and finding nothing wherewith to charge them, they were freed, and death did soone after seize the said Duke from the feare he had conceiued of the Kings hatred. Hee had imitated the Duke of Bourgongnes army, and by the aduice of des Cordes his Lieutenant generall in Picardy had newly imposed fifteene hundred thousand Frankes, for the maintenance of ten thousand foot: whereof the fixe thousand Swisses before mentioned were a part: two thousand fixe hundred p[er]soners, and fifteene hundred men at Armes of his ordinary, to fight on foot when as need should require, causing a great number of carts to be made to inclose them, and tents to campe in, and therefore hee called them soldiers of the campe. And for that they complained that the franke-archers did greatly oppress the poore people, hee did cassier all their companies. When this new campe was ready, he went to see it ranged in battell in a valley neere to Pont de Larche in Normandy.

Under the command of his Lieutenant Generall, causing them to lie in campe a whole moneth together, to the end he might see what quantity of victualls were necessary for them: and then he returned into Touraine. Being at Tours, behold a relapse, which he feared greatly. Hee loseth his speech, they hold him for dead, hee remains two houres couched on a pallet in a gallery. Being somewhat recovered, seeking to diuert his dis-ease, and to reuiue his spirits by the change of ayre, hee went to Argenton, and then returned to Tours, but still languishing of his dis-ease foretelling death. Then hee vnderooke the journey of Saint Claude, which many Gentlemen had vowed being present at his fall. Vpon his returne, newes comes of the death of Mary of Bourgongne, who going a hunting mounted vpon a stirring hobbeys, was cast, and after dyed of a quotidian, hauing had by Maximilian, Philip Arch-duke, Marguerite afterwards Queene of France, and Francis that dyed yong. A vertuous Princes, liberrall, respected and beloued of all her subiects.

This death was wonderfull pleasing vnto our Lewis, in the midst of his afflictions, who not dreaming that he had one foot in the graue, thinks now to doe his businesse the better: for (sayd he) the Emperour is miserable, ill beloued and of small credit in Germany: Maximilian yong and of small experience, and ill beloued of his subiects: and moreover, the pupils are in the Gantois keeping, a people inclined to mutiny against the house of Bourgongne. Yet he repined much at the secret intelligences the Duke of Britany had with the English: and now a new subiect thrusts him on to this enterprise, the which doubtlesse hee had vndergone, if his health would haue suffered him. Francis Duke of Britany, vnderstanding that they made excellent armes at Milan, sent to buy a great number, and (to the end they should not be discovered by the noyie, and breed a new suspicion in the King, if hee heard thereof) hee caused them to bee trussed vp in packes of silke, with cotton. These armes passing vpon moyles through Auvergne, Doyac Gouverneur of the Country had some intelligence, and aduertised the King thereof, who declares them forfeited to the benefit of Doyac.

This buying of armes, made Lewis to gape, more then euer, after Britany, but he defers the execution, to practise the Gouernors of Gand by the Lord of Cordes, and treats the marriage of the Dauphin his sonne, with Marguerite the daughter of Maximilian and Mary lately deceased. The late surpris of Aix by Cordes, amazed the Flemings and Brabanders, and made them willing to seeke an agreement with the King. To this end, Maximilian and they together send a great Ambassage to Arras, managed for the Arch-duke, by the Lords of Bergues and Launoy, with some Secretaries: and for the Communalities by the Abbots of Saint Bertin and Saint Peter of Gand. The King appoints his Lieutenant generall in Picardy to heare them, with la Vacquerie, lately created first President of the Parliament of Paris, and other graue personages. A peace is concluded by meanes of the said marriage, in fauour whereof, they giue (as a portion to the said Marguerite) the Countiees of Arthois and Bourgongne, the lands and Seigneuries of Malconois, Auxerrois, Charolois, Salins, Bar, Sens and Noyon, to enioy them for euer. And in case that yong Philip Earle of Flanders should die, Marguerite should succeed him in all the Lordships that belonged to her deceased mother, the souerainty of Flanders remaining to the King. By meanes hereof, the Artisans (that had bin confined) returned to Arras, and the city recovered her ancient name.

Thus Marguerite was conducted into France by the Lady of Rauestein, the bastard daughter of Philip duke of Bourgongne, and receiued by the duke and Duchesse of Bourgogne, who led her to Amboise, the place of the Dauphins abroad, where the marriage was solemnly celebrated. Edward was wonderfully incensed at this marriage, seeing himselfe deprived of his pension, and fearing lest this disgrace should breed him great contentions, yea a rebellion of his subiects, seeing the effects of that which hee would not beleue. Moreover, hee did finde, the King had newly planted strong defenses betwixt them two, and his conquests did stretch very neere vnto him. Hee conceiued so great a griefe vpon all these considerations, as soone after hee died, partly for sorrow, and partly of an Apoplexy. Soone after the death of Edward, Lewis receiues letters from the Duke of Glocester, who (by the murder of his two nephewes the sonnes of Edward, his brother) had vsurped the Crowne of England, and was called Richard. This Richard sought the Kings friendship, but Lewis abhorring so barbarous a cruelty, would not vouchsafe to answer his letters, nor to heare his message. But he enjoyed not long this tyrannous usurpation. God raised vp that Earle of Richmond (whom we haue seene so long prisoner in Britany) who with some little money from the King, and three thousand men leauied in the Duchy of Normandy, passed into Wales, and ioyned with his father in law the Lord Standley, with fixe and twenty thousand English, with which forces he encountered Richard, fought with him, and slew him in the field, and then was crowned King of England. At the same time, William of March, brother to him whom they commonly called the Boare of Ardenne, (to install his sonne in the Bishopricke of Liege,) leaues a great number of foot and horse, and besiege Lewis, brother to the Duke of Bourbon, being Bishop there. The Bishop craues succours from the Archduke of Austria and the Prince of Orange his brother in law, who not able to come in time, and preft by some secret partisans of La Marche, hee goes forth in armes to fight with his enemy, and was slaine: whereby La Marche entred into Liege, but soone after he was surprized by the Lord of Montaigny, ayded with some troopes from the Archduke, and suddenly beheaded.

The last act of Lewis his life.

His disposition
in his declining age.

Our Lewis is now well satisfied touching the affaires of Flanders: there remained nothing but a reuenge of Britany. But oh! how doth suspicion, feare, distrust, and finally death, break off his great desires? he is now at Pleffis neere Tours, priuate, solitary, and shewing himselfe to few. He feares a decay of his estate, and yet is become vnable to gouerne a great estate. The opening of a doore feares him; his owne shadow amazeth him, death terrifies him, but (the worst is) his conscience troubles him. He puts his most trusty seruants from him, he doubts his neereft kinsmen, he abhorres them he suspects, and suspects all the world. Those whom hee doubts most, hee distrusteth, with a couple of his Guard to guide them; pensiuē, sad; dreaming; froward; peeuish and cholericke: euery thing displeaseth him, all is vnfeasonable; all offends him; hee knows not what is fittest for him, either life or death, and yet he would liue and reigne. He knows that he hath many enemies, and hath offended many, that the greatest of the Princes loue him not; that the meaner fort murmured, and that the people hated him: for hee hath overcharged them, yea more then any of his predecessors, and hath not meane to calue them; and although he had a will, yet it is now too late.

Oh what a grieuous testimony is the conscience of our misdeeds! Few enter at Pleffis, but his household seruants, and the Archers of his Guard, whereof there are foure hundred daily in guard at the gate. No Nobleman lodgeth there, none come there but his son in law Peter (afterwards Duke of Bourbon; by the death of John his brother) and few of his followers: and yet he thinks: still, that some one enters to offer violence to his person: or that by loue or force they will pull his scepter from him. Hee causeth his sonne to be straightly guarded, and will not suffer many to see him, lest he should bee made the head of a faction. His daughter hath no access to him: his sonne in law no credit. His son in law returns from the Dauphins marriage: Lewis with a deuice, makes the Captaine of his Guard to search such as are entred with the Duke, to see if they were not secretly armed. He commands him to hold the Councell, then he dissolues it: for in his absence they would make Monopolies. Who did euer see a minde more distrust, more vnquiet, and fuller of cares? He distrusts his sonne, his daughter, his sonne in law, and generally all those that may command.

The Castle gate is safely guarded; but they may leape ouer the walles, they may be planted with gaddes of iron, with many points, and so thick as no man might passethem: and moreover, the ditch at Pleffis, compassed in with great barres, with foure engines of iron at the corners: Canoniers, and forty Crosse-bow men were appointed to stand, ten a day and night Centinell in the ditch, with commission to shoot at any one that should approach in the night, vntill the opening of the gate in the morning. Doubtlesse, the iustice of God would that those cages of iron, and those of wood covered with plates of iron both within and without, those shackles, bolts, manacles, chaines tyed to a great bowle, weighty beyond humane force: where he had oftentimes imprisoned many, (yea and of honour,) for very triuolous causes, should now be so many tortures to his conscience, at the last point of his death: and as he had giuen them eight foot in breadth, and it may be so much in height, to stretch out themselves, so he now retires himselfe into a little corner of the Castle, and like another Perillous, they were fatal to their first deuiler. his sonne.

A of Verdun remained foureteeen yeares shut vp in the first that was made. To conclude, no dispatch came to Court, during this lamentable estate. The King had but one or two about him, men of no credit, who knew wel, that after his death, the best that could chance vnto them, was to be shamefully chafed away. But a great confusion attends them shortly. These men made no report vnto him of any thing that hapned, but onely that which concerned the Estate and the Realme, labouring to maintaine loue with all men. As for his person, euery day a new groom of his Chamber, euery day new seruants. Yet knows he nor whom to trust. One onely amongst the rest gets some credit, but forced. It is his Physician, James Cottier a Bourguignon: he giues him ten thousand crowns monthly, and what Offices, or what lands he will demand, be it for himselfe, or his friends: and for a nephew of his the Bishopricke of Amiens; and as a man would say) his Crowne and his scepter, so as he will prolong his life. An odious, impudent, and audacious Physician: who to continue his credit, said vnto the King. I know well that one of these mornings, you will send me away with the rest, but (swearing a great oath) you shall not liue eight dayes after. A strange heart-breaking, to be braued by a rascall, whereas so many great Princes did yeeld him voluntary obedience. But oh vanity, to thinke that the deuice of man can add one minute to mans life! Lewis had neede to haue bene put in minde of this Oracle; I haue said you are Gods, and all the children of the Lord, but you shall die like men, and you that are Princes shall fall like other men.

C At that time liued Francis borne at Paul in Calabria, a deuout Hermit, without learning, but of an austere life, and holy reputation, founder of the Friars Minimes. The King sent for him by a Steward of his house, in the company of the Prince of Tarentum, son to the King of Naples: at the first sight he kneeles vnto him, and desires him to prolong his dayes. In truth, we haue often zeale, but not according to knowledge. But, Put no confidence in the chiefe of the people, nor in any of the sonnes of man, who haue no power to deliuer thee. O how happy is hee, whom the mighty God of Iacob helpes, and whose trust is in the Eternal! In the meane time, Lewis declines, and death followes him at the heeles: yet will hee not haue men to thinke so, and omits no inuention to diuert this opinion, both within and without the Realme. Within, hee attires himselfe richly, contrary to his custome, and shewes himselfe, but onely in his Court, and gallery: he makes seuerall lawes to be feared; sends away officers, dischargeth men at armes, cuts off pensions, & takes some quite away. To conclude, he passeth his time, to make and marre men. Without the Realme, he payes that duty in England which he owes, and all other places, where he will haue them thinke that he is found and aliue: he sends men vnder colour to buy something: Into Spaine, Naples, and Germany for some horses; in Sicile, some good Mules, but especially of some good officer of the Country, and payed double for them. In Britany, Gray-hounds, and Spaniels. In the Kingdome of Valence, little Water-dogges. In Denmarke and Sweden, Hawkes. In Barbary, little Lions, of the bignesse of Foxes. To conclude, the more he feared the decay of his dignity toward his latter end, the more he sought to be feared, and takes away all occasions to thinke that his end approached. Feeling his end draw nere, he sent for the Dauphin his sonne, whom he had not seene in many yeares, causing him to be nourished apart, lest the colour of his presence should haue bred some faction, as there had rashly risen in his young age against Charles the Tenth his Father. And experience hauing taught him, how dangerous a fodaine alteration was; he commanded him expressly not to displace any Officer, and especially to maintaine Olivier le Daim in the Offices and goods he had gotten in his seruice, as hauing assisted him well in his sickness: (but as this man was hastily and too highly exalted, so must he and some others of like sort bee shortly suppress.) and John Doyac, gouernor of Autiergne, from whom hee had recleued good and notable seruices; to call master Guyot Pot, and the Lord of Beauchage to Court; and to follow Philippe of Cordes for armes: Not to beleene his mother, especially in the gouernment of his State, who (as a Sauoisen) he had found by experience, to fauour the Bourguignons; and generally, to confirme all those in their dignities, whom hee had aduanced: And to ease the people, whom he had oppressed by the necessity of the warres. Few dayes after the King had spoken to the Dauphin his sonne, his ordinary infirmity took him, and he suddenly lost his speech, with a great debility of his forces. Having recovered (judging himselfe but a dead man) he sent the Duke of Bourbon to the Kings sonne (so then he called him) giuing him the charge and gouernment of his said sonne.

sonne. Then he sent the Chancellor with the seale, and part of the archers of his guard, and a Captaine, all his hounds, hawks, and other things, and all such as came to see him, he sent them to Amboise. Yet was he not so well resolved for his death, but hee had some hope to escape, namely by the means of his Hermit, and a multitude of reliques which were brought from Rheims, from Paris, and from Rome, the holy oyle, the rods of Moses and Aaron, the holy Crosse (were it true or false) and such like, vntill the Divines had taken counsell to let him vnderstand, that hee deceived himselfe, and that his only hope must consist in the mercy of God. A hard sentence to a man that had so often commanded, that euen in the last pangs they should pronounce that cruell word of death, the which he feared beyond the condition of man, and preuented by all the remedies that might be inuented. Yet behold he disposeth himselfe; I haue (said he) hope that God will helpe mee: but withall he addes: yet happily I am not so sicke as you suppose. Notwithstanding, he felt the helpe of heauen, for his speech was restored, his vnderstanding good, his memory perfect, whereby he pronounced many prayers, adding thereunto, by his last Will and Testament: That de Cordes should giue ouer the enterprise they had concluded vpon Calais: that they should suffer the Duke of Britany to liue in peace, without feare or suspight, and likewise all the neighbours of the Realme: that vnder the fauour of a peace of five or six yeares, the people might breathe, and the King his sonne grow in age. Finally, on Saturday the thirtieth of August, hee yeelds vp his soule quietly to God, hauing liued threecore yeares and one, and reigned three and twenty: he made choice for his buriall at our Lady of Clery the place of his deuotion.

A cunning Prince, wife, painfull, reuengefull, vigilant, industrious, of a great memory, neuer hazarding that, which by policy, dissembling, money, or any other industry he might obtaine: quiet in his reigne, vnquiet in his life, and vnquiet in his death, not able to solve but in extremities: Deuout, but inclining to superstition. A great oppressor of the people, but to giue to Churches, to foraine pensioners, and to purchase them dead whom he had found fit for his purpose, as we may easily perceiue by the discourse of his life. He was continent beyond the ordinary of great and generous Princes: and in truth greatly to be commended, in that he had so virtuously constrained himselfe within the bounds of his professed vowe, and neuer to haue knowne other women then his owne wife. And if the 61 yeare, (the which he alwayes apprehended as the fatal period of his life, for that none of his predecessors since Hugh Capet, had passed that terme) had not ended his life, he had reformed the State, ordred iustice, & releued the people. Happy in his death, hauing changed a continuall toile, into an eternall rest: happy in that rest (which was hope for in heauen) to haue left a Successor quiet of himselfe, young, but of great hope, and chiefly, for that he had seen the Church, during his reigne, freed from that long and immoderate three and twentieth Schisme, which had so long turmoyled it. Thus are we come to the end of this reigne: but before we proceed, we must succintly view the estate of the Church and Empire vnder his reigne, seeing the course of our History hath drawne vs on thereto without interruption.

Estate of the Church vnder
Lewis.

We haue seen, that by the renunciation of Felix the first, Nicholas the first of that name, remained in quiet possession of the Pontifical Sea. The most memorable acts of his Papacie, were the great Iubile, which he did celebrate in the yeare 1450, where there was so great a concourse of people, that about two hundred were smothered, going and coming out of the Churches, besides an infinite number of people that perished in the riuer of Tyber, through the fall of the bridge of Saint Angelo. This Pope loued learning, he gaue great pensions to learned men, sent them into diuers places, to seeke out books which lay hidden in darknesse, by the negligence of the ancient, or perished by the violence of the barbarous, filling his Library at Vatican, he caused many Greeke Authors to be translated into Latine. He repaired many Churches and other buildings ruined in Rome, enriching them with vessels of gold and silver, and crosses beautified with precious stones. Finally, grieved for the taking of Constantinople from the Christians, he shed of thought, a Fever, and the Gout, or as some will say, of poison, the 25 of March 1458.

Calixtus the third of that name, a Spaniard, of the age of 85 yeares, before called Alphonso Heriz, Bishop of Valence, and Cardinal of the four Crownes, succeeded by the consent of the whole Colledge: commended, for that in the first fruits of his Popedom, he had (according to a vow he had made) proclaimed a warre against Alphonse. And to

A vp Princes, he sent some notable Preachers in those dayes, as Iohn Capistran, and Robert de la Lize, Friars, to exhort Christians to reueue their brethren, detained vnder the Turkes tyranny, and by ringing of the bell at noone-day, to inuite them to pray for those that fought for this quarrell: yet blamed, for that vnder colour of his Indulgences and pardons, which were sold for five Ducats a peece, he had gathered together, and left to his successor, a hundred and fiftene thousand Ducats.

He died in July 1458, Pius the second called Eugenius Silvius, a Siennois, a poore boy, hauing attained to much knowledge, by his laborious study, obtained the dignitie of Pope. He had beene the Popes Secretary, at the Councell of Basil, and by writing had impugned the authority of Eugenius the Schismaticke: and soone after was crowned Poet laureat, by the Emperor Frederick the third, and honoured by him with many Ambassages to diuers Princes. Nicholas the fifth made him Bishop of Triest, and after of Sienna; and Calixtus, Cardinal. But vpon his entry to the Popedom, he sought to suppress two bookes, which hee had published for the approbation of the Councell of Basil, and afterward laboured very ambitiously to enlarge the Roman Sea: for the increase and preservation whereof, the History saith, he neither feared Kings, nor Princes, people nor tyrants. A great enemy to King Lewis the eleventh, whilst that he would not yeeld to the abolition of that pragmaticke sanction: who to crosse him in that yeare 64, did forbid to cary any money to Rome, or to bring any bulls from thence, renuing the same Edicts in the yeare 1478. But in the end he was so flattered by this Eugenius, and by his successor Sixtus the fourth, as hee renounced all the rights of the pragmaticke sanction. Hee had likewise proclaimed a voyage into Turkey, by a Councell assembled at Mantua. But the Ambassadors of King Lewis and of René Duke of Anjou, having laid open the rights which the house of Anjou had to the Realme of Naples, and the wrong was done him, vsurping it to the behoofe of Alphonso the bastard of Ferdinand, whom this Pope had by his absolute authoritie put in the possession of the Realme; he grew so bitter against the French for Ferdinand, as the said Ambassadors would not promise any thing, in their masters name, for this warre: so as the assembly was dissolved, the eight moneth, without any good to Christendome. An Ambitious man, austere to Princes, a great persecutor of the enemies of the Clergy, courteous and officious to his friends, buile for the enriching of the Church, a great builder. And finally, as he was ready to depart from Ancona, to march in person against the Turke, who was then entred Italy, a quotidian ague seized on him, whereof he dyed in the yeare 1464. Of him we reade thus much: as Platina and Sabellicus do report. Priests are forbidden to marry for a great reason, but yet there is a greater for the which they should be suffered. And moreover, Peradventure, it should not be the worse, if many Priests were married, for many being Priests and married, should be saved, the which in their barren Celibates are damned. He likewise would haue abolished some Nunneries of Saint Brigit and Clare, and caused the Nunnes to come forth, to the end (saith Calixtus Secundus) that vnder the habis of religion they should not hide their adulteries.

His first calling was merchandise, but seeing an vncle of his chosen Pope, hee applied himselfe somewhat to learning, and was first created Arch-deacon of Bononia; then Bishop of Ceruo, after Cardinal, and finally Pope. A man of a good personage, but arrogant and proud: so as Platina obserues, that he first spake these wordes: I that the Pope carries within the circuit of his hose all diuine and humane lawes. Exceeding all his predecessors in attire: but about all in his mitre, the which he enriched with pearle and stones of an inestimable price, shewing himselfe proudly vpon solemn dayes, thus sumptuously attired, followed by his Cardinals with Scarlet hats (the which he did forbid all others to weare, vpon grievous punishments) and mounted vpon mulets with foot-clothes of the same colour: grosse and dull witted, louing neither learning, nor learned men: so as he declared them Hereticks that either in sport or earnest did pronounce this word Academy or Vniuersity. Couetous, dissolute, voluptuous, turbulent, giuen to conuiving, and the whole time of his reigne he troubled Italy, with combustions and home-bred wars. Finally, they report little good of him, but that he had beene pitifull to the poore and needy, to haue preserved Rome from famine, and reformed many Monasteries, reducing them to a better discipline. They say, that hauing one day read certaine poesies, made against him and his daughter, he began to grieue; and to blame the rigor of the law made by

second.In the second bookes of the Councell.

Paul the second, borne at Venice, before named Peter Barbo, Cardinal of S. Marke, succeeded. His first calling was merchandise, but seeing an vncler of his chosen Pope, hee applied himselfe somewhat to learning, and was first created Arch-deacon of Bononia; then Bishop of Ceruo, after Cardinal, and finally Pope. A man of a good personage, but arrogant and proud: so as Platina obserues, that hee first spake these wordes: That the Pope carries within the circuit of his bosome all diuine and humane lawes. Exceeding all his predecessors in attire: but about all in his mirth, the which he enriched with pearle and stones of an inestimable price, shewing himselfe proudly vpon solemne dayes, thus sumptuously attired, followed by his Cardinals with Scarlet hats (the which hee did forbid all others to weare, vpon grievous punishments) and mounted vpon mulets with four-clothes of the same colour: grosse and dull witted, louing neither learning, nor learned men: so as he declared them Hereticks that either in sport or earnest did pronounce this word: Academy or Vniuersity. Couetous, dissolute, voluptuous, turbulent, giuen to coniuering, and the whole time of his raigne he troubled Italy, with combustions and home-bred wars. Finally, they report little good of him, but that hee had bene pitifull to the poore and ready to haue preserued Rome from famine, and reformed many Monasteries, reducing them to a better discipline. They say, that hauing one day read certaine poesies, made by him and his daughter, he began to grieue, and to blame the rigor of the law made by

by his predecessors, who did forbid Priests to marry: so as seeing himselfe a scorne to the people, he resolved to give Priests liberty to marry, but an Apoplexy tooke him suddenly out of this world, the 25 of July 1471, leaving a rich treasure. In truth, they gather goods (saith the Oracle) and know not who shall enjoy them. Some impute this sudden death to the Author of the Magicke art, the which he practised.

Sixtus the fourth, borne at Saoune, and named Francis of Ruere, General of the Grey-Frayers, and Cardinal of Saint Sixte, Legat of Aiguon, was installed by the Election of the Colledge, in the Pontificall chaire. Liberal and charitable to his owne, beyond the bounds of true zeale: for in their favour he gave Indulgences and Pardons prodigally, and granted many other things against all right and reason: so saith the History. Amongst the rest, hee advanced Peter of Ruere, to a Cardinalship: a monstrous man in his expences, who in two monthes devoured in vanities, dissolutiō and loosenesse, above two hundred thousand crownes, besides the debts wherewith he charged his heires. He repayed many decayed Churches and Monasteries, built new, and gave them great revenues. He restored the Abbreviators (which was a Colledge of learned men, and studious in diuine and humane lawes, Poets, Orators, Historians, &c.) first instituted by Pius the second, then abolished by Paul the second his successor. Then did he institute anew Bullists, people fitter to get money, then for any other thing, and nine Notaries of the Apostolick treasure, appointing them certaine revenues: which offices were sold in the beginning for five hundred crownes, and since for two or three thousand crownes: so well could they sell their merchandise. Sixtus made many vniust warres, against Ferdinand King of Naples, for that against the Popes liking, he had succoured his sonne the Hercules of Este, Duke of Ferrara, besieged by the Venetians: against the Venetians whom he did excommunicate: against the Florentines, excommunicated likewise with an interdiction of fire and water. But by the intercession and threats of the King, and the succours the Venetians gave to the Florentines against the Pope (who had incensed Ferdinand King of Sicilia, Alphonso Duke of Calabria, and Frederick Duke of Vrbis, Captaine general for the Church) to make warre against them, he absolved them. Then being sick of a Fever, hauing newes that a peace was made betwixt the Venetians and other Potentates of Italy, he dyed suddenly. There discomfited vnder him John Regiomontanus, a great Mathematician, Rodolphus Agricola, Pomponius Latinus, Ambrose Calepin, learned men in humane Lett. It is suffice to haue noted such Popes as haue reigned vnder our Lewis, and now let us see that which concerns the Empire.

That great John Huniades, a firme and sound rampier for the Christians against the Turkes, had left two sonnes, Ladislaus and Matthias. They had for an hereditary enemy Vrlike Earle of Sicilia, neer kinsman and a fauorite to Ladislaus King of Hungary and Bohemia, sonne to Albert of Austria, borne after his fathers death. Ladislaus the eldest, complaining one day to Vrlike, of the slanders wherewith he wrongfully charged him, Ladislaus they passed from words to blowes, so as he slue Vrlike: for the which the King of Hungary caused him to be publicly beheaded, and lead Matthias the younger, prisoner to Prague in Bohemia, to purshim to death, farre from the view of the Nobility of Hungary, to whom the memory of Huniades was wonderfull deere and precious. But as Ladislaus prepared for his marriage at Prague, to be sonne in Law to Charles the seventh, beheld a blacke and deadly poison suddenly chokes vp the ioy which that new alliance had conceited. After whole death there did arise great quarrels for the succession. Some Nobles of Hungary, wished the Emperor Frederick the third for their King: the greater part preferred Matthias, both for that he was of the Nation, as for the happy memory of his father John.

The election being made, Matthias is set at liberty by George Boicbat, the new King of Bohemia: he demands the Crowne. Frederick armes himselfe with a constitution, which he had received from Elizabeth mother to Ladislaus deceased, when she sent him her son to bring vp. Vpon refusal, they goe to armes; but the Germane Princes pacified the quarrell, concluding, that Matthias should pay for his Crowne vnto the Emperor, four thousand Crownes. In the meane time there springs vp new seeds of warre in Germany. Pius the second (making the Emperor; and his deuotion to the Roman See support) puts Dietrick Isenbourg from the Archbishopricke of Mentz, advancing Adolph of Nassau in his place. Isenbourg opposed himselfe vigorously against the Popes exactions, who

A spoiled (as he said) the Provinces, vnder a pretext of warre against the Turke, and moreover, he would enrich himselfe by oath vnto the Pope, who would likewise bind future Ecclesiasticall Electors, not to assemble the Electors of the Empire, for the election of any new Emperor, or for any other cause concerning the Empire, before he were duly informed, to the end his pleasure might be preferred before all others. Ambitious and vncult demand. Frederick the victorious Conte Palatin of Rhine then administrator of the Electorship of his Nephew Philip, the sonne of Lewis his brother, being a pupil, stood firmly for Isenbourg. Lewis Duke of Bavaria, furnished the rich, ioyes with Frederick. The Emperor hated them both, and desired much to crosse them (although in his heart he had reason to fauor that party, for the which they fought) but he feared the valour of Frederick and the wealth of Lewis.

The Pope vrgeth him to stirre vp some great Princes of Germany, to oppose against the protectors of Isenbourg, rather then against Isenbourg himselfe. Adolph of Nassau, was assisted by Albert Marquis of Brandebourg, Lewis of Bavaria, furnished the blacke, Charles Marquis of Baden, and his brother, John Bishop of Metz, with John Earle of Wirtemberg: all which enuied the prosperity of Frederick, and yet feared to try his valour. Frederick was the weaker in men, but right hart a strong party. They neglected their enemies, and charges him disorderly: he resists them valiantly, beats them, cleares them, and puts them to flight, takes the Marquis of Baden, the Bishop of Metz, & the Earle of Wirtemberg prisoners, the first of July 1461, and to let them vnderstand that they had erred in the discipline of warre, spoiling the corses, and burning the Mills, hee caused them to sup the first night of their imprisonment without bread.

The end of this warre was the beginning of another, more fatal to the Emperor. The Pope deposed George Boicbat from the Crowne of Bohemia, as fauouring the doctrine of Hus, and appoints Matthias named Casimir, but the Emperor would not graunt it, depending of the Empire. Matthias was much moued, and the more, when as after the death of George, the Lords of Bohemia, and the Emperor likewise, leauing him, made choice of Ladislaus, the sonne of Casimir, King of Poland, and of Elizabeth, daughter to Albert of Austria. In this warre, the Imperiall Matthe was not onely shaken, but through Fredericks misfortune almost ruined, and he in a manner expelled out of all Austria, & it redged vnder the power of a strange Lord, mighty & warlike. When as beheld Albert Duke of Saxony, sonne to Frederick the second Elector of Saxony, father to Duke George and Henry. Grandfather to Maurice and Augustus Electors, heuies a godly army at his owne charge, allies Matthias, and so weakens him in many battails, as hee abandons the greatest part of Austria, and forceth him in the end to accept a peace with such conditions as Albert would impose. During these partialities in the West, God raised vp some meanes to crosse the Turkes exploits, if the diuisions of Christian Princes, for the most part procured by the Popes, whilst they feried themselves, had not counteracted their own forces against themselves. Three years after this pittifull wound which the Christian Church receiued by the losse of Constantinople, Mahomet the second, besieged Belgrade, but to his confusion. A handfull of men, lead by that brave Huniades, in two dayes together, giue him two bloody battels, whittes them, kills about forty thousand of his men, spoiles his Campe, takes his Artillery, and with some difficulty hee saved his person, being wounded in the left pap, and caried out of the fight as dead. Mahomet seeing by this disgrace, that the land did not fauour him, meanes to try another element: hee right against a fleet of Gallies, to teize vpon the Islands of the Archipelagus. But hee had purchased a mighty enemy, Sumcassan of the race of Asim, Turke, Lord of Cappadocia, Armenia, and some other Countries adioyning, who had lately slaine Metaphran, or as some write Demir of Persia, and by that victory intruded the Realme. Metaphran had pointed the designs of Mahomet, grew to preiudice to make this victory the more famous, he drew rich presents out of the treasures of Persia, and sent them vnto Mahomet, requesting him not to attempt any thing against Trebisonde, nor Cappadocia (a Conquerors request imports an imperious command) Countries which belonged vnto him by titell of the dowry of his wife, the daughter of Dan Comnene. Mahomet not able to digest that a meaner then himselfe should prescribe him a law, employs all his wit to obscure the glory of this new King. He therefore sends a part of his fleet into Asia, directly to Pontus and Sinope, towards Trebisonde. And he himselfe, with an incredible speed

out throwne twice in Asia, winne the third battell.

crosseth Asia, and camps neere to Vsumcassan. Three battels are fought: Vsumcassan winneth the first against Amarath Bafcha, a Greeke by Nation, neere to the flut of Euphrates, which Bafcha was slaine: and the second against Mahomet, where he was in person. These two battels did wonderfully weaken the Turkes forces. In the third, the Persians amazed with the vnaccustomed noise of the Turkish shot, vnable to endure the terror of the harghebuiffe, Vsumcassan and his men oppressed with this new army, lost the honour of the two first dayes, and Zemald the sonne of Vsumcassan was slaine with a shot.

Mahomet pursues his good fortune, besiegeth and takes Sinope the Capitall City of the Prouince; and afterwards all Paphlagonia: then the camps before Trebisonde, batteth it by Sea and Land, and in the end takes it; spoyleth the treasures of King Daniel Commene; sends him prisoner with his two sonnes, and his cousin Iohn le Beau, to Constantinople to serue for a shew, the day of his triumph, causing them afterwards to be barbarously slaine, rooting out the race of Commene. In the same voyage he tooke Silicia from Piramus Calaman, and being returned to Constantinople, hee conquered with his army by sea, the Islands of Lemnos and Lesbos: he vnpeopled Mitilene, and transported the Inhabitants of the Island into another Country.

With his forces at land he assailed Dracula Prince of Valachia: who with such stout forces of foot and horse, as the shortness of time would suffer him to leaue, did surprise and shut vp Mahomet, as both he and his army were in a manner rained: where beheld Mahomet Bafcha, Lieutenant Generall in the Turke army, with a braue and high resolution, opened the passage by force: but with great losse of his men, the which (assisted with new troopes,) he sends into high Missa and Sclauonia: chased Stephen King of Bosnia, out of laize the chiefe City, dispossessed him of his Realme, and in the end sent him about the yeare 1463. A while after Matthias King of Hungary recovered the said City and Realme, overthrew a great army of Turke spoiling the Country of Sirme, took many places in Croatia and Dalmatia, and in the end expelled Mahomet, being come to besiege laize, spoyleth his Campe, and was master of all his baggage. Scanderbeg (expelled his Country) was retired into Italy, where shewing that the diuision of Christian Princes was the means to confirme the Turke estate, and that it was impossible to make him gaine ouer this audacious and insatiable desire, being at Lisse vpon the river of Drille, he was surprised with a Feuer, whereof he dyed, being three score and three yeares old, in the yeare of our Lord 1467.

A Prince exceeding all men in valour, of a wonderfull courage, so as euen with a vehemency his lips did bleed, at the beginning of euery charge. He neuer refused battell, neuer turned his backe, neuer was hurt but once, lightly in the foot with an arrow: he neuer had aboute fixe thousand horse and three thousand foot, and had slaine with his owne hands aboute two thousand Barbarians, striking with such force, as he cut many in two peeces.

Mahomet being freed by the death of Scanderbeg, vnderooke three warres at one instant: Mefibus of the race of the Paleologues, had commission to goe to Rhodes: Acomath Bafcha into Italy, to conquer it, with Rome, and the Empire of the West: and Acomath himselfe goes into Asia. Mefibus being often beaten, was forced to returne with the remainders of his army, languishing and in pittifull estate. Acomath lands in Calabre, takes Oranto, and so amazeth all Italy, as the Pope (neglecting all in regard of the safety of his person) resolues to leaue Rome. Mahomet going into Asia, dyed of the Colicke, neere vnto Nicomedia, in the yeare 1471. A happy death for the Christians: for Oranto besieged by the Italians, ayded by Matthias, was yeelded by composition, with their liues and goods sayed, without attending five and twenty thousand Turkes, which Acomath (pursuing his victory) brought to their succour. Thus Italy was deliuered from imminent danger, and the Pope assured: we will now leaue the raigne of Baizet, successor to Mahomet, to continue our worke in the West.

CHARLES the Eight,

The 56 French King.

His Raigne will not hold vs long, but after the Duke of Orleans league, the motiue of five yeares warre in Britany ended by the Kings marriage with Anne the eldest daughter to Francis Duke of Britany, we shall be transported beyond the Alpes, to take the possession, which René King of Sicile, and Charles Earle of Maine his brother, had by their testaments left to Lewis the 11 to their rights they pretended to the Realme of Naples: vpon the way we shall see him entertained by Lewis Sforce, in the Towne of Ast, then hauing received the Forts of Florence, with the Citie of Pisa, from Peter de Medicis, hee enters Rome notwithstanding the gaine-saying of Pope Alexander, and hauing vfed therein the rights of a Conqueror, he treats an accord with the said Pope: receiues from him the title of Emperour of Constantinople, with the inuestiture of the Realme of Naples: & consequently causeth himselfe to be crowned King of Sicile. And to augment his honour, he makes his passage, maugre the forces of all the Princes and Potentates of Italy, at Foumone: and laden with glory and spoyle, returns triumphantly to seeke some rest in France, after his weary toyles. But alas! when as in the Greene and vigorous season of his life, he shall meditate of a second voyage for the recovery of his Realme of Naples (as easily lost as wonne) and when as the Easterne parts liued in hope to haue the Christian Church restored by him, oppressed now vnder the Turkish tyranny, Death vniust and vnseasonable, according to man, shall with himselfe cut off all his goodly designs, the which he had laid in the beginning of his flourishing youth, to cary him to the fruition of a better rest. The iudicious Reader may iudge, if wee haue reaped more honour and profit in the gaining, then shame and hurt in the losse of so many Estates lying farre from vs. Charles came to the Crowne at the age of thirteene yeares, delicate, weak, sickly in his youth, milde, gracious, deuout, but willfull in his humours. Lewis had bred him vp at Amboise, attended on by few seruants, not visited by any, without any instruction, but bare reading, not willing to helpe nature by art. Yet the weakness thereof hath oftentimes more neede of a prop to support it, and a spur to prick it forward, then of a bit to restrain it. Did he feare that learning should impair his health, or corrupt the good seeds which nature had planted in his minde. He was content, that according to his fathers humour, his sonne should learne this onely sentence in Latin. He that cannot dissimble, cannot rule. But he did him wrong: for, he was inclined to the reading of French bookes: and he came no sooner to the crowne, but they found in him a desire of knowledge, which made him to haue a taste in the Latin tongue. But as the aperiēt time of his age was slip away without profit, so did he salute the Mules but a farre off: weak of body, but of a good wit, capable of counsell, and susceptible of the helpe requisite for the gouernment of a firme and solid State. His minority was the cause of a quarrell, betwixt the Duke of Orleans (a young Prince & next to the crowne) & the Earle of Beaufieu, for the Regency, which caused his coronation to be deferred vntill the next yeare after the which an assembly of States should determine of the administration of the King & realme. The Princes of the blood attending this solemnity, hauing bin so often wronged by Oliuer le Daim, Daniel his seruant, and Doyac, who had wholly gouerned the deceased King, did without the Kings priuie (whose young yeares withheld him from gouernment) informe of their insolencies, proud cariage, vnjust murders, thefts, extortions, & other crimes, which they had committed vnder the authority of Lewis the 11, and by a decree of the Court, make Daniel to forfeit both body and goods, and his master likewise some few dayes after. Doyac whipped at the corner of euery street, lost one of his eares vpon the Pillory at the Halles in Paris, then hauing his tongue pierced with a hot iron, he was conveyed to Monse Perrault in Auvergne, where he was borne: there they cut off his other eare, and whipe him likewise. Moreover the execrable rewards which Lewis had given to some persons, were reuoked, and they constrained to make restitution. To teach meane men, raised by the bounty of Kings, that man is A mortal, but the memory of indignity is immortal with great men.

At the same time the Duke of Britany was wholly possessed by Peter Landays his Treasurer, (of whom we have formerly spoken) by whole flanders and suggestions he had seduced his Chancellor Channin, to die miserably in prison of hunger and cold: being a very honest and a reverend man. Landays was the sonne of a poore Taylor in the suburbs of Rachapt, at Vitry in Britany, as it appeareth in his processe, quick witted, and bush-headed. His first access vnto the Duke was in the quality of a Taylor, and after he vied him in cary his loue letters, the said Duke being of a very amorous disposition. In the end he makes him master of his Wardrop, and finally his Treasurer generally, then he began to manage the Treasure, lustice and affaires of State at his pleasure, he did preferre one by his letters without the Dukes appointment, and place or displace whom he pleased: proud, treacherous, reuengefull, implacable to such as had offended him. Presumptuous, declaring such Noblemen of Britany, as could no longer enquire his arrogancy, guilty of high Treason, for that they had attempted against his person, forfeits their goods, banisheth their persons, and arming his master to their destruction, the which they could not uoide, but by a general pardon and remission.

In the end their patience is moued. John of Chalon Prince of Orange, sonne to one of the Dukes sisters, and John of Rieux Marshall of Britany, the Principall of his Court, having layed a plot, with the other Barons of the Country, at all adventures to seize vpon Landays: they enter the Castle of Nantes, being secretly armed, sicke for Landays, and find him not being gone to Pabotiere, a house of his vpon the Loire, nere vnto Nantes. The Duke is amazed at this insolent proceeding, and beleues it is some pretence against his person. One of his seruants goes vpon to the battlements towards the towne, and crieth out aloud: That they seeke to force the Duke. The archers of his guard storme: the officers and gentlemen of his house flee thither, the people troope together. They place such Artillery as they find in the towne against the Castle, ready to batter downe the gate. The undertakers (who had not fore-seene so dangerous a consequence) shew forth the Duke vpon the battlements, and caule him to speake. He assures them, that they haue not attempted any thing against his person: and to satisfie the multitude, Philip of Montauban enters by agreement, he aduertieth these Noblemen to absent themselves for a time, in the meane time the people would be pacified, and the Dukes wrath appeased. Landays on the other side hauing escaped a troop that was sent to surpris him in his house, saues himself through the ditches of his garden, alone, and on foot: and so in the night recouers the Castle of Poence, and giues the Duke notice of his aduerture. The Duke sends a company for him, and is more ruled by him then before. So Landays assembles all the Officers and men of counsell in Britany: he sends them to the Vniuersities of Italy, layes open the violence done to the Duke in his owne house, by his vassals and subiects, and demand what punishment this offence deserues. The assembly answers, as Landays desired: that they found them guilty of high-treason, yea in the highest degree, and therefore deserved death and losse of goods. A decree followes, with condemnation of death, haues beaten downe, wounds cutt up at the waist, with all the rigours which men condemned for such a crime might desire. They die into France, and offer their seruice to the Countesse of Beaucien, the Kings sister, complaining of the insolencies of Landays, without making further mention of their quarrell with the Duke. Landays discouers their retreat, he vnderstands of the discord betwixt Lewis Duke of Orleans, and the said Lady, and causeth his master (by letters written to Lewis) to accuse the disobedience and treachery of his Nobility, who acknowledging Anne for Regent of this Realme, deprived him of the honour and right that was due to him rather then to a woman, as the first Prince of the blood: he exhorts him not to relinquish his iust title, and promiseth to assist him with his best means. The Duke of Orleans had against his minde (as we haue heard) married Anne the youngest daughter of Lewis the Eleuenth, deformed and vnfit for conception, and followed the only aduice of the Earle of Dunois, sonne to John baron of Orleans, a man of great force, fight, aduised, a good and a valiant Captain.

This Earle did presently force call what (by the means of Landays, who did so secretly inuice Duke Lewis) forsaking Anne, he might marry with Anne the eldest daughter of Francis Duke of Britany. This hope drew him soone to Nantes, where hauing heard the complaints

Landays gouerns the Duke of Britany insolently.

Landays escapes and comes to the Duke.

He condemnes the Noblemen of high treason

Landays causeth his master to inuice the Duke of Orleans against the Countesse of Beaucien.

A complaints of the French, and contented them with words and promises, without any meaning to accomplish them, moued rather with desire to gouerne the Estate, he returns into France, to assist at the Kings Coronation at Rheims, whereof the day approached. There were present at the Kings Coronation, the Dukes of Orleans, Alençon, Bourbon, and Loaring, the Earles of Beaucien, Angoulême, Vendôme, La Roche-sur-Yon, Montpensier, Longueville, Epix, Dunois, and those that were fled out of Britany, the Prince of Orange, John Lord of Rieux and Ancenis, the Earle of Aumale, Ponce de la Riviere (who was created Master of Bourdeaux) the Lord of Vife (who was made master of the horse) and others of their troope, all which brought him with pompe to make his entry into Paris, and to prepare for a general Parliament to be held at Tours, with more free access, then had been of all, yet not so effectual as was expected: euery one seeking rather to maintaine his private authority, then to procure the peoples ease. The pragmaticke Sanction was restored, to vse it as they had accustomed. The Constables sword was giuen to the Duke of Bourbon: the government of the Kings person to his sister, a cunning woman, and somewhat of her fathers humour: but the name of Regent was forbidden to them all, to preuent jealousies. There was a Councell erected of twelve, by whom matters should be dispatched in the Kings name: of the which Lewis Duke of Orleans, should be President.

Lewis discontented with this deuce, seeks to hold his ranke: he pretends that being the first Prince of the blood, the Regency belonged vnto him, he assists at the Councell, in Parliament, and in the Assemblies in towne, and notwithstanding the last Will of King Louis, and the decree of the Estates, yet will he by force haue the name and effect of Regent. But our Kings who may not (to preiudice the elder, or for want of issue, their nearest kinman, being a male and legitimate) dispose of their crowne: haue they not then power to commit the guard of their children, being yet pupils, and the Regency of the Realme to whom they please? Moreover, was it reasonable that he which was not yet five & twenty yeares old, who liued vnder his mothers wing, who by right had yet need of a gouernour, should be declared capable for the government of this Realme? So, want of yeares deprived his grandfather of the same dignity, during the phrensie of Charles the sixth. This discontent is nouisshed by a new accident: Lewis playing one day at Tennis, where the Ladies were present, there fell a stroke in controuerse, the which Anne iudged for the aduerser part. Lewis otherwise moued, casts out some word, importing a lie. Anne discontented therewith, causeth it to be decreed in Councell, that the Duke should be committed prisoner: he is aduertised thereof by John Louen (or Louaine) a Gentleman of his house, and so retires to the Duke of Alençon. The Duke of Lorraine was come to demand the Duchy of Barre, (the which Lewis the Eleuenth had held) and the Earldome of Provence, which he pretended to be his, as sonne to the daughter of René King of Sicilia, Duke of Anion, and Earle of Provence, and by consequence the nearest kinman to Charles Duke of Anion (who by transaction and testament had made Lewis the Eleuenth his heire) yet was the burthen to René, and soane to Charles of Anion, Earle of Maine his brother. Barre was restored, and the Lorraine had a hundred men at armes entertained, with thirty fixe thousand frankes for foure yeares, during the which they should looke into the title of the said Earldome. During this tearme, some well acquainted with the Estate of Provence, produce certaine testaments of Charles the first of that name, brother to Saint Louis, and Earle of Provence by his wife, and of other Kings of Sicilia, which had bene of the house of France, by the which, the house of Lotharing was not onely excluded from the succession of Provence, (not liable to the daughter, while there remained a son of the race) but that also the realm of Sicilia, and all other Seigneuries possessed by the house of Anion, belonged to the King. That K. René hauing regard to the said testaments, had at his death preferred his nephew Charles, before the said Duke of Lorraine, son to his daughter.

For the Duke of Orleans grieved to be thus excluded from his pretensions, and that Anne alone gouerned the King her brother, practiseth the Dukes of Bourbon, Alençon, and Britany (the chiefe support & refuge of the discontented French) the Earle of Angoulême, John Vicont of Narbonne, Francis Earle of Longueville, and many others. Alain Lord of Albrét, hoping (by the means of Lewis, whom hee found to haue great credit with the Duke of Britany) to marry with Anne, the eldest daughter of the said Duke (having not duly examined the heart of Lewis) enters easily into this faction.

Thus all things threaten a horrible and pernicious warre, but more in shew then effect.

A league made by the Duke of Orleans

The Duke of Orleans discontented leaves the Court.

The Duke of Orleans goes into Britany. The Kings Coronation.

Lewis with his allies assembles some troopes, and thinking to put them into Orleans, the inhabitants give him to vnderstand by the Lord of Joyeuz, deputed there on his behalf, that he might well enter with his household, but not with his souldiers. Boiſſgency was then his retiring place.

Anne and the twelve Councillors, cause him to be besieged by Francis Earle of Vendosme, Lewis his brother, Earle of Roche-sur-Yon, René Duke of Lorraine (whom the said Lady had wholly won vnto her, knowing him to be resolute, vehement, and of faction) and Peter of Rohan, Lord of Gie, Marshall of France. In the end this warre was pacified by this agreement, that the Duke of Orleans should come to Court, and enjoy the place that belonged vnto him: but Francis Earle of Dunois (the Dukes right hand) a busie body and the first author of the trouble, should retire himselfe into the Countrey of Aft, belonging to the said Duke, or to what other place hee pleased without the Realme. Mal Lewis then bring his confederates in disgrace with the King, and now abandon them, hold the Duke of Bourbon and the Earle of Angoulesme leading 300 Lances, eight thousand foot, and about eightene hundred Gentlemen of Auvergne, Bourbonnois, Poitou, Beau-iculois and Angoulesmois, and Alain eight or nine thousand fighting men. If Lewis had attended them in some place of strength, how dangerously had hee shaken the estate of Charles, nor well felled during his minority? But he had too good a mind to tear out his own bowels, in their persons, whom the law in time should submit vnto him, & dismember the crowne, which he should weare in his turne. Anne, to disperse this storme, causeth the Earle of Beauieu her husband, to encounter their troopes, and forceth the Duke of Orleans to march in person, against those that came to his seruice. They were Frenchmen: and as they were lightly armed, so were they as lightly disarmed: the Marshall of Gie, and the Chamberlaine of Graulle, shall easily reconcile them. Alain being stopped his passage of Garonne, at S. Basille, by the Earles of Vendosme, and Roche-sur-Yon, was admitted to the same accord, vpon charge to furnish the King an hundred men at arms for his seruice: the which he deliuered vnder the command of S. Cyr, and Forsan. They are dispersed: the King at Amboise, Lewis at Orleans, Alain in Bazadois, and all the rest their houses: the Vicount of Foix, and Peter his brother being Cardinall at Nantes, vnder colour to visit their sister, wife to the Duke of Britany. They find their brother in law much incensed against his Nobility, and they resolute to defend themselves. But as both armies were ready to ioyne, an accord is made by some mediators: that considering the Dukes age and weaknesse of iudgment, the State should be gouerned by the aduice of his nearest kinsmen and friends. Landays is reinforced, and stormes: hee drawes letters Patents in the Dukes name, and declares all those of the Dukes army, that had entred into capitulation with the enemies troopes, guilty of high treason, forfeiting all their goods as traitors: he carries this Patent to the Chancellor Francis Chrestien, to be sealed, and brings a commandement from the Duke to that effect: the which the Chancellor refused. Behold Landays hath purchased two enemies for one, and both haue sworn his ruine, but they must conuenance it with Iustice. They depute the Lord of Pont-Chasteau to summon the Chancellor to doe Iustice vpon Landays, to appoint Iudges for his tryall, and to force him to appeare. They make informations against him, whereupon they decree to apprehend him: it is bruited throughout the towne, that Landays by sentence should be committed prisoner. The people run by heapes, they fill the Caille-yard, and will not depart till Landays be deliuered. He saues himselfe in the Dukes chamber. The Nobility doth force the Chancellor to repaire to the Castle and to demand this man. The Duke being contrayned, deliuer him, but vpon condition that he should not be vied contrary to Iustice, and commands vpon paine of death, that he suffers no outrage be done vnto him, vnder color of Iustice.

The Nobilitie being aduertised of his taking, posts to Nantes, and offer themselves vnto the duke, like humble subiects, suing for his fauour. Landays proceesse being made with that of Isle of Vity, one of his seruants, by certaine Commissioners, they were hanged. This done, the people were pacified, and the Nobility, by the intercession of the Earle of Comminges, returned into fauour, and obtained letters of pardon. Then returns the Earle of Dunois to his towne of Parthenay in Poitou, but without the Kings permission. The King, that is to say, the twelve vnder his authority) suspect his returne, and (feeling that the Duke of Orleans had sent for him, or that hee practised some new worke) sends for the Duke. Hee sends backe the Messenger with promise to follow, and vpon a second charge

A charge by the Marshall of Gie, doubting the humour of the Countesse of Beauieu, and moreover, mad at his ill vſage, keeping him as it were confined within Orleans, without liberty to go forth in safety, he parts from Orleans, vnder colour to go a hawking: he takes the way to Fronteaux, and from thence to Nantes, whither the Earle of Dunois went to meet him. This departure was presently knowne, & Parthenay was suddenly besieged, taken and razed, with many other places in Guienne, which belonged to the Earle of Comminges, and others that were in Britany. These men slept not. A league is presently made vnder the Dukes of Britany and Orleans, wherinto there enters the Prince of Orange, Francis of Laual Lady of Dinan and Chastellubriant, Isle Lord of Rieux and Earle of B. Aumale Marshall of Britany, the Earles of Angoulesme and Dunois. The Duke of Lorraine who finds no great satisfaction of promises, is easily drawn into it. Maximilian King of Romans gives his consent. Charles opposeth Lewis of Bourbon, Earle of Roche-sur-Yon, great Grand-father to the Duke Montpensier last deceased, and makes him his Lieutenant generall in this warre: with Lewis of Bourbon the yongest brother of the Earle of Vendosme, he giues them for assistant, master Lewis of Tremouille Vicount of Thouars who had married Gabrielle of Bourbon, sister to the said Conte Lewis.

Francis Duke of Britany had no great reason to be a Sanctuary for these mutines, and by receiving them to draw all the forces of France vpon his decayed age, attending nothing but his graue. But supposing to protect himselfe from the Kings surprisles, hee must C. rinate his Country, his Nobility and his subiects. But then falls out another accident. The Lords lately reconciled grew in ieaousie, that the French were come to reuenge the wrong done vnto their Duke: or else with their ruine and the Dukes, to make their peace in France. They desired to send them home for two respects; the one to content the King and his Sister, the other for that they should not grow in any such credit with the Duke, as in the end he might employ them against themselves, wishing in a manner for Landays, to oppose him against them. Moreover, they feared James Guise, a Captaine of the Dukes men at armes, and in good credit, Nephew to Landays and his seruant, lest he should seek to reuenge for his Vncles death. If it should be so, how could they subsist? The King discouers this secret ieaousie, and findes a good expedient, to thrust them out to their owne mutual ruines. To this end he sends Andrew of Espinay Cardinall of Bourdeaux, and the Lord of Bouchage, with instructions to Rieux Marshall of Britany, and commission to offer them men and meanes to expell the French out of Britany.

The best aduised discouer the Kings intent, that accepting of this offer, they make the way open for the King to enter into Britany. But in the end they agree: That he should not send into Britany for this succour, about foure hundred Lances, and foure thousand foot, and that at the Barons request, That the King should pretend nothing to the Duchie, whilst the duke liued. That he should not besiege nor take any Towne, Castle, or Fort within the Country: and that his souldiers should take nothing without paying. That when as the Duke of Orleans, the Earle of Dunois and others should retire out of Britany, the King should be bound to withdraw his forces. And for the Brittons: That the Noblemen of Britany should arme with him, and accompany his army to expell the French. The confirmation of these Articles is seconded with foure hundred Lances, and five or six thousand men led by the Lord of Saint Andre, who enters Britany on the one side: the Earle of Roche-sur-Yon on another, and the Vicount of Tours on the third. All the Country is suddenly filled with French men at armes, and the Orleansois are amazed, being vnfurnished both of force and counsell to resist. The Earle of Dunois being of more iudgement then the rest, considers that the company of a hundred Lances belonging to Alain of Albret, was a part of those foure hundred commanded by Saint Andre: that it was conuenient to winne him, and with this designe to put him in hope of the marriage of Anne of Britany. An inuention according to the necessitie of the time, but this was not the Earles intent, who laboured to winne her for the Duke of Orleans, neither the Prince of Orange, who vnder hope of this alliance, had drawne the Arch-Duke Maximilian into this league, whereby he should enter into Bourgongne, with a mighty army led by the Duke of Lorraine, whilst that hee himselfe should annoy the King in Flanders and Picardy. But great shewes and small fruits. Hee was so poore and needy, as the King might easily disappoint all his practises and strata. Now are we deeply engaged in Warre. Ioyeuze, du Lis, St. George, Dampierre and Beauuau) tooke a view of his army at Malestroit, consisting of fixe thousand Lances, and sixteene thousand foot, good and bad, ill armed and ill trained: whilest the French and Brittons being ioynd together, take Rennes, and (to terrifie Rennes) they spoyle the Country euén vnto Mecay, besiege Ploemel, batter it, and in three dayes take it, spoyle and ranfome it.

The Duke of Brittons army.

The Dukes army marched to succour this towne, when as Maurice of Mené being great of body and courage said. Whither goe we my friends? Our Duke is onely gouernour of the French, by whose persuasions we march against the French, who at their first entrance will betray him to their Nation, whereof I am well aduertised. Were we not better to remain in our houses with our wives and children, then to be thus led by the humours of others? A speech of a great consequence. He was of the best allied in Britany, issued out of the house of Guierlesquin, and had well serued Leuén the eleuenth, as Gouernour of Guierlesquin, Captaine of a hundred men at armes in the Warres against the Flemings: a man of valor and counsell, and well aduanced by the said King, hauing the profits of La Ferté, Maréchal, Aiguemortes, Beauuau and Gorlonniere: but very inconstant in his changing of parties. At this speech they all scatter: so as of sixteene thousand, scarce the fourth parting the field: the Duke amazed herewith, leaues Malestroit, and recouers Vennes: but he was pursued so speedily, as he loseth his baggage, being fauoured in his retreat by the Prince of Orange, who had posted from Nantes to his succour: very happily for the wife he had bene besieged and taken. Vennes being beleagred, yeelds for feare. The Duke at his departure had left two thousand eight hundred horse in it, vnder the command of Coetquen Lord Steward of Britany, and of Amalury of Moulfay; and for Captaine of the towne James le Moine, who vnable to maintaine the siege, retired in haste. Coetquen went to Dinan, where he commanded; La Moulfay with his horse to Nantes, where the Duke was, and the Kings army did bend that wayes. Adrian del Mafis a Captaine of the armes, meets him vpon the way, defeated him, kills a great number of his troope, and takes many prisoners: some fixe hundred recouer Nantes. This was about Whitsonside. The Duke thus pressed, being weake in his person, and weake in his subiects: being divided, weake in friends, weake in those who had ingaged him in this warre for their quarrell, and the Earle of Dunois, and Oliuer of Coetman (who soone after fell to the French, and was made gouernour of Auxerre) to craue succours from Henry King of England. But to increase his misery, Henry was not yet in quiet possession of his Realme, crossed by some maindiers of Richards party, the which he must suppress. The King resolved to besiege the Duke in Nantes, he comes in person to Ancenis, thither come the associate Brittons, repenting their indiscretion, for that they had taken townes, and spoiled the country, contrary to their promise; and their owne lands suffered the like extremities. Thus Nantes was besieged the 19 of Iune, well battered, well assailed, and as well defended. The deputies of England were four times shipped to crosse the Seas, and four times put back by tempest of weather. In stead of English, they brought fifty thousand Brittons of the commons, grieved to see the Duke besieged. The Kings army, either holding themselves vnable to fight with this, or neglecting them as fruitles forces, or doing it of purpose, the better to furnish the towne, gaue them free passage, and holding it likewise impossible to force a towne well furnished with commanders, men and victuals, they raised the siege the sixt of August, to go without losse of men to Dole: the which was taken and spoiled without resistance, the Brittons and other souldiers were put to ranfome.

Nantes besieged.

During the siege of Nantes, Peter of Rohan Earle of Quintin, of the French faction, surprised Montcontour, and summoned Guingamp, a passage for succours that came to the Duke from the Bishopricks of Treguer, Leon and Cornouaille. Iohn of Coetman Lord of Chasteaugui, Captaine of the Towne, was at Nantes. Hee flies thither, and furnisheth the place with men sufficient to defend it, & hauing intelligence that Plasguen with about fifty Gentlemen, Brittons of the Kings army, spoyleing the Country & drawing the Nobility to their party, dined in the Abbey of Begar, hauing called together the neighbor parishes, and assembled some troops, he charged them, ouerthrew them, and hid them all prisoners to Guingamp: where the Iudges of Goello & Guingamp, by the Dukes expresse commandement, began to enforme against them, & had finished their process, if some friends and kinsmen had not found meanes of delay, vntill the Dukes death, which proceeding. This prize gaue courage to the Capitaines of Dinan. They assem-

Able about fixe thousand men, and besiege Montcontour. But the Vicont of Rohan, and the Earle of Quintin, offering to succour it, and moreover, the siege of Nantes requiring force and expedition, they retire to Rennes, to ioyne with the other forces, consisting of fixe or seuen thousand men. At the same instant Thon of Rociers, Lord of Bois de la Roche, and Peter Long Lord of Kaeruegues (inticed with the great wealth which the Earle of Quintin had left in his Castle), assemble some souldiers with many peasants, and besiege Quintin: they take it, and against the composition sworne, spoyle the towne and Castle, and (in hatred of the Earle, who followed the King) burnt it to ashes. The Earle by meanes of his subiects recovered it soone after: and Gouques Captaine thereof before, expelled them againe, and spoyle the towne. But to what end serued this cruell stratagem, seeing that Rociers had a house in the Country, and the Earle good meanes to be reuenged: as he was a yeare after, by the taking of Rociers himselfe, and the spoile and burning of his house. The Phrygiens grow wise too late, saith the Proverbe. The Nobility of Britany finding their error, by drawing the Kings forces into the country, to their owne ruine, they send to the duke protesting to be no way associate with the king, but to defend themselves against the French that were neere his person, who they doubted had bene drawne in to preiudice them: they offer to serue him hereafter, and against all men, so as he will pardon them. The Duke receives them, and grants his letters of abolition, delivery and restitution of all their goods and dignities, as before the warres, namely: to the Vicont of Rohan, to the Lords of Auangour and Rieux, (lately put from the office of Licutenant general, and Martiall of Britany) as well for themselves as their assistants. Rieux enjoyed it, but the rest persisted in the Kings seruice. In the meane time the Kings army prepares to goe into Base Britany, and to besiege Guingamp: but the Marshall of Rieux changing his party, makes them to change their proiect. Rieux was at Ancenis, wonderfully perplexed to see the French entred the Country, by a breach which the Nobility of Britany had voluntarily made them, deuising some means to repaire these confusions, drawne thereunto by his reception into grace. The Earle of Cominges going Ambassador to the King, passed by Ancenis, and confirmed Rieux in this good resolution, persuading him to goe vnto the Duke, with assurance that he should be graciously receiued. Rieux thinking to strike two strokes with one stone, sends Francis du Bois to the King, who at that time was at Pont de Larche: giuing him intelligence that the Duke of Orleans, the Prince of Orange, and others, retired into Britany, were willing to leaue the Country, so as they might rest safely in their houses, without touch for that was passed.

Rieux recoiled from the King

Which being concluded, he beseeched his Maiesty to retire his men at armes, according to the treaty he had signed with his owne hand. Anne hearing this proposition. My friend (said the vnto the Gentleman) say vnto my Cousin the Marshall of Rieux, your master, that the King hath no companion, and seeing he is entred so farre, he will make it good. The Earle had no better satisfaction. An answer discovering the Kings intention, which was to incorporate this Duchy to the Crowne: the which caused the Marshall to yeeld to his Prince without dissenting. He drawes some souldiers from Nantes in October, and deliueis his towne of Ancenis into their hands, swearing they should keepe it for the Duke. In the end Francis of Laval, Baron of Chasteaubrian, sonne in law vnto Rieux, suffers him to enter the Castle, holding him to be the Kings seruant. Being the stronger, and lodging his troope within the towne, he commands (seeing that the King had broken the contract) all those that would not swear fidelity and seruice to the Duke, to retire the next day with bag and baggage. Could he be ill receiued of his master, carying with him the deliuey of two so good places: The Prince of Orange hauing ioynd with some Germane succours, sent by Maximilian, and led by Baldwin Bastard of Bourgongne, and some 3000 men of the Countreies of Cornouaille, Leon, Treguer, and Goello, resolved to besiege Quintin, where the Brittons (ioynd with the French that were commanded by the Baron of Pont-Chateau) did wonderfully annoy Guingamp: who being in a town vnfit for war, left the place, & gaue the Prince means to campe before La Chaize, a castle belonging to the Vicount of Rohan, but weakened by the losse of many of his men, part of them going daily to the French, and part disbanding by reason of the Winter; he retired his army to Montcontour, resolute to take a view; and to punish such as were departed without licence. Yet notwithstanding all his care, and the Dukes seuerer command to the Gentlemen, to returne to the Campe within two dayes, vpon paine of the losse of their goods and honours, and

and to others of corporall punishment, those few forces which remained, vanished fast & deny.

Thus the Duke wauers, betwixt hope and feare, fortified on the one side, but weakened on the other, seeing his estate incline to ruine. Hee had two pillars, which in his conceit might raise him, or at the least support him; Anne and Isabel. The Prince of Orange wooed Anne for Maximilian: Rieux, the Lady of Laual, and the greatest part of the Nobility, for Alain of Albret. The first promised greater conditions, yet the King had combred him much in Flanders, supporting the Gantois, so as hee could not succour his pretended Father in Law, neither with his person, nor his subjects; having small credit amongst them, and lesse money: for that they would not assist him to prejudice the King.

Alain (whom others call Amand) had some forces in hand, and fed with this plausible hope, he brought about a thousand men out of Castile, and three thousand Gascons, the Duke would willingly haue made two sonnes in law of one daughter, and vrgent necessity forced him, (like vnto Charles of Bourgonne) to promise her so many, whom hee could giue but to one: euen as Erichonius satisfied his gluttony and continual hunger, when vnto Ceres had condemned him (having cutt downe her groue) by the many sales of his daughter Metra. In the end Anne is promised to Maximilian, who should come to marry in Britany, and withall, hee should bring great troops of men to succore the Duke against the oppression of the French. But he abused him no lesse then he is abused. Hereupon Alain comes with his Castilians and Gascons. At his first arriual hee went to saluete the Duke at Nantes, and then his mistresse, thinking to haue the greatest honor in his love. But oftentimes two braue Grey-hounds courting a Hare, a third crosseeth them, and carries away the game, as we shall soone see. The Marshall of Rieux being arriued, haue his consent in fauour of Alain, at the Countesse of Lauals request, sister in law to the said Alain. It was no time now to leaue this Marshall (newly reconciled) idle. The Duke giues him the charge of his army, with commission to take Vennes, where Gilbert of Grassai, and Philip of Moulins, (of whom we shall make mention in the battell of Fornoue) commanded. He marcheth thither, batters it, and takes it by composition, the third of March. Then Saint Cir and Ferfaix (who led the hundred men at armes of Alains company) declared themselves Brittons by their Captaines commandement, building friuolously upon this marriage: yet some of the company retired to the King. The Kings army wintered, but Lewis of Bourbon aduertised of the taking of Vennes by Rieux, requires him by the surprize of Ancenis and Chateaubriant, places neerer the river, to make the siege of Fougères more easie, on the one side, being a frontier towne, and of good defence, and on the other side, that of Saint Albin le Cormier. The Brittons army had beene eighteen moneths in field without rest, to make head against the French; but now they must shew what courage is in them. The Duke of Orleans, Alain of Albret, the Earle of Dunois, the Marshall of Rieux, the Lord Scates an Englishman, (commanding some three hundred men of his nation, sent by Henry King of England, by the meanes of the Lord Maupertuis) the Siegior of Leon, eldest sonne to the Vicount of Remy, the Siegior of Chateaubriant, Crenettes, Pont l'Abbe, Plessis, Baliscon, Montigny, Balines, Mutuel, and other Captaines of bands, go forth of Nantes, with an intent to raise the siege. Their army was 400 Lances, and 3000 foot, (beside 300 English, and 200 Germanes, sent by Maximilian) with good store of Artillery, for this great rabble armed, and tumultuously assembled by the Earle of Dunois, had beene in a manner all sent backe, as an vnprofitable burthen vpon the earth.

But the matter is of importance, the French are not so easily forced to rise, and if an occasion of battell be offered shall they accept it? The Marshall of Rieux (best experienced in matters of war) with some others, are not of that opinion: for to what end (say they) should we hazard the estate and Country, vpon an euent which may be auoyded? If we lose the day, by what meanes shall we releue our selues? The souldiers that shall remaine after the overthrow, will want courage, and change their minds: the people would be amazed, the Townes stand in suspence, the Conquerour would become master of the Country, and take all Townes he should attempt without resistance. It were best to reuoluntize, and to incampe at Rennes, being well furnished with victuals and things necessary, and in the meane time, to keepe the enemy occupied, forcing him to lie in field, tiring him with their horsemen, and cutting off his forrage, or else to lodge the army in the frontier

of the Brittons
army.

A frontier towne, to shut vp the victuals, and attend the winter: which being come, the enemy shall haue no meanes to lodge abroad, but must of force dislodge: and in the meane time, we shall see what profit will grow by the leagues of the kings of England & Castile, of the Arch-duke, and the Duke of Lorraine, all which giue the Duke great hope, to counterminne the Kings practices in Britany. The rest (rashly thrust on, partly by a young and boyling humor, partly with desire to make triall of their forces) make answer. That the souldiers are wearied with this long bearing of armes without effect; that hauing now an opportunity to doe well, they obserue a great ioy in their resolutions, the which it was more fit to nourish then to quench: that their forces were vnited all together, and asked nothing but employment; and that delay would make them leaue their Ensignes by little and little. In the meane time, Fougères was at the last gape; a towne of importance, and one of the keyes of the Country, that to leaue it in this extremity, were to shew a manifest proofe of cowardise to all the rest. To conclude: they say in a manner, that to temporize were to play the cowards. The first opinion was most probable, but the vehemency of the Earle of Dunois, and the heat of younger heads caried it. All march: but see the pittifull fruit of their first lodging at Andouille, a village vpon the way from Rennes to S. Albin, a contention falls betwixt the Duke of Orleans, and the Lord of Albret, a man of greater reuenues, father to Iohn the last of that name, King of Nauarre: but his mistresse did not affect him, a good scholler in dissembling, to vse the power of Albret, for the benefit of the Duke her father. The Duke of Orleans did rise a higher pitch, and by the mediation of the Earle of Dunois, was very far in fauor with Anne of Britany: Alain discouered some good shewes of Anne, to the Duke of Orleans, whereupon they grow to some words, as the day approaching they were ready to fight. But the enemy being at hand, was it now time to contend, to the prejudice of a whole army? But now the foresight of the Marshall of Britany, doth pacifie all: vpon this diuision they receiue two several aduertisements. Saint Albin of Cormier was battered by the French with three batteries, and yeelded by composition, with their liues and goods saued: a small towne, but furnished with a very good Castle, but at that time vnfortified of men, victuals and munition, and Fougères yeelded vpon the like accord: Saint Albin was commanded by William of Rolsmeinen, an ancient captaine, who had had a command of men at armes vnder Charles the seventh, and Lewis the eleuenth, but in the warres betwixt Charles the eight, and the Duke of Britany, he returned to serue his naturall Prince. The Brittons army marcheth to recouer this place, and the French to preferre their conquests, when as be hold there a trifer a mutiny among the Brittons. It is secretly murmured, that the French Commanders their associates, had intelligence with the heads of the French army, the which suggestion did euen then hazard all, and if the Brittons had beene farther off, without feare of charge, they had easily disbanded. The Duke of Orleans, and the Prince of Orange aduertised of this conceit, had great paine to worke any other impression. What doe they? to giue an assurance of the contrary, they leaue their horses, and I sweare all to fight on foot with the Brittons and Germans. A more bold then wise resolution, but necessary did force them to appeale this mutiny which tended to sedition.

They order their troops to fight. The foreward to the Marshall of Rieux: the battell to the Lord of Albret, with some horse to couer his flanks. The Rereward to Chateaubriant, and on either side, their carriages of artillery and baggage to couer some of their feet, being fauoured on their flanks with a small groue betwixt Saint Albin, and the village of Oranges. And to make the small numbers of strangers (seeme great, they attire some hundred, (some say, seauenteene hundred) Brittons, with cassocks bearing a red cross, the English liuery. Lewis of Tremouille in the absence of Lewis of Bourbon his brother in law, commanded the Kings army. He giues the foreward to Adrian del Host, and old French Captaine, and famous in this warre: hee takes the battell to himselfe, and giues the rereward to the Marshall of Baudricourt, pressed by a more sudden charge then he expected. Gabriel of Montfauois with ten or twelue horsemen, sent out to observe the Brittons countenance makes report of their good order.

The two armies approach, the artillery thunders, and kills many men of either side; a skirmish continues about two houres, which giues the French leysure to order their battell. The two forewards ioyne, the Brittons endure the shocke so courageously, as the French yeeld to the resolute valour of the Marshall of Rieux, who goes to charge the battell.

tell: and at the first they kill Claude of Montfort, a brave Capitaine, sent by the King of England to succour the Duke, and the Lord Scates, a valiant Knight, with some others of the foremost ranke. Blaise a Germane Capitaine, to cover himselfe from the French artillery, changeth his quarter, marching by ass-wile with his battalion, like unto a Chapeau sarras: but he is suddenly charged in flanke by four hundred French horse, broken, and many of them slaine. At the same instant, two hundred horse charge these which had the baggage in charge, and force them to retire. The Brittons horse that flanked the army, grew amazed, and leaves the foot naked. They charge them, and force them to give way, and all fly, some here, some there, the Brittons horse into the wood, and likewise their foot. The Duke of Orleans, and Earle of Dunois fighting unhappily on foot, say what possibly may be expected from such gallant Princes, but the Duke dying among the Germanes was taken in the wood; the other seeing this generall overthrow, tore off his blacke crosse, the livery of Britany, and hid himselfe among the dead bodies: an Antier (that had beene of his company) knew him, and both of them were led prisoners to St. Albin, whence the Duke of Orleans was soon after caried to the great Tower of Boisges. The Marshall of Britany, and the Lord of Albret saved themselves in Dinan by the swiftnesse of their horses. All the counterfeite English with red crosses were slaine without remission.

The Lord of Leon (sonneto the Vicount of Rohan) Pont l'Abbe, the Lord Scates, an Englishman issued from that brave Talbot Montfort (kinsman to the Prince of Orange) with sixe thousand souldiers of their army were slaine. Mosin Gralla (a name famous of the Iewe) Lord Steward to Ferdinand King of Castile, and chiefe of the Spanish troopes, was taken prisoner. Of the French, James Galeas a Neopolitane, a valiant and renowned Capitaine: and others to the number of a thousand or twelve hundred men, but few of any make. This was on Monday, the 25 of July: a day of great import for the State, the which did wonderfully shake the Dukes affaires, being troubled in mind, and his subiects tired with toyle and terror, whereof doth follow practices of places, yeeking vp of Townes, and finally, euery one frames himselfe to follow the Conquerors fortune: a day eternizing the happy memory of that Noble Knight, Lewis of Tremouille, great great Grandfather to Claude Lord of Tremouille last deceased, Duke of Thouars, Prince of Talmond, Earle of Guines, &c. and of the noble Princessse, Charlotte Katherine of Tremouille, Princessse of Conde, Countesse of Taillebourg, Baronesse of Suille, Craon, Bouffiers, S. Hermine, la Chaise, in the Vicounty, &c. mother to the most high & mighty Prince Henry of Bourbon, Prince of Conde, first Prince of the blood, and first Peere of France, &c. having at the age of 25 or 26 yeares, by his incomparable valour and verue, wonne the honour of so memorable a victory. The next day, the Lord of Tremouille turns towards Rennes, summons the towne, and (to terrifie the Inhabitants) he lodgeth his army in the villages of Acigne, Chasteaugiron, Veru, S. Supplie, and others thereabout. The Heralds returne an answer: That the King had no right to the towne, and that he wrongfully made war in Britany; That notwithstanding his forces and happy success, God the guardian of their right, might doe vnto him, as hee had in former time to King John before Poitiers, and to Philip of Valois at Creey. That if Tremouille come, hee should find twenty thousand men to resist him. So the army leauing Rennes, marcheth to Dinan, vnder the command of the Vicount of Rohan. Anastury of Mouffay, gouernor of the towne, compounds at the first summon, to deliuer it into the Kings hands, vpon the accustomed conditions in like cases: to commit the guard thereof to whom hee pleased, and the inhabitants to sweare vnto the King: which done, the French army should retire. On the other side, Guy the fifteenth of that name, Earle of Laual, catcheth some French troopes to enter by night into his Castle of Vitre, and so they became masters of the towne: and by the same meanes he drew his brother Francis Lord of Chasteaubriant, and Montalant to the Kings party. The Baron of Pont Chasteau, brother to the Vicount of Rohan, followed the example of Francis of Auaugour, the Dukes base sonne, who had already deliuered the towne and castle of Clifton into the Kings hands; and the greatest part of the Nobility followed the same course. Hereafter we shall see a ciuill war, rather then a foraigne. And for the last worthy exploit of this army, Tremouille beleegeth St. Malo, both Towne and Castle, one of the strongest places in Britany, beautified with a goodly haucn. It was able to hold out against the forces of a mighty army, as well for the

A feat thereof, as for the fortification: but they easily enter into composition. The Kings affaires advanced thus, as the Dukes declined: his Maieity being at Angiers, hee propounds in Council whether hee should proceed to an absolute conquest of the Duchie, seize vpon the dukes person, and his daughters, giue them some pension, and marry them at his pleasure. He wanted no firebrands in Court, to kindle these combustion; dispersed throughout all Britany. My Liege (say they) if you once get the father and his daughters into your hands, you shall easily obtaine the whole Country, without striking stroke, and reduce the Nobility at your discretion. Guy of Rochefort, Chancellor of France, a iust man, and of a good conscience, shewes, that the duke of Orleans retreat into Britany, had beene the chiefe motiue to draw downe the Kings forces. That his Maieitie hauing now the said duke in his power, the cause ceasing, the effect should cease: That the Duke was somewhat to be excused, if by the bond of alliance and affinity, he had beene intangled in the disgraces of these Noblemen, tied vnder the shadow of his wing. Moreover, the King had no iust cause to pursue his owne vassall with such violence, to ruine his estate, to invade a pupils patrimony, and to spoile her of her Grandfathers inheritance. If the King werenot satisfied to haue the chiefe motiues of these confusions in his power, hee armed himselfe with a transport made to King Lewis, by the Lord of Bouffiac & Nicole of Britany his wife: that hee must then examine the titles, and appoint men to looke into the rights of the one and the other: if the Kings pretensions were iust, it was in him to put them in execution: if not, the people would exclaime against this violence, and God the protector of the oppressed, would soone or late, raise vp some to reuenge it: for the peoples voice, is the voice of God, who cries to Princes; Doe right to the needy and Orphelins: doe iustice to the afflicted and poore. This aduice made the Lords of the Council pause a while, and many in the end conclude: That it was more conuenient to agree vpon Iudges, to decide this contumacious iudicially. Doubtlesse God holds the hearts of men in suspense, & makes them yeeld to what he pleaseth: But our Countesse of Beaune was not well pleased with this resolution, hoping to haue the Earldome of Nantes for her share. They let the duke vnderstand what the Council had decreed. These crosses, diffemperatures, age, and weaknesse of Iudgement, hindered the apprehension in his affaires, yet will hee deale surely. He charged the Earles of Dunois and Cominges with offers and submissions to the king, the king refers them to Yerger to consider thereof: aboute belonging to the Marshall of Gye. Behold there grows great pretensions. The king pretends the propriety of Britany, by reason of the grant made by Bouffiac. The Vicount of Rohan had not renounced his interest. He descended of Mary of Britany, sister to Marguerit the dukes first wife, the only heire of Francis the first, and Mary preceded the duke that then was, in degree of blood. But the pity was, she was a woman.

Pretendaine for Britany.

As for the pretended rights and grants of Bouffiac, they answered: that the matter had been fully decided by the treaty made at the Abbey of Victory, and many others. To the Vicount of Rohan: That it was ended by the contract of mariage, testaments, and ordinations of Dukes their Predecessors, and decrees of Parliaments. But the King hauing two strings to his bow, like a conqueror, grew willfull, and his sister Beaune more then hee. If one failed, the other was ready bent. Charles demands the ward-shipp of the dukes daughters. It was of purpose, that obtaining this ward-shipp, he might marry Anne at his pleasure, being twelve yeares old, and her sister seuen. This might not be, the Nobility would neuer haue endured it. Moreover, Charles discouers, that foraigne Princes repined thereat, and were ready to embrace this quarrell. They must therefore agree vpon Iudges, and a certaine place. Yet leauing nothing of his conquests of Britany, and being seized of some townes won by their Swords, let the Iudges determine what they will, we will doe what we please. In the end they draw Articles: the King accepts them, and sends them to the Duke being at Coton vpon Loire, where the Duke remained. He signes them, some willingly, the rest by force: enjoying this happinesse in the end of his dayes, to haue changed this wretched warre into a publicke rest.

So a peace is concluded, and sworne on either part, the one and twentieth of August. The King promises to call home all his men at armes, and the duke to dismiss all strangers: hee promiseth to giue the King for hostages, the Lord of Montalant, Rainfort, and the son of the Lord Steward of Britany: and within a certain time, to assemble the Estates of the Country, and to make them confirme this Treaty. But Francis the second of that name, name, duke of Britany, oppressed with griefe, melancholy, and age, and fore brused with a fall: falls sicke and dies the ninth of September, leaving the Marshall of Rieux guardian of his daughters, the Earle of Comings for an assistant, and Francis of Laual, Lady of Chasteaubriant for gouernesse.

Presently after the Dukes decease, the Kings sends Ambassadors to Anne the new Duchesse, who giues her to vnderstand, that the Kings intention was to maintaine the treaty made betwixt his Maieity, and the duke deceased: but to make it more firme, it was expedient for her to yeeld in three points to the King. The first: That seeing they were yeelded vnto the King, reason would, that he should haue the guard, or wardship, and during their minority, the disposing of their lands and Seigneuries. The second: That Commissioners appointed should decide their controuersie, touching the principality of Britany, by the first day of January next ensuing: and in the meane time, neither the one nor the other, should cary the name nor the authority of Duchesse, nor receive the ome of fealty. The third: That all strangers should voyde the Country, as was contained in their contract. Anne makes answer: that she desires to keepe the treaty betwixt the King and her deceased father, without any other conditions: And for confirmation of the words, she calls a Parliament the 29 of December following, as the Duke was bound to haue them ratifie the conuentions of peace. In the meane time there were robberies, taking of ransomes, massacres, thefts, deuolation of the Country, sale of townes, euen in open warres. The Vicount of Rohan laboured to winne the townes by sweet words, and amiable letters; he shewes vnto them the miseries of this war, farre from any end, by the decease of their Duke: that at his request, the King had retired his army, attending, if the Nobility and Commons, would put themselves into the hands of the said Rohan, vnto whose command his Maieity meant they should remaine, otherwise he was ready to reduce the obstinate to reason by force. Rennes, Guincamp and others (to whom heretofore particularly written) answer: That neither they nor the rest, can or ought acknowledge any other commander then the Duchesse: to whom during her fathers life, (and since her decease) they were bound by oath. Moreover, they were aduertised that the King was solued to entertaine a peace with their Prince, in the same manner as had bene agreed. They beseech him to rest satisfied with this answer, vntill they bee informed of the Duchesse intention, of the Councells, and the Marshall of Rieux: and in the meane time, to haue the good of the Country, and the peace in recommendation.

This answer puts the Vicount into cholier, and the Earle of Quintin his brother thrusts him on, being desirous to be reuenged for the often taking, and spoiling of his towne. He goes to field with his troope, and neere vnto Pontieu he encounters some men gathered together, with an intent to goe to succour the Duchesse: he doeth charge them, slayeth them, and kills a part of them, being abandoned by some Gentlemen that conducted them: then hee takes and sacks Pontieu and Chasteaulin vpon Trieuf, and so makes his way to Guincamp. Hee summons Chero and Guicquet Captaines, to yeeld the Towne. They answer, that they will not obey him, so long as there shall bee a Duke or Duchesse in Britany. Vpon this refusal, he sends a Capitaine called Saint Pierre, Seneschall of Thebes, and La Forest, to beleaguer it: who being repulsed out of the suburbs of Treguer, takes them of Montbareil and Pontauguen, spoile and burne them, and Rohan being armed, he takes the suburbs of S. Croix: then hee lodgeth in Montbareil, from whence hee discovereth the whole towne so plainly, as hee might shoot point-blanke into the market place: he burnes a part of the suburbs, and lodgeth his artillery; he plants another battery in the Iacobins garden; to batter the curtain of the wall betwixt the ports of Rennes and Pontani, and he makes a breach but not sufficient, yet hee giues an assault, and is repulsed. The next day hee changeth his battery, and plants it at the vpper end of the Fris garden: hee plays a whole day, beates downe a part of the wall, betwixt the Ports of Montbareil, and Treguer: he offers a second assault, but it was as valiantly defended as the first. Guicquet thrust into the thigh with a pike, is carried out of the fight. The night brings councell, and those which had withstood two assaults, will be vnable for the third, being now weakened of one of their chiefe supports, who was made vnable to serue, by reason of his hurt: morning being come, a truce is granted, to take aduice of their Duchesse. Anne presseth it, and the Captaines seeing their men decayed in number, as well by the taking of the suburbs, as at the two assaults, compound for ten thousand Crownes to the General, all, to retire his army, and to receive them into his protection, promising to furnish victuals & munition for the siege of Conquet, the which he had charge from the Kings bestowes, & for want of present money, by reason of the losses sustained by the war, to take hostages. But this parlee was fruituous. During which time capitaine Breisl declares himselfe to the French, seizeth vpon the gate of the tower Queneile, and brings in the Earle of Quintin, (who gaped only for reuenge of this place) he takes and spoiles the town, and ransomes the inhabitants, and amongst them capitaine Chero: Guicquet saies himselfe at la Roche de Rien. This chanced the 23 of January, after fife daies siege. Conquet yeelds vpon their approach, & Brest followed, a most strong place, and the key of all the country.

Thus Ploermel, Chasteaubriant, Malestroit, Vitré, Fongeres, S. Malo, Dinan, S. Albis, Guincamp, Conquet, Brest, and other places, are in the Kings power. The Nobility discontented for the most part of their best places, shroud themselves vnder the conqueror, there is small hope of succors. The English are diuided among themselves: the King of the Romanes hath worke at home, and those small succors that come from both, preuail nothing: there is no money in the treasury, the Souldiers are not paid, the Crowne is worth eight Frankes: Anne is forced to sell of her reuenues for the maintenance of her house; and to aggravate these mischiefs, her Councell is greatly diuided about her marriage. The Marshall of Rieux, and the Lady of Laual, hold for Alain d'Albret, but three will none of him. She protests, that whatsoever she had done in her fathers life, was in respect of him, being loth to disobey him, or to giue him discontent; and causeth the said protestation to be signified vnto him. The Chancellor and the Earle of Comings, support her against the Marshall: he flies to armes, and besiegeth the Chancellor at Guerredes, being seized of Annes person, to keepe her from falling into his hands, who would marry her against his will, where he pleased, but he could not enter. All these confusions make an easie way to the King, for the execution of his enterprises. Being thus oppressed, he sends to her allies, the Kings of England, Castile and Romanes: the English (swearing her (and in a manner beyond her expectation) with an army of nine or ten thousand men, vnder the command of Cheney Master of the horse, accompanied with the Comptroller, and Ambassador of England: not for any hatred hee bare vnto the King, but for feare of too mighty a neighbor, if he vntied this goodly Prouince to the Crowne. The Marshall of Rieux, (hauing another meaning apart, seeking to tye the English Commanders vnto him, and to draw them to his faction) sends the Master of the horse of Britany, and the Lord of Kaerouisi, to Penmarch, to receiue this Ambassadour, and to offer him a conuoy to goe to the Duchesse, (who to haue this army neere vnto her person, makes it to land at Croisic, a port neere vnto Guerredes.) And to haue the people at his deuotion, Rieux giues out, that the Earles of Dunois & Comings, the Chancellor and others, had laid a plot to deliuer the Duchesse to the French king. Anne fortified with this new supply, goes to field, desirous herselfe (being a Virgin) to affront the Marshall of Rieux, if he presented himselfe: and being prevented of her entry into Nantes by the Mar, she retires to Rennes, to giue order for the recovery of Guincamp. For this effect, she assembles some troopes, being assured that the French garison could not be suddenly released, the kings army being employed far off in the conquest of the townes of base Britany. These troopes were seized of Pontieu, & to stop the courses of Guincamp, had sent some gentlemen, with a number of the common people. Those of Guincamp encounter them, charge them, ouerthrow them, and kill many of the chiefe Gentlemen of note, William of Rostrenen Lord of Breledi, Tuon of Ploesquel, Siegnieur of Kaerabin, Tuon of Leuierault, Kaerlout, Pontglou, Kaernehrien, Bottley, Prigent, the eldest son to the Lord of Lanechion, and an infinite number of the Commons. They presently take Pontieu, sack it, and burne it. This was the fuenth of April. The next day, Guicquet being aduertised that about a thousand five hundred men of the English army, appeared at the Isle of Brehat, he went vnto them, and so wrought with the Commanders, as they landed at Pontieu. The French hauing notice hereof, being about a thousand five hundred horse, being loth to ingage their honors in a place not to be held, without succors, and ill furnished with victuals and munition, they set fire of many places of the Towne, cary away what they can, exact 1200 Crownes of the Inhabitants, and retire themselves, leading eight hostages, for the security of fifty thousand Frankes, granted by the Inhabitants to the Vicount of Rohan. This English army was presently followed by another of Spaniards, Islands, commanded by Don Diego Perez of Sariniento Earle of Salinas, consisting of cannon, men of armes, and a great number of foot. Now Anne is strong, fortified with men of armes, and the King fears, that in case of invading another man's Country, he shall be forced to defend his owne. To prevent all danger, he fortifies his frontiers, and sends Francis of Luxembourge, Vicount of Marignies, and Charles of Marignies, to the French King of England, to draw him from the alliance of Britany, considering that the King, by whose means hee was inslaved in the royall throne, should not be so easily admonished. The King calls for his Nobility, and all his companies of men of armes, and resolves to enter Britany with the greatest forces of his Realme. In meane time hee puts two thousand four hundred foot into Chastelgontier and Brest, and sends John of Bellay with his company of forty Lances into Brest: into Chastel of Montauson, and Bangers a Capitaine of foot, with artillery, victuals and munition; and four thousand French and Swizzers were distributed into Dinan, Pons Saint Malo, and Vitre. But this was not sufficient to assure these places: a man of good experience import more then the whole body of a towne. He therefore practices with John of Quallence, Vicount of Fou, Admirall of Britany, by the means of the Count of Rohan. This Admirall armes some ships, to keepe the Britons from Brest by sea, and Maurice du Mené (of whom we have made some mention) the Lord of Chastel (newly reduced to the Kings service, by the Lord of Kersicay) took the guard of the sea coast, to hinder the enemies landing. In the meane time the English, being impatient to haue bene left Tutor vnto Anne by testament, and not to haue her in his possession, being too weak to take her by force in regard of Albin, hee seeks to English, and sends Bourgeois to Henry, to let him vnderstand, that Albin might assist in the recovery of Guienne. That it were good to binde him vnto him by the marriage of Anne of Britany, and to sequester those from her that were opposit. He pleaseth, he hath the means to draw her into his Captaines power, vnder colour to haue her to visit these great and goodly succours, that were come to serue her. He could not preuaile in this point. She had already conceived some ialousie of the English: for her Treasurer (carrying them five thousand Crowns, which they had re-ceiued, attending their pay) had discovered, that they treated with the Kings men, and that they were now in speech of a truce. Being moued herewith, she doth aduertise Henry, and beseegeth him to giue order, beseeuing that this dealing was not with his content.

She complains moreover, that the Marshall of Rieux detained Nantes from her, kept her requeries, placed and displaced her officers: beseeching the King to command the Lieutenants of his army, to giue no support nor fauour vnto Rieux against her, but to pursue as a rebell, and disobedient to his Princesse, attempting against her & her authority. Henry won by the Marshall, assures the Duchesse of the continuance of his great loue, and that he will answer at large to that which her Ambassadors had propounded, by some thing he would send vnto her. In the meane time he desires his Army should goe to Rennes to the Duchesse, or that she might goe to the, to the end she might visibly see, if those forces were sufficient to succor her. And hee giues her to vnderstand by Turench Secretary of State that he had sent his army to succor her against all men, and especially against Rieux: that the army with the commanders may come to her to Rennes, or that she may goe to the army, as she shall thinke best. A grosse policy, easily discovered at the first sight, that this was but a practice to put her and the chiefe of her counsell into strangers hands, to rule her at their pleasure. Anne finds this condition of hard digestion. And Henry fearing lest this strut should make her to sue for an accord with the King, aduerteth, that the French means to fortifie the Duchesse party against the French, was the Marshalls reconciliation with her: and wrought therein so politically, that by mediation of John of Coetman and other Noblemen of Britany, an accord was made betwix the Duchesse, the Earle of Montpensier, and others of that party, with the Lords of Albrét & Rieux, and the Lady Estienne in the beginning of January all quarrels were pacified, and all were united in the common service of their country. During this treaty, the Marshall well informed that Brest & Conquet wanted both munition & victuals, went to besiege the fortress of Brest by land and sea with three score Briton ships: and the English went to Conquet. The King knowing how much these places did import, sends S. Pierre and Chastel with

A foot, to ioyne with the forces of Rohan, Saint Andre, the Seneshals of Tholouse and Carcassonne: and to draw forth part of the Garisons of Vitre, Fougères and Dinan: and sue and twenty ships by sea, which put all the gallies to flight, and after their example, the army at land retires so hastily, as they leaue part of their Cannon, wherewith the Towne was furnished, victualled, and relieved with fresh men: and Con-quet likewise was freed from the siege of the English. Winter approached, and the cold and rainie weather forced both armies to leaue the field. And therefore a new truce was concluded, during the which, Iudges should be appointed to examine the interest of all parties: who for that effect should be sent to Auzignon, a neuter towne, and they should name a neuter Prince, who (according to the report of the Iudges) should decide the controuersie. Maximilian was chosen. Doubtlesse it was a folly to spend much in spies, and want good intelligence. The King being vpon the point to consummate his marriage with the Arch-dukes daughter, relied on him. But in whose fauour should hee giue sentence, being in no good termes with the King; and hoping on the other side to ioyne vnto his ordinary title, the quality of Duke of Britany? Charles and Anne send their deputies vnto him, who are referred to Franckford. The Iudges come and pronounce a sentence, but not definitiue: That the King should deliver all such places as he held, vnto the Duchesse, except, S. Albin, Gormier, Dinan, Fougères, and S. Malo, which should be sequestred into the hands of Maximilian; and the Duke of Bourbon: and to yield them vnto him to whom the Duchy should be adiudged: and all Frenchmen that bare armes, should leaue the Country, and the Duchesse likewise should dismis the English, and other strangers. Taking a new assignation at Tournay, to iudge definitiue of the cause: but all this was but to win time. Maximilian makes his peace with the King, for his owne regard, whereby many places he held in Flanders were deliuered: and during these treaties, Isabel the sister of Anne of Britany dies at Rennes the tenth of Iune.

Anne remaining sole heire, the King of Romanes loue increased, and the Duchesse desire to be supported against the King, made her willingly iudge. And for that Maximilian could not goe in person, he deputed the Earle of Nassau, Wolfgang Baron of Pothen in Austria, James Condebaux his Secretary, and Lopian Steward of his house, with authority to treat, and conclude the marriage and to wed the said Duchesse. Notwithstanding the truce, no man will leaue his hold, neither will the King giue over the places he holds, nor the Duchesse dismis her strangers, but some part of them, and puts the rest into Garisons. Shee sends not to Auzignon, fearing perhaps the surprize of her writings. The King of Nantes runnes ouer Poitou, Antou, and other Countries. The Kings troopes commit the like acts of hostility. Some Germans enter into Britany. The Chancelor of Montauban goes to solicit in England. Charles will haue Anne first to discharge her English and Castilians. Anne replies, that in like sort hee ought by the treaty of Franckford, to yield her her places, and to leaue the other foure townes aboue mentioned, as neuters. Shee imputes the spoiles of Nantes, to the former diuisions betwix her and the Marshall of Rieux, and promisseth that hereafter the like inuolencies shall not be committed. That the Germanes coming was onely to force some of her subjects to obedience. That the Chancelors going to the King of England, was to agree vpon the charges due for the succours he had sent. That in truth, seeing the King, to make new preparations to the prejudice of their treaty, she had giuen the Chancelor commission, to treat for some succours of men. The King is discontented herewith, so as Guemehé and Coetquen her Ambassadors returne with no other answer but a new assignation at Tournay. In the meane time the King armes, and makes great preparations at Pont-See.
Anne serues him with the same fauce. Shee solicites the Kings of England and Castile, and her new spouse, to ioyne their forces, and to invade France with a might army. He that cannot circumuent his enemy with the Lions skin, must vie the Foxes. Charles is aduertised of this new alliance of Austria and Britany. The neighbourhood is dangerous, being thus fortified. He must auoyde this, and by some means get that for himselfe, with an ill neighbour pretends. Hee therefore sends to treat with the Duchesse, but the cannot affect him, that had shewed himselfe so violent an enemy. Yet he finds another expedient. Alain of Albrét was frustrate of his hopes, and this denial had mightily discontented him: he was therefore easily drawne away. The duke of Bourbon gouernes him so absolutely for a time, that vpon certaine promises and other preferments, he was him for the King, who promisseth to deliver him the towne of Nantes, wherein hee might doe A much, being armed with the Marshall of Rieux fauor. The effects follow: Alain surprized the castle of Nantes, and in hatred of Annes didaine, he spoiles the Treasury of the dukes of Britany, in the which were all their pretious stones, and the Duchesses Jewels, and deli- uers both Towne and Castle into the Kings hands, yielding him the right he pretended to the Duchy, by reason of his wife Frances of Britany, daughter to William Vicount of Limoges, a yonger brother of the Houfe of Ponthieure, for a pension of fixe hundred pounds a yeare, issuing out of the lands of Gaure, neere Tholouza; whereunto the Cham- ber of Accounts at Paris, with the Kings Proctor Generall, and the Inhabitants of Gaure opposed, maintaining, that there was no recompence due to the Lord of Albret for that seruice, seeing he had none. The King (who was in Scutnell) marcheth thither in person with his army, the fourth of Aprill, hoping now to finish this warre, and to send home the English. Hee marcheth, with an intent to besiege Anne in Rennes, whe- ther this new terror had drawne her. But they had so suddenly pestered all the approaches with numbers of trees cut out off the neereff forest, as they were forced to giue out chat enterprize, to vndertake the siege of Guingamp, being the key of bafe Britany. The Inhabitants were reduced to extreme poverty, having lodged the English army almost a yeare, who for want of payment, had spoiled them of all their goods, and left it ill guar- ded with men for defence. Tremouille Lieutenant for the King, had this charge, who sent Adrian V Hospital before, with part the army, to beleaguer the place. At his approach the inhabitants demanded a composition: the Lieutenant receiues them, with assurance of life and goods. But in his absence, he cannot saue the towne from spoile.

taken.

Then fell out the appointment for Tournai: Anne sends sixteene Deputies, who shut the gates shut against them, and no lodging but in the suburbs: the King disdaining the treaty, having intelligence of the marriage of Maximilian with Anne: fore-seeing, that from this stocke might spring a plant, which hereafter might crosse his estate. Maximilian was now much moured for the taking of Nantes: the Emperour Fredericke his father held a Diet at Noremberg, to prouide some means to recouer this losse, and to encounter the French forces. The Princes of Germany promise him twelve thousand Lasque- nets, which the Colonell George of Terreplaine should bring to him by August follow- ing. The King of England should augment this army with a leaue of fix thousand Eng- lish. But the discord that fell out betwixt these two Princes, and the tediousness of the Germanes, who are wonderfull beavy, gaue the King means to effect his desire, and to supplant Maximilian.

discontented with King
Charles.

At that time the King freed the Duke of Orleans from prison, and by the same means the Prince of Orange and the Earle of Dunois were reconciled vnto him. These men were great means to put the King in Maximilians place, being onely married by a De- puty. The Councell found no better expedient, to pacifie all these quarrels and trou- bles. But the Duchesse was strange: what meanes is there (saith shee) to loue a Prince, who these three yeares hath made such cruell warres against mee? being a pupill and re- darge: who detaines my Townes vniuilly: who spoiles my subiects: doth out-rage, and kill my officers, vpon refusal to pay him my rents and reuennues: who (notwith- standing former transactions passed betwixt vs) spoiles my Country, makes desolatemy townes, and hath sought tyrannically to seize vpon my person. It was needfull to im- ploy many great personages to pacifie this discontented mind. The King sends the Duke of Orleans to that end, who cunningly doth pacifie the Marshall of Rieux, the Chancellor of Montauban, and others of the Councell, with the Lady of Lual (gouernesse to the Duchesse) and other Ladies her familiars, who both publicly and priuately lay be- fore her, her fore-past dangers, the miseries in the which her subiects had been plunged through warre, the neighbourhood of so mighty a King, who would continually op- press her, and the farre distance of Maximilian, a poore Prince, full of affaires, and of small credit, who hath no means to raise her, neither could he euer succour her with a- boue two thousand men. That shee had no better means to purchase rest to her selfe, and peace to her subiects, then by embracing the alliance of King Charles, whereby she should not onely recouer her places, but of a Duchesse of Britany, should become a peaceable Queene, and welbeloued of the whole Realme. If they were both married, it was but by Attorneys: finally, in such accidents, the Church doth willingly dispense

A with such couenants not personally performed, to prevent the miseries that grow by war. Maximilian was farre off, vnacquainted with these practices, no man thought to prevent it: and these perswasions did ring dayly in the eares of Anne, so as in the end these yeelds to follow the resolution of her states. They were wonderfully royled and wearied with the warre, the people turmoysed, the Nobility impoverished, the Clergy oppressed, some townes taken, and some waivering: and moreover, they did see a great Prince demand their alliance with force, and the chiefe Noblemen inclined to the French faction. These reasons made it seeme more conuenient, and to be preferred before the flow succours of Maximilian.

Thus was Anne Duchesse of Britany perswaded, and a peace concluded and ratified by a happy and pleasing treaty of marriage, by the which (to maintain the subiects of the Country in peace that were armed for either side) it was said, That all exploits and offences committed and done vpon assurance, or otherwise, during the wars on either side, should be for- gotten, and remaine without reproach to any, as remitted, abolished, and recompensed: every man should returne to his home, and all soldiers depart the Country. A wife aduite to main- taine these two Countries in loue and concord. The City of Rennes yeelds at this happy composition, where the King entred in Nouember, vpon the assurance & conduct of the duke of Orleans, with his simple traine, and without any men at armes, (for so it was a- greed) to see the Duchesse, and to ratifie the treaty, making the Prince of Orange (for that he had been a chiefe instrument in this businesse) his Lieutenant generall in Britany: then he tooke the way to Langeais in Touraine, whither Anne was conducted by the Chan- celor Montauban, Cestquen Lord Steward, and by the Lord of Chasteaubriant, and the ma- riage was consummated the 16 day of December. The Articles of the contract are to be seen in the Originalls. If this marriage were pleasing to God or not, let vs leaue it to the iu- dicious reader: for it is, that of three sons they could not bring vp one. Soone after Francis of Orleans Earle of Dunois died, the chiefe fire-brand of this war, & likewise the princi- pal motive of this peace. From him are issued the dukes of Longueuille, and a little before him the second D. of Bourbon was deceased without children, to whom succeeded Peter Earle of Beaulieu, who hereafter shall be D. of Bourbon, the twentieth of that nation.

This yeare was borne Gaston of Foix, duke of Nemours, son to Iohn of Foix, Vicount of Narbone, and of Mary of Orleans, one of the greatest Captaines of his age, who shall giue ample testimony of himselfe in the wars of Italy, which now approach. There dyed also at Rome, Peter of Foix, Cardinall, brother to the laid Iohn, and Vncle to Queene Katherine of Navarre. Henry of England, wonderfully incensed at this marriage, sought by all secret practices to surprize some of the chiefe places of the Prouince: and at the first remoue of his army out of Britany, he caused it to make an offer at Port-blanc, and some other ports, but they were still repulled by the faithfull care of the Noblemen of the Country: namely, by the Chancellor of Montauban, of Bartraud d'Acigne, and other lea- dy Captaines. Thus the English seeing their attempts like to take none effect, bent their course to goe towards Calais, in the company of their King: who was making war in the County of Guines, whilst that Maximilian should enter the Realme with forces on the other side: then they besieged Boullen by sea, being kept from landing by the Lord of Coples, and the bastard of Cardonne, Captaine of Arras, with such small forces as they could suddenly oppose.

But on Bassard, whilst thus repellt this common enemy, how preiudiciall shall they be to the gallants (saith the history) make false keyes to the gates, and gaue Maximilian intelligence, bringing him by night into the towne, vn- knowne to Congelant, Lieutenant to Cardonne. Some write that one of those, in whom he trusted, for the opening of the gates, made this stratagem. But (how loquacious) he was taken in his bed sleeping at this case, and for reward taken of bafe cowardise, he yeelded up the Castle, without attending the sutors that came vnto him: The towne was spoiled, without sparing of the Churches, or the Traitors houses: A worthy reward of this treachery. Thus wee preferre our Conquests: A while after they attempted Amiens. A shame to soldiers, that a woman should haue the first brunt, and that her seruicemen, to the watch, in ringing the great Bell of Defroy, should put the towne in armes. of Robempré and of Anthony Clabault Maire of the Towne, did their duties so well (as if any one repairing to the quarter, which had been formerly assigned him) as the enemy returned amazed. A duty which made them as famous, as their descendants infamous, by the notable treachery they committed in our dayes.

Henry loved Peace, and was imbarke more at the instance of his subjects, (left they should thinke him more gracious to the French then the ancient quarrels of both nations required) then for any desire he had to haue the King his Enemy, to whom he had a great and strict bond, as we haue heard. The chiefe cause of his grudge was a great summe of money, which he said he had lent to the deceased Duke of Britany. The King hauing discovered it, commands the Lord of Cordes to treat with him, and payes him the money, and so sends him home satisfied into England.

This Peace made Maximilian willing to be reconciled. Moreover, the Princes of Germany labored in this pacification; and the affaires of the Empire (in which his father had associated him since the year 1486) beganne to call him. The Swisses laboured it, and the people, especially those of the Low Countries (as well through the French warres, as their owne priuate diuisions) were so toiled, as they detested the wars. In the end, a peace was concluded for foure yeares onely, by the meanes of the Duke of Bourbon, the Duke of Orange, and the Lord of Cordes. So he receiued his daughter Marguerit againe, with the Counties of Artois and Bourgongne, receiuing the reuenues and homages, and the King keeping the Castles, to place garisons in them, vntill the end of foure yeares. Behold this Estate doth now enjoy a happy rest, by the vnion of this goodly and great Duchy to the Crowne of France, and by a Peace confirmed with Henry and Maximilian. But Charles had enlarged his Diadem with this new acquisition, so the vrgent importunity of his Schoolmaster, Lewis of Amboise, Bishop of Albi, and of Doctor Maillard, made him to restore the Counties of Roussillon and Parpignan (too religiously) vnto Ferdinand King of Arragon, the which Lewis his father had gotten, hoping by this meanes to the Spaniard to a perpetual peace. What should Charles doe then with his Nobility of his youth, he being young, vigorous, and of no idle complexion? Now a great desire makes him to cast his eyes beyond the Alpes, and draws him to the conquest of golden and rich Estates. But let vs examine the causes and proceedings farther off.

We haue said before, that Rene Duke of Lorraine was in Court, and demanded restitution of the Duchy of Barre, and the County of Provence. During his abode, the Realme of Naples being reuolted, the Nobilitie and the three Estates of the Realme put themselves vnder the protection of the Church, as holding of it in fee. The Pope sends for him to iue him in the Realme, vpon some right which he pretended. The Gallies of Genoa attended him, the Cardinal of S. Pierre was thereto conduct him, and some from the Noblemen of the Country prest him thereunto, where they expected him so long, as the Pope was forced to make an agreement with Ferdinand, being assisted by the Florentines. Vpon assurance of this accord, which the Pope, the Venetians, the King of Spaine, and the Florentines had sworne and were bound to see obserued, the Barons of the Realme turne home to their houses, and were all taken prisoners. The Prince of Salerne, chief of the house of S. Severin, escapes, and three of his nephewes with him, sonnes to the Prince of Bisignan, who retire themselves to Venice, and demand of the Seignoury whither they would with them to choofe, to the duke of Lorraine, or to the king of France or of Spaine. The Venetians answer, That the duke of Lorraine was a dead man, vnable to support so heauy a burthen: That the king of Spaine was already strong as a rock, and the Realm of Naples and Sicily would make him too mighty: that they had liued in good correspondence with the Kings of France, who in former times had possessed the said realme. The delays of the Lorraine being thus propped, made him thus to qualifie him: for he wanted neither courage nor valour. They were jealous of the neighborhood of a mighty prince, and did not consider, that to call in a King of France to these Estates, was the meane to ruine them. So they passe into France, where the affaires of Britany held them about two yeares in their putting in. One called Jehan de S. Pierre, a man of base sort, who had serued the King well in his infancy, as a Groom of his chamber, and now made Seneschall of Brecaire, and president of the Accounts of Paris, and the General Brissom, afterwards Cardinal, ruled their Matter.

These Neapolitanes gouerne them, and they imbarke him in this voyage, who of himself

Peace with Henry.

And with Maximilian.

The first motive of the voyage of Italy.

A selfe was farall: he wanted all necessary things. The King was young, and weak of complexion, he had few good Commanders, and fewer wife men: no money, and himselfe willfull, the best was, he had a gallant Nobilitie and young, but ill commanded, nothing obedient, and too willfull like to their head, the which notwithstanding purchased the king an immortal glory. The leading and returne of this army doubtlesse was the worke of heaven. Before his departure, Charles required ayd and counsell of the Venetians. And we cannot giue you (say they) for feare of the Turke, yet were they in peace with him, and the Turke then reigning was of small reputation. As for counsell it were presumption for us to counsell so wise a King, assisted with so good counsell, notwithstanding wee will helpe you rather then hurt you, and you shall be very welcome. In truth God will haue vs to confesse, that neyther the wit nor policy of man can disappoint that which his eternall prouidence had decreed. This succeeded otherwise then that Common weale expected. First, they conceived not that the King would vndertake this voyage in person: moreover, they hoped to be reuenged of this House of Arragon, whom they hated exceedingly, imputing it to Ferdinand, as he meane to draw downe Mahomet Othoman, who conquered Constantinople, and had done many outrages to the Venetians; and Alphonso sonne to the said Ferdinand had stirred vp the Duke of Ferrara to make that chargeable warre against them, the which had almost ruined them; and had sent a man to Venice to payson their Cisterns; with many other complaints which they framed against this house. But the chiefe motive was, for that by their meanes they could not extend their dominions, as well in Italy as in Greece. Thus they thought to vse the King as a scourge to whip their enemy, but not to ruine him; and by their shipwracke to haue meane to seize vpon some townes in Apulia lying vpon the Gulfe, as it happened.

This was one motive to transport the French Forces beyond the Alpes. Another was, that Bonne a daughter of Sauoy & widow to John Galeas D. of Milan, a woman both with our honor & iudgment, was chiefly gouerned by a Secretary of hers, named Chico, bred vp in that house, and by her Caruer, Anthony Tascino. Chico to assure the estate of the young duke John Galeas, son to the said John, had expelled all his fathers Brethren, Vncles to the sonne, and amongst the rest Lodowike Sforze, and Robert of Saint Seuerin, sonne of a barlard daughter of the house of Saint Seuerin: Tascino (who had a great interest in his Ladies bed and fauour) calls them home with her consent. Being returned, they take Chico, and against their promise to offer him any violence, they put him in a pipe, and dragging him through the citie of Milan, send him prisoner to Pavia, where he died, and they modestly dismissed Tascino.

Lodowike and Robert freed from these two obstacles, fortifie themselves neere the Duchesse, and euen then did Lodowike practice to vsurpe the Duchy of Milan. For the first fruits of this project, they sequester the two sonnes of Bonne and lodge them in the Castle, and seize vpon the treasure (which was then held to bee the greatest in Christendome). They make three keys, whereof theee kept one; but they had the guard of all. They force her to renounce the Wardship, and Lodowike was made Tutor. This was not all; the Castle was carefully kept, and the Capraine went not without the turne-pikes. Lodowike and Robert were not admitted; but with one or two followers. But two great Princes cannot raigne long together in one State without ialousie: Lodowike supplants Robert, and puts him from all government.

Thus Lodowike commands Milan absolutely, and Robert serues the Venetians: yet Galeas and the Earle of Ciazazzo, children to Robert, shall returne and doe Lodowike good seruice in the State of Milan. Then began Lodowike to increase in authority; granting the dukes picture on the one side of their coyne, and his owne on the other, not without the murmuring of many, namely, of Isabel the wife of Alphonso Duke of Calabria, son to Ferdinand King of Arragon, as proud and haughty a woman, as her husband was weak of iudgment and without courage. This reuolting made Lodowike to haften his resolution. And thus he proceeded: when the Duke went forth of the Castle, his brother remained within, and Lodowike conducting him home, the Capraine did vnto him come forth vpon the bridge to receive him. One day amongst the rebe, Lodowike stays him suddenly a while without the bridge, to draw forth the Capraine, whom Galeas and the Earle of Ciazazzo seize vpon, and on such as followed him put him to death. They which draw the bridge, Lodowike lights a candle, and sends to cut off their heads.

that were in his power, if they yeeld not the place before the light be burnt: the which he doe. He enters and placeth men at his pleasure: he puts the Captaine in prison: he arraigns him, vpon colour that he meant to deliuer vp the Castle to the Emperour: hee slayes some Germans, and makes them beleue that they treated in fauour of the house of Austria, which of old time pretended some right to the Duchy: yet afterwards both he and they were set at liberty. Lodowike is now master of the Fort. Hee must seeke meanes to maintaine this usurpation: yet lest he should grow too odious, he makes all dispatches, the name of Iohn Galeas Duke of Milan his Nephew, a Duke in name only, but he in effect. In the meane time Isabel solicits her father and grandfather, to reuenge the iniustice and tyranny of Lodowike. Lodowike vnderstood well, that this act would offend many Princes: that his insolent and not accustomed exaction of money made his name odious to all the subjects of the Duchy: and that Ferdinand King of Arragon with his sonne Alphonso, would not faile to imbrace the quarrell and right of Iohn Galeas and of their Isabel. To crosse them, he cunningly (to the prejudice of the ancient confederacy of the Estates of Italy) makes a league betwixt the Pope, the Venetians, and Iohn Galeas Duke of Milan his Nephew (arming himselfe alwaies with that name) for their common defence, and namely of Lodowike government, vpon condition, that the Venetians, and the said Duke should either of them lead presently two hundred men at armes to Rome, and greater forces (if need were) for the recovery of such places as were detayned from the Church by Virgilius Vrsinus, in fauour of Peter of Medicis his kinsman, affociate with Ferdinand, and Alphonso. And more to crosse their estates, Lodowike (who could not subist to the midst of their united forces) lends an honourable Ambassage to the King, whereof the Earle of Caizim was the chiefe, assisted by Charles of Balbiano Earle of Belzoiole, and Galeas of Saint Peterin, who had married a bastard of Lodowikes: who greatly vrge the title he had in his goodly and pleasant country of Naples. They easily drew the King to taste a vaine glory of Italy, perswading him by great offers of seruice, iuccors of men, money, and munition. But before we passe the Alpes, let vs examine the estate of Italy, and the right which Charles pretended. Since the declining of the Roman Empire, Italy neuer enioyed a more happy prosperitie, then about the year 1490. A long peace had made the most barren places fruitful, it abounded in people, riches, great men of State, and good wits in learning, industry and military fame, such as that age could produce, beautified with the State of many Princes, not subiect to any other command but of themselves.

Laurence of Medicis, a Citizen of Florence, was a great meane to hold things in this prosperous Estate, a man of a quiet spirit, experienced in affaires, iudicious, of great authority aboue all his fellow Citizens, and (for that he gouerned Pope Innocent the eight, his kinsman absolutely) renowned throughout all Italy. Hee knew that the greatest enemies to other Potentates, would mightily shake the common-weale of Florence, and therefore hee sought by all meanes to hold them equally, by a generall obseruation of peace. Ferdinand of Arragon, King of Naples, a wife Prince, and of great reputation, did much affect the publicke quiet, but he had worke at home: Alphonso Duke of Calabria his eldest sonne, being much discontented, seeing that Iohn Galeas Sforce, Duke of Milan his sonne in law, should carry but the naked and simple title of Duke, vnder the oppression of Lodowike his vncle. But Ferdinand hauing yet a fresh impression of the late reuolt of his subjects of Naples, not ignorant that at the first motion they would open their armes to the house of France, considering the affection which most of his subjects bare vnto it of old, feared lest the diuisions in Italy should draw the French to invade the Realme of Naples: preferring a present benefit before the indignation of his son, desiring rather to vaite himselfe with the other Estates, especially that of Milan and Florence, to countertermine the Venetian greatnesse, being then fearefull to all Italy, put vp with the late ouerthrow of the Duke of Ferrara, rather in law to Lodowike, after a long and dangerous hazard of their estate. Lodowike was in the same predicament with the rest: and moreover, peace was sure more necessary then war, for the preservation of an authority lately usurped. Hereinto that commendable inclination to peace which he found in Laurence of Medicis, did moue him. And considering that in regard of the inneterate hatred betwixt the house of Arragon and the Venetians, they should hardly make any firme league betwixt them, hee thereupon concluded, that Ferdinand and his son should not be at need assisted by any other, to crosse him in his designs: and having them alone opposit, he should easily withstand them.

So

A So Ferdinand, Lodowike, and Laurence continued the alliance cheerefully which they had renewed in the year 1480, for five and twenty yeares: all the meane Potentates in a manner leaning vnto them: to whom the Venetians greatnesse was wonderfully suspected, managing their affaires apart, not imparting their counsels to the body of the common league, watching ouely opportunity to grow great by the publicke discords. Being all thus united, they were too strong for the Venetians; yet were they full of enuy and mutual jealousy, one prying still into anothers estate, and continually making designs, so as they could not long liue in true and faithfull friendship.

The death of Laurence of Medicis, was a great cause of the breach of this general peace. An vnseasonable death for him, hauing not yet liued foure and forty yeares complete: for his country, the which (by his wisdom and iudgement) flourished most happily in all the benefits which a long peace doth vsually bring forth; and for Italy, as well by reason of the affaires which he did wisely manage, to the generall good of the whole country, as also for that he was a notable instrument to temper the diuers humours & jealousies which sprung vp daily betwixt Ferdinand and Lodowike, and to quench the flames which might easily cause a generall combustion.

This peace being well shaken by his death, was presently quite broken; not so much by the death of Innocent, who by his sloth was growne vnprofitable as well for himselfe, his friends, and the publicke, after he had retired his armes, the which he had displayed at the influence of the Barons of Naples; as by the succession of Roderike Borgia, who was then called Alexander the 6, a Spaniard, chosen vnder the factious discords of Africanus Sforce, brother vnto Lodowike, and Julian of Saint Pierre, buying the suffrages of many other Cardinals, partly with ready money, and partly by promises of Offices and Benefices. He was subtil and quick-witted, excellent in counsell, vehement to perfwade, and a great man of State, but (saith the Original) his vertues were surpassed by his vices, dishonest in manners, ungenerous, no shame, no truth, no faith, no religion in him: but an insatiable covetousnesse, an immoderate ambition, a cruelty more then barbarous, and a violent desire to aduance (by what means soeuer) his children, which were many in number. Peter the eldest sonne of Laurence of Medicis, was successor to his goodly honours, but not to his fathers good humours. Ferdinand differed as much from Laurence, as that Hector drawne dead at a chariots taile, from Hector returning victorious, honoured with the spoiles of Achilles.

At his entrance to the government, following an aduice directly contrary to his fathers, without any other counsell then of Virgilius Vrsinus, of whose humour Peter depended (both their Mothers being of the family of Vrsinus) he made so strict a league with Ferdinand and Alphonso, as Lodowike (a vigilant and subtil man) conceived presently that the Florentine forces might easily be drawne to prejudice him, in fauour of the Arragonois. This jealousy was layed open by this accident. The confederates according to their custom, must send to congratulate and acknowledge the new Pope. Lodowike had wisely aduised, that all the Ambassadors should enter Rome together in company, and likewise into the Consistory before the Pope, and that one should speake for them all: For (saith he) by this manner of proceeding we shall make knowne to Italy, that there is not onely a singular leue and league betwixt vs, but also so firme a coniunction, as we shall seeme to be but one body and one Principality. Ferdinand approved this aduice. Peter did not publicly gainesay it, but in private he could not digest it, being one of the Ambassadors chosen for the common-weale of Florence, hauing resolved to beautifie his Ambassage, with a proud and stately traine. Hee considered, that entering into Rome, and presenting himselfe to the Pope in troope, his traine would appeare farre lesse stately in so great a company. And therefore he caused the King of Naples to frustrate this designe, as not to bee done without his consension. But Ferdinand loth to displease one to please another, doth aduertise Lodowike, that hee did not recall his first consent, but at the instant request of Peter of Medicis.

There was yet another reason, which made Lodowike to suspe& some secret intelligence betwixt Peter and the Arragonois. Francisco Gibe, a bastard sonne to Innocent, after his fathers death had retired himselfe to Florence, to Peter of Medicis, brother to Magdalen his wife. Being planted there, Virgilius Vrsinus bought of him, by Peters meanes, Languillare, Ceruerre, and some other places neere to Rome, for forty thousand Ducats. The money was in a manner all lent him by Ferdinand, of purpose, to the end that Virgilius being being his kinsman and entertained souldier, growing great about Rome, he might reap the more profit. Ferdinand found no better foundation for his safety, then to tie all of the greatest part of the Noblemen, within the territories of the Church, to suppress that Hidraes head, if it should rise too high. This he laboured more carefully, doubting that Lodowike's authority would proue great hereafter with the Pope, by the means of Cardinal Afcianus his brother.

The vanity of mans conceits must needs discover the weaknesse of his iudgement. Of two mischiefs Ferdinand did chooele the greatest, and grounding vpon a light profit, he did not fore-see, that he layed the way open to his owne ruine. For the Pope discounting the Arragonois intention, and pretending that by the alienation of these small places lying in his iurisdiction, done without his priuie, they were by right forfeited to the Apollon-like Sea. He exclaims and complains against Ferdinand, Peter and Virgilius, protesting to omit no means that may serue for the defence of his dignity, and the rights of the Roman Sea. Lodowike embraceth this occasion, and seeing the Pope to study of some great reuenge against Ferdinand, he feeds his passions, by the loan of forty thousand Ducats and three hundred men at armes, leauied vpon the common treasure. Yet apprehending new troubles, he aduiseeth Ferdinand, to perswade Virgilius, to content the Pope by some honest composition, to prevent the inconueniences & scandals this diuorce might breed, and counselleth Peter to follow the domestical example of his father, and to be a mediator, as he had beene, betwixt Ferdinand and him, rather then a fire-brand to kindle diuision: but he talked to a deafe man. Ferdinand promifeth to doe it, but he ruined with one hand, what he raised with the other: he secretly solicits Virgilius to take possession of those townes, and not to yeeld the Pope any thing, but some certaine some of money, by meanes whereof he should remaine peaceable Lord of the said places, promising to warrant him from all troubles.

Lodowike finds hereby, that it behoues him to fortifie himselfe with new supports and new alliances. He hath a good opportunity: the disdaine of Alexander against the King of Naples, and the affection the Senate of Venice seemed to haue to the diuision of this league whereby their proiects had so long beene made frustrate. But the Pope lousd his children deere, and contrary to the custome of others) who called them Nephewes, as a more modest name) he impudently called them sonnes. He hoped to obtaine one of the bastard daughters of Alphonso, for one of his bastard-sonnes (graft crab vpon crab, and you shall neuer reap good fruit) and whilest this vaine hope possessed him, he opened his eares rather then his heart to Lodowike's motion. Ferdinand, gaue his consent, but Alphonso hated the ambition and pride of Alexander. The Pope being thus frustrate, turns all his thoughts to Lodowike, moued partly with disdaine, and partly with feare, seeing Virgilius, by the exceeding great fauours which he receiued from Ferdinand and the Florentines, to be growne mighty in all the territories of the Church.

The Venetians had yet fresh in memory, the leagues made against them in the warres of Ferrara, in which Sixtus had intangled them: and yet to withdraw them, he employed both his spirituall and temporall power. They had no more confidence in Alexander. Yet the policie of Lodowike did in the end worke this league, betwixt the Pope, the Senate of Venice, and the Duke of Milan, in the moneth of April 1493. Thus Lodowike is fortified on the one side: but he had another meaning then the Pope or Senate of Venice: and fore-seeing that he could not long build vpon the foundation of this new alliance, he resolves to assure himselfe by foraine forces, seeing that both his owne, and his friends in Italy were doubtfull vnto him. He therefore conuerts his thought on this side the Alpes, seeking to draw the King to seize vpon the ancient inheritance of the house of Anjou. But let vs see by what right Virgilius the fourth gaue the Realmes of Naples and Sicilia (vniuictly detained by Manfroy bastard sonne to Frederick the second) to Charles Earle of Prouence, and of Anjou, to hold in fee, being brother to Saint Lewis, who obtained this title that was given him by armes. Charles the second succeeded his father, who left it to Robert his sonne, and this man died without heires. Joane daughter to Charles Duke of Calabria (deceased before his father) enjoyed the succession. Being disinclined not so much for the sexe, as for the lewdnesse of her life: she adopts Lewis Duke of Anjou brother to King Charles the wife for her sonne, and then dyed of a violent death. Lewis passing thither with an army, dyed of an ague in Apulia, seeing himselfe almost in possession of the

King.

A Kingdom: so as the house of Anjou reaped no profit by this adoption, but only the title of Earldome of Prouence, which was continually possessed by the successors of Charles the first. Lodowike withstanding John of Anjou sonne to the first Louis, and after with the challenge of the same name struck on by the Pope, as he was then, and afterwards with the King of Naples, haile of Italy (but unfortunately) possessed of this Realme, by the death of Lewis the Realme was transported to Charles the first, who dyed without children, his first sonne, to whom Lodowike his sonne succeeded, who dying without issue, left his first sonne, the second for his heire; an unfortunate name in that place, where he had no good land, and his sonne, who purchased the name of Alphonso, left that heire, making way with the helpe of Marthe the first against Joane, obtaining the gouernment of that Realme, who dyed without issue, and his body (besides the adopted sonne, his brother, Alphonso King of Arragon and Sicilia. Afterward shewing reuolue of her affection, which colour of ingratitude, she adopted the same Lewis, in who employing his forces for her gainst Alphonso, expelled him the Realme: but he dyed the same yeare, leaving his daughter in possession the remainder of her life. Then dying without children, she instituted John Duke of Anjou, and Earle of Prouence, for heire, being brother to the said Lewis, who adopted Alphonso. This institution displacing some Barons, who said that the will was forged by them of Naples, they called backe Alphonso at difference spring the warres and faction betwixt the Angeuins, and the Arragonois, nourished so long, by the diuision of the Pope, who according to the opportunity of times, had oftentimes giued their assistance diuersly. Alphonso carrying it by force, and dying without lawfull heires, left Ferdinand his bastard to succeed, as a purchased estate, not belonging to the Crowne of Arragon. John sonne to René assisted by the chief Barons of that County, came to the field, but the happinesse and valor of Ferdinand gues him the repulse. But furnishing his sonne John, and dying without an heire male, Charles his brother's sonne for heire, who dying without children, resigned all his inheritance to Lewis the Eleuenth, father to Charles the eight. Charles was but two and twentie yeares old, little experienced in affaires, courteous of glory, and thrust on with a warlike desire, he often neglected the whole of his Council: of the wisest, namely Lames of Grauille, Admiral of France, preferring the aduice of some of less quality, that possessed him, corrupted by the Neapolitans that were payred for his sake, and by the Ambassadors of Lodowike. The Nobility of France, commended the wisdom of Lewis the Eleuenth, who refused to accept of the Genouois, when they offered themselves, being alwayes loth to attempt anything vpon Italy, being both painfully and finally to the Realme. They knew Ferdinand to be a wife Prince, rich in money, and of great fame, and his sonne Alphonso to be valiant, and well scene in the art of warre: but these were but shewes, and all their reputation turned into a ridiculous smoke. That for the gouernment of Warre and State, the Kings Council was but weak, and their experience small that had most credit with him. He must haue a huge masse of money, and there was not any in his Treasury: Moreover, they objected the subtilty, and policy of the Italians: that Lodowike himselfe for a light profit would breake his faith: that he would be loath to see the Kingdom of Naples, in the French Kings power: finally, they made any conquest beyond the Alpes, were so vniuict for the Realme both of men and money.

All this was but to cast oyle into a fire already kindled. Charles rejects all aduice of peace, and without the priuie of any of his friends, he agrees secretly with Lodowike Ambassador: *It is an army passing into Italy for the conquest of Naples, the Duke of Calabria should give him passage through his Country: he should accompany him with five hundred men at armes entertained: he should suffer him to arrive at his shipping, he would not serve: and before he should march, he should lend the King two hundred thousand Ducats. On the other part, The King should defend the Duchy of Milan against all invaders, and should especially maintain Lodowike's authority: and during the warre, he should maintain a two hundred thousand men, a City belonging to the Duke of Calabria, to supply all necessities in the Duchy. This he signed with his owne hand, and promised more vnto Lodowike, than he was to the Conquest of Naples, he should give him the principall City of Teramo.*

But did not Lodowike feare the power of so great a King, lucky fortified with the goodly Possessions of Bourgoyny, Picardy and Brissy, the whole of the French force would being his kinsman and entertained souldier, growing great about Rome, he might reape the more profit. Ferdinand found no better foundation for his safety, then to tie all of the greatest part of the Noblemen, within the territories of the Church, to suppress that Hidraes head, if it should rise too high. This he laboured more carefully, doubting that Lodowike authority would proue great hereafter with the Pope, by the means of Casimirus his brother.

The vanity of mans conceits must needs discover the weaknesse of his iudgement. Of two mischiefs Ferdinand did chooe the greatest, and grounding vpon a light profit, he did not fore see, that he layed the way open to his owne ruine. For the Pope discovering the Arragonois intention, and pretending thereby the alienation of these small places lying in his iurisdiction, done without his pruitie, they were by right forfeited to the Apollonike Sea. He exclaims and complains against Ferdinand, Peter and Virgilius, pretending to omit no means that may serue for the defence of his dignity, and the rights of the Roman Sea. Lodowike embraceth this occasion, and seeing the Pope to study of some great reuenge against Ferdinand, he feeds his passions, by the loan of forty thousand Ducats and three hundred men at armes, leauied vpon the common treasure. Yet apprehending new troubles, he aduiseeth Ferdinand, to perswade Virgilius, to content the Pope. by some honest composition, to prevent the inconueniences & scandals this diuorce might breed, and counselleth Peter to follow the domestick example of his father, and to be a mediator, as he had beene, betwixt Ferdinand and him, rather then a fire-brand to kindle diuision: but he talked to a deafe man. Ferdinand promisth to doe it, but he ruined with one hand, what he raised with the other: he secretly solicits Virgilius to take possession of those townes, and not to yeeld the Pope any thing, but some certaine some of money, by means whereof he should remaine peaceable Lord of the said places, promising to warrant him from all troubles.

Lodowike finds hereby, that it behoues him to fortifie himselfe with new supports and new alliances. He hath a good opportunity: the disdain of Alexander against the King of Naples, and the affection the Senate of Venice seemed to haue to the diuision of this league whereby their protectors had so long beene made frustrate. But the Pope loued his children deere, and contrary to the custome of others (who called them Nephews, as a more modest name) he impudently called them sonnes. He hoped to obtaine one of the bastard daughters of Alphonso, for one of his bastard-sonnes (graft crab vpon crab, and you shall neuer reap good fruit) and whilest this vaine hope possessed him, he opened his eares rather then his heart to Lodowikes motion. Ferdinand, gaue his consent, but Alphonso hated the ambition and pride of Alexander. The Pope being thus frustrate, turns all his thoughts to Lodowike, moued partly with disdain, and partly with feare, seeing Vrsin, by the exceeding great fauours which he receiued from Ferdinand and the Florentines, to be growne mighty in all the territories of the Church.

would have doubted, if a poore Earle of Prouence, had conquered the realme of Naples, and did he not apprehend him who had publicly protested, that he would neuer suffer the apprehension of his cousin: for Charles and John Galeas were sisters children. Doubtless now the time was come, when as that should be verified which Laurence of Medicis said a little before his death, vnderstanding of the vnion of Britany to the Crowne. That first King of France knew his cause forced, Italy should suffer much, and the publicke predictions of Feyer Isidorus Sanouarelle, whereof we will speake hereafter.

The voyage to Naples.

The Kings army.

The King now takes his way to Lions, to assemble his forces; and diuides them into two armies, at land and at sea. In that at land were about sixteen hundred men at arms, two Archers to a Lance, six thousand Archers on foot, six thousand cross-bow-men, five thousand pikes, eight thousand Harguebufers carrying two-hand swords, twelve hundred pieces of Artillery, of iron and brasse, six thousand two hundred Pioners, two hundred expert Canoniers, six hundred master Carpenters, three hundred Masons, three hundred men to cast bullets, to make coales, cords and cables, four thousand Carters, and eight thousand horse for the artillery. The army at Sea consisted of eighteen gallies, three galleons, and nine great ships. The chiefe Commanders that did accompany the King, were, Edwin Duke of Orleans Lieutenant general for his Maiestie by sea, the Earle of Angoulême, the Earle of Montpensier, the Prince of Orange, the Duke of Nemours, John of Foix Vicont of Narbonne, the Earles of Nevers, Ligni, Boulougne, Brissac, the Lord of Albret, Louis of Tremouille Vicont of Thouars: the Marshalls of Gie, Rieux, and Baudicourt; the Lords of Cruseilles, Tournion; Pienes, Silli, Guise, Chantouy, Mauléon, Prié, Montaisson, d' Alegre, Bonneau, Genouillac, Frainzezeles, Chaumont, Chastillon, Palice, Vergi, d' Hospital, Beaumont, Myolans, Matthew bassard of Bourbon, the bassard of Bourgongne, with a great number of Noblemen, and voluntary Gentlemen. The Lord of Cordes (so famous in our History, for his singular valor, wisdom, and loyalty) dyed at Bresse, three leagues from Lions. The Lord of Vrse, Master of the Kings horse, prepared all things necessary for the fleet at Genoa.

Some infection transported the King from Lions to Vienne, from whence the Duke of Orleans parted for Genoa, and there the voyage was fully concluded: for vntill that time the dissuasion of the best advised, and the distrust of the chiefe sinewes of War, had held the in suspence: for that an hundred thousand franks, borrowed vpon great interest in the booke of Soly at Genoa, could not long maintaine the ordinary charge of his house. Yet fifty thousand Ducats lent him by Lodowike Sforze, and the lively impression of the Cardinal Saint Pierre (the fatal instrument of the miseries of Italy) did somewhat reuoke the fainting courage of Charles. Vvhat shame (saith he) what infamy, to giue ouer so boonsable a resolution? an enterprise published throughout all the world? the Popes amazement? the terrour of Peter of Medicis: the ruine of the Arragonois? who can stay the violent descent of this army? even vnto the marches of Naples? Doth he doubt the want of money? At the fearful thunder of his artillery, yea, at the least brute of his armes, the Italians will bring vnto him: and the rebels spoyles shall feed his army: what shadowe there? what dreame? what vaine feare doth cause this inconstant change? where is that magnanimity? where is that courage, which did but euen now brag to ouer-run all the forces lately vnited together? In the end, the King marcheth the 23 of August, leaving Peter Duke of Bourbon, his brother in law, for Regent: who conducted the Queene from Grenoble into France.

Doubtlesse, we must obserue a singular and fauourable prouidence of God, in the conduct of this voyage, vnderaken vpon borrowed money: but where God works, all things are easie. For a third proofe of his need, being at Turin, the King borrowed the jewels of the Duchesse of Sauoy, daughter to William Marquis of Montferrat, and Widow to Charles Duke of Sauoy, and pawned them for 1200 Ducats: and for a fourth, being at Casal, he pawned the jewels of the Marquesse, widow to the Marquis of Montferrat, for the like summe: women worthy doubtlesse of our History, hauing loued our France with a singular affection. At Ast the King was toucht with the small pockes, and a fever, which did hazard his life, but within sixe or seuen dayes he was recovered. Thither came Lodowike Sforze, and Beatrice his wife, daughter to the Duke of Ferrara, to salute him, and withall came very fauourable newes.

A magna, towards Ferrara, the which Ferdinand his sonne Duke of Calabria commanded, accompanied by Virgil Vrsin, the Earle of Pettillano, and John Jaques of Triuile, who afterwards serued the King. This army had to encounter them the Earle of Caiazzo, and the Lord of Aubigni a Scottishman, who stoppt their passage. The other at sea, led by John Frederick brother to Alphonso, accompanied by Obisio of Fieque a Geneuois, and others, by means whereof they were in hope to draw the City of Genoa into their faction. But the Bayliffe of Dijon entring with two thousand Suisses, assured it for the King. Charles with three thousand men had taken Rapaille, twenty miles from Genoa. The two Saint Seuerins brethren, and John Adorne brother to Agnustin Gouverneur Genoa joyntly with the Duke of Orleans, and a thousand Suisses, charged them, ouerthrew them, and slew a hundred or sixscore: (It was much in that age, for then their warres were not bloody) tooke some prisoners, and all that escaped were stript by the Duke of Milans people: so as Frederick could neuer gather them againe together. A disgrace which did much distaste the Florentines, being alwayes more inclined to the house of France, then what of Arragon, and incouraged the King to proceed, animated therunto, by the persuasions of Lodowike. My Lord (saith he) doubt not of this enterprise: there are three great parties in Italy: you hold the one, that is, Milan: the other fires not, those be the Victorians: you haue no businesse but at Naples, hauing conquered that realme, if you will giue me credit, I will assist you to become greater then euer was Charlemagne, and I will expell the Turke out of Constantinople. He spake well, if Christian Princes had bene well vnited.

The first onset throw at the Arragonois.

Finally, Charles makes his entry into Pavia, in quality of a King, vnder a canopy, the harts hanged, and the people crying God save the King. Then grew there some ialousie, they would haue the King rest satisfied with the towne for his lodging: but in the end, the Castle was opened vnto him, where he did visit John Galeas his cousin, being sicke, and at the point of death: not without great compassion of such as thought the course of his life would be soone cut off, by the notable treachery of his Vncle.

Placentia receiued him as willingly as Pavia, and thither newes was brought of the death of the Duke of Milan, leauing a son and a daughter: Lodowike posting thither, with a purpose to returne, vsurped the Duchy absolutely with the title. Thus all Lombardy marked at the brute of this French army, some for loue, and some for feare. They held out not to bereligious, loyall and full of bounty: but conuincesse, robberies and other inuincibilities of souldiers, made them soone to alter their conceits, and the horer of the artillery (whose thunder was yet strange vnto them) amazed them. The Florentine, a cunning dissembler, had sent twise vnto the King, before he parted from France: at the first came the Bishop of Rhegium, and Peder Soderini: of whom they onely demaunded passage, and a hundred men at armes maintained: at the second time, Peter Caponi, and others, who made answer, that by the commandement of King Louis the Eleuenth they had reuoked the alliance of John of Aniou (if he were associate with Charles of France in the name of the common weale) to enter into league with Ferdinand of Arragon, and therefore they could not rashly leave it. But whether of these troopes, there was still some way to Peter of Medicis, who gaue the King intelligence of the peoples desire, listing which hands for the recovery of their liberty oppressed by Peters gouernement, enuied him by his neere kinemen, and the best families, as the Capponi, Soderini, Perli and others.

The death of John Galeas.

And for a second time, Lodowike and John de Medicis counsils to Peter, came secretly to the King at his departure from Placentia, vowing great loie in general to the house of France, and much hatred to their Kingdome, against whom Charles was greatly incensed, for the excuse he made to his Ambassador, which was sent from Ast: That the chiefe Citizens were at their houses in the country, and could not so readily returne him an answer, but they should shortly let him vnderstand their resolution, by special Ambassadors.

Great practices against Peter of Medicis.

In the second time they came jointly with the Pope. The King must not leave Tuscan and the Estate of the Church behind him as his enemies. The Army passeth the Appennin at Pontremone vpon Magre, the which diuides Liguria (which is the country of Genoa) from Tuscany, and is vpon the marches of the Florentines country, of purpose to force them to plant the Standard of France vpon their walls, or else to take the weakest place, and winter in it.

The second exploit of the Kings army, was at Filizane, a towne taken by force, sackt, and all mercenary souldiers, with many inhabitants slain. A hard stratagem, for men, who (as we haue said) made war rather in pompe and brauery than with blowes.

Serezane was sufficient to withstand, yea to ruine a great power: Serezanelle was more strong, a fort built vpon the hill about the towne: but the Florentines diuisions had hindered all necessary provision, but men. And indeed they were loth to make warre against the house of France, of whom they had of old time depended: and the rather, for that they were forbidden to traffike, and their men banished out of all France, by the especiall aduice of Caponi. The army could not continue there; the Country is stark and barren, compassed in by the sea and mountaines, no victuall but what was brought from farre, and great store of snow. But the way must be laid open to Pisa, and if they had selected the first place that refitted, what village but would haue held out: Pisa Florentines some horse, with three hundred foot (meaning to put them into Serezane) who were counted, beaten, and in a manner all slain or taken prisoners, by some troopes of the foreward going to forage beyond Magre. This terror made the Florentines to retreat publicly, T but they would no longer incurre the Kings displeasure, nor the Duke of Milan. Whereupon they send fiftene or sixtene Citizens; and offer the King free entry into their City, whose onely designe was to expell Peter of Medici.

Peter practised (by the means of Laurence Spinola his factor in the bank at Lintolme) Earle of Bresse, and Myolans the Kings Chamberlaine, Gouvernor of Dauphine, to procure him a safe conduct, and at the first treaty hee grants the King all his demands: T That the forts of Serezane, Serezanelle and Pietro Saincto (the keys of the Florentine domination of that side, Salvo of Pisa, and the port of Lionorne, should be put into the Kings hand, who should be bound to redeliver them after the conquest of Naples. That the King should receive the Florentines into his alliance and protection, upon the haue of two hundred thousand Ducats, and the assurance of these premises should be concluded in Florence. A facility which discovered a wonderfull feare and trouble of mind: for the King would haue beene satisfied with more easie conditions.

Lodowike was present at this Capitulation, who to recompence his thoughts of Charles his conquests, obtains from his Majesty for thirty thousand Ducats a transport for him and his heires, of the possession of Genoa: (which the King some years before had giuen to John Galeas Duke of Milan) yet discontented that Charles would not giue him Pietro Saincto and Serezane in guard (which places he demanded as forcibly taken away by the Florentines from the Geneuois, and had serued him as a maner to lay hold of Pisa he returned to Milan, and did neuer after see the King, leaving go withstanding Galeas of St. Seuerin, and the Earle of Belzoiz to receive his Majesty.

Lodowike being discontented with the King.

Thus by the conjunction of these strong places, the parts of Romagna are opened vnto the King, he enters Luques being very honourably received by the Citizens, God save the King of France Augustus. From Luques hee goes to Pisa, Galeas of St. Seuerin, following the instructions given him by Lodowike Spinola (who did not know that the like accident would be the cause of his ruine) called the chiefe Citizens, and uisited them, that rebelling against the Florentines, they should craue liberty from the King: hoping by this meanes that he should one day draw Pisa vnder the duke of Milans command, to whom they were subject before the Florentines held it, this was in thre yeece that the Venetians conquered Padua. Through this aduice the people rose together, men, women, and children, they flocke the next day about the King, crying to masse, crying with open throat, Liberty, Liberty, beseeching him with hands lifted and reares in their eyes, to free them from the Florentines oppression, by whom Spinola they were most tyrannously intreated. Rabaz, Concellor of the Republicke of Dauphine, and Master of Requests, said vnto the King, that these demands were iust, and that it was a pitifull thing to see the hard subiection that did oppress them. The King who did not consider the importance of this action, breaking the treaty of Serezane, and that he could not giue liberty to a towne that was not his, inke that which was received only by courtesy, rather less slip, these words were spoken: Spinola was inquisit

Prickt forward a strong headed horse, and he will run as fast as hee can. This multitude presently change their cry of liberty, into cries of joy, and running to the bridge vpon the riuer of Arne, they beat downe the Mazoreco (this was a great Lion, placed vpon an high pillar of Marble, with the armes of Florence) and cast it into the riuer, and the

A same place they set vp a King of France holding a sword in his hand, and treading this Mazoreco vnder his feet. But oh the lightnesse of Italians! few years after, at the entry of the King of Romanes, they shall deale with the King as with this Lion.

This ignominious and rash wound, giuen to the Estate of Florence by Peter of Medici, contrary to the example of his predecessors, without the aduice of the Citizens, and without any decree of the Magistrates, had wonderfully incensed his fellow-citizens. Being returned to Florence, to prepare his lodging for the King, going the ninth of November to enter the palace of the Seignoury, to treat of the Kings arrival; beheld Janet Meli a young man, noble and rich, with other magistrates, being armed, offer him the entry alone, but deny it to all his followers. He retires home to his house, and is resolved to get that by force which he could not willingly obtaine. He armes, and causeth Paul Pysan to approach with his troope, the which was in the Florentines pay. The State proclaimes him a rebel, the people flye to armes, and cry liberty. Peter recouers the gates; and with him were the Cardiall Iohn and Julian his brethren: they flye to Bolonia, and from thence to Venice. Peter had no cloake but one of his groomes, being hated of his fellow-citizens, disdained of his domestick seruants; his house spoiled, with losse of aboue an hundred thousand Ducats in imueables; and to increase his misery, a factor of his at Venice, refused him for the value of an hundred ducats in cloath a notable example of the inconstancy of worldly affairs. But by the rashnesse of one young man, lately equal in a manner to great Princes, the house of Medici fell for that time, which vnder colour of ciuill administration, had gouerned the common-weale of Florence threescore yeares peaceably, and with respected authority.

His miserable estate at Venice

Charles entered the next day triumphantly into Florence, himselfe and his horse armed, and his lance vpon his thigh. The Florentines were not ignorant of his descent, for that they sought to crosse him in his enterprise, and that many of his followers, thrust on by enuouement, gaped after nothing more then the sacke of so rich a City, having first of all resisted the power of France, and that others also did solicit the restitution of Peter of Medici, especially Philip Earle of Bresse. And although the City might worthily iustifie that violence whereof Peter and his compliers were the onely motiue; yet did they wisely foresee that the King would not let slip this opportunity to become their Lord. But being vnable to stop this violent streame by any force, they had secretly filled their chiefe houses with resolute men, receiued their enterained Capitaines into the city, and did give order, that every man, both within and without, heare the City should arme at the sound of the palace great bell. Thus fortified with men, they stand thickly vpon the eardrums of composition. Oftimes we lose the Rele by ouer-gripping. The fauour they did see some beare vnto Peter: the insupportable summes of money that were exacted: the absolute Seignoury of Florence which the King demanded, as hauing conquered it by the law of armes, considering in what manner he entered, made them refuse these rigorous demands, with a firme resolution to maintaine their publick liberty with the perill of their liues. Thus they grew angry on eyther side; and for a conclusion of the last conference, the Kings Secretary reading the articles which his Majesty would resolutely haue concluded, beheld Peter Caponi one of the foure Deputies for the city (a violent man, and one of the mightiest Families in the State, pulls the articles from the Secretary and teares them. Seeing you demand of us (saith he) so outrageous conditions; you shall find your traitors; and see our Rele.

The Kings entry into France.

The Florentines furnish themselves in their houses for feare of the King.

This audacious brauery did moderate the excess of their demands: for how lamentable had it bene, to haue fallen to any tragickall decision of their controuersie. The King clamour backe, and containing himselfe within the bounds of reason, passeth this capitulation: That the Citty of Florence should be a friend, confederate, and in the perpetuall protection of the Crowne of France. That as the end of the enterprise of Naples, the King should yield up (without any charge to the Florentines) Pisa, Lionorne, Pietro Saincto, Serezane, Serezanelle, and all other places taken or resolted: and in case of denial, they might recouer them by force. That they should giue the King fifty thousand Ducats in fifteen dayes; forty thousand in March, and thirty thousand in Iune following. They should pardon the Pisans their rebellion and other crimes. They should free Peter of Medici from banishment and confiscation; and concluded that he should not approach within an hundred and fifty miles of their confines: and that he should be nearer then an hundred miles. This accord was sworn vpon the great Altar in the Church of Saint John at Florence. But matters succeeded other wise, as we shall see, such as Florentines changed their red Lillie into a white.

The articles of the agreement.

Two dayes after, the King parted towards Siciana; a Citie well peopled, situated in a fertile country, in ancient time rich, mighty, & the second citie in Toscane, which yielded in many factions to the stronger party, so as they enjoyed more the name than the effect of liberty. They took off their gates for the Kings entry: notwithstanding the City being suspected of him, (for that it had been always at the devotion of the Empire) he took garison, and took his way to Rome. Aqua pendente and Montefasconi (places belonging to the Pope) received him with coyall pompe; and layd the way open to Viterbo. The Florentine Forts which the King held, and the garison left in Sienna made the Venetians and Milanais to feare, that he would hardly end his conquests with Naples. They went this common danger, they treat of a new confederacy, and had concluded it, if it had made that resistance to the King which many expected. Ferdinand Duke of Calabria, the Popes forces, Virgil Perin, and the remainders of the Arragonois army, had solyed to camp at Viterbo, and there to make head against the King, but the roades which the Colonis made (who had taken Ossia from the Pope) and hindered the passing of victuals to Rome by sea) having put all the countrey about Rome in alarme; being allious of the Popes integrity, who began to hearken to the French demands, made him retire, leaving the way open for the King to enter into Viterbo by the fauour of the Cardinal of Saint Pierre, and the Colonis, and so into the territories of the Duke.

The Pope is now wonderfully perplexed: he knows himselfe to have become one of the chiefe motives of Charles his voyage, and since, without any offence, he hath opposed his authority, his counsell, and his armes. Hee imagines, that the assurance hee shall have from the King, shall be no firmer then his to the King. He sees the Cardinals of Saint Pierre, and other his enemies in credit about the King. Hee fears that this prediction of Sebastian should now take effect. That the Church should be reformed by the sword, and remembers with what infamy he came to the Popedom; his government, and his life, controules him. The Cardinals of Assensio, Saint Pierre, Calanne, Savelle, and about these others, urge the King to suppress a Pope so full of vices, and abominable to all the world, and to proceed to a new election. Hee hath no sufficient forces to withstand a stranger. Alphonsus a Pope, Ferdinand is weak. Virgilus Perin General of the Arragon army, Constable of the Realme of Naples, allyed to Alphonsus, (John Ferdinand, eldest to the said Perin, having married a bastard daughter of Ferdinand the father of Alphonsus) bound to the house of Arragon for so many respects, had of late confessed, that the houses should give the King passage, lodging and victuals within the territories of the Church; and leaues him Campagna, and other places for his assurance, until the way were past the territories of Rome. The Earle of Petrellano, and all the rest of the family of Perin, followed the same accord. And now Ciuita uecchia, Coenette, & in a manner about Rome, is in the power of the French. All the Court, all the people, are troubled, they demand an vniuy. Being thus troubled in minde, hee sends the Bishop of Concord and Terne, to the King: but hee seeks to compound both for himselfe and Alphonsus. The King had not advanced his armes euen to the gates of Rome to that intent. Hee sends the Cardinals of Assensio and Calanne, Lewis of Tremouille, and the President of Gannai, to the Pope, who in an humour brings Ferdinand with his army into Rome, and suffers them to fortifie the weakest places. But where is the means to defend it? Ossia cuts off their victuals. The Cardinals being ariued (in a short way of Alexander) they are presently taken prisoners, to make them to deliver vp Ossia, and in the same tumult, the French Ambassadors are slayd by the Arragonois: yet the Popes sented them to be presently deliuered, and the Cardinals soon after. Hee sends the Cardinal of Saint Severin to the King, being at Nepes, and treats no more but of his own safeties. And that which vigeth him most, the King is come to Bracciano, the chiefe towne of the Virgins; the Colonis haue many of the Ghibelin faction within Rome: the Duke of Ligoy, (a vniuy german to the King by his mother) and the Lord of Alegre were to be a vniuy to them, with five hundred lances, & two thousand Swisses, to spoile the Countrey beyond Tiber, and to keepe Ferdinand within Rome. But hee was more amazed with as about twenty fadomes of the wall fell downe of it selfe, the which makes the King, and forces the Pope. But hee fears the Cardinals hatred, and the rage of his estate.

The

A. The King frees him of this doubt, and doth assure him by the Marshall of Gile, the President of Gannai, and the Scheshall of Beucaire, that his intention to take this place by force, he is notwithstanding rescued with the same reference that his intention is to have a wayes borne to the Roman Sea, that crying peaceably into Rome, all the Garrouses should be converted into amity and friendship. Hee recds, and sent him a safe conduct for Ferdinand, to passe safely through the dominions of the Church: Thus the King entered Rome with all his army, by the Port of Saint Peter. Hee Popes, in the manner as he had done into Florence: euen as Ferdinand Duke of Calabria, passed out of Saint Sebastians gate, the last day of this yeare. The Pope, fraught with feare, and distress, shus himselfe up into the Castle Saint Angelo, which he should treat with the King. And for that he refused to deliuer the Castle vnto the King: the artillery was with drawne out of the Castle of Saint Marke, where the King was lodged; yet the promises and promises of Alexander, prevailed much with some of the priuy Counsell, and the King of his owne disposition, was not inclined to offend the Pope. But what needs there any Cannon to batter a place, which opens of itselfe, fifteen fadomes of the Castle wall (the original) tell at the Kings arriual. In the end the Pope gives the King the Towns of Ciuita uecchia, Terracina, and Spoleto (yet this was not deliuered) to haue them vnto the conquest of Naples, and grants impunity to the Cardinals, and Barons that had followed the King. Zemin Ottoman brother to Bajazet the 2, who since the death of Mahomet the 2 father (being pursued by the said Bajazet) had saved himselfe at Rhodes, and from thence being led into France, had bene put into Pope Innocents power: for whose guard Bajazet paid yearly forty thousand Ducats to the Pope, that by the greedines of this summe, they should be the lesse willing to yeeld to any Prince, that might make vse of him against him. The King desired to haue him, to make him an instrument of the warre; which hee refused against the Turke, after that of Naples. But Alexanders holiness, advised the Turke to stand vpon his guard, and so provide for his young King, preuails not in his enterprise: for a recompence hereof, Bajazet (although he detested the Popes impiety) sent him two hundred thousand crownes, by George of Antie, the messenger of this aduice, intreating the Pope to free him of this feare. It was generally beleued, that he was poysoned, and dyed within few dayes after that Alexander had deliuered him. Moreover, it was said: That Caius, Cardinal of Valence, the Popes fanne, should follow the King three months, as the Popes Legat, but rather to be a pawne of his fathers promises.

By means of this accord, the Pope returned to the Vatican, the Pontifical Palace, where the King made his filiall submission, obtaines two Cardinals Hares, the one for the Bishop of Mans, being of the house of Luxembour; the other for Briconnet, Bishop of Saint Malo, and for himselfe the title of Emperour of Constantinople; and a promise to himselfe him in the Realme of Naples, without any prejudice to anothers right, and then hee cured many of the Kings euill. And to shew, that as eldest sonne of the Church, hee had as great iurisdiction, as the Pope within Rome, hee caused three seats for Justice to be set, and execution to be done of some that were guilty of a delition made in the lower street.

Ferdinand was no sooner parted out of Rome; but the hatred which the people bare to the house of Arragon, discouered itselfe. The tyrannous oppressions of Ferdinand, and that to Alphonsus were yet fresh. The Isle of Sicilia flowed yet with the blood of foure and twenty Princes and Barons which had returned vpon his word; who being imprisoned after the result of Arragon, Alphonsus (to make his coming to the Crowne famous) caused to be slaine, amongst others, the Duke of Sella, and the Prince of Rosane, who had married the sister of Ferdinand his father. Ferdinand had bene a man without faith, a dissembler, cruell, violent, a great exactor, infamous, a rauisher of women, and irreligious. Thus (witnesseth the Bishopricke of Tarentum, the which he sold to a few for thirteenth thousand Ducats, for his son, who he had said was a Christian) Alphonsus had the same qualities: and moreover, he was disolute, impious, and wicked. Hereunto were added the old reliques of the Angevin faction, which might helpe much to breed an alteration. Thus the people of Naples rise, Aquila and Abruzzo aduance their enuies; Fabrizio Colonne, keeps all in awe about Albi and Taillicouffe, and all the rest of the Realme was ready to rebel. But that which most imports, the furies of his owne conscience tormented him. Hee thinks that the ghosts of these murdered Noblemen appeare vnto him, that the trees and forests found into his ears the name of France. He sees his subjects by no revenge the blood shed against his faith. Thus, unable to withstand both a time and a shame, bred enemy, he caught his sonne Ferdinand and was crowned, whose years had yet given no cause of scandal; and with four light Gallies, laden with hundreds of Vases (whereunto he was much given) seeds to garden withall, some Rosiers, and a little money, he fled to Marate in Sicile, where he suddenly changed his horrible estate into a Monkish life, assisting the religious at all hours of service, both day and night in abstinence, almes and prayers; but oppressed with the Hemroids and gravel, he was being ready to shut himself up in a Monastery at Valenza the great.

This flight made the Kings way more easie, and verified the saying of Pope Alexander that the French were come with wooden shooes, and chalk in their barbingers hands; for their lodgings without any difficulty. Alluding it to the prick of wood which pages and lackeys put in the heels of their Masters shoes, when they ride upon their moyle. And in truth, our Frenchmens backs were not much over-heated with their armes in this predition; nor any one place slaying the King about a day, but the Castles of Naples. The King going from Rome comes to Velletri, from whence the Cardinall of Valentia (his fathers right) stole from his Maisty. From Velletri he comes to Montforti, a house belonging to the Church, strong of situation, yet was it battered and taken in four hours. All that were found in armes were slain, except the three sons of Lames Count, a Roman Gentleman Lord of the towne, who preserving the haire he bare the Crown, before his honour, had left the Kings pay to follow Alphonse. These with others being rettyred into the Castle, yielded themselves prisoners upon view of the Cap. Mont Saint. Lan, a towne belonging to the Marquis of Pescara, seated in the plaine, upon the confines of the Kingdom of Naples, strong both by art and nature, fortified with three hundred strangers, and five hundred inhabitants, which were resolute defend their state, yet was it one day besieged, battered, assailed and taken in the King presence. Six hundred and six men were slain in the fury of the fight, and but tiny escape: and to terrifie the rest, it was burnt.

We are now ready to enter. The Arragonois must shew his courage. Ferdinand the King assembles all the forces he can, having fifty cornets of horse, and fixe thousand choice foot, under the most expert Captaines of Italy, and camps at Saint Germaine. The place is of easie defence, on the one side high and inaccessible mountaine, on the other side the waters hinder the approach, and in front is the Garilian, a river vncasie to passe;
 and not farre off is the passage of Cancelli, a mountaine which of necessity they must passe:
 It is the Key of the whole kingdom, here must they fight, or give way. But this army was daunted, without courage, and without force the name of the French had amazed them, and the Captaines, partly desirous of innoation, partly greedy of better entertainment, wavered in their faith and courage. The Marshall of Gie approacheth with three hundred Launces, and two thousand foot, but terror goes before him. In this amazement both Cancelli and Saint Germaine are shamefully abandoned, and eight pieces of great artillery are taken to thunder hereafter in favour of the French.

Capua was sufficient to receive the army, which marched after the forward, rather like travellers then men of Warre, without order, without commandement, and without discipline, the soldiers gaping after nothing but spoile. The situation is very strong, having Vulturno before it (a river very deepe in that place) but their resolution was like to that of Saint Germaine; and to increase it, as Ferdinand made account to defend it, and by that means to hold Naples and Caiette. The Queene his Grandmother sends him word, that since the losse of Saint Germaine, there was so great a tumult at Naples, as all would be in vprore if he came not speedily. He goes, and promiseth to returne the next day.
 But John laques of Truivelle (to whom he had given the Towne in guard) comes with some gentlemen of Capua to the King being at Calui: he presents him the towne and his service, and makes an offer to bring Ferdinand. The King accepts the Capuans offer, and the coming of Ferdinand, upon condition that hee retain no portion within the realme, but should content himselfe with such means as he should give him in France.
 In the meane time the soldiers lack Ferdinand lodging and his stable: the men at armes disperse themselves in diuers places: Virgilius and the Earle of Perellane craue a safe conduct from the King, and retire with their Companies to Nola. Ferdinand thinking

by

A by this journey to have assured the Neapolitans, retirines at the time prefix, when as the Capuans aduise him not to set forward, seeing they were otherwise resolved. Aulerle (a towne betwixt Capua and Naples) sends their keys to the King; and the Neapolitans determined to follow them. Ferdinand retired into the Castle, knowing that 300 Lanquennets meant to take him prisoner: he gives them the moucables of the said Castle, and as they were busie to divide it, he slips from them, sets the yong Prince of Rosane at liberty (whom by loue or force he caried with him) and the Earle of Popoli: hee caused the ships that remained in the port, to be burnt and sunk, and saues himselfe with the Queene, Don Fredrick his vncke, his daughter Isabel, and some few servants; in the Isle of Ithaca; and whilst he was within sight of Naples, he often repeated this goodly Otiacle, if the Lord kept not the City, the watchmen watch but in vaine.

Thus all water at the Conquerors fame, and with such cowardise, as 200 horse under the command of the Earle of Ligny going to Nola, took both it, Virgilius and the Earle of Petralia, without resistance, being retired thither with 400 men at armes, attending the safe conduct they had obtained from the King; being amazed like to the rest of their army, and from thence they were led captiues to the foot of Mountdragon, and all their men stript. In the meane time the Neapolitans Ambassadors come with their keys, desiring a confirmation of their ancient exemptions and priuiledges: The King orders the 21 of February, and is receiued with such exceeding ioy, both of great and small, of all ages, all sexes and all qualities, as euery one runnes as to their dearest redeemer, from a cruel and insupportable tyranny. Thus Charles (without planting of tent, or breaking of Lance) in four months and a halfe, with an admirall happinesse, came, saw and ouercame. They say commonly, that the poison lyes in the raile, & that the hardest part to flea an ancle is the raile. The perfection of the victory consisted in the taking of the Castles of Naples. The tower of Saint Vincent, built for the defence of the port, was easily taken.

 Then the Castle, the lodging of their Kings, seated upon the sea, strong by nature and by art, plentifully furnished with victuals & munition, and manned with five hundred Lanquennets; but abandoned by the Marquis of Pescara, to whom Ferdinand had left it in guard (who seeing the garrison bent to yeeld the place, had followed Ferdinand, and was after some small defence yielded, upon condition to depart in safety, and to carry what they could away. And see here the first and greatest error which the King committed in this exploit, himselfe wanting experience, but his minions & fauorits no conscienceless; Mag use all these victuals and other moucables, to the first that begged them: who furnished themselves with the munition, whereon the preferuation of the towne and place depended. The Castle of Ouo, built upon a rocke, hanging ouer the sea, being battered with the Cannon (the which might only indammage the wall; but not the rocke it selfe) compounded, if they were not releued within a certaine time, and after foure and twenty dayes siege, it was deliuered into the Kings hands.

The King made his entry into Naples the 12 of May, in an Imperiall habit, & was recei-ued as King of France, and of both Sicilies (whereof the Realme of Naples makes a part) and Emperor of Constantinople: But herein hee made no just accompt; with him that guesse and takes away Kingdomes. The Barons and Commons all sent away their Captaines and troops dispersed in diuers parts of the realme. Those which depended most of the house of Arragon, due still remembrance: The Caristis, who enjoyed surry the land and sea of Inheritance: the Dukes of Melfe, Graua, and Sorra; the Earles of Mantorio, Ralchi, Tripaldi, Celano, Monteleone, Meritano, and Popoli, come to do their homage; and generally all the Noblemen of the Realme, except Alphonse Quato, Marquis of Pescara, the Earle of Acre, and the Marquis of Squillizzo; whose injuries the King gave away.
 Another vantage which shall be a great cause the following readers.

at discretion, after some light assaults. Tarentum, Otrante, Monopoli, Trani, Manfredi, Barle, and in a manner all other strong places yielded at the first breach. But some holding themselves wronged, for that they had in a manner disdain'd to heare their depuries: others, for that they had sent no man to receive them, will soon returne their first demand. The life of Ischia remained yet, and Ferdinand upon the first intelligence of the yielding of the Castles of Naples had abandoned it to Janike d'Alcala, brother to the Marquis of Pescara, both most faithfull to their Prince, and was retired to Sicily. The King sends thither his army at sea, the which was cast by a tempest upon the life of Corfe: yet in the end they anchored upon the Realme, but after the last of the Expedition. This army holding it selfe too weak to force the fort of Ischia, would not assaile it, and therefore the King resolved to lead into Provence and to Geneva, let more ships, and to assaile the sea, the which Ferdinand scowred with fouretyne galleies ill armed. But profperity doth oftentimes make vs become insolent; and without considering the consequence, we easily let matters passe at adventure. Our French are soon well lodged, they dreame of nothing but feasting, dancing, and tourneys: and the great self about the King have no other care, but to make the victory profitable to themselves without any regard, either of the dignity, or profit of their Prince, who not satisfied with the conquest of these goodly and rich estates, determines to advance his victorious forces. Let vs leave them glured with ease, pleasure, and good cheare, and let vs make an escape into the East, to see how he had sped there, if the Pope had as well united the Potentates of Italy, to joyne their common forces with our Charles, as he now flimsies up to croffe his new conquests.

Mahamet the second, left two sonnes, Baizet the second of that name, and Zemin (they name him diversly, Zemin, Zizim, Gemin and Geme) both resident in their governments when the father dyed. Baizet in Cappadocia, Zemin in Licaonia. Their abilities fell the Balchaes and Captaines of the Janisaries at discord, about the succession, and they fell from words to armes. Hereupon the Janisaries proclaime Baizet Emperour being absent: Isaac and Mesithes, chiefe captaines of the Turkish army, being at Constantinople, set Carchus the sonne of Baizet in the throne of his ancestors: they deliver him the forts and treasure, that under colour of his nonage they might manage the affaires of the Empire at their pleasure. Baizet posts thither, and by great bribes doth pacifie and win the hearts of the Janisaries, and of their Captaines, incited against him through the malice of some Noblemen. So Carchus being yet very young, yielded him the Crowne willingly.

Zemin on the other side, was called by his friends and partisans, holding him to be a man of greater courage, and better execution then his brother, being more fit for his booke, whereunto he was more addicted, then unto armes. Pyrramus, Comman King of Cilicia, and Caithbey Sultan of Egypt, incite him to warre against his brother. But he was vanquished in three battells, by Achamet Balcha, and despairing, fled to the great Master of Rhodes, leaving his mother and two twins, a sonne and a daughter in Carras, whom Baizet caused to be murdered. Many Princes of Europe demanded Zemin, as Leu the cleveneth French King, and Matthias King of Hungary, hoping by his means to unite Baizet: but this was a good pigeon in the Papes Doue-house. Innocent the eight would have him, hoping that Baizet his brother would give some notable summe of money to redeem him, or else to keepe him from any other, that might vie him as an instrument to croffe his new Empire. Alexander, successor unto Innocent, (a monstrous man in life, monstrous in his election, and monstrous in his death.) I have horror to read, and more to report, what writers doe testifie, intreating the curious reader, to see them rather in the Originals themselves) being forced to deliver him to Charles the eight, and so disposed of him: corrupted by the money of Baizet, he caused him to be paysoned; either grieved for the losse of his pension, or envying the glory of Charles: or else fearing, lest if things should succeed happily for him against the Infidels, he should turn his thoughts and forces, to reforme the abuses and corruptions, which had long before crept into the Church.

A while after the sight of Zemin, Baizet caused Achamet to be strangled, for that (growing proud and fierce, by reason of his wealth,) he practised to ruine Baizet, and transport

The Turke swift overcom by the Sultan.

A transport the Emperour to Zemin. A happy death for the Christians, of whom Achamet was a violent and cruel oppressor. Baizet fired by the death of these two men, he turned his forces against the Christians, and subdued Valachia. Then he vanquished Carman, reducing his principality into the forme of a Province. After that, hee marcheth with his army into Asia against the Sultan Amir, who had succoured his brother Zemin with countlesse men, victuals and money. The Sultan defeated the Turke in two great battels, the one was given neere Salatane in Cilicia, the other neere to Taurus: in the which he took both the Commanders of the Turkish army prisoners, Mesithes Balcha, and Achamet Chieftaine, loose in law to Baizet, and slew about threescore and ten thousand Turkes.

This checke made Baizet to change his climate, and leaving Asia, to passe into Europe, where his adventures were not so strong. Hee took Durazzo, neere to Valonne, and won a great battell under the command of Cadi Balcha, against the Sclavonians, Hongarians and Croations, who were encamped in the large plaines of Orbatia, neere to Sag, about the yeare 1493. But John Christ, sonneto to the brave Schubert, recovered that which Baizet had snatched: forcing him to accept of such conditions as hee propounded. Moreover, Cris Pichin defeated him in battell in Croatia, and expelled him the Country.

The all these nations which lye betwixt Valonne and Constantinople (being from the one to the other about eightene dayes journey) languished under the burthen of the Turkish tyranny, Albanos, Sclavonians, and Grecians, hoping for their deliverie by the means of our Charles. But what could he do, seeing those that should second the resolution of this young Prince, were the first to overthrow his designs by their secret practices? Charles notwithstanding the death of Zemin, sent the Archbishop of Durazzo into Greece, an Albanos by birth, having an enterprise upon Scurari, with Constantine a Greek, afterwards gouernour of Montefray who had intelligence within the Towne: the Yugians have no longer knowledge of the death of Zemin: but to gratifie Baizet, they will give the honor to give him the first aduise for the effecting whereof they command, that no ship should passe by night betwixt the two Castles, which are at the entry of the gulf of Venice. This was the same night, when as the Archbishop should depart with many swordes, bucklers, and iuelins, to arme those with whom hee had intelligence. But he is taken, and shut up in one of those Castles: his instructions are viewed, whereby the Venetians informed of the fact, send to aduise the Turkes in the places adjoining. Intwixt our French had not yet learned to know him, who guides our hands to fight, and our papers to the battell; attending a strange and sudden Catastrophe, they must plant the bowels of their victory in the Realme of Naples. Let vs now see the issue of this journey. Wee haue left King Charles at Naples, seeking his delights, and his people hunting after profit, neglecting to expell the Aragonois out of those few places which held yet for them. In the meane time the peoples love and fauour, (who loue not a stranger, but in their need) degenerated.

The King had in his bounty fired the Realme of above 300000 ducats by yeare: yet matters were not managed with that order and iudgement as was requisite: hee heard not the petitions and complaints of suitors, but felt the charge thereof to such as ruled him: whole incapacity and countenance confounded all. The Nobility were not regarded, their services were not recompensed: they had no addresse to the King: no distinction of persons, no gratuity, but by chance: mens courages that were estranged from the house of Aragon, were not comforted: no restitution of goods and offices to the Anguins, and other Barbans, which had beene banished by old Ferdinand: preferences were given to such as purchased them with money, and other extraordinary means: to many they were given without reason, and taken from others without any cause: the townes which were wont to obey any immediately but the King, were given for the most part to Frenchmen. Things most insupportable to subjects, who had beene accustomed to the wise and well ordered government of Kings of the house of Aragon, and had hoped for better in the change of this Royalty. These things did wondrously blench the reputation of the French. On another side, there was no care to keepe the faith made to the Aragonois of the conquests and forresses to the Florentines and the Church: A pretence which served as a pretext to the following issues.

Causes of discontent in the Realme of Naples.

Causes of discontent in the Realme of Naples.

In the meane time, Alphonso and Ferdinand lately King of Naples, lay before the Venetians the dangers they incurred by this new purchase to the Crowne of France. The King of Castile is in doubt of his Islands of Sicile and Sardinia. The Emperour is jealous, and they giue him falsly to vnderstand, that the King desired his Imperiall Crowne. The Duke of Milan could neuer beleue, the King should find so great facility in this expedition, or proceed so farre with his forces. He was vnabie to defend his estate newly vnruped. But another feare posseseth him, the seruinde that hangs ouer his head, and all Italy. The Pope opposeth, and the Turke at the Popes instance, threatens the Venetians, if they declare not themselves against the King. The Venetians, hauing seene the violent course of this happy successe, that the King, like lightning, had run through all Italy: that hee had seized vpon Pisa, and other forts of the Florentines, that he had left a garison in Siena, and done the like in the territories of the Church. They imagined, that his proiects had a further reach then the Realme of Naples, and held another danger to be their owne. To preuent it, they conclude a league, (for three yeares), said they to the Lord of Aragon, the Kings Ambassador at Venice, To defende Christendome against the Turke: for the common defence of Italy, and for the preteruention of euery ones private estate. They conclude by secret articles to aide Ferdinand of Arragon, for the recovery of the Realme of Naples, who with great hope of the peoples loue, was ready to forsake the King. He had not felted them in the possession of their places. He preferred the counsell of such as reported the Pisans before the Florentines, on his faith, perswading him that if these were restored they would vnite themselves to the other Potentates: yet would not they enter into this League, desiring rather to discover their places from his hand that did enjoy it. The Duke of Ferrara dissembling, would not signe it, yet was hee content that his son should accept the pay of an hundred and fifty men at armes, and the title of Lieutenant general for the Duke of Milan. This League concluded, made the Courtiers desirous to returne into France, thrust forward rather by an inconstitute lightnesse, then any wise consideration, or loue to the Kings honour and good: leauing many important affairs undecided, and the Realme not wholly conquered: some chiefe forts, either not taken or not furnished, gaue an entry to the Arragonois. We doe oftentimes contemne in our my ouer whom we haue an aduantage. So the Castles of Caiero, Rhegium, Brundisium, Gallipoli, Mantia, Turpia, Otrante, and other townes neglected, made the way to a generall reuolt. Now the confederates march to field, to ioyne their forces, meaning first to besiege Charles within Naples, or to fight with him in his returne. They must therefore resolute either to defend the Realme, or to leaue a good guard, and so depart before this great storme fell vpon them. The Spanish fleet landing at Rhegium, had furnished it, and assured it for the Arragonois. Mantia, Turpia, and Otrante seeing the League, and that they had not regarded them, plant the Arragon Ensignes, and receiue the Captains, which Don Fredericke had sent them. The Venetian fleet commanded by Giulio Grimaldi, appeared vpon the coast of Apulia. In the end, all the Realme begins to shew open demonstration of a new will. But fee, he that was euen now the peoples terror, the Iudge of anothers life and estate, the hope of the East, stands in feare to be conquered. A course to abate the presumption which his victory had bred. The King leaues Charles of Bourbon Earle of Montpenier, for his Viceroy, a hardy and valiant Prince, but with the History, Not wise, he did not rise before none. And sent the defence of the Realme, two thousand five hundred Suisses, a part of his French footmen, 300 French Ladies, two hundred men at armes Italians, in his pay, some commanded by the gouernor of Rome, some by Prosper and Fabrizio Colonna, and by Anthony Squilli; Captaines well practiced in the distribution of places and offices within the Realme; especially, the Colonell Prosper had in the Duchy of Tracette, the Cury of Fundi, Monfortino, and about thre other places, Fabrizio had the Countreies of Albi and Taillecouffe, which Prosper did formerly enjoy. The Lord of Aubign, a brasse and wise knight, was made Governor of Calabria, and had the Earldome of Acri, and the Marquisate of Squillazzo giuen him.

The order the King leaues in Naples.

A The Prince of Salerne was restored to the office of Admirall, and he of Besignan well aduanced. Sienens de Vers, sometimes groomer of the Kings Chamber, and after Senechal of Beaucaire, obtained the Duchy of Nola, the captainship of Caieto, and other commands, with the office of great Chamberlaine, and Controller of the treasure within the Realme, well affected to the guard thereof, but too weak of iudgment to beare the burthen and care of so great affaires. Don Iulian of Lorraine (greatly commended for his gouernment) was made Duke of S. Angelo. Gratian des Guerres, a valiant Captaine of great reputation, had the gouernment of Abruzzo: Gabriel of Montfaucon (of whom the King made great account) had Manfredonia, but hauing receiued it well furnished with victuals, and in a Country abounding with corne, he so deuoured his provision, as after four dayes siege, he was forced to yeeld vp the place for want of victuals. The king left George of Soulli at Tarentum, who caried himselfe with much honour. Hee died there of the plague, and the Towne held for the King, untill that famine forced them to change their party. In Aquila, the Bayliffe of Vitry was commended to haue well discharged his duty; such was the order the King left in the Realme of Naples, whereof followed a horrible disorder: for the greatest part of other Captaines, appointed in diuers places, applied to their owne private profit such commodities as they found within their places, for the defence whereof the King had greatly weakened his forces. So returning but with nine hundred men at armes, two thousand five hundred Suisses, seauen thousand men in pay, and C. threescore hundred men of defence, chosen out of his traine following the Count, hee perished the twentieth day of May, taking his way to Rome; and his army at sea to Efliorre. The Pope made some shew to reconcile himselfe with the King, and the King laboured to shuide him from the league. In the end, a bad confession made him go to Orsieto with his college of Cardinals, a thousand light horse, two hundred men at armes, and three thousand foot, leauing a sufficient garison in the Castle of S. Angelo, and the Cardinall of Castilio for Legat in Rome, to receiue the king, who refusing the Vatican, lodged in the suburbs. And the Pope vnderstanding, that hee approached to Viterbo, (although hee had giuen some hope of an enterview betwixt Viterbo and Orsieto,) yet he went from Orsieto to Perugia, with an intent if the King tooke that course, to recover Ancona, and to retire himselfe by sea into some place of safety. Yet notwithstanding the times just passed discontent, hee redelivered him Cinara, uechia, and Terracina, reseruing Orsieto, which he left in the hands of the Cardinall of Saint Pierre, Bishop of that place. The treasures of the Church were not spoiled by his army, only Trospand, which refusing to lodge his foreward, was taken by force and sack. But wee must leaue records of our indignation in all places. His enemies troope together, and during a fruitlesse stay of sixe or seauen dayes at Siena, we giue them leisure to ioyne their forces. Moreover, the Florentines summon the King of his faith and promises, and to draw him thereunto the more willingly, (besides the thirty thousand Ducats which they were ready to pay, as recompence of their fidelity they offered) to send them three score and ten thousand Ducats more. Brandon alitt him in his passage with three hundred men at armes, where the command of Renecio Skeona a brave Captaine, and faithful to the King, and with two thousand foot. These reasons should moue the Count to accept thereof. The want of money hee in excuse of their army, and also which did most import, the discharge of the Kings faith, and soyl to be a yet a sifter and must be kindle, and in the end hee left Italy. The Earle of Salui, young and vnexperienced, (yet fauoured of the King his count), laboured for the Signorie of Pisa and Livorno, and the Signior required him for the Lord, promising him an appointment of twenty thousand Ducats by the year. Upon condition he should entertaine three hundred foot for the defence of the place, taking away the ordinary guard, while the order of Monte Nouo (in whose power the gouernment of the City was wont to be) should be in the Palat.

The King the next day, pictured the Countell of Yong in, before the marshall of the King Charles the President of Senay, and others well aduised: and agreed, that the Count should take the City of Yong to his protection, binding himselfe to defende all that depended thereon, except Montreuil, where hee would not reside, but for the Florentines should be the Signior. But what were the fruits of this conclusion? But the Thane should be the Signior, and of the Lord of Esle, whom the King had left thereof Ambassador, by those of the foresaid order, who soon after recovered their ancient authority.

And the confederates should giue the Emperour and the King of Spaine a certaine summe of money, to moue France with a mighty army. The Florentines had iust cause to forsake the King. by force. Then lived at Florence, Frier Ierosme Sauonarola, of the order of Saint Dominick, in great reputation of a holy life, and a graue preacher, who by his sermons had greatly confirmed the Florentines affection to the King: he had long time foretold and preached the Kings coming into Italy, saying: that hee was sent of God to punish the sinners of Italy: that nothing could resist him: that hee should enter Pisa, and such a day the state of Florence should die. And in truth Peter of Medicis was banished that day, and many others things fell out as he had foretold (amongst others the death of Lawrence de Medici) and he said he knew them by reuelation: that the Church should be reformed by the sword. He likewise affirmed: That notwithstanding the great forces of the Venetians, the King should returne without any great danger to his person: that he should bee incounred upon his way, but the honour should be his, had he but a hundred men in his company. That God which had conducted him in his going, would guard him in his returne: but for that hee had no debt charged himselfe in the reformation of the Church, as he ought, and had winckt at the riches and influences of his troopes, that God had pronounced a sentence against him, and hee must haue his chastisement. The which he himselfe did signifie vnto the King in plaine termes adding, that if hee would take pittie of the people, and restraîne his men from doing ill, and punish the offenders, at his duty required, God would reuoke, or mitigate his sentence. To conclude, that he should not thinke to be excused for saying: I doe no euill. A lesson for Kings. That the faults they suffer in their subiects, are so many burthens laid vpon their owne backs, to plead one day against them, before his Maiestie, to whom they, like other men, are accountable. And moreouer, that the peoples voyce, is the voyce of God.

In the meane time, the Venetians and Lodowike Sforze make great preparations to stop the Kings passage: or at the least, to keepe him from attempting against the Milan. And for the better effecting of their designe, they entertaine John Bentiuole, at their common charge, who ioynded the Citie of Bologna to their league. Lodowike armed ten Gallies at Genoa, vpon his owne charge, and foure great ships, at the common charge of the Pope, the Venetians and himselfe. And to surprize the Towne of Ast (as hee was bound by the capitulation,) he leaueed two thousand foot in Germany: (hauing lately droned Galeas of Saint Seuerin into this action) with seven hundred men at armes, and three thousand foot. By meanes of these forces he promised to himselfe an assured conquest of the Citie of Ast. He sends the Duke of Orleans three insolent conditions: That hereafter he should no more usurpe the title of Duke of Milan, the which his father Charles had taken from the death of Philip Maria Visconti. That he should not suffer any new forces to come from France into Italy. That he should send those into France that were in Ast. And for the assurance of these things, he should deliuer the said town into the hands of Galeas Saint Seuerin, who should keepe it faithfully for the King. A wretched man, who by a proud ostentation, thinke to amaze a noble courage, and cannot instantly hide the basenesse of his owne. But by the aduice of the Lord of Argenton, Ambassador for the King at Venice, the Duke of Orleans had from the beginning furnished the place with foure hundred men at armes, five thousand foot, two thousand Suisses, and five hundred men which Lodowike Marquis of Saules had sent. The Duke of Bourbon had leauesed his army to ioyne with the King vpon the Rhine, and to helpe his passage: But the Duke of Orleans employed it in the Marquisate of Saluces to take Gafinieres, the which Lodowike Maria of Saint Seuerin held. And although he had expresse commandement from the King, to lay aside all enterprises, and goe to meet with him, yet did he accept the offer made by two Officers, gentlemen of Nouarre, who hated Lodowike Sforze.

He passeth the Pau by night, at the bridge of Sture, accompanied by the Marquis of Saluces, and was let into Nouarre by the conspirators, without any resistance. In this place the Duke of Milan tooke his greatest delight, being most pleasant to all other things, hauing and hunting. This stratagem had bene dangerous to another of meaneer quality, seeing the question was to succour the Kings person, where the French efforted no less then a Kingdome. But seeing the Duke of Orleans had thus begun, why did he not proceed? Milan opened her armes, Paula offered it selfe, and shee that sent twise to him, Lodowike (as delect in aduersity, as proud in his prosperitie,) shewed the basenesse of his courage. The Nobility and people desired nothing more, then the ruine of this Duke of France.

dowike.

A The Venetians had let the King vnderstand, that if he made warre against the Duke of Milan, they would succor him with all their meanes. Thus Charles foreseeing, that by the taking of Nouarre, he should soon haue the enemies vpon him, & that the Duke of Orleans should need succors: he goeth on from Sienna to Pisa. Then Sauonarola comes to him to Poggibonle, and the next day to Castle Florentine, and vjing (as he was wont) the name and authority of God, he declared vnto him: That if he yelded not to the Florentines the places whereunto he was bound by oath, he should be rigorously punished. The King excusing himselfe vpon that which hee had promised to the Pisans, to maintain them in liberty, before he had taken any oath in Florence, gaue both the Monke and the Florentine Ambassadors hope of restitution, after his coming to Pisa. At Pisa, the Citizens teaze both of men and women, (beseeching them that lodged in their houses, to intreat the King, not to suffer them to fall again into the Florentines tyranny) made Charles to forget the promises and oath he had taken vpon the altar of S. Iohn at Florence: but most of all, the importunate sute of the Earle of Ligni, that the King would leaue him Pisa & Liurne at his deuotion. Those which had impugned this resolution in Sienna, did likewise contradict it in Pisa (said they) if by the opposition of enemies, any disorder should chance, or any difficulty to passe through Lombardy, we should haue a sure & fit retreat at Pisa: whereas, if we restore them to the Florentines, when as they haue recovered all their places, we shal find them as inconstant as the other Italians. Moreouer, they gaue the King to vnderstand, that for the safety of the Realm of Naples, it were expedient to hold the port of Liurne, for if the estate of Genoa should change for the Kings good, hee should bee in a manner Lord of all the sea, from the port of Marfeilles vnto that of Naples.

Finally, the King changed the captaine of the Cittadell, and left one called Eniragues, a man (saith the original) ill conditioned, seruant to the Duke of Orleans, (whom the Earle of Ligni had recommended) with some footmen of Berry. Eniragues wrought so, as he had Pietrasanta, Mortron, and Libreforta, neere vnto Luques. Scerzane was giuen (by meanes of the said Earle) to a bastard of Rouilly his seruant, and Serezanelle to another that was at his disposing. Thus the King did willingly weaken his forces, the which he must distribute into these places, to make his favorites great. And as he suffered himselfe to be too easily caried away by the rash counsel of those he fauoured, beheld vpon a hope giuen him by the Cardinals of Rouere and Fregose, Obizzo of Fiesque, and other banished men, on a sudden alteration at Genoa, hee sends with them (against the aduice of his counsell, who did not approue the weakening of his army, for if he should win the battell, Genoa would yeld of it selfe, but if he lost it, hee had then no need thereof) Philip Earle of Breffe, afterwards Duke of Sauoy, the Lords of Beaumont, Polignac, and Ambelou of the house of Amboise, with sixscore men at armes, and five hundred crosbowmen, newly come out of France, sending after them the company of men at armes of Vitelli, and those men which the Duke of Sauoy had sent; fortified by the army at sea, reduced to seven galleys, two galleons, and two barks, commanded by Mielans gouernour of Dauphine, to countenance that at land.

But how easily doth man deceive himselfe in his owne conceits? All these that went to take, are taken, euen at the same place where we haue seene our men defeat King Alphonsus troopes, and by the same men that they had beaten. John Lewis of Ficque, and John Adorne, were led captiues vnto Genoa, where they lost the fruit and honour of a famous battell, in the which they might haue done good seruice.

But who will not thinke the predictions of Sauonarola to bee very true. That God would guide the King by the hand into safety, taking away his enemies iudgement, not to molest him in the most painful straights of his voyage: Our French are now betwixt Luques and Pietrasanta, enuironed on the one side by high mountaines, and on the other, by deepe marshes and bogges. They must passe a caufie, which a Carr let crosse, with two peeces of Cannon might easily guard. Pontreme, lying at the entry of the mountaines, was held for Lodowike by three hundred foot. The Marshall of Gye arising with the forward, they presently open the gates in fauour of Trimule, vpon promise to saue their liues and goods. But alas, the Suisses had not yet forgotten, that when as the army passed to Naples, some forty of their companions were slaine there in a tumult! For this cause, they fall furiously vpon them, kill all the men, sacke the towne, and burne it, and all that was within it, the Marshall not being able to prevent this disorder. The blood being inflamed, it transports vs beyond the bonds of reason, but as it growes cold, it returns to his right place. These Swisses doubted some punishment: or at the least, that the King should grow in dislike of them for this our rage, committed both against the lawes of armes, and nations. But what? an vnbridled desire of reuenge, a military fury hath transported them: they are ready, though not to make satisfaction, yet to repaire it, by some notable seruice. And see, an opportunity is offered. The army laid on this side the valley of Pontreme, in extreme want of victuals: and the artillery could not passe these troublesome straights, without great toyle, and losse of time. And this gaue the enemy leasure to make one vnited body of all his forces. The Swisses come and doe voluntarily offer to passe it by force, so as the King will pardon them: the which he doth. Leaving the valley, they must mount vpon a very steepe hill, where their Moyle did creepe vp with great difficulty. These men performe the worke of horses of burthen: they couple themselves by two and two, and so undertake the worke, a hundred or two hundred at once, as the burthen required, and one being weary, another supplied his place.

The army of the league.

The foreward was lodged at Fornoie (a small, but a good village, seated at the foot of the mountaine, entring into Lombardy) where he had the enemy in front: without doubt they were in great danger, if they had then charged them. But their desire to swallow vp this army in the middelt of the plaine: giuing the King meanes (who lay fifteen French leagues off) to ioyne his troops, laid the way open to shame and confusion, imagining, that to charge our French on this side the Mountaines, were to cut off all retreat to Pisa and other places of the Florentines. And on the other side, to fight without attending their men, were to doe them wrong, seeing that their foot were not excellent: if they miscaried, they should purchase reproach with the Seignery of Venice. Some light skirmishes made the Marshall retire into the higher part of the Mountaine. Here vpon the King ioynes with his foreward, on Sunday the 15 day of Iuly: and all the enemies forces arriued, being five & thirty thousand men in pay, two thousand five hundred men at armes barded, making foure men of combat to euery Lance: five thousand light horse, amongst the which were two thousand Albanais, and of the neighbour Princes of Greece, who retaining the name of the Country, are commonly called Stradiots: as who would faye, men of the campe; good footsiders, and well practised in armes. The reuerse foot, well appointed with artillery. Ouer the Venetian troops, Francis Gonzaga the Marquis of Mantoua commanded as Generall, a yong man, but of great courage and desirous of glory, and with him Luke Tisani, and Melchior Trevisan, were Commissaries of the army, being of the chiefe Senators of Venice: for Lodowick Sforza (who opposed some part of his forces against the Duke of Orleans: being nine hundred men at armes, twelve hundred light horse, and five thousand foot) the Earle of Caiazzo, a fitter politike than hardy Captaine commanded, and Francis Bernardin Villcount, chiefe of the Gibelin faction at Milan was Commissary: and by consequence enemy to Trinulce.

Their army camped at the Abbey of Guaiuolo, about a league from Fornoie, vpon a little hill on the right hand of the Kings army. The King had no other forces, but what he brought from Naples, whereof we haue made mention at his departure. Hee must passe neere the enemy (being halfe a league off, and a small brooke called Taro, betwixt both.) There was no likelihood, that this great multitude should part without the hazard of a battell. To try their resolutions, the King (who desired only to passe quietly into France) caught the Lord of Argenton, lately Ambassador at Venice, to write vnto the aboue named Commissaries, that he desired to confer with them. They promise to meet the next day in a convenient place betwixt both armies. The night was terrible in raine, lightning and thunder, a fearefull prediction of the day following.

Munday morning, the King armes himselfe complete, and mounted vpon his Sauoyard (a horse which Charles Duke of Sauoy had giuen him) faire and goodly, managing him with all agility, blacke of colour, and answerable in proportion to him that was mounted thereon: he shewes himselfe to his troops, with a cheerefull countenance, well coloured, and a speech contrary to his custome, strong, resolute, and wise, an assured preface of the honor hee should win that day. Putting his army into battell, hee placed in the foreward 350 French Lances, and John Jaques of Trinulce with his company of an hundred Lances, and three thousand Swisses the chiefe hope of the army, commanded by

The order of the kings army.

A by Engilbert brother to the Duke of Cleues (who did fight on foot, with the Bayliffe of Dijon, that had leaued them) and to second them, three hundred archers, some cross-bowmen on horse-backe of his guards, whom hee commanded to leaue their horses, and the most part of his foot, conceiuing that the foreward should be charged with the chiefe of his enemies forces. His Maiesty was in the battell, hauing about him seuen or eight yong Noblemen armed like himselfe (for the confederates had sent to discover him by a Herald, vnder color of some demand) and for counsell hee had the Lord of Tremouille. The Earle of Foix commanded the reeward: the baggage, by the counsell of Trinulce, was left without guard, exposed to pillage, to keepe the enemy occupied with that baite.

Thus the army marched, when as Luke and Melchior the Venetian Commissaries were ready to partlee. But the troops were now in alarme, the Captaines incouraged their men to fight. The neernesse of both armies calls them from words to blowes, they begin by skirmishes, the Cannon thunders, but with more noyse then effect. The Marquis of Mantua, his vnkle Ralph of Gonzagua, the Earle Bernardin of Montione, with a squadron of sixe hundred choice men at armes, a great troope of Stradiots, and other light horse, with five thousand foot, passe the Taro vpon the backe of the French reeward, to charge them behind: leauing on the other banke, Anthony of Montfleur a ballard of the Duke of Urbins, with a great squadron, to passe at the first call: ordaining moreover, that at the first shoock, a part of the light horse should charge in flanke, and the rest of the Stradiots should follow, to set vpon the baggage. The Earle of Caiazzo, with four hundred men at armes, and a great number of foot, passeth likewise to charge the foreward, leauing in like sort on the other banke, Annibal Bentiuole with two hundred men at armes, to supply what he should be sent for. And for the guard of their lodging, two great companies of men at armes, with a thousand foot, the Venetian Commissaries reseruing a supply for all euents. Thus the French army is inuironed on all sides, so as being broken, no man might hope for safety: and the King, who to strengthen the foreward, had weakened the other two parts, was forced to leaue the Knights he meant to make to some better leysure, & to turne his backe to the foreward, and his face to the enemy, approaching neere the reeward. The Stradiots fall vpon the baggage, they wound, kill, and spoile, and the Marquis is blowes with the reeward, who at the first charge breake their Lances, and then valiantly they ioyne pel-mel with their battle axes, swords, and other short weapons, the Marquis performing the part of a most valiant and vigilant Captaine, and his troope of most resolute men at armes. The King was brought rashly into danger, his followers being dispersed here and there in the conflict, assisted with few about him but Antoine ballard of Bourbon, and Philip of Moulin a gentleman of Solongne, noted for that they had beene scene very neere vnto the King in this conflict. The King did afterwards greatly fauour this Philip, he made him Keeper of the great Scale, gaue him a company of men at armes, the government of Langres, and a great summe of money, according to the time, to helpe him to build Moulin, (a Castle neere to Romorant in Solongne.) Robinet of Fraizecelles (who led about fourscore Lances of the dukes of Orleans) Louis of Tremouille, with about forty Lances, an hundred Scottish Archers of his guard, and the Gentlemen of his household, did fight more courageously, then their forces could permit, nor without great danger to his person, being much esteemed by the Marquis, hoping to haue the like adventure ouer him, as hee had vpon the said ballard, being wounded, and taken prisoner, were vnto the King.

But the apparent danger of his Maiesty had so inflamed those that were neere vnto him, as falling by heapes vpon the Italians, they counterbelied their passion with their owne: and so this sudden fury was layed, by the charge of a squadron coming at need from the battell broken by the death of Ralph of Gonzagua. A death vaworthy of him, for hee loued the French, and if his might haue bene credited, the King should not haue opened his passage by force, and quite ouercome all by effect and courage of the Free-booters: for these men (seeing their companions smothered with the spoile of the baggage, and to carry away ouer the same, some able toyles with their burthens, and some horse or armor) they leaue their men at armes, and misse the spoile, if the other horse-men were moued presently with the like desire of gaines: and the foot shole out of the battell, to follow the like example.

On the other side, Anthony of Montfleur appointed by Ralph to succor when he should be called, keeping his stand (for that by reason of Ralph he called the man called him) the French took their field at large, and doubting their courage, they doubled their blows, as by the death of some, and the wounding and flight of others, the Marquis his troops oppress with the rough charge of four men at arms, in the end turned their backs, and were chased and beaten unto the rivers side, without taking of any prisoner, or care of booty, our French being loathed of this filthy gaine, by that common voice, flying amongst them; Companions remember Guinegate, where the greediness of spoile had taken from them the better part of a notable victory. At the same instant the Earle of Gaiazzo led his troops against the forward; but this was but a countenance, for even as they couched their Lances, seeing some of his troops unhorsed, John Piccinin, Galeas of Corregge, and others, fainted, and breaking of themselves, they had means to recover their battell. The Marshall of Gyé seeing on the other side of the river another regiment of men at arms, prepared for the battell, hee keeps backe his men, the which was held of some to be rather an act of cowardise, then of discretion; but by such a preference before danger, wise and iudicious. The Swisses took about twenty of these run-aways, and slue them.

The army of the league overthrown.

The Marquis of Mantoua gathered together the remainders of this overthrow, and the Earle of Perillano (being prisoner vpon his word, since the taking of Capoua) flying in this tumult to the Italians came, kept them from a more shameful rout. For the whole campe talked of a retreat, and the high way from Placentia to Parma was covered with men, horses and carts that retired. Then the King going to his foreward (which had kept their stand) propounded unto his Captaines, whether he should charge the enemy in his lodging; Trinulce and Vistelli counselled him thereunto, and Francis Secco (whom the Florentines had sent to conduct the King unto Ast) thrust him forward: But the passage of Taro being vnassie (by reason of the raine falne the night before, and the day of the battell) the companies being weary, the night approaching, and the King content to haue had the advantage in so doubtful a fight, did moderate the heat of the pursuit, causing them to lodge at Medefane, a village halfe a league from the place where the battell was fought. So this battell ended, a memorable day, being the first of a long time, that had bene continually fought in Italy with blood-shed and slaughter, (for in former times the Italian combats, were rather pleasant shewes then battells) famous also for the great numbers of Commanders that were slaine, the small number of conquerors, in regard of the huge multitude of the vanquished. There were numbered some five and thirty or forty French horsemen slaine, and some so grooms of the baggage. The Stradiots carried not away (of all their booty) but five and forty of the best horse, which were the kings & his Chamberlaines: of Italians three hundred and fifty men at arms, amongst the which there were seven or eight of the house of Gonzaga, Rainacio, Farnese, Bernardin of Montone, about sixscore Gentlemen of the Marquis his company, & so great a number of others, as they were esteemed to be three thousand five hundred, and not one prisoner. Let vs remember, That the eternal God scatters the counsels of the nations, and brings to nought the practices of men: And in another place, That the King is not saved by a great army, neither doth a mighty man escape by his great force: The King stayed the next day at the same lodging, and departed on Wednesday the 8 of the month, without any sound of Trumpet, besyng the enemy vnder color of a parley, fearing them that feared him. But if he could haue made profit of his victory, and turned head against them, who were yet amazed, at their owne commanders did confesse, althad fought for their safety by flight: And if he had displayed his colors in fauour of little Francis, son to John Galeas Duke of Milan, the name of the usurper was so odious to all the Duchy, and the name of their lawfull Lord so pleasing, as the people had easily confined Lodowike into the castle of Milan, and consequently the Venetians had lost most of the places they possessed in Italy: so ready is that nation to follow the victors happenesse: This was the counsell of Trinulce: but the King would not attempt any thing vpon the night which the duke of Orleans pretended to the Duchy, being now in possession of Novare. Moreover, God which had given him the honour of a victory, would take from him all cause of presumption, depriving him of the principall fruits that depended thereon.

This so happy a victory, opened a passage for the King, yet was he to encounter a world of difficulties: keepe and craggy mountaines, rough valleys, dangerous forests, rivers hard to passe, want of victuals, & behind him the Earle of Caiazzo had passed the river of

Taro

A Taro with two hundred Lances, to cut off them that lingered behind. The river Treby gave the first obstacle with some terror: for about ten of the clocke at night, the river swelled so high, as it was impossible to passe it before five in the morning, the souldiers wading about breast high. The King did wisely to dislodge without brute, being (besides the enemies Army) so neere to Lodowike forces strong garisons, hauing a great number of horse, and twelue hundred Lanquenets, lodged in Tortone and in Alexandria: and five hundred others with the forsaide Earle, who were entred into Placentia fearing some alteration.

Truly Charles did daily feeble the truth of Sannarolas predictions: That he should enioy the honor should be his. The river of Scriuia was kept by Caspar of S. Steurin, surnamed the Fracasse, brother to the Earle of Caiazzo, and Captaine of Tortone; but aduertised that the Kings meaning was only to passe, he retired to his charge, furnished the army with victuals, came vnto the King, and excused himselfe, for that he could not lodge him within the towne: the which he kept for Lodowike. After a shower comes a sun-shine, saith the Prouerbe. The king is now in a friends Country, at Nice; belonging to the Marquis of Monterrat, and from Nice to Ast: Then the great army of the league, which had followed him into the Country of Tortone, hauing no more means to annoy him, went to ioyne with Lodowikes troops before Nouare, the which was in great want, for the duke of Orleans had gouerned the victuals he found therein very ill, and had neglected to furnish it as he might haue done, considering the fertility of the Country. He had of late retained the supply of seuen thousand five hundred good fighting men, sent to the King by the duke of Bourbon: and contrary to his Maiesties commandement, he hath taken place from Lodowike: and now in stead of succouring, he demands succours, for want whereof he shall be forced to yeeld what he hath gotten.

But Charles had other worke. Naples is in danger: Ferdinand sought all means to recover it, and hauing presented himselfe with Gonsalve Fernand of the house of Agilino, of the territory of Cordoua, with sixe thousand men neere vnto Seminara, after the making of Rhegium, he had fought to draw the whole Realme into rebellion, if the Lord of Aubigni, Governour of Calabria, had not by his vigilancy and valour slacke the heat of the peoples rage. And the quarrell had bene ended by the death or imprisonment of Ferdinand himselfe, if John of Capoua, brother to the Duke of Termini, (whom Ferdinand had brought vp a page) had not performed the part of a most faithful and loyal seruant, who leauing his horse, lost his life to saue his master; Ferdinand had his horse slaine vnder him. Gonsalve fled through the mountaines to Rhegium; Ferdinand to Rakus, lying vpon the sea neere to Seminara, and from thence to Messina. Ferdinand grieved with this disgrace, will once againe try the hazard of armes. He is well informed, that all the City of Naples desires him greatly: many of the chiefe, both of the Nobility and people, call him secretly. And therefore, before the brute of this overthrow in Calabria should enter this good humor, he parts from Messina with three score vessels with top masts, and twenty leffe, furnished more for shew and brauery, then for any good service, huiuing no forces proportionable to so high an enterprise. The peoples fauor and desire supplied his want of men. The townes of Salerne, Melfe, and Caia, display their Ensignes, and bestowes about Naples, attending some musty in the City. But all was in vaine: the Vis-roy led in time manned the approaches, and suppressed the rebellion which began to breed. But according to the aduice of some, he would haue armed such ships as were in the harbor, with souldiers and men of execution, and haue charged the enemy, who being strong in shipping, and weak in men, was retired to Sicily.

The conspirators faint not, but seeing their practice discouraged, make a vertue of necessity. They call backe Ferdinand, and intreat him to land, to giue both force and courage to those that would rise in his fauour: The approacheth, and lands at Magdelaine, a mile from Naples. Here the Vis-roy shewed no lesse courage, when he should most feare, then he had shewed himselfe fearefull when a resolution was most necessary. Hee leads in a manner all the garison out of the City, to disturb their landing. The Neapolitans imbrating this occasion, fly to armes, troope together at the found of the bell, seize vpon the gates, and preclude Ferdinand name in all places. Our French are now in danger on all sides: shall they attend the foraine enemy, or shall they goe to encourage them within the City? They haue no incense to enter by the same way they came forth: all are armed, all is barred vp. There is no other access but by the port opening vnto the new Castle: And but the way is long and hilly, and they must goe about a good part of the Towne walles. But during this march, Ferdinand enters, and riding through the City, the people receive him with great cries of ioy: the French hauing recovered the Castle, seek to winne the heart of the City; but being repulsed with croffe bowes and small Artillery, and finding the entry of euery street well manned, the night likewise approaching abandoning almost two thousand horse, good and bad vpon the place, hauing no means to keepe them within the fort, vnturnished of provisions, all put themselves into the Castle, despairing euermore to recover the Towne.

Caeste sacked by the French.

Presently Capoua, Auerse, Nola, the castle of Montdragon, and many other places follow this example, and the greatest part of the Realme turns to Ferdinand. Some must needs pay for all. Caeste hauing taken armes for Ferdinand, the French garison enters the town with fury, makes a horrible slaughter of the rebels, and sacks it. The Venetians a army at sea, besiege Monopoli, a City of Apulia, both by sea and land, gives a battail aule, they take it by force, and the Castle by composition, and afterwards the Towne of Pulignan. Charles aduertised of these revolts, being parted from Ast towards Turin, he sends away Peron of Balche his Steward, to hasten an army at sea, from Villefranche neere vnto Nice, the which carried two thousand fighting men, with store of victuals, vnder the command of the Lord of Arban, a valiant Captaine, and well experienced at sea, vny very vnfortunate in this expedition: for hauing discovered Ferdinand's fleet about the Isle of Porze, consisting of thirty saile, and two great ships of Genoua: they presently turne saile to the enemy, leaving him a small Biscaine ship for a pawne, and recover the port of Lisborne, where the Captaine could not stay the greatest number of his souldiers from landing, who tooke the way to Pisa.

The French fleet flies vnto Turin.

In the meane time, the Arragonis employes all his forces against the new Castle, the Castle del'Ouo, and other forts held by the French. And to makes the way the more easie, he fortifies the Hippodrome, mans Mont Saint Hermie, and Puisfaucou, and assailes the Monastery of the croffe. But being at the first greatly annoyed by the Artillery, hee counters his force into policy, which proues vnfortunate for the Author. There was in it a Moore, sometime seruant to the Marquis of Pescara. The Marquis founds him, and hee promised to giue entrance. For this effect, he mounts in the night by a Ladder set to the Abbey wall, so conclude of the conditions, the manner, and the time, but hee discovered not another Paris, who lying behind the battlements of the wall, cut the throat of his Chichillan with a Croffe-bow. The Marquises death was repaired by the revolt of Proffer and Fabrice Colennes, who notwithstanding the great aduancements they had from the King (carried away with a light beleefe, spread abroad by certayne lying letters of Lodowick Sforze, that the King was dead at Fornoue, and seeing moreover, that the French affaires declined) they returne to Ferdinand pay. The Castles thus beleaguered; the sea shut by Ferdinand's fleet; famine increasing daily, and all hope of foraine succours cut off by the voluntary rout of Arban's navy, made the Viceroy to yeeld vp the new castle to Ferdinand after three moneths siege, with promise to go into Provence, if he were not releued within shirty dayes, departing with bag and baggage; and for assurance of this capitulation, he gave for hostages, Yves of Aleste, la Marche of Ardennes, la Chappelle of Anisou, Regneron, Guthan and Leslis: this was the sixth of October. If any reliefe came vnto them, it must be of those forces that were disperseed within the Realme. So the Lord Pess of Allegre, brought the Swisses, with many of the companies of men at armes, accompanied by the Prince of Bisignan, and diuers other Barons persisting yet in their fidelity. Ferdinand aduertised hereof, opposeth the Duke of Monteleone. They encounter at the Lake of Pezade neere to Eboli, where our French had a resurgence of that braue fight of their army at sea. For the Earles forces exceeding Pess in number, fly at the first approach without any fight, leaving Ferdinand son to Isidore Verane Lord of Camerin prisoner, and being not pursued (for that our men came to another end), they retire without any great losse to Nola, and then to Naples. This victory thrust forward our men so, the execution of their designe. Ferdinand (to hinder their approach), calls vp a trench from Mont Saint Hermie, to Castle del'Ouo, and plants artillery vpon the hills adioyning, the which doth greatly enuadamme the French, and takes away all means to enter the Castle. This (the watering fresh water) made them retire in disorder, leaving behind them some pieces of artillery, and part of the victuals they had brought for the reliefe of the Castles, being discontented with the small endeavour the besieged had vsed to receiue them.

He that giues ouer, loseth the game. The Viceroy frustrate (by this dislodging) of all hope of succours, leaving three hundred men in the Castle Nouo (a number proportionable to the victuals that remained) and a conuenient garison in that of del'Ouo, imbarks by night with the rest of his souldiers, being 2500, and takes his way to Salerne. Ferdinand complains that the accord is broken: that it was not lawfull for the Earle of Montpensier to depart suddenly, without taking leave, and with such a company, before he had consigned him the Castles, threatening to be reuenged of the hostages for this injury & fraud, the which were yeilded a moneth after the prefixed time, when as the garisons compounded for their departure, being vnable to endure the famine any longer: those of Castle Nouo, vpon condition the hostages (should be deliuered: those of del'Ouo, if they were not succoured by the first day of Lent ensuing. But let vs leaue Ferdinand confirmed in his throne, and returne to Nouarre.

Nouarre was at the last cast, they had no more corne, no more horses, but for few daies; some dyed of hunger, some languished of sickness. Mugnes, Brione, Camarian, Bolgare, and other neere places (with the forts built by the French) were taken by force, and the enemy (lodged in the Suburbs), were so many block-houses: neither was there any means to succour them without a battell. But how? The King tooke his pleasure at Turin, and at Quiers, he had no will to hazard another battell for our towne onely, which the Duke of Orleans would keepe, and no man would fight but in the Kings presence. The Prince of Orange (who in matters of War had great credit with the King) and all the other commanders, desired rather to end the siege by some friendly agreement, then by the hazard of a battell. Winter approached: euery one sees his store spent, many are sicke, some retire without leave, others straine in: The enemies giues care to a peace. His army was newly increased by a thousand Reisters, led by Fredrick Capelare, of the Countrey of Ferte, and by eleuen thousand Lanquenets, commanded by George of Aberling, borne in Austria. The leany which the Bayliffe of Dijon went to make in Suisseerland, was not yet ready. Why then (considering the content of both parties) are not these great numbers diffidently without force? some few sought contention, they had the Kings eyes open, and their words were Oracles as Brissonet Cardinal of Saint Malo, and the Archbishop of Rouan: yet would they not leave their roabs to put on armes, but keepe themselves safe from blows. The King (say they) must not begin, let his enemy strike first, he is busy in person: The Pope, the Emperour, the King of Spaine, the Venetians and the Duke of Milan are by their Deputies. But whilst they stand vpon this point of honour, their teeth grow and their stomachs shrink at Nouarre. And thus the matter was handled referring the honor of both parties. About that time the Marquise of Montferrat died, daughter to the King of Serbia in Greece, leaving two sonnes, whereof the eldest was but nine yeares old. The Marquis of Saluce, and Constantine Viceroy to the said Marquis, one of the ancient Noblemen of Macedony (the which Mahomet Ottoman had many yeares before invaded) contended for the gouernment of the two pupils. To accord this controuersie, for the safety of the children, and the content of the Countrey, the King had sent the Lord of Argenton to Casal Ceruas, and the Marquis of Mantoua, a Steward of his; to condole this death. These two fall into discourse to pacifie both armies without blows: so as by the Stewards perswasion, Argenton writes to the Venetian Commanders, vnder colour to continue the paele they had vpon Turin. Giuing ear the result, they impart it to the duke of Milans Captaines. In the end, by common consent, they meete betwixt Bolgare and Camarian. There were for the King, the Cardinal of Saint Malo, the Prince of Orange, the Marshall of Sic, and the Lords of Picennes and Argenton. For the Confederates, the Marquis of Mantoua, Bernard and Constantin the Commissaries of the Venetians Sradatos, and Francisco Bernardin Viconte.

Siege of Nouarre.

Their chiefe controuersie was vpon the deliuey of Nouarre. Milan holden for the Empire, and therefore the King did vrge, that Nouarre, as member of the said Duchy, should be deliuered to Maximilian, by the hands of the German Capitaines that were in the Italian camp; and the confederates would haue him leaue it absolutely. In the mean time the famine growes to great, as it kils about two thousand of the Duke of Orleans men; and this great necessity required nothing but expedition. But more difficulties growing growing then could suddenly be decided, they conclude a truce for 8 dayes, with permission for the Duke of Orleans to come forth with a small traine. For the surety whereof, the Marquis of Mantoua did willingly offer himselfe, as an hostage to the Earle of Foix, after an oath taken, that they should proceed sincerely in the treaty of peace, and that it was not onely to free the Duke of Orleans. The Duke being come to the King to Verceil, the prolongation of the truce, untill a conclusion of peace, all the men of Warre came forth, and were conducted into a place of safety, by the Marquis of Mantoua, and Galis of Saint Seurin. So the towne remained in the inhabitants keeping, with an oath, not to deliver it to any, but with the consent of both parties. And thirty men were left in the Castle, under the Duke of Orleans authority, to whom they should daily send victuals out of the Italians campe for their meyny.

Twenty thousand Swisses Verceil for the King.

Within few dayes after, arrived the Bayliffe of Dijon, with his Swisses, who vnder colour of ten thousand which he thought to bring, the number was doubled, running at the name of the Kings purse. So great a number of men of one Nation, was suspicious. The one moiety ioyned with the Kings army neere to Verceil, the other camped apart, five leagues off. This new supply, revived the courage of the Duke of Orleans, and of those whose fingers itched. But to what end were a battell, seeing that Nouarre had not moved the King, but onely to free the Duke, and his seruants that were now deliuered from captivity. And what meanes were there to fight with two thousand eight hundred men at arms, barded, five thousand light horse, eleven thousand Germans, and an infinite number of other foot, in a campe intrenched with palisadoes, and deep ditches full of water? a compass fit for scarlet robes, thrust on rather by their owne countenance, then with any respect of the Kings honour or the Dukes. This Cardinal of Saint Malo, did hee more affected his Maiesties seruice, or the priuate aduancement of his house, seeing that his vniuersal greedeinesse extorted this confession from his owne mouth; That the Duke of Orleans had promised him ten thousand Ducats for his seruice, if he had this Duchy of Milan. Doubtlesse great Princes vse good and bad instruments to satisfy their desires, but in the end they abhorre the lawfull practices of their workemen.

Verceil.

On the other side, this great number of men, newly arriued, who desired nothing but employment, made the Italians minde more inclinable to peace. So the Marshall of Genne, the President of Gapuai, the Vidame of Chartres, Argenton, Piennes and Morailly, being conferred againe with the Considerates, where the Duke of Milan did assist in person, they concluded an accord, more through the necessity of the season, and want of money, desirous to returne home with the shew of an honourable peace, then with any confidence it would continue. It was agreed; That the King should be serued by the Duke of Milan for Genoa, as of his vassall, against all the world; and in so doing, the Duke should furnish at his owne charge, two ships to succour the Castles of Naples (the which hee yet) and the yeare following, should serue the King with three; and go with him in person to the enterprise of Naples, if by chance he returned; and should suffer the Kings meyny to passe. If the Venetians did not accept of the peace within two moneths, but would maintaine the house of Arragon, he should aide the King against them: and the King should give him all that should be taken from them. That of sixscore and foure thousand Ducats lent to the King in that voyage, he should forgive fourescore thousand. And for the expenses made at Nouarre, hee should pay the Duke of Orleans fifty thousand Ducats, by the moneth of March following. That for the surety of Genoa, the Duke should give two hostages, and deliuer the Chasteler into the Duke of Ferraras keeping, as a Neuter for two whole yeares, the guard thereof to be paid at their common charge: and in case the Duke of Milan should forsake Genoa to the King, the Duke of Ferraras should then deliuer the Chasteler to the King, and the Duke of Milan should give two of their hostages of Milan. That the Duke should not impeach the Florentines, to recover what belonged vnto them. That Trivulzio should be restored to his lands and goods. And that the prisoners the Considerates had taken should be deliuered. This peace was sworn on either side; the Venetians gave respite for two moneths, to accept, or not; and the King transported with a great desire to see his France, relolued to part the next day. But aduerted that the Swisses practised either to assure themselves of his person, or to seize vpon the chiefe in Court, for three moneths pay, which they said was due vnto them, by an accord made with Lewis the Eleuenth, that so often as they should goe forth with their

A their Ensignes displayed, they should receiue that payment, he parted from Verceil (into the which may Swisses were gotten) and went towards Trine, a Towne belonging to the Marquis of Montferrat. This humour possessed them by the instigation of those to whom this peace was not pleasing.

From Trine, the King sent the Marshall of Gie, the President of Gannai, and Argenton, to Lodouico Sforza, to moue him to an interview. But he grounded his excuse vpon some speeches which the Earle of Ligni, and the Cardinall of Saint Malo had vied. That they should take him (when he came) to the King to Paula, yet would he willingly parlee with the King, hauing a barre and tiuer betwixt them. He had heard talk of the parlee betwixt Edward and the Constable of Saint Paul, with Lewis the eleuenth. Charles taking this distrust in ill part, receiued his hostages of Milan, and impatient to attend the Genevois, aduancing to Quiers, he sent Peron de Bassife to Genoa, to receiue the two carrakes promised by the treaty, and to arme foure others, wherein he made account to ship three thousand Swisses, to relieue the Castles of Naples, knowing that the army of Nice had bin altogether vnprofitable. But it was sufficient for the Milanois to promise: hee knew well that hunger would force the Wolfe out of the wood, that is to say, that want of victuals would shortly expell the garisons out of these Castles. Moreover, being perswaded, the King would hardly repasse the Alpes, he seeks the friendship of Ferdinand, arming two ships for his seruice.

Charles did then send the Lord of Argenton to Venice, to know if they would accept of the peace, and to passe three articles. To re-deliver Monopoli, which they had taken from him: to draw backe the Marquis of Mantoua, their Lieutenant generally, and others they had in the Realme of Naples, for Ferdinands seruice: and to declare King Ferdinand to be none of the league lately made, in the which there was only named the Pope, the King of Romans, the King of Spaine, and the D. of Milan. For answer, they flatly refuse all the Kings demands, as hauing no warre with him, and that their meaning was onely to succour the Duke of Milan as their ally, whom the King sought to ruine.

And for the making of an agreement, they offer to be a meanes: that Ferdinand should doe homage to the King, for the Realme of Naples, with the Popes consent: and should pay a hundred and fifty thousand Ducats yearely; and a present summe of money, the which they should lend: for the loane whereof they should haue Brundisium, Otranto, Tanti and some other places in Apulia in pawn: that Ferdinand should giue the King some places for safety, to make warre against the Turke, according to the hope wherewith Charles had fed all Christendome. The which, if hee would vndertake, all Italy should contribute thereunto. That the King and they should dispose of all Italy without contradiction: and for their part, they would serue the King with an hundred gallies at their owne charge, and with five thousand horse by land. But this Turkish warre was but a glorious cloake for euery priuate mans couetousnesse. And who can wonder if God did suddenly frustrate our designs, hauing another ground then we made: shew of. Who will not iudge, but this offer had bene as honourable for France, as the generall losse of the sayd Realme was dishonourable. Charles would willingly haue vnderaken it, and the greatest part of his Councell did allow it. But Facinus obserues of Richius, That his judgement was such, as he found all harsh that was profitable, and took nothing in good part, but what was pleasing, and that proved hurtfull. A lesson for Princes, not to trust so confidently to some particular persons, for the gouernment of their affaires; but to impart in sometimes to others: neither to aduance any one so high; as all the rest should bee his inferiours, for making himselfe to be feared and respected about all (as the Cardinall Borgia, his brethren & kins-folke did) he commonly makes his house great at his masters cost. But it was the humour of this young King, fearing (saith the History) to displease them to whom he gaue credit, and especially such as gouerned his treasure; as the above named.

Our Conquerors are now arriued at Lions, in the moneth of October, not greatly careful of those they had left at Naples, without any intelligence or letters from the King, but onely contented, and nothing but promises for assignations of pay, wherof followeth the generall losse of the Realme: who for a signe of their conquest, left them nothing but the possession of a sinking and contagious disease, which afterwards spread ouer all France: the which (being still then unknowne in our parts, and the Philistines not acquainted ted with the cure thereof lodged many in the graue, leauing many deformed and lame of their limbes, and subiect to continuall aches.

Charles, hauing continued two monthes at Lions, he receiued two very troublefome and vnpleasent aduertisements: one was domestically, the death of his Sonne the Dauphin, deceased at three yeares age: A goodly child (saith the Original) and bold in speech, who feared not those things which other children are accustomed to feare. The other was foreigne, the yielding of the Castles of Naples. The King passed ouer his mourning lightly, for being little both of body and vnderstanding, he began to fear, lest the Dauphin growing in these generous dispositions, which they noted in his infancy, should soone blemish the fathers power & authority. A lamentable thing, that so great a Monarch should fear his owne Child lying in a cradle. But that was certain that Charles the seventh, his Grandfather had bene jealous of Lewis the eleventh his sonne. Lewis had terrified his father, and was in feare of his sonne Charles the eighth: and now Charles apprehends some decay in his estate by his sonne. Jealousie is a disease which doth commonly infect Princes houses. The other accident was of greater consequence, and toucht him more neerely. But were not these croffes sufficient to afflict him, but he must receiue a publick shame, by meanes of a priuate mans couetousnesse.

The Florentines prest the performance of their treaty, sworne at Florence, confirmed at Ast, and afterwards at Turin. Charles writes to this effect to Entragues, Captaine of the Citadell at Pisa, and to the bastard of Saint Paul, to restore those places to the Florentines which they commanded. But these gentlemen are good Merchants, they sell that which they are commanded to give. Entragues interprets the Kings Letters-Patents according to his owne couetousnesse, and exculeth himselfe with a secret charge, he saith he had receiued it, not to deliuer it without the Earle of Lignes hand-writing, in whose name he commanded Pisa. But this was the chiefe cause, he must haue money. Florence will not offer any, Pisa must pay it, or else fall into their hands whom they hated to the death. To draw them vnto it, he hath another wicked practice. He sends to the Florentine Commissioners, to bring their Army to the Port of the Suburbs of Saint Mary, that if the Romans would not receiue them friendly, he would force them to abandon the said garrison, being so commanded by the Citadell, as it could not resist without the Captains assistance. He did not beleue the Florentines should so easily haue taken the Bulwarke of the said suburbs. But when he sees the assailants enter pell-mell, kill some, and take others prisoner, he turnes his artillery vpon the Florentines, kills and hurts them, and forceth the Florentines to abandon the place. In the end, prest by the Kings commanding letters, both to the Earle of Ligni, to him, and to all the Garisons, to leaue the said places, he deliuereth them for twenty thousand Ducats, and after sells Pietrelanta to the Luquois, and Librefatta to the Venetians. And the aboue named Bastard, as good a Merchant as the other, sells Serezane and Serezanelle to the Geneuois. And all to the Kings dishonour, his subiects shame, and the absolute losse of Naples. Saillans, who commanded in the Port of Liorno, is commended to haue yielded the place to the Florentines at the first summons, and Entragues banished the realme of France, by a decree of the priuy Counsell. Yet the Duke of Orleans (his Master) caused this sentence to be repealed. The Priuy, being matters of their Citadell, razed it to the ground. And rather then they will submit their necks to the Florentines yoke, they implore aide from the Pope, Emperour, Venetians, Geneuois, Siennois and Luquois. But whilst that Lodowicke consults whether he should receiue them into his protection, the Venetians preuent him. So, many dogs fighting for one bone, pull one another by the throat, whilst the most politike cases lie away.

The Viceroy in the meane time gathers together the remnant of his Shipwrecke. And as the result of the Colonnois had greatly weakened the Kings party, so hee hoped to passe it by the meanes of Virgilius Vrsinus, who seeing the Colonnois his enemies newly advanced to great authority with Ferdinand, he accepted of the Kings entermainment, being agreed, that he with the house of Vrsin, should make a leaue of six hundred men in armes, and with the Vicelli oppose Ferdinands attempts, who by diuers euents laboured vehemently to recover that which the King held yet. And let vs now see the success of their affaires. The success of armes is variable, but God holds them in balance, and gives the advantage to whom he pleaseth. Our men had sometimes the better, and sometimes

A times the worse. But this is but a languishing fit. Our French being encamped at Nocera, had by an intelligence taken and slaine feuen hundred Arragonois, going to surprize Gilone, neare to Saint Seuerin: but seeing Ferdinand fortified with the Popes troops, they leaue Nocera, to take Saint Seuerin, and Gosenze, which was lately rebelled against them.

Abruzzo continued firme through the valour of Gratian de Guerres, against the attempts of the Earle of Popoli: and the coming of the Vrsins and the Vicelli, did greatly molest the lands of Moncasin, and the neighbour country of Labour. Calabria (although the long sicknesse of the Lord of Aubigni, had staid the course of his prosperity) remained yet at the Kings deuotion. The Viceroy had mounted and armed such as came with him from Naples. All these considerations gaue courage to our men, and made the way to battell, which the Viceroy and Vrsins greatly pressed. But the want and necessity of money to pay their strangers doth cast an Apple of discord in the Army: eight hundred Lanquenets for want of pay, goe to the Arragonois, who fortifying the enemy, make our French so much the weaker. Behold a sore blast for a house that threatened ruine, and now comes the blow which in few monthes shall strike vs dead.

At the first the Venetians would not receiue Ferdinand into the league of the Potentates of Italy, to the end that vrgent necessity might force him to yeeld them something, watching so long for an opportunity, as in the end they finde it. Ferdinand had a great cation in hand: he must hazard all to become (as they say) a rich Merchant, or a poore pedler. He accords with the Venetians, and in regard of a succour of feuen hundred men in armes, five hundred light horse, and three thousand foot, led by the Marquis of Mantoua; and their Nauy enterrained which then lay vpon that coast, with a loan of fiftene thousand ducats, he deliuered vnto them Otrante, Brundisum, and Thrance: and consents they should retaine Monopoli, and Pulignano, which they then held, vpon condition to deliuer them vpon payment of such money as should be imploied in the guard thereof, so as it amounted not to aboute two hundred thousand Ducats. Moreover, the Pope, they, and the Milanois sent other companies of men at armes leauied in common. And Lodowicke, who would not directly breake the treaty of Vercell, agreed secretly to pay ten thousand Ducats monthly towards the wars of Naples. If the Earle of Montpensier were in want, Ferdinand was as needy, and the Venetian succours could not bee so soone ready. So the weakenesse of both parties, being sick of one disease, kept them from attempting much, yet idleness makes the souldiers slothfull. To keep them in exercise, the Viceroy practiseth an intelligence vpon Beneuent: but he was preuented by Ferdinand, who had notice thereof: he leaues it to take Ferezane, Apice and many other neighbour townes, wanting victualls: and the season approaching to collect one of the most important reuenues of the Realme, which was the custome for Cattell in Apulia, he marcheth to frustrate the enemy: it mounted yearly to fourscore thousand ducats. Ferdinand followes to stay the Viceroyes course, attending his succours.

At that time there arises a French Nauy at Caiete, of fiftene great ships, and less lesse, wherein they had shipped eight hundred Lanquenets at Sawona, and the troops appointed for the great ships that should haue beene armed at Genoa. This army takes him at their landing, with other neighbour places. Don Baptista Caraccioli had promised to giue him entrance into Seffa, but Don Fredericke, Ferdinands Vncle, preuented him, committing the Bishop, and others guilty of this practice to prison. The fury of the war was in Apulia, and the success was variable, for both parties lodged in diuers townes, who rather by their ordinare roads then any valor, made warre against the poore Cartell. Virgilius Vrsinus, and Adrian Saulli had gathered together an infinite number of cattell, being the custome betwixt Saint Seuer and Porcine, and Ferdinand with six hundred men in armes, eight hundred light horse, and fiftene hundred foot, comes by night to driue them away: who by the breake of day being planted before Saint Seuer with his men at armes, to make head against Virgilius if he issued forth, hee caused his light horse to driue away about three score thousand head of cattell. Saulli issued forth of Porcine to the rescue, but being too weake, hee was forced to retire with the losse of thirty men in armes.

This checke drew the Viceroy against Ferdinand, being at Fogge, to recover both the honour and prey that was lost. Vpon the way hee encounters eight hundred Lanquenets, betwixt Nocere and Troy, which went to ioyne with Ferdinand: he chargeth them, and being obstinate in fight, defeats and kills them all, with some losse of his men: and so presents himselfe in battell before Fogge, but none issuing forth save the light horse, he lay in ambush in the wood of the Incoronate and recovered the greatest part of the cattell. Then presenting himselfe before Fogge, hee retires to Saint Seuer: where the light horse, falling vpon thole that did drive away the booty, depriued either part of the greatest profit, for the cattell being disperfed here and there were abandoned to the first that could take them. Hereupon the army at sea ioynes with the Viceroy, and the Marquis of Mantoua with the Arragonois. So the chiefe forces of both armies approach. The French were stronger in foot, and the Italians in horse, which held the estate of a faïres in suspense.

The King began againe to affect the affaires of Italy, and hauing made a progress to Toures and Paris, to performe (saith the History) some vowes which hee had made at Pournoue, hee returns to Lions. His owne inclination drew him naturally to this warre glorious, for that he was the first of the Kings of France, after many ages, that had recovered the French armies in Italy. Moreover, the Florentines, the Cardinall of Saint Pierre John Laques of Triuulce, the Prins the Earle of Montoite (sent to that end by the Emperour of the Realm of Naples, who yet did cary the flower de Lice) but with more efficacy than all the rest, the Cardinall of Saint Malo, and that Mignon the Seneschall of Beaucaire, gaue him a certaine hope of Victory, by meanes of a great and speedy succour; and contrariwise of an apparant losse, if matters were more neglected. Euen those which before had disswaded this enterprise of Italy, grieved now exceedingly to see their conquests cowardly lost, and the French Nobility to perish, who (vsurnished of aide) were ready to suffer shipwracke. The Admirall of Grauille alone could not sauour this warre.

These resolutions were somewhat hindered by the warre which the King supported in the Countie of Rouffillon, from whence the Spaniards made ordinary roads and robberies in Languedoc. Charles of Albon, grandfather to the deceased Marshall of Saint Andrew defended the frontier, as Lieutenant to the Duke of Bourbon, Governour of that Province, the which was greatly endangered by the Garçon of Saulles, a little towne in the said Countie, strong of men and situation, and defended by some Gentlemen of the King of Castilles house, who were seconded by an army in field, bigger then the French. Charles undertakes to besiege Saulles, batters it, makes a breach, and gives an assault, and within ten houres carries it by force, where he slew some forty Spanish gentlemen of mark, and about foure hundred men of defence. A worthy reward for the wrong which the Castilian had done to Charles, who had so willingly restored him the possession of his Countrie, hoping to binde him by this good turne not to crosse him in his designs vpon the realme of Naples, as vpon the contract of reddition hee had promised. This exploit kept the Snails within their shells, who vnder pretence and colour to continue their conquests vpon the Moores, whom they lately overcame and chased out of Granada, in the end they mentioned a truce, the which (being concluded from March to October, for themselves and such of their faction as would accept it) diuided the Castilian from the other confederates, attending that a mutuall assembly at Montpellier should end all their controuersies by a firme and durable peace.

*A truce betwixt

France and

Charles greatly affects the enterprise of Italy

Thus Charles freed from this incombrence, returns more vehemently to his first designs: and to draw his counsell thereunto, he said, that hee felt a diuine inspiration in his soule, which called him into Italy. It was according to the predictions of Sennarib. In the end it was concluded, that Triuulce should return to Ait, with the title of the Kings Lieutenant, with eight hundred Launces, and foure thousand French and Swisses: that the Duke of Orleans should follow, and then the King: that thirty ships should pass the straights into the ports of Prouence, and should be armed for the passage of Naples with men, victuals, money, and all other munition. A braue designe and a goodly onset if it had taken effect. But it is a great error in Kings, to giue the chiefe places of authority, rather to Church-men then to their Princes, or to Noblemen of merit: seeing that these men haue but one oath, which is to their King, and the other hauing two, they commonly preferre that which they owe vnto the Pope. The Cardinall of Saint Malo, governing the treasure, and in a manner the whole state, did not directly contradict the Kings will (hauing so greatly affected the first voyage) but so slackt the expeditions, delaying the necessary necessary payments, that no provision was effected; and who would not believe but the Pope giuing to this man a Cardinall's hat, would likewise draw him to his faction.

But let us heare another disturbance; when as Charles was supposed that the King would speedily passe the mountaines, he makes a posting voyage to Paris, and aboue Toures for three reasons. The first vnder colour of deuotion, to take leaue (saith he) of S. Denis and S. Martin, according to the ancient ceremonies of the Kingdom of France: The second to bid the Queene farewell, who was resident at Toures. The third, to draw all the Chieftes of the Realme to aide him with money, after the example of Philip, to avoid the calamities of the yeare before. But he did not set downe the fourth, and that may be made vnder the loue of one of the Queens maides, an importune passion; which doth not keepe him all the months: he sends Triuulce to Ait, with a small troope, more to confirme the friendship of Philip the new Duke of Sauoy, by the death of the little Duke his Nephew, then for any preparation of war: and for the prouision of Naples, six ships were prouided laden with victuals, and laden with hope to be soone followed by a great army, and to receive forty thousand ducats due at Florence: This was physick after death; for if they had not used in time, they had preferred, or at the least flaid for, a seasonable losse of the Realme: if Charles were so dull in these commissions in the Kings presence, iudge if he made any hast in his Maiesties absence.

Yet the body of the Neapolitan state was so shaken, as for want of speedy remedy it was ready to fall. The two armies approach, both so tired, as the war must suddenly end by the ruine of the one. The French were camped before Cicerle, ten miles from Beneuent: and Ferdinand to diuert this siege, was before Franget of Montfort. For the succouring whereof, our men leaue Cicerle: but the Lansquenets approaching a second assault, left the place arrandome; this was a losse which did greatly import our men.

They had means in shew to defeat this army, so busie at the sacke of Frangette, as the Captaines aduertised; that there was but a valley betwixt the French and their lodging, they could not in time call backe the souldiers from the spoils to armes. The Earle of Montpenfer would haue embraced this occasion, Philip Prins did vrges, Per of Alger by an enuious or malicious shew of hazard which they should incur in passing the valley at the mercy of the enemy, loathing the Swisses and Lansquenets, which hee commanded, discontented moreover with the small entertainment they had giuen him when he presented himselfe to succour the Castles of Naples, hindered the execution and shew: our vnder colour of pay (as they say) he caused the strangers to mutine. Thus the Viceroy forced to found a retreat, went to follow the siege of Cicerle, where Camille Prins performing the office of an excellent Captaine and souldier, during the assault was wounded in the head with a stone whereof he died. An accident which causeth the French to abandon both the assault and siege, to retire towards Arriane, and to seek some means to draw the Arragonois to battell. But they had to deale with cunning temporizers, who knowing our men to be pressed with the want of meat and money, and forseeing that the slacknesse of their succours would breed greater discoommodities and disasters, they suffered them to keepe the field, and lodged in their forts, where their commodities could not be cut off.

Not only the Army, but also the other parts of the realme were greatly distressed. And with the bastard sonne of the Lord of Camerin, had of late defeated the Marquis of Bioute of the French faction, in Abiuzzo Alfonse, Grailan de Guerres being in field, ouerthrew the Earles of Selane and Popoli, leading three hundred horse; and three thousand foot for Ferdinand. Notwithstanding the losse of an occasion of a victory at Franget, the extreame necessity of all things, the discord of the Captaines, and continual contradiction of Per, refusing to obey the Earle of Montpenfer, for that (saith he) he had against reason abandoned the Castles of Naples, the disobedience of the souldiers, the discontent of the Neapolitan troops following the King, not paid, and iniuriously treated in the diuisions of booties or victuals, the departure of many from the campe, the mutinies of the Swisses and Lansquenets, who cited out tumultuously for their pay, the neighbourhood of many towne supported by the enemies army, many disasters concurring, daunted the courage of our souldiers, engendered a contempt & harred in the people people, and forced our men to flee from place to place, without any hope of meeting fight with the enemy, who re spare the blood of his people would not hazard any thing.

All these difficulties carried our French into Apulia, and as they were beaten in the King and taking of Arreles, and then to possess Venouse, a strong towne, and abounding with victuals, Ferdinand takes Gessulide in one day (the which in former times had inuaded a siege of fourtене months) and taking from them all hope of Venouse, he forceth them to retire to Arreles; and presently campe before it, desirous to winne a Victory without perill and losse of men; and cutting off all the passages, he takes from them all means of reliefe. But this accident made his designs more easie. The remainder of the Kingdom, who saw their departure from their houses had receiued but two months pay, being the time of their entertainment past, they went to the Araggon party. And when what happened the totall ruine of our men, was the euent in Calabria. By reason of the loss of Antibonics sicknelle, many of his men were gone to the Victories Army. The Duke of Melito, and Albert of Saint Seberin, with many other Barons of the Countie, he wants to the King lodged at Laine, upon the riuer of Sapri, covered with the Castle, the onefide of the riuer, against any one that should assaile them upon the high way, and from some other places belonging to the Prince of Bisignan. It is very dangerous to be too confident especially in matters of war. These Noblemen assembled all the forces they could, to charge Gonfalus, who made war in that Prouince, and after the taking of some places, was camped before Castonillare. Gonfalus perceiues them, and coming neare the riuer, he cauleth his foot to march toward the bridge, which lyeth betwixt the Castle of Laine and the Village, which bridge was negligently guarded, relying vpon the above named places, whelch he passeth with his horse at a Ford two miles above the both might charge burmen as the instant. The effect succeeded, he arriues before his enemies them without strinell, and without guard, charge, and breakes them in many ly, takes eleven Barons prisoners, and almost all the Souldiers, who flying towards the Castle, fell among the feet, who had already seized vpon the bridge. This Victory laid the way open for Gonfalus to ioyne with Ferdinand, with six thousand men, and thus he was the ruine of our troops, spee'd with three armies, the Araggonis, Venetian, and Spanishe. So as being no more able to be relieved with victuals, nor goe so farreth neither to haue any passage to the riuer to water their horses, being themselves in great extremity for want, vanquished with so many difficulties, and abandoned of all hope, after two and thirty daies siege, they obtained of Ferdinand a peace for thirty daies, and necessary victuals for that time; during the which, none of the besieged should go forth. Licence for the duke Montpensier to signify this accord vnto the King, the Souldiers, their liues and goods Gued, with the which they might retire into France by land or sea, and the French with other Italian Souldiers whether they would, out of the realme; Impunity to the Barons and all others that had followed the French faction, and restitution of all goods and offices, so as within fifteen daies they returned to Ferdinand. All this is great, but there followes a very dishonourable promise: That if the Earle of Montpensier be not relieved within thirty daies, he shall deliuer Acells, and all that he holds within the Realme of Naples into Ferdinands hands, with all the Artillery. Thus reason yeelds where force commands.

The time expired, all were conducted to the castle of Stabbia vpon the Sea, and the Viceroy was summoned to yeeld vp all the other places, which the King possessed. But pretending that his authority did not extend to the Captaines which commanded in Calabria, Abruzzo, Caiete, and other places, which the King himselfe (and no other) had giuen them in guard. The Araggonis making shew so dishonourable, caused them to be conducted (but more properly confined them) vpon this controuersie to Bay and Pozzol, where (under colour that shipping was not yet ready) part of them by the water they had endured, and part by the indisposition of the airc, being hot and vnholefome, and part seeking incompertely vpon grapes, and other fruit hals ripe: but with most likelihood, hauing (as forme write) seasoned their meats, and mixt their wines with druggs in supportable for the stomacke, the Earle of Montpensier died and of such thousand scarce fifteen hundred returned safe to their countrey. There is but one hazard to befall all. A baxell (although very desperate) had bene far more honourable and lesse fault. But let vs rather note the examples and errors of others, then reproacheth

Virgil

Virgilius, and Paul Virgil, by the Popes commandment (who had sworne the ruine of that house) were shut vp in the Castle de l'Ouro: their men (led by John lordin the sonne of Virgil, and Bartholomew of Aluian) were dript in Abruzzo by the Duke of Vrbis; and these two commanders called by Ferdinand to Naples, were likewise imprisoned. Aluian escaped soone after, the rest died in prison. Now all things smile vpon the Conquerour, but he pursues the victory otherwaies then we can doe: and in these garboles, euerie one lies to the stronger, and makes his peace as he may. Ferdinand lends Don Fredericke his vncl, and Prosper Colonne before Caiete, and Fabrizio Colonne into Abruzzo, who receiued Aquila for the Araggonis, took the rocke of Saint Seuerin by force, and caused the Captain and his sonne to be beheaded, to terrifie the rest: then he went and entained before Salerne, where the Prince of Bisignan made his peace, for himselfe, for the Prince of Saleme, for the Earle of Cappacio, and some other Barons. Gratian des Guerres (forced to giue way to this violent streame) leaues Abruzzo, and retires himselfe with eight hundred horse into Caiete, where Don Fredericke doth presently inuest him. Gonfalus returned into Calabria, where the Lord of Aubigni (after such resistance as his forces could make, being gotten into Groppoli, in the end promisth to leaue all the Prouince, having liberty to returne into France by Land. The other Captaines (either for that they had filled their bags with the prouisions of their places, or had by disorder consumed that in few daies, which in time of necessity might haue serued long, or through feare) or impatience of the difcommodities which follow a siege) were forced to yeeld them at the first sumon.

But shall Ferdinand long enioy the happy successe of his armes? Behold, hauing not yet tasted the sweetnesse of his conquests, nothing remaining for the recouery of the Realme but Tarentum, Caiete, and a few other places, held by Charles of Sanguin and Mont S. Angelo, where Don Iulian of Lorraine commanded, who caused the neighbor counties to feele both the greatnesse of his courage, and the weight of his armes, death comes and cuts off both the course of his victories, and the thred of his life, and transports his Crowne to Don Fredericke his vncl. Thus the state of Naples, felt the diuers humors of five Kings in three yeares: Ferdinand, Alphons, King Charles the eight, Ferdinand, and the incestuous (hauing married his Aunt, sister to Alphons his Father) and Fredericke.

Fredericke leauing the siege of Caiete, comes to enioy his Nephews succession, and those which had before followed the French party, as the Princes of Salerne and Bisignan, the Earle of Cappacio and others, were the first to proclaim his name in Naples, and to helpe him to finish the remainder of the war against our men. Tarentum (besieged by the Venetians) was forced to yeeld through famine, who hauing held it some daies (not without suspect that they would appropriate it to themselves) in the end they assigned it vnto Fredericke, at the Popes entreaty, and the King of Spaine. Caiete might haue held out some months, but iudging the King would haue as little care to free them, as many other places negligently lost, to the prouidence both of a great number of the Nobility, and also of the crowne, they compounded with Fredericke by the means of the Lord of Aubigni, giuing them leaue to returne by Sea into France, with bag and baggage: And consequently, all other places did quite reiect the French command in the state of Naples. And Fredericke (hauing obtained the inuestiture of the Realme, from the Pope) was solemnly crowned.

Thus King Charles was freed from the care he had for the recovery thereof, but the peace and infamy christs him once reuenge vpon the next neighbour. Many Protestants of Italy perswade him therunto; the Duke of Ferrara knew well, that the Venetians (hauing taken Polcan from him) sought his ruine; and amidst these distractions he was the victor of the hereticke two Wolves, that is to say, the Venetians, and the Duke of Milan. Ignorance in law, who (preferring his safety and his childrens, before the loue of the Duke of Milan) offered the King five hundred men at armes, and two thousand foot. The Marquis of Mantoua (being discontented with the Venetians) fell from them with six hundred men. Montpensier offered a hundred and fifty thousand armeries in the countie, which two thousand, with a good number of foot. The Florentines (notwithstanding) he had in their places, and to warrant themselves from the wrong which the Venetians pressed against them, promised eight hundred men at armes, and the Duke of of Pisa were not able to divert them from their naturall inclination to the house of France: And contrariwise, the more mighty they are, the more means they shall have to disturb the quiet of Italy. Why then have the Confederates by a common consent promised the Pisans to defend their liberties, and now to violate both their honour and faith? Is this the reward for the exceeding charge we have so willingly maintained, when as all the other Confederates were unwilling to disturb any thing for the common good? By what means was Italy preserved? With what forces did they fight at Taro? With what arms have they recovered the realme of Naples? Where-with have they forced Nouarre to acknowledge her first Lord? Can any one day, but these actions did proceed from a sincere affection to the good estate of Italy? Seeing we were not the nearest unto dangers, neither are the disorders grown by us, wherof we suffer the paine.

Whilest these things were treated of at Rome among the Confederates, not without apparent signes of future diuision: a new humour caries away our Charles to his Castle, which he caused to be built at Amboise; a building of admirable worke and charge, hauing (to that end) brought the rarest worke-men that could be found, from Naples, and all other partes: and for the beautifying thereof, he had gathered together the goodliest plots that could be found in France, Italy, Flanders, and elsewhere: not able to forsake, that in stead of a proud and stately Palace, hee should end his life in a bafe and lowly Gallery.

Hauing his minde inclined (besides his building) not onely to a second voyage beyond the Alpes, but to reforme his life, honouring the Queene his wiues bed with a chastit speck, whereas many loose allurements had transported his youth. To restrain the power and ambition of the Clergie; to order Iustice, giuing audience twise in a week to all complaints, and free access to any that would desire iustice. Doubtlesse, The King sitting in his throne of iustice (saith the Wiseman) dispereth all ill with his looke: to reforme his kinde to dispose of his treasure, to ease his subiects, restraining all taxes (which had bene due vpon his subiects) to twelue hundred thousand Frankes, besides his reuenues: a summe which his Estates had granted at his coming to the Crowne, for the defence of the realme. It chanced the tenth of Aprill, going after dinner with the Queene into the Castles riches, he struck his forehead against the doore of a Gallery, whereas he meant to see a set at Tennis: this blow being a certaine aduertisement, to drine him to the premeditation of his approaching end, the last pangs of death moued him presently, with a godly and holy resolution (but wisely conditioned according to mans weakness) at which he testified by these words, talking with John of Beauuois, Bishop of Angiers his Confessor, touching the faults he had committed in his yonger age: I hope (saith he) neer so commit mortal nor venial sinne, if I can auoide it. Presently vpon this protestation he fell backward, falling into an Apoplexie, wherewith he had bene a little before troubled, which closed his eies with the sleepe of death, about eleuen of the clocke at night.

A notable example, wherein wee read the pitifull estate of Princes, when as death knocketh with an euen hand, both at Kings palaces, and at poore mens cottages, giuing them an end liko to all other men; and the inconstant loue of Courtiers. Behold a King, who commanded ouer so many Provinces, whom so many great Cities obeyed, whose such numbers of sumptuous Castles at his pleasure, & now building a magnificent house, giuing vnto the ghost in a chamber nere to a Gallery, stinking with the Vrine which every one made as he passed through it, laid vpon a matresse, such as they could finde out by chance. And before his eies were shut vp with this last sleepe, euery one forgot the counsell which this declining sunne had runne, to follow the hope of the Easterne Starre, which came to lighten this realme.

King Charles died.

His disposition.

Thus Charles the eight liued, and thus hee died: an humble Prince, liberall, religious, courteous, familiar, and of easie access; of a good and tractable disposition, small stature, but of an inuincible courage, louing Iustice and his people, capable of counsell, commended for his great attempts, hauing in his youth purchased so much glory, and giuen so much hope both within & without Christendome, that if God had granted him a longer life without doubt he had equall'd the fame of the most excellent & rarest Prince. In him failed the direct line of the Kings of France, descended from Philip of Valois; and the growne fell to the collateral line, of the which the nearest, and most capable of the succession, was Lewis Duke of Orleans and Valois.

LEWIS the Twelfth,

The 57 French King.

OW behold our France (hauing vnder Charles the eight happily breathed, after the troubles and confusions which had so long afflicted the State during the reignes of his Predecessors) takes her rest vnder the protection of a Prince, excellent in bounty of nature, in sweetness of manners, in temperance and moderation of minde and affection: Finally, in the happinesse and felicity of his raigne. Who hauing extended his Empire beyond the limits of Gaule, subdued vnder his obedience two of the noblest and mightiest Cities of the world, Milan with Lombardy, and Genoua with her two riuers, East and West, together with the Islands of Corsica, and Chio: reconquered and diuided the Realme of Naples with the Castilian: but in the end, lost it by treachery and disloyalty: vanquished the Venetians in that memorable battell, the fiftenth of May 1500: suppressed the Popes insolencie: defeated the Verians againe before Breschia: made a peace with the Spaniard and Venetian, and consequently allied himselfe with the King of England. He shall haue this honor and content, to see his subiects in so great prosperity, that by the conference of things passed before his time, the Realme was neuer so mighty in armes and men; neuer so plentifull in all kinds of commodities; neuer so fortified with such strong places: and which imports more, neuer so blessed in concord: neuer so void of diuisions, neuer so able to endure a great charge, and to produce noble attempts.

The happinesse of his raigne.

A godly King, chaste, vpright, courteous, good to his seruants, gracious to his enemies, mercifull to all men, a friend to Iustice and sincerity, and enemy to flattery, liberall, but without oppression of any; loyall, respected in all parts of the world: who in regard of learning, shall open a way which his thrice worthy successeur shall bring to a most happy perfection. But to crowne him with titles of honor, he was called The Father of his people. A King commanding a nation most willing to obey: a people multiplying by millions, in Nobility, Merchants, Trades-men, and the common sort: a people replenishing the Townes before halfe desolate. To conclude, a people testifying the excellency and greatness of their Soueraigne. For the greatness of a King (saith Salomon) is in the multitude of people, but when his subiects decrease, it is the fall of his Soueraignie. But let vs see, by the relation of the History, the course of this admirable prosperity: and first of all, his rigths of Succession, as well to this Crowne, and that of Naples, being King of France, as also to the estate of Milan, by reason of Valentine his Grand-mother.

King Charles the 5 had two sonnes. The eldest, Charles the 6 his successeur, who was father to Charles the seventh, of whom was borne Lewis the eleuenth; father to Charles the eight, who died without children. The yongest, Lewis Duke of Orleans, married Valentine daughter to John Galeas Earle of Vertus, and first Duke of Milan, by whom hee had three sonnes, Charles his successeur Duke of Orleans, John Earle of Angouleme, and Philip Earle of Vertus. The said Charles freed from his long imprisonment in England, had by Mary of Cleues his wife, our Lewis the 12, heire (for want of heires male in the direct line) of this Realme, and of the dependancies thereof; and so was anoynted at Rheims the 27 of May 1498: assisted at this solemnity, by John Duke of Alanson, serving as a Peere in the place of the Duke of Bourgonne; Peter Duke of Bourbon for the Duke of Normandy; Anthony Duke of Lorraine, for the Duke of Gulesne; Philip Earle of Rausstein, in the place of the Earle of Flanders; Gilbert of Cleues, for the Earle of Champagne; and Gaston of Foix, for the Earle of Tholous: and for the Peeres of the Clergie, the Bishops that were then resident. Afterwards hee receiued the royall Crowne in the Abbey of S. Denis in France, the first of Iuly, and the day following made his triumphant entry into Paris.

The generation of Lewis the 12.

Wee iudge of the inward beauty of a Palace, by the entrie thereof: Who would not see by these happy first fruits of this raigne, conceiue a constant hope of a heavenly blessing? Lewis, after he had worthily performed the funeralls of his Predecessor, he first purchased purchased the love of the Noblemen of his Court, maintaining every man in his dignity and state, and the Magistrates in their Offices. Hee applied his minde to order and cut off the tediousness of suites: freed his Subjects of the third part of the subsidies which oppressed them: yea, even the rites which they are accustomed to pay to their new King, for the charges of his funeral that is deceased; and for his coronation: and for a second benefit to the country, he put the men at armes into their Garisons, reducing them to the ancient discipline of war, which the disordered liberty of troubles past had much corrupted. This done, by the aide of his best States-men, hee made many goodly laws, vpon the abusive charges in the pursuit of Justice; neither did he euer publish an Edit, before it was confirmed by the judgment of Sovereigne Courts. His decrees contained some limitation of the priuiledges granted in old time to Vniuersities, the which they abused to the oppression of the people. The Vniuersity of Paris opposed against the publication thereof, and were ready to make a sedition, many publishing infamous libells against the King, and against the Chancellor of Rochfort. The Scholers troope together, and resolute to abandon both study and the exercise of learning. John Cane being Rectour, forbids the Regents to read any more, and the Preachers to preach, vntill the Vniuersity had recovered her ancient priuiledges. The King aduertised of these mutinies, drew many men at armes into Paris, and sitting in Parliament confirms the aboue named ordinances by an Edit. The Rectour fearing a checke, keeps all the Scholers within their lodgings, and reuokes the commandment he had given. John Standen, a Doctor of the Vniuersity, a Brabancon, and one of the chiefe authors of this counsell, was banished the Realme. Thomas Warner of Cambray, (who preaching, had barkt out something against the Kings authority) preuented this decree, and banished himselfe. Being thus calme in minde, and quiet within his realme, his thoughts soared beyond the Alpes, and he takes vpon him the title of Duke of Milan. He was grounded vpon the right of succession. Valentine besides her dowry (which was the City and country of Ast, with a great summe of money) had obtained this claufe expressly in her contract of Marriage, The for want of heires male of Galeas, Valentine should succeed to the Duchy, or shee being dead, her next descendants.

The Vniuersity of Paris mutinies

Lewis his title to the Duchy of Milan.

This conuention was of no force, but the Imperiall seat was then vacant: and the Pope confirmed it. The Pope pretending (the Empire being without an Emperour) that the administration belongs to him. And seeing that by the death of Philip Maria Visconti, the masculine line of John Galeas failed, who then should succeed in this goodly estate? many contended for it, the Emperour Fredericke maintained, that it should bee vnto the Empire, considering the line specified in the institution made to John Galeas by Winceslaus King of Romans was extinct. Alphonso King of Arragon and Naples armed himselfe with the testament of Philip, by the which he was made his heire. But in worldly affairs the strongest most often carries it. Francis Sforce, one of *Philip*s Captaines, son to Sforza Attendule, an aduenterer, a braue and active spirit, had married Blanche, bastard daughter to the said Philip: and hauing no man at that instant that might resist his violence, he did so cunningly win all the greatest families of Milan, as by their support and assistance he soone seized on the State: the which he might easily effect, hauing all the forces at his command, and no competitor. For neither Lewis Duke of Orleans, nor his children had any meanes to recouer this Duchy from Francis, by reason of the great warres which followed in France, by the murder of the said Lewis, and of the Duke of Bourgogne slain likewise at Montereau, vnder Charles the sixt and seuenth, Charles sonne to the said Lewis (taken at the battaile of Azincourt, languishing twenty yeares a prisoner in England, and deliuered by Philip Duke of Bourgundy,) could neuer obtaine any aide from Lewis the eleuenth, being crossed by home-bred warres from the beginning of his raigne. Moreover, Lewis did alwaies make account to settle his authority, by the suppression of his nearest blood. And for this cause our Lewis, his sonne in law, sonne to the said Charles, had no whit the more credit with his father in law, for the recovery of his heritance. And the sword which he diuulgeath against Charles the eight his brother in law, (of whom he pretended the Regency) and after in the wars of Britany, took from him all meanes to attempt this enterprize, vntill such times as (the King hauing left him in Ast to cross the attempts of Lodowicke Sforce) he seized vpon Nowarre, but with a fruitlesse event.

Now

A Now is he seated vpon the royall throne of his Ancestors, peaceable within himselfe, and peaceable with his neighbors. Trinulce doth not cease to lay open vnto him the Ensigne to expell Lodowicke. To make the way easie, Pope Alexanders friendship, the Venetians, Florentines; and other Potentates of Italy was very requisite. He seeks it by his Ambassadors, and finds that the death of Charles the eight, had bred an alteration in their dispositions. The Pope conceiuing, that the peace of Italy was the decay of his priuate estate, did easily allow of new troubles. The Venetians (being freed by the Kings deceale, from the feare they had of him, for the indignities he had receiued,) did not beleue that a new King would so vehemently embrace the quarrell of his Predecessor: and foreseeing also, that if Sforce were once quiet, he would oppose himselfe against them, for the affaires of Pisa, whereof he did sollicite (but coldly) the restitution vnto the Florentines by the Popes meanes. The Florentines had not yet so much changed their affection from the French, but there was good meanes to recouer it.

The Popes affection.

Being thus affected, they all send their Ambassadors to the King. The Pope (who aspired to nothing more then the temporall aduancement of Cesar Borgia his son, being then Cardinal) did willingly embrace this occasion to plant him in the kings good favour, and by some especiall bond to purchase his Masters loue. He knew well that Lewis would willingly put away Joane his wife, to marry with Anne the widow of Charles: and euen then he resolved to exchange spiritual graces for temporall commodities.

He capitulates with the kings

He then agrees with the King for thirty thousand Ducats, and draws a promise from him, to aide him presently after the conquest of Milan, to reduce to the obedience of the Apostolicke see, the rownes possessed by the Governours of Romagna. And for his sonne Cesar, a company of a hundred Lances, twenty thousand frankes pension, a wife in France to his liking, and Valence in Dauphine, with the title of a Duchy. Then he committed the matter of diuorce to Ferdinand Bishop of Septa, his Nuncio in France, to Philip Cardinal of Luxembourg, and to Lewis Bishop of Alby (some name George of Amboise, Archbishop of Rouen) who vpon report of the protestation made by Lewis to a Notary, the day of his marriage; that his meaning was not to contract any marriage, and that the solemnity which hee did celebrate, was only to please the King; whom hee knew to be cruell against him, by whom hee thought himselfe to be wronged. And moreover, if by Charles Lewis, either by the expresse commandment of his father in law, or after of his brother in law, did hee and his wife, hee did interpose secret witnesses; that should depose of his abstynency. And besides, the Physicians hauing iudged her incapable of issue, they declared the said marriage voyde, and gaue him liberty to marry with Anne: who contracting herselfe to any other should haue diuided the Duchy of Britany from the Crowne of France. The Venetians sent to congratulate his coming to the Crowne, and by way of excuse, gaue him to vnderstand, that the contentions they had with king Charles, proceeded only of distrust and jealousy, whereof hee had giuen them cause, seeing that not content with the Realme of Naples, hee had cast his designs vpon all Italy.

The Florentines did not forget their ancient custome, in like cases to the Crowne of France, but especially, to put him in mind of their dependance to the aeternall King. Iohn called meur by Lodowicke Sforce, to the end that when the two common weales of Venice and Florence, should come to treat of the affaires of Pisa, the Venetians practices (whereof Lodowicke did much feare in Italy might be crossed by the Florentines) did they purchasing fauour and credit with the King, he might employ them, to mediate some accord betwixt the King & him, the which he desired with all his heart. Gerardo did see the forme, and laboured to auoyd it, but in vaine for the summe of his shew was at hand. Then Cesar Borgia, the new Duke of Valentinois, came vnto the King with the bill of dispensation: where he was no sooner arrived, but as the sonne of his father, hee had the first act of a bloody tragedy, vpon the alliance which the King did contract with the Pope his father. Cesar following the instructions of Alexander, dumbeled the bringing of this Bill, iudging the Kings disposition to be like vnto those who desire that more which is refused, to make him the more pleable to his desires. But the Bishop of Septa, being sent intelligence vnto his Maiesty of the truth, the King thinking it sufficient to see the Bill dispatched, concluded the marriage with Anne, giuing for a paction to his wife the Duchy of Berry. Cesar hauing discovered the authors of this adulterous deed the Bishop to bee soone after poysoned. The peace with Quar Princes, which might somewhat disturb the projects of Lewis, was no lesse expedient: he therefore concluded with Ferdinand King of Castile, and thereby did associate him in the conquest of the Realme of Naples: he confirmed that which his Predecessor had with the English, and renewed the alliance with the Swisses, granting them the pensions which Lewis & Charles were accustomed to give.

Maximilian alone, working vpon the old lesaine of his Ancestors, shewed some benevolence amidst these contents, calling the coales of diuision in Bourgonne and Champaigne, by the Lord of Vergi Comtois, when as they least doubted it, seeing that Lewis being taken prisoner at the battell of Saint Aubin, and hauing, aboue all others, imployed Maximilian for an intercessor to Charles the eight, they thought that Maximilian should reioyce at this new successe, more then any other Prince, and that the discontent he had against Charles (hauing forsaken his daughter, and married with Anne of Britany) had become mortified by the death of the said Prince. The Emperor was thrust on by the Duke of Milan who being perswaded, that the King busied at home, should haue no leisure to attempt any thing in Italy, or any accord being made betwixt them, he should be comprehended therein. This warre put the Realme in alarme: but Lewis opposed to great power, vnder the command of John of Foix Vicount of Narbonne, his brother in law, it was quenched as soone as kindled, by a truce of many moneths, without any mention of Lodowick Sforze. And to the end that Philip Arch-duke of Austria, and Earle of Burgundy, son to Maximilian, might reape the fruits of their reconciliation, he did homage to the King, for the places he held of the Crowne: and those of Artois were restored to him. In the meane time, they consule at Venice, vpon the treatmes of confederation with the King. The difference was, the holding of Pisa. The Venetians offering all other conditions, would not haue this firing toucht; and the King being resolute to haue it redemmed to him in fauour of the Florentines, refused to treat, vnlesse this Article might be granted. But the Duke of Valentinois and other Agents for the Pope, the Cardinall of Pierre, Triuinelle, and all the Italians (who for their owne priuate interest perswaded him to warre) laying before him the losse he should receiue, by the want of the Venetians ayde, considering their power and meanes to annoy the Duke of Milan, he yielded without any more speech: that at the same time, as he should invade the Duchy of Milan, they should doe the like vpon their frontiers. Thus hauing won the rest of the Duchy, Cremona and Guaradadde should be taken by their common forces for the Venetians, except the breach of forty faddome along the river of Adde. Thus after the conquest of Milan, the Venetians should be bound to defend that for a time, with a certain number of horse and foot: and the King should doe the like for Cremona, and other places which they possessed in Lombardie, euen vnlesse the Marches of Venice. This convention tooke all hope from Lodowick, both of peace with the King, and reconciliation with the Venetians. Being thus abandoned, hee resolueth to defend himselfe, and begins by the fortification of Anoa, Nouarre, & Alexandria, towns lying neere to the French, meaning to oppose against their violence. Galeas of Saint Severin, with the greatest part of his forces, & the rest against the Venetians, vnder the command of the Earle of Caiazzo. He commands Galeas to passe the Pau, with fixtene hundred men at armes, sixtene hundred light horse, ten thousand Italian foot, & five hundred Lanquenes: but rather to defend his places, then to keepe the field, hoping that the prolonging of the war would breed him some aduantage, for that he expected an issue of the accord, which he did mediate betwixt Maximilian and the Swisses: the which effected, he had promise of notable ayde. On the other side, the King called Lewis of Luxembourg, Earle of Ligni, to march with Euerard Steward Lord of Aubigni, and John Jaquet of Touluse, leading 6000 horse, and 25000 foot. The Castle of Araze vpon Tanare, was the first object of their armes, a place kept by 500 foot, assailed the 10 of August, and taken within few dayes. Seven hundred men being lodged in Anoa, did likewise suffer it to be taken in two dayes, and all those put to the sword that were retired in armes into the Castle. Bonast Raffagnin, a Milanais, Captaine of the Castle of Valence, well furnished with men and artillery, corrupted by the promises of Triuinelle, gaue entrance to the French, the same day as he had by the like treachery twenty years before, deliuered one of the gates of Torone to Lodowick Sforze, to the preiudice of Bonne of Sauoy, and of the little Duke John Galeas. All the souldiers were slaine or taken, amongst others, Victorian brother to Saint Severin, was prisoner.

The same deluge ouerflowed euen vpon the very brute) Basignagne, Voguer, Challanceuf, and Pont Coronee. Anthony Maria Palamish yielded vnto Torione, not attending any assault. Alexandria makes head against the army, and whilst they presse, Lodowick thrusts himselfe into Milan, and seeing his estate lost by poore meales, hee flies to those remedies which are vsual in greatest despair. Hee iuroules all that could carie armes, assembles the peoples, discharged them of a part of their ordinary impositions: sheweth them with most vehement words, "That if happily hee had often charged them, not any desire to gather treasure, nor his owne disposition: (being an enemy to oppression of his subjects) but rather the time and the common dangers of Italy: had perswaded him thereto: first to counterchecke the Venetians greatnesse: then, to oppose against the will of King Charles. That the fruits which they had reaped thereby, were reasonnably quiet, wherein he had happily maintained them many yeeres, with a general increase in riches, beauty of buildings, and inhabitants, with mildnesse and moderation of his iustice, full to administer good and briefe iustice to every man indifferently. That the meane and gracious government of his father layed before their eyes, how ill supported he would be, in the insolent and proud command of the French be vnto them. That abhorring the rough and vnciuill manners of strangers, they should refuse for the common defence of their liues and Countrey. That the French are but a brut, which being withstood, it should then be easie to resist them. That the Emperor made hasten to succour them in person." C. That Prisier Colonne marched with the troopes of Fredericke King of Naples. That the Marquis of Mantoua, was already in the Countrey of Cremona, hauing sacrificed all his troufferies. That to all these aydes, if they did burye in their loyalties and good will, they should find himselfe strong enough to incurraunt the power of France vnited together. But these admonitions came too late: it was very apparant, that necessity, & not any good meaning, had forced him to this humility, whereas he had neuer given them any testimony. Thus his ruine approached. The Venetians for their part made war in Guaradadde, and had taken Carauage and other towns vpon the river of Adde. The Earle of Caiazzo, discontented that his brother being younger of yeares and of lesse experience, should be preferred before him in the command of the army, had secretly passed his word to the King. In the meane time they thunder against the walles of Alexandria, and Galeas of S. Severin hauing with him 1200 light horse, and 6000 foot, (not discouering his intent to any Captaine, but onely to Luke Malucze), flies secretly out of the towne in the night, after the third daies siege, with a part of his light horse, shewing by the effect, that hee had a brauer arme, and was more experienced in lusts and Tourneys (in which exercises all other Italians gaue him place) then in the government of any army. This flight dashed the courage of the besieged, and made the passage easie. The army enters in at the breach of the day, spoiles the garrison, and sacks the towne. The losse of Alexandria, and the following siege of Mortare, opened the gates of Pavia.

Milan with the Citizens arme, and respect Lodowick so little, as they giue good testimony of their affection, by the murder of Anthony of Landriano his Treasurer generally, committing at noone day from the Castle. Lodowick foretelling his owne by others ruine, being well informed that his government was exceeding hateful vnto the Milanais, and moreover, amazed at the report which Galeas made of the valour of the French men at armes, he sent away his children, accompanied with the Cardinalls Affandus his brother, and of S. Severin, with about two hundred thousand Ducats which he had in treasure, well shorted of a million and a halfe which hee made thereof few yeares before: hee left the guard of the castle to Bernardin of Corte borne at Paula, whom he had bred vp young, and 3000 foot, furnished with victuals, munition, & money for many moneths: hee restored to the Borgheses, Gentlemen of Milan, the lands he had taken from them: But was this any bounty, seeing he could not keepe them? and the 2 day of September he departed for Germany, followed by the Cardinall of Este, and Galeas of S. Sauerin, with a good number of horse, and foot, vnder color to hasten the imagined troopes, with Maximilian prepared for him. The towne thus abandoned, being loath to be a prey vnto the enemy, who approached towards the wals, prevented their coming, and willingly consented to bring them in, reseruing the capitulation to the Kings attall, from whom they hoped, (considering their voluntary submission) to receiue goodly exemptions, & great priuiledges. All other places of the Duchy conformed themselves to the paterne of their chiefe City.

Cremona

Cremona affected to the French.

Cremona abhorring the Venetian yoke, stretched out both armes and hearts to the French: but the King unwilling to infringe the treaty made with the Senate, they were forced to yeeld to the yoke after some daies siege. Genoua follows this example. Adornes (to whom Lodowike had giuen the gouernment) Iohn Lepk of Fieque, and the people, contend who shall haue most honor in yeelding it to the King, who giues them the Gouernour, Philip Lord of Rauastin, and Baptista Frege for his Lieutenant. But force could not take the Castle, by the aduice of Trinulce, gold makes a breach. Bernard without any other approach, by the consent of the other Capitaines, namely of Philip of Fieque, brede likewise and brought vp by Lodowike, tells it twelue dayes after Lodowike departure, and receiues for payment a hundred thousand Crownes: some report but ten thousand (yet I should tearmethis sale the capitulation of a foole, considering the place which he commanded) halfe the moreables in the Castle, a company of an hundred Lances, an annuall pension, with many other graces and priuiledges. But this infamous merchant (hatefull to all the world, fled from by every man, as vnworthy to hold any ranke amongst men of honor, cast off from all companies, with words full of reproch confounded with shame, and tormented in his owne conscience, accusing his villany and base ingratitude,) dyed of griefe within few dayes after.

Thus all things fore-tell the ruine of Lodowike: his owne indiscretion; the people hatred; the cowardlinesse of his Captaines and souldiers, and the treachery of his household seruants, so as in twenty dayes he is dispossessed of this mighty Estate which he had before vsurped. The King receiuing intelligence at Lyons, of a speedier victory then he expected, departs presently in post; and makes his entry into Milan, granting to the people exemptions of many customes, impunity to all such as had followed Sforze, restitution to the Gentlemen, who through the tyranny of former times had lost their goods: they were extant, or not to discontent them that were in lawfull possession; hee gaue money many to buy them againe, or other lands if any were to be sold. He repeated by Edith the Regens and professors of learning, giuing to some lands, to others increase of their entertainment, honored the gentlemen of the Countrey with his table, and their houses with his presence. And to make this gouernment more popular, he made Iohn Laque of Naples, a Milanois Gouernot of Milan, giuing vnto him Vigueue & many other things in regard of his merits & loyall seruice. As the French Forces prospered thus in the Duchy of Milan, and the Venetians buffed in the Countrey of Cremona, the Florentines giue after the restitution of Pisa: and to obtaine it, they giue vnto Paul Pielli their Generall, an Army of ten thousand foot, with a great number of horse, with the which (having taken Calsine and other places that supported Pisa) hee incamped before the City the last day of Iuly. An enterprize of difficulty, as well for the strength of the Towne, as for the valor and resolution of the Citizens, who willingly would haue suffered any misery, rather then to haue false vnder the Florentines command. Hee battens the fort of Stambrice, and the wall of either side with twenty peeces of artillery.

Pielli giues an assault and forceth it, with so great a terror to the Pisans, as abandoning the rampiers, every man seeks to saue himselfe by flight. And if the Generall had pushed it vigorously, that morning had crowned him with honour, whereas it proued the beginning of his downfall; for seeing his souldiers vpon hope of spoile run together by heapes, he slayed their hear, causing most of his troopes to retire, and gaue the besieged ioynture, (seeing this first brunt past) to resume new courage, and returne to the guard of the rampiers. So as whilest he laboured to win a victory, with the least preiudice to the army that might be, being lodged in a Countrey full of pooles and marshes, which lie betwixt the sea and the towne, and the season being subiect vnto pestilent winds, a generall contagion infects so many of his men in few daies, as the healthy were not sufficient for a generall assault, so as he raised the siege against the Florentines will, who promised to renew his troopes with fresh supplies. So as the bad opinion which the Florentine people had conceived of him, increased in such sort, as being called into Calsine, by the Commissaries of the army, vnder color of lodging the Companies, they tooke him prisoner, and from thence hee was led by the Magistrates commendement to Florence, and there publicly beheaded. An ordinary reward for generous minds that subiect themselves to the seruice of a multitude.

A Naples, either came, or sent vnto him; some to congratulate, some to purge themselves from suspicion to haue been more affected to Lodowike then to him, as also to assure their priuate estates. The King receiuing them all graciously, compounded with them according to the qualities of their persons, and the benefit he might reape by them. The Marquis of Mantoua, and the Duke of Ferrara, came in person. The King gaue the Marquis a company of an hundred Lances, and the Order of St. Michel, with an honorable pension. The Ferraris (being in disgrace in Court since the time that he deliuered the castle of Genoua vnto Lodowike) was glad to buy the Kings loue with ready money; Iohn Brunsme sent his sonne Hannibal: the Florentines had some trouble to make their peace. They had offended all the Court, for that fearing to incense Lodowike Sforze, touching the affaires of Pisa, they had held themselves newters betwixt the King and Lodowike. Metecur, the death of Paul Pielli (to whom the Crowne of France was beholding) made the King strange vnto them; and the credit of Trinulce did them harme: who aspiring to the Seigneury of Pisa, was as much desired of the Pisans, to warrant them from the Florentines oppressions; finally, the King had need of money, and the Florentines paying a fine as the rest did, were receiued into grace, vpon condition: To make one answer for their common defence, to take armes in Italy for the King, and the King for them for the recovery of Pisa, and some places held by the Siennois and Liquois: that being repossessed of Pisa, they should furnish the King with five hundred men at armes, and fifty thousand ducats: paying also vnto the King six and thirty thousand Ducats, which Sforze had lent them, adding that which they had disbursed for him.

The Pope also did not forget himselfe, but vrging the performance of the treaty made with the King, obtaines for the Duke of Valentinois (who hauing married the Daughter of the Lord of Albret, had repassed the Alpes with his Maiesty) three hundred Lances in the Kings pay, and four thousand Swisses to be paid by the Pope, to ayde him to make war in Romagna. The King (hauing settled such order as he thought fit for his conquest: and prolonged the truce he had with the Emperor, vntill May following) rooke his way to Lyons, leading with him the Grand-child of Iohn Galeas, whom the mother had vnduly deliuered, him hee made a Monke. Then he receiued newes of a faire daughter that was borne vnto him, which shall hereafter bee witt to Francis the first of that name, and Queene of France. Another accident, but fatal, made that season famous: The fall of our Ladies bridge at Paris, drawing after it the ruine of threescore houses, and a great number of persons (swallowed vp in the river.

This year Italy (beside foraigne and homebred denitions) felt also the Turkes forces. Baxatz Ottoman (being expressly drawne by the perswasions of Lodowike Sforze, hauing no other meane to be reuenged of the Venetians) assailing with a mighty army by Sea, such places as the Venetians held in Greece, he sent sixe thousand horses by land to spoile Friuli, who finding the Countrey without defence, expecting no such guests, did spoile, sacke, and burne all euen vnto Linence: they chained together an infinite number of prisoners, and being come to the riuer of Tagliamento, they refused such as they thought fit to carry with them, and murdered all the rest. In the meane time, the Duke of Valentinois (hauing ioyned the forces of the Church, with those troopes he receiued from the King) took Imola (with ease) in the end of the year. And in the beginning of the next, famous for the celebration of the great Iubile at Rome) Furli. But as hee marched to other townes, the course of his conquests is stayed by vnexpected accidents, bred by diuers motives. The most part of the Lombards could not fit with the French humor, and all were discontented, for that they had not tasted this great bounty of the King, whereby they were promised a generall exemption of all imposts and tributes.

Moreover the Gibelin faction (very mighty in Milan) was wonderfully grieved to see Frinulce (chefe of the Guelfe) preferred to the gouernment: and he by nature sachieus, proud, and stirring, did much increase this bad disposition, fauouring them of his party beyond the bounds of reason: This did greatly estrange the peoples hearts from him. Hee slew with his owne hand some butchers, who according to their common rascallness, refused to pay the ordinary customes, and withstood the receiuers with armes. Doubtlesse, if such as haue the guard of a mighty estate newly conquered, displease both Nobility and People, what may be expected but a generall alteration? Adde therunto the lightnesse of an inconstant multitude, alwaies desirous of innovations: now they lament him whom whom before they hated. Lodowike aduertised of these broyles, strikes while the iron is hot, and without any longer feeding himselfe with the Emperors vaine & frustratoury hopes, he makes sudden leauy of 8000 Suisses, and five hundred men at armes, Bourguignons, by the helpe (but not entertained) of the said Maximilian, and flies to Coma with all speed, the which being abandoned by the French Garison, finding the humor of these habitants inclined to change, gaue him an easie entry.

Triunlee felt this forme comming, and to auoide it, hee demands speedy succours from the Venetians, according to the affociation which they had made with the King, and makes knowne to the Lord of Alegre (who commanded the French troopes, and the Suisses in the Duke of Valentinois army) the necessity which calls him speedily to Milan. The Venetians send Nicholas Earle of Petilliano, to ioyne with Triunlee or Ambigni, and if hee were debarred, to spoile the Milanois Country. The Earle not able to ioyne with Ambigni, spoiles the Country, and then returnes towards the Towne of the riuier of Adda, to prevent any new alteration. Ambigni departs suddenly with the Suisses, and all the horse, obtaining free passage through the Countiees of Parma and Placentia, vpon condition to abstaine from all acts of hostility. And comming neere Tortone, at the perswasion of the Guelles of that Towne, (who had beene expelled the rest that were at Lodowikes deuotion) he enters and sacks the whole towne, Gales and Gibelins, without any distinction: then hee went towards Alexandria, where the Suisses for want of pay, went to Sforzes army.

Suisses revolt.

The losse of Coma hauing stirred vp the people of Milan, and the chiefe of the Gibelin faction, Triunlee leaues within the Castle such forces as the present necessity could furnish: he fortified Nouarre with foure hundred Lances, and puts himselfe with the rest into Mortare, thinking that Lodowike would force it before hee passed, and in the same time, giuing the King aduertisement of this sudden alteration, hee should haue means to stay the enemies proceedings. But it chanced otherwise. Sforzes army, neglecting both Mortare and Nouarre, flies to the most important, and recouers Milan as easily as they had lost it. Pavia and Parma presently set vp Sforzes armes. Loda and Placentia had the like, if the Venetian troopes had not suddenly entred. Alexandria and other places neerer to Ast then to Milan, would not declare themselves, before they had seen the act of this Tragedie. The Genuois refused to returne vnder Lodowikes command, and the Florentines reiekt his request, touching the restitution of money which he had lent them, for the which, they had past their promise vnto the King.

The Marquis of Mantoua sent him his brother, with some men at armes. The Lords of Mirandole, Carpi, Corregio, the Rosses, those of Verme, and Bobie, with other such watercockes, follow the wind that blowes: finally, this new Conqueror finds more affection, and ioy at his returne, then he had left at his departure. Milan being recovered, Lodowike leaues the Cardinall Ascanius his brother before the Castle, and (re-enforced with fiftene hundred men at armes, besides the Bourguignons, and great troopes of foot) he takes Vigeeu by composition: and the Kings succours, not able to come in time, for the defence of Nouarre, they compound to yeeld the town, and to depart with all their baggage. But the Castle (which holds yet for vs) shall shortly be the meanes of Lodowikes ruine. At Triunlees first summon, the King had dispatched the Earle of Ligni, with a good number of foot, and horse. But he found the two commanders, Triunlee and Ambigni so diuided, as if the King had not speedily and wisely prevented this pestilent contention, it had doubtlesse ended with a pitifull and bloody Catastrophe. Ambigni & Triunlee held themselves equal in power and vertue. The first would haue them presently to force Milan: the other would attend about Nouarre the new army which the King leauied in Suifferland. If Ambigni set at liberty any prisoners taken in warre, Triunlee ransomed them. Finally, what the one built, the other pulled downe: and they torned it ted one another with continuall riots.

The King aduertised of this dangerous faction, he sends vnto them Lewis of Bourbon, younger brother to Gilbert, late Vice-roy of Naples, and Iohn of Foix Vicount of Narbonne: but by reason of their young yeares, they were guided by Lewis of Tremouille Lord of Thouars, being accompanied by the Lords of Grauille Admiral of France, Lantier, and many others, followed with fiftene hundred Lances, ten thousand Suisses, five thousand French, and the Cardinall of Amboise, who was Lieutenant for his Maiestie on that side of the Alpes. Tremouille being ariued, treating with these two Commanders, easily drew them (in regard of his Maiesties seruice) to lay aside all rancor, and to become good friends, handling them so wisely, as there appeared no change in their government: but in stead of two, they afterward seemed to bee three heads in one hood. This vnted, they resolute to send some companies of light horse vpon the way to Milan, to cut off the passage to foure hundred horse, and a great number of foot that came from Milan and to prevent Lodowike of all meanes to get vnto Milan if he were prest, and then they turne the force of their army against Lodowike being at Nouarre. There were among the Suisses, that were entertained by Sforzes, many Captaines which had leised in the voyage of Naples, and at Nouarre, who complained of their entertainment, not payed at the appointed time. Tremouille deales with them vnderhand, and vpon promise of a great summe of money, withdraws them from Lodowike.

The Suisses, by the perswasion of their Colonels, begin tumultuously to demand their pay. Lodowike giues them all his plate, and intreats them earnestly to attend the men and money that came from Milan. But fearing, left by the comming of these Milanois, they should be forced to winke at Lodowike and to saile Tremouille, they caused the French army to approach neere to Nouarre, to draw Lodowike to field, who was loth to engage himselfe among men whom hee sees ill affected to him. They are not deceived in their hopes. He goes forth with his army, & puts his light horse to begin the charge. Tremouille makes it good, vntill the Admirall Grauille, and Edmond of Prie ariuing, the Italian troopes giue way, and are put to rout. The Suisses being prest to fight, answer: That they will not fight against their brethren, kinsmen and others of their nation, without leuie from their superiours. And approaching neere the Country-men, making as it were but one army, they protest, that they mean to returne, and so obtaine free passage through the French army. Lodowike compassed in by this nation, could neither by prayers, nor promises, diuert them from their disloyall intent: onely he got a promise, To let him in a place of safety. So they agreed, that disguised and armed like a Suisse on foot, hee should march in their ranks. But going betwixt two great troopes of men at armes, this poore Suisse disguised, is discovered, in one of their battalions, with Galeas of Saint Seuerin, Francasse, and Antonius Maria his brethren, and stayed: the Italians were stript, but the Lanquenets and Bourguignons were sent away without touch, and Lodowike was led prisoner to Lions; where the King remained: and within two daies after was sent to the great Tower at Loches, where he continued captiue about ten yeares, vntill his death. Behold the ambition and aspiring conceits of him, whom all Italy could not containe, now restrained in a straight prison. And to auoide a greater corrausue, he intreats Tremouille that hee might not see Triunlee his enemy: who being aduertised, and halting thither, Sforzes, (saide he with a brauing speech) thou seest the wrongs thou hast done me, are now repayed in the same measure.

Disloyalty of the Suisses.

This happened the Thursday before Palme-Sunday. Doubtlesse the circumstances of Lodowikes Sforzes miseries are remarkable: wherein we may learne; that the diuine Iustice doth alwaies punish offenders, and takes from them at need, both iudgment, courage, wit, and all other faculties. Let vs obserue in this tragedy, that Lodowike being fearefull, promising, praying, fighting, and flying disguised: is mockt, taken, and finally, dies in a most pitifull estate. A Prince excellent in many perfections of nature, industrious, eloquent, of an high and buisie spirit, but infamous for the death of his nephew, couetous, vaine, ambitious, turbulent, proud, trecherous, impious, cruell, paying a Crowne for euery Frenchmans head that his host should murder going to the table. So as it is not strange, if hee hath felt the rigor of Gods Iustice in his owne person.

Lodowikes disposition.

As to fill vp the measure of affliction in his family, the Cardinall Ascanius, vpon the brunt of this defeat, flying from Milan to recouer some place of safety with many Gentlemen of the Gibelin faction, (who hauing affected Lodowike, depaired of pardon) refreshing themselves at Riualte, in the territory of Placentia, Conrad of Lande, Lord of the same place, (his kinsman and ancient friend) sends presently for Charles Prinse, and Sansin Bent on (Captaines vnder the Venetian pay) and trecherously deliueys vnto them the said Cardinall, with Hermes Sforzes, brother to the deceased Duke Iohn Galeas, with most of the Gentlemen in their copany, who presently conueyed them to Venice: but the Senate, at the Kings instant request (who considered how necessary it was for the safety of the state of Milan to haue these men in his power) deliueied both the Cardinall

Baptista Viconti, and Hermes, with all other Milanois that were retired for the same time into the Townes of Guaiardade.

The Cardinal was sent to the great Tower of Bourges, until that having the whole Realme for his prison, he obtained leave, by the intercession of the Cardinal of Amboise, to go to the election of a new Pope, promising upon his oath neuer to attempt anything to prejudice the Crowne: and to be a meane to aduance one of the French Cardinals to Saint Peters chaire. But oh the ingratitude and treachery of this Milanois! the College of Cardinals inclining to choise the cardinal of Amboise, he alone by his faction won the Popedom from the French, to giue it vnto Inisius the second, a Genouois, in the year 1503. Milan being restrained from all meanes of rebelling, lies presently for pardon, in which they obtaine of the Cardinal of Amboise in the Kings name, upon condition to repaire their rebellion, by the payment of three hundred thousand Ducats, whereof his Maiesty did afterwards remit the greatest part.

The rest of the rebelling Cities were euery one taxed, according to their ability. Thus all the Duchy of Milan was quiet: the Swisses were dismissed, who returning to their houses, leize upon Belinzone, a King in that mountaine, the which (not drawne out of their hands, as the King might haue done for a little money) shall hereafter grieve the author of this error, being a most convenient passage to stop the Swisses entry into the Duchy of Milan, and shall giue occasion to liberal tongues, to scold both in publike and private, at the greedinesse of Lewis, whereof these braue Commanders returning into France, had had more cause to complaine, if the Queene had not supplied this defect with that bounty which the King did owe vnto their merits. Doubtlesse he did boundfully repaire those errors, which the King did often commit in that respect. And the King retraying his liberty, within the bonds of frugality, would not seeme bountiful with the oppression of his people.

Now let vs see how the remainder of the yeare was employed. The exceeding pride of a Prince is suspected vnto other great personages, who feare some diminution in their estates. Maximilian considering how the alienation of so goodly a see, was prejudiciall to the Empire, and the blame hee did incurre by suffering Lodowike to be thus spoiled, who had cast himselfe into this protection, hee dismissed the Ambassadors of France and Venice, being ready to proclaime warres against them, as usurping the line of the Empire. With this designe hee acquaints the Princes Electors with the many done to him, to them, and to all the Germane nation, and the apparent danger, lest that too still patience should make the French King seeke to ioyne the Imperiall Crowne vnto his owne, like vnto some of his predecessors. That partly through necessity, and partly through the ambitious desire which the Pope had to aduance his sonne Borgia, Duke of Valentinois, hee would willingly winke at these proceedings. This consideration made the King to put off the warre of Naples vnto the next yeare. But as the forces of Germany moue but heauily, so had hee leisure to assist the Florentines, (who had shewed themselves ready in the recovery of Milan for the King: and discharge the oath made by his Predecessor, and his owne) with 600 Lances maintained by his Maiesty, and fiftie thousand Swisses (but payed by their common-weale) and diuers companies of French, with artillery and munition necessary for the recovery of Pisa, Pietreançe, Montpelian, Mutton, and other places, vnder the command of the Lord of Beaumont, whom they demanded, but ill chosen for them.

To auoyde this storme, the Pisans, Genouois, Siennois, and Luquois, (cauving the Florentines greatnesse) offered the King a hundred thousand Crownes in ready money, to the end the Florentines should not benefit any thing by the recovery of those places so important for their states: promising to pay him fifty thousand Crownes yearly for euer, upon condition that the Pisans should recouer their liberty by his meanes, and the fortresses of Liurone, with all the territory of Pisa. Triunice and Fisques, pledged for the Pisans, shewing how expedient it was for the King to weaken the Florentines, and some other Potentates of Italy: but offering a great sum of money to the king, they discovered their inward greedinesse, to make themselves Lords thereof. Finally the matter was concluded in fauor of the Florentines. And whilst this army remaynes in Lombardy expecting their pay, the King causeth the Lords of Mirandole, Carpi and Civico to pay their fines, who for 30000 Ducats obtayned remission of their rash rebellion.

Milan pardoned by the King.

The King succors the Florentines.

The Marquis of Mantoua, (to auoyd the like censure,) humbly craued pardon. John Bentiuole (having fauored Lodowike as the rest,) payed forty thousand Ducats: and the King by this meanes, tooke both him and the City of Bologna into his protection, whilst that the army (to lose no time) tooke Mont Chiarucolo in the territory of Parma, belonging to the Torelli fauorers of Sforçe: then returning backe, to passe the Appennin, by the way of Postreme, at Fregoses request they spoiled Aubri Malepine Lord of Massa, (with small credit,) and other places, although hee were in the Florentines protection. In the end the Cardinal of Amboise (performing his promises but badly with the Florentines) receiued (for a summe of money) the Luquois into the Kings protection, agreeing, that his Maiesty should hold Pietreançe in guard, until it were decided to whom it did appertaine. The Pisans (being resolved to make a defense war) repaire their fortifications: men, women and children worke with great affection: and to coole the heat of the French comming to their siege, they made knowne the affection they bare to the Crowne of France, by an autentick instrument sent to the Lords of Beaumont and Rausstein Gouvernors for the King at Genoua, who receiued them in the Kings name: and Beaumont (summoning the Towne of Pisa) had for answer, That they desired nothing more then to liue vnder the obedience of his Maiesty, and therefore they yielded vnto the King, upon promise not to deliuer them into the Florentines power. Doubtlesse he was ill practised in politicke and military affaires, to seeke that by force, which hee might haue without toyle or shame.

And was it not a hard thing, to ruine a people which made such shew of tender loue and voluntary obedience to this Crowne: Beaumont camps before Pisa the 29 of Iune: battens it all night, and some part of the day following, beats downe about threefoore sadome of the wall: and mounts to the assault both with foot and horse. But hee discovered not a deepe and large trench, which the Pisans had made betwixt the wall and the rampier within, so as the breadth and depth amazing our men, they remained vpon the breach, rather as spectators of the worke, then hauing any desire to enter. Strangers speake truly, that we are but a brunt, and that being withstood at the first, wee are easily broken. The quality of the rampiers, the oblinacy of the Citizens, their ancient inclination to the French, ingenders such a familiarity, betwixt the besiegers and besieged, as conferring familiarly together, going into the towne of Pisa, and comming our safely as from a friend towne, the souldiers now fall to accusing their Commander of rashnesse, and support the Pisans against their Captaines, so as in stead of assailing them, they themselves encouraged them to defend and suffer Tarlatius (borne at Castello) to enter the towne with some old souldiers, to receiue the command for matters of warre, as hee did euer after, with much honor. This sufferance both of horse and foot, breeds other disorders. They desiring to haue the siege raised, spoiled the victuals that came to the camp: and Beaumonts authority being vnable to stay this insolvency, the Gascons first leaue the army, in tumultuous manner, and giue example to all the rest of the foot. The Swisses likewise found a retreat, and the horse retorne into Lombardy, leaving the Florentines affaires in great confusion and disorder.

The Pisans embrace the opportunity, and with one breath take Libresacta, freeing themselves towards Luques. And the King complaining, that the Florentines had preferred Beaumont before the Lord of Alegre, would haue sent backe his men at armes, to winter about Pisa: that roading vp and downe the Country, they should keepe it, as it were blockt vp; giuing them hope, and promise of a new siege in the Spring. But the Florentines refusing this offer, despairing of any better successe by the French forces, exposed themselves to the common injuries of their ill willers the Genouois, Siennois, Luquois, and all others, who desired their ruine. On the other side, the King considering that the Popes vnion with the Emperor would bee wonderfull prejudiciall vnto his designe for the reuenge of the reuolt at Naples, although hee had some reason of discontent against Alexander, who had nothing assisted him during the warres of Milan: yet his Maiesty shewed himselfe alwayes most tractable to second the Popes continuall designs, in fauor of the Duke of Valentinois, sending vnto him, (vnder the command of the Lord of Alegre) three hundred Lances, and two thousand foot, accompanied with threats, To be reuenged of those that should oppose themselves against the Popes designs, as an injury done to his owne person. And the Pope likewise promised him both his sonnes person, and his men, whensoever hee should recouer Naples. So Borgia (ioyning fixe hundred men at armes, and fixe thousand foot, to the French troopes,) enters Romagna, takes Pefera, Rimini, Brisquille, and runnes without any resistance throughout all the valley, vntill that Faenza layed for a time the violence of this stream. Hee camps before the Towne in Nouember, batters it, makes a reasonable breach, and the fifth day of the siege gaues a fierce assault, so valiantly defended, as the death of Flouore Samelli, and a great number of his men, slaine at the first charge, forced him to found a retreat, and the snow, falling with an exceeding cold, to raise the siege. The former threats had terrified the Potentates of Italy: and the Kings request vnto them in private, made them abandon Romagna. The Venetians renounced the protection of Peter After, Lord of Faenza. John Bentiuole, his vncl, contains himselfe fearing to incense the King, and the Popes forces; and the Duke of Valentinois, could not endure, that an vnwarlike people, (hauing no other head but a yong man of eightene yeares of age) should obscure the fame of his first exploits: hee returns in the beginning of the new yeare, laden with ladders, and seeks to surpris it, but in vaine. Policy not succeeding, hee returns to force, and by the taking of Ruffy, and other places of the Country, hee makes the enterprise easie. A new breach is made, and new assaults giuen: the first without effect, the second gaue hope of victory: but the violence of the Cannon which battered in flanke, the incounting of a deepe and large trench; the death of Ferdinand Farnese, with many other men of worth, and the number of the wounded, makes them to leave the assault. But at length hee carries it. The losse the Faentines had receiued in this assault, and the despaire of succours, cooled this first heat, and feare making them apprehend hard conditions, if force reduced them into the victors power, they treated to yield, their liues and goods saued, vpon condition that After their Lord, should with his liberty choos what retreat he pleased, enjoying the reuenues of his patrimony. But poore After (oh Borgia whoioeuer shall read the detestable life and horrible death of thy father, will alwayes iudge thee a right and worthy sonne of such a father!) being yong and very beautiful, was with goodly shewes & honorable demonstrations of loue retained in the Valentinois Court, and soone after conducted to Rome, where some one (saith the original, naming no man, but noting the villaine with his finger) hauing taken his pleasure of him, and glutted his lust, caused him to be secretly murdered with his bastard brother: and the Pope with the approbation of the Colledge, giues to his sonne Borgia, the investiture and title of Duke of Romagna. This Estate seemed to him imperfect, without the adiunction of the territory of Bolonia. But the Kings expresse commandement, not to attempt any thing against the estate of John Bentiuole (whom he had taken into his protection) caused the Valentinois to content himselfe for that time, with a transaction from Bentiuole, to haue passage and victuals through his Country, a tribute of nine thousand Ducats yearly; a certaine number of horse and foot, and Castle bologne, (a place vnder the iurisdiction of Bolonia) and so he transported his forces into Tuscane. Marke here a notable example of a childe to his father. One of the sonnes of Gilbert Earle of Montpenfer going to Pozzuolo, to visit the sepulcher of his father, suffered himselfe to be so much ouer-ruled with passion, as after hee had bathed all parts of the monument with his lamentable teares, hee fainted, and fell downe dead vpon the Sepulcher, who had as little sense of those his latest sorrowes, as he had feeling of so great an error, to giue such liberty to the rage of nature.

perplexity.

The Florentines are mightily perplexed, they had greatly moued the King by their bad order in the recovery of Pisa, as we haue heard before, but there springs vp new motives of discontent. The exceeding charge they had beene at, and were still forced to beare for the warres of Pisa: the ialousie of the Popes forces and of his Borgia, made them slacke in paying the King the money, which the Duke of Milan had lent them: and the debt which he pretended to be due vnto him by reason of the pay, made by his Maiestie to the Suiffes which he had sent against Pisa, whom he had maintained with his owne money, vpon refusal which the Florentines had made them, vnder color that they would retire into their Country before their time prefixed: and the King (who sought to empty their coffers, to the end he might gouerne them more absolutely) demanded it very earnestly. Moreover, they grew more weak by their owne ciuill discords, which troubled them in the popular government, wherein many of the citizens being suspected, or

Ather as friends to the Medicis, or desiring an other kind of government, matters were managed with more confusion then counsel: and to increase their crosses, the King did press them for the aids and summes of money promised for the voyage of Naples: pretending, That he had performed the conuentions they had made together, whereunto they were bound, seeing that by their owne fault they had hindered the recovery: therefore he was no more bound to protect them. And in truth Julian de Medicis, beseeching him in person, and at the Popes perswasion, to restore him and his brethren into their estates, vpon promises of a great summe of money, he most willingly opened both eares and heart to these offers.

All these considerations drew the Valentinois into Tuscane, with seven hundred men at armes, & fixe thousand choise foot which Bentiuole gaue him, (the French companies lodging apart, to attend the Kings army which began to march): But hee knew that the King would not be pleased with this entrie in hostile manner into the Florentines Country, and that otherwise his Army was both weak of men and munition, to force any Towne.

The Florentines also knowing themselves naked both of horse and foot, others then of the Country, oppressed with ialousie, feare, and diuisions, hee makes this accord with them: That there should be a confederacy betwixt the Common-weale of Florence, and the Duke of Valentinois, with a prohibition not to ayde the Rebels on either side: and that the Florentines should entertaine him for three yeares at their charge, with three hundred men at armes, and fixe and thirty thousand Ducats yearly, which men at armes he should send to them whensoever they had need, either for themselves, or any other, and should not oppose themselves against him for the defence of the Lord of Plombin, who was in their protection. But this composition was onely to disarm the Valentinois, and to send him packing. And hee well informed of the policy, staying in the country, spoiled it in reuenge, both by fire and spoile, most like to an open enemy, tyring them with demands, which partly they refused, partly deferred, hoping that the Kings authority should free them from these bonds, which necessity of the time, and Borgias force had extorted from them. The King indeed, held the word, but stayed his arme: he was pleased the Valentinois should terrifie them, but not tyrannize ouer them. For although he would willingly haue seene some other forme of government at Florence, yet an alteration then, would haue beene very preiudicial vnto him: the King being loath to see the Valentinois advanced to any other authority, or by any other forces then his Maiesties. So, by the commandement of Lewis he leaues Florence, and enters the territory of Plombin, taking Surgeret, Scarline, and the Islands of Elbe and Pianosa, were leauing a sufficient garison, as well to guard the places, as to molest them of Plombin, he returned towards Rome to ioyne with the army that was marching to the conquest of Naples.

Nothing crossed the course thereof, but the alarms which the Emperour had formerly caused. But when one treats with a Prince that is flexible for money, the accord is soone made. The gold of France must now stay the iron of Germany. Philip the Archduke might doe much, he was a Prince inclined to peace (and it may be he died too soone for the good of France, leauing an heire, whose birth and all the course of his life had beene most fatal to the Crowne) and the trafficke of his subjects made them loath to heare speake of war with the French. But that which did most import, the King offered to giue Claude his onely daughter in marriage to Charles, sonne to the said Archduke, and for a dowry, when they should be both of age to consummate the marriage (for neither the one nor the other was yet three yeares old) to giue the Duchy of Milan. So by the means of Philip, & for money, Lewis obtained a prolongation of the truce, in the which the King of Naples was not comprehended, who notwithstanding, by the means of forty thousand ducats, and a bond of fiftene thousand more monthly, purchased a promise from Maximilian: Not to make any accord, but to comprehend him in it, and to make war in the Duchy of Milan, when as neede should require: and when the Kings forces. There yet remained one scruple, Ferdinand King of Arragon and Castile by Isabel his wife, might stir vp the Venetians, and happily the Pope (both prompt enough to oppose ioyntly against the greatness of this Crowne.) He was concurred with our Lewis, in the right of the succession of Naples: for although Alphonso King of Arragon had disposed thereof to Ferdinand his bastard, as his owne proper good: gotten without the rights of the crowne crowne of Arragon: yet Iohn his brother (successor to the Realme of Arragon) and since Ferdinand, sonne to Iohn, had alwaies protested of their lawfull pretensions to the chiefe of Naples, as a good, purchased by Alphonso, with the forces and treasures of Arragon.

And thus Ferdinand King of Arragon temporized like a Spaniard, watching his opportunity to attempt some great matter for his owne benefit, he did not onely make demonstration of all the duties of a good kinsman to Ferdinand King of Naples, and his other successors, but the better to lull him asleepe, he allied himselfe to the Neapolitan King, giving him his sister Lane in marriage, and consenting that Lane her daughter should marrie with young Ferdinand.

The realme of Naples divided betwixt the Kings of France and Arragon.

This concurrence of two Kings in like desire, caused the one to free himselfe from les and crosses, and the other to get a part of that which he could not compasse wholly, and so then to share betwixt them, the conquests of the said realme, vpon condition: That, the King of France should haue the City of Naples, with all belonging to the land of Labour, and the Province of Abruzzo: Ferdinand should for his part haue all the land and territories belonging to Apulia, and likewise to Calabria; agreeing that euery one should conquer his owne part, without any bond to aide one another, but onely not to hurt one another, and that they should doe homage vnto the Pope, Lewis with the title more of King of Sicile, but King of Ierusalem and Naples, imitating the example of Fredericke the second, Emperour of Rome, and King of Naples, by his wife the daughter of Iohn King of Ierusalem (in name but without effect) and of Naples; and Ferdinand in quality of Duke of Apulia and Calabria. The capitulation was no sooner concluded, but the King prepared his army vnder the command of Lewis of Armagnac, Duke of Nemours, sonne to Lane beheaded at Paris vnder Lewis the eleventh, and de Lord Aubigny, an ancient, wife, and well experienced Captaine.

In the which were Francis of Bourbon, Earle of Saint Pol, brother to Charles Earle of Vendosme, sonnes to Francis of Vendosme, who died at Verceil, Lewis of Bourbon, Prince of la Roche-sur-Yon, great Grand-father to the Duke of Montpensier last deceased, Charles of Bourbon, afterwards Duke of Bourbon, and Constable of France, Louis of Bourbon Earle of Montpensier his brother, Gaston of Foix, Vicount of Narbonne, the Kings Nephew, sonne to Iohn Vicount of Narbonne, but by reason of their young yeares, obeying the aboue named Commanders. The troops were a thousand Lances, foure men to a Lance, six thousand French foot, foure thousand Suisses, and the of Valentinois with his forces. The army at Sea, commanded by the Earle of Rasazza, Gouvernour of Genoua, consisted of three Caragues of Genoua and sixteen ships, with many other small Vessells, with many footmen, so as they esteemed their footmen more twenty thousand: who by the Popes fauour and Borgias his sons, passed through all Italy without any resistance.

Fredericke King of Naples, had not yet discovered the secret convention of the two Kings, who proceeding plainly, did solicit Gonsalve (who lay at anchor in Sicile, under colour to succour him) to come to Caiete: and very simply put some places in Calabria into his hands, as he demanded: but this was but to make the conquest of Ferdinand portion the more easie. So hoping (that Gonsalve, hauing ioyned with his army) he should haue sufficient forces to withstand the French; he went and camped at Saint Germaine with seven hundred men at armes, six hundred light horse, and six thousand foot, with the troops which the Colonis brought vnto him, hauing likewise sent his eldest sonne Ferdinand to Tarentum, to commit the Prince of Bisignan, and the Earle of Melere to prison, accused to haue intelligence with the Earle of Caiazzo, who was in the French army: the which being come neare vnto Rome, the Ambassadors of France and Spaine giue notice vnto the Pope of this diuision made betwixt their Masters, with an intent Afterwards (say they) to make warre against the enemies of Christian religion: and according to the tenour of this agreement, they demand a league, the which was presently granted. Doubtlesse the more we seek to shadow and colour an iniustice with goodly shewes, the greater it appears.

Behold the designs of two Kings, discovered and laid open to all the world, and both jointly blamed. Ours, for that he had rather draw a corruall into Italy, to whom his enemies and ill-willers might flee, then to leane the full possession vnto Fredericke, offering (as wee haue

A haue said) to hold the Realme of him, and to pay him a yearly tribute. The other, for that, desire to haue a part of the Realme, had made him to conspire against a King of his owne blood, whom (the more easly to ruine) he had alwaies entertained with lying promises of fauours, blamishing the glory of that noble title of Catholike King, which hee and his wife Isabel had lately obtained. This league amazed Fredericke, but more the generall mutinie, whereby Saint Germaine and the neighbour places had rebelled at the brate of the French forces, euen before that Aubigny departed from Rome: so as in stead of keeping the field, as he had pretended, he shuts himselfe vp, meaning to defend his townes: Capoua was the first place of defence that hee made choice of, and did fortifie it with three hundred men at armes, some light horse and three thousand foot, vnder the command of Fabrizio Colonne, and Rainucio of Marziane: and leaving Prosper Colonne for the guard of Naples, helogged in Auerfe. Fabrizio had caused the messengers of some Neapolitan Barons of the French faction to be murdered at Rome, being sent to treat with him touching an accord for their masters: and see now, these murderers are reuenged, if not vpon the person, at the least vpon the authors goods: Aubigny in passing, burnes Marise, Cami, and certaine other places belonging to their house: then drawing towards Montfortin, hee findes that Iulius Colonne had shamefully abandoned it, leauing by the same means, all the other Townes about Capoua, euen vnto Vulturno, at the Victors discretion.

Rebellion in the state of Naples.

C Fredericke aduertised that Aubigny had passed Vulturno, leauing Auerfe, hee retired into Naples. Auerfe, Nalo, and other places, yielding vnto the French, prepared thea the way to Capoua, the which inuested on either side the riuer, and battered furiously on all parts, endures a hot assault, and repells them with great losse, the Cannon shakes the strongest walles, and the rough assaults amaze the most resolute; they renew the battery, and all prepares to a second assault. The people mutined, the Captaines and souldiers fainted, and Fabrizio Colonne parted from a baskin with the Earle of Caiazzo, when as our men, grieved with the first affront, force the breach, overthrow the defences, enter it, kill all they meet in the fury, ran some such as they finde after their fury past, and sacke the townes. A happy victory, if the horrible infoleny and licentiousnesse of the Victors had not defamed it. Many women, maidens, and Nuns, to auoid this first fury, were retired into a tower. Borgia would see them, and chose out forty of the fairest, the rest serued as a prey for the souldiers lust, who after sold a part of them at Rome. Fabrizio seeing the towne taken, fled away speedily, but some galloping after, brought him backed prisoner to the Campe. Don Hugues of Cardonne, and all the other Captaines and men of quality saued their liues by ranfome. Rainucio of Marziane being hurt at the assault, died in the Duke of Valentinois mens hands.

The lamentable taking of Capoua.

Capoua being lost, it made them lose all hope euer to defend any place: Caiete yeelds presently, Auerfe opens her gates. Naples compounds suddenly for threecore thousand crownes, payable to the Victors. And Fredericke being shut vp into Castle-Neuo, compounds with Aubigny; "To deliuer into his hands within six daies all the townes and forts which were of the Kings portion, onely reseruing the life of Licia for six moneths, during the which it should be lawfull for him to goe whither he pleased, but not into the realme of Naples: To draw what he would out of the Castles of Naples, except the artillery of King Charles which remained there: That all offences should be pardoned which had beene committed since the first conquest of the Realme by Charles: & that the Cardinals, Colonne, and of Arragon, should enioy the spiritual liuings they possessed within the Realme.

Thus Fredericke detesting the treachery of the Arragonois, and desiring rather to flee vnto the Kings protection, he came into France to accept what his Maiesty should giue him: which was the Duchy of Aniou, with thirty thousand crownes of yearly pension. An ill aduised resolution, for keeping himselfe in some place of safety, happily he might (during the partialities which shall soeue grow betwixt Lewis and Ferdinand) haue found means to recouer his realme, yet was hee happy in his misery, changing a crowne of thornes, a state full of troubles, to a quiet life, and yet honourable: for euen after the French were expelled Naples; hee was still maintained in the same honour, and in the same estate, by the Kings great loue and bounty.

Gonsalve at the same time conquered the portion for his Master, and although all the Country

Gonsalve exploits.

Country did more affect the French command, yet having no man to receive them in his name, nor to defend them, all the townes did willingly submit themselves unto him, except Manfredonia and Tarentum, the which after some shew of resistance, did in the end undergoe the Castilian yoke. Ferdinand, eldest Sonne to Fredericke, was at Tarentum, with secret commandement from his father not to come into France, though he should be forced to strike saile. But seeing that both were wholly spoiled of their choice, and that our Lewis did nourish the Father, the Castilian might well entertaine the Son. Gonsalve sends him vnto him, against his solemne oath taken at the receiving of the command, To leave him at his liberty: but some nation preferres the interest of state, before the feare of God and the respect of his owne reputation.

The conquest of Naples had made the Valentino returne to his enterprize of Plombin, and James Appia Lord of the Towne, having manned it with a sufficient Garde, came vnto the King, who long before had taken him into his protection. But whilest he did sollicite in Court for the preferuation of his estate (though without any hope of success), by reason of the Kings promises made vnto the Pope, Not to hinder him in his signet. Pandolfo Petruccio deliuered vp the towne to the Valentino, who by the vicinity of the Apostolike Sea, and the support he had from the King, made it well knowne in Italy that his excessive courtesie had no restraint nor bounds. In the meane time the King treats a peace with the Emperour very effectually. Many reasons moued him thereunto: the desire to obtaine the possession of Milan: to offend the Venetians, who (the prosperity of this realme being very offensive vnto them) did vnder-hand hinder the conclusion of this peace, and to recouer Cremona, with Gnaredade, at the great instance of the Milanois, with Brescia, Bergamo and Crema, the ancient appurtenances of the Duchy of Milan, and vsurped by the Venetians, in the time of Philip Maria Visconti.

For this treaty the Cardinall of Amboise, Lieutenant Generall for his Maiesty at Milan, went to the Emperour to Trent, where first they treated of the marriage of Charles the eldest sonne to the Archduke Philip, with Claude, the onely daughter of Lewis, the Emperour granting to either of them, the inuestiture of Milan, but not to the Kings heire males, in case he had any: to recouer whatsoever either of them pretended to haue been vsurped by the Venetians: to call a generall Councell to reforme the Church, not only (say they) in the members, but euén in the head. Doubtlesse there is small assurance the loue of Princes, who gaze after nothing but their owne greatnesse. Moreover, we euer see any thing succeed well with them who haue coloured their passions with the name of the Church, and the reformation thereof? This is directly, To take the name of God in vaine. And likewise all the malicious practises and schoole-trickes of a Cardinall (whose ambitious spirit gaped after a Popedom) what could they bring forth but strife for France, and combustion for Italy? Truly the reading of Histories doth teach vs, That the politike government of Priests is unfortunate and fassall.

This treaty, hauing onely in shew made way for a peace, was ended with a promulgation of a truce, giuing hope, that these things treated on should soone take effect. This opinion was confirmed by the coming of the Archduke Philip, with his wife (daughter to Ferdinand King of Arragon, and Isabell Queene of Castile) who as appointed to the succession, meaning to goe and receive the oath of fidelity of their subiects, they passed through Paris the five and twentieth day of Nouember, and from thence to Blois, where the King and Queene remained: and there they concluded the marriage of their children: but man purpoeth, and God disposeth.

For with the new yeere, the Emperour brought forth new designs, refusing Italy the inuestiture of the Duchy of Milan to the King, and treating with the potentates of Italy touching his passage to Rome, to receive the Imperial crowne, he found the Florentines tractable to the articles which he propounded, considering the hard conditions the King demanded, seeming to be wholly estranged from them, saying that he was acquit of the articles accorded at Milan, and they remained still bound. Thus Hermes Sforze Ambassadors for Maximilian at Florence, had obtained a promise of the common-weale, to take him in his voyage with a hundred men at armes, and thirty thousand ducats, when as he should be entred into Italy. But the King, fearing lest the Florentines despairing of his loue, should make some accord with Maximilian, in the end he made a new agreement with them, vpon milde conditions: That the King (rectifying them againe into his protection)

As he should defend them against all men, with his owne force and charge for three yeeres following, during the which they should pay unto his Maiesty forty thousand ducats yearly, and it should be lawfull for the Florentines to be practised by force against the Pisians, or against any other that withheld their place. The Pisians are againe abandoned to the Spains, and the Florentines are resolved to vanquish by a generall waite (the ore-runner of famine) that place which they had inuainely tried to subdue by the sword. This passed in Tuscane, when as no man perceived what followed these garboles.

But two Nations of such contrary humors, could they liue to neare neighbours, but great feedes of dislike should bring forth fruits of diuision? There suddenly growes great controuersies betwixt our French and the Castilians for these confessions, and why doe we not vte a graue deliberation in our counsells, to make them to stoppe at nothing may infringe them? Alphonso of Arragon King of Naples, the first of that name, had (to make collection of his reuennues the more easie) diuided the realme of Naples into six principall Prouinces, the land of Labour, the Principality, Bazilicate, Calabria, Apulia, and Abruzzo: whereof Apulia was sub-diuided into three parts; the land of Otrante, Rari, and the Capitanate loyning to Abruzzo, and separated from the rest of Apulia by the river of Lofante (otherwise called Laufade). Seeing then that in the diuision, Abruzzo was fallen to the French, had they not reason to dispute the possession, the said Capitanate being rather a portion of Abruzzo, then of Apulia? and the matter of greatest importance was, that not inioyning the Capitanate, they lost the reuennue growing of the countie of Catell, being one of the clearest of the realme.

Moreover, the Capitanate is a corne Country, and might easily in a time of dearth furnish the land of Labour and Abruzzo, whensoever the Spaniards should forbid the traffike of graine from Apulia and Sicilia. Hereupon either part drew what he could out of the remuances of this custome, feeding still their contentions with new mooues. The Spaniards maintained, that the Principality and Bazilicate were comprehended in Calabria, which is diuided into two; the hither, and the farther; one high, and the other low, and that the valley of Beneuent, possessed by the French was a portion of Apulia. And therefore Gonsalve chailed the French Magistrates out of Tripaldi, and sent others to administer iustice vnder the command and authority of Ferdinand. All things tended to open diuision. But let vs not flatter our selues. Was it not reason, that they which had deposed others, should afterwards consume themselves? The chiefe Barons of the Countie, desiring to quench these first fire-brands of discord, did mediate an enterview betwixt the Viceroy Neumors, and Gonsalve, who agreed to enjoy those places in common, that were in controuersie, and in the meane time set vp the banners of the two Kings, expecting what what they should determine.

The Viceroy was hot and vehement, and could not endure a brauadoe, Gonsalve (of whom the Spanish and Italian Authors make no lesse account, then of a Furius Camillus, a P. Scipio, or a C. Caesar) had doubtlesse goodly parts of a Captaine. Braue in armes, vigilant, industrious, patient in travell, stately, prodigall, liberrall, not voluptuous, and man of a strong and vigorous complexion. He sometimes by liberality, sometimes by intirance, gaue liberty to his souldiers; then againe would restraîne their insolency impatiently, within the bounds of duty; he loued and honoured men of Valour, and very ingeniously did fit himselfe to occurrents, iudging of things to come with a good natural discourse, by the comparison of the present, and what was passed, neuer grounding his designs vpon any vncertainty. But all these goodly vertues were blemished with a perpetual dissimulation and treachery, no feare of God, no loyalty, where hee felt any point, being accustomed to say, That a braue souldier must grosly weane the web of his honour.

As Gonsalve then (following the instructions and letters of Ferdinand, who already in imagination had deuoured the whole realme of Naples) had fowed the seeds of warre on Alides, the Viceroy protests by a publicke declaration, that he will make war against Gonsalve, if he speedily depart not out of the Capitanate. And seeing the King of Spain required not to leaue the possession, he enters Tripaldi by force, the nineteenth of Iune, and consequently the other townes which Gonsalve held in that Countie. They are now embarked in war, and the King is at Lions, to provide necessary things, more commodiously to crosse the vniuert practices of his aduersary. Vpon this designe he sends two thousand land Suiffes by sea to supply his men, and entertains the Princes of Salerno and Brindisi, with an intent to passe into Italy if need required.

New broyles in Italy:

Then the tumults which Piselloze (impairer of the death of his brother Paul) beheaded at Florence, as we have said, did raise in Tuscane, drew him thither. They were gon by the revolt of Arezzo against the Florentines, at the persuasion of the said Piselloze, of the Prins, John Paul Bailion, and Andreas Petruccio, and others which desired the returne of Peter of Medici into the state of Florence. The Florentines protesting themselves with their new league with the King, flie to him, accuse the Pope and the Duke Valentinois, to be the Authors of these stirs: found forth the imminent danger of the Duchy of Milan, if the aboue named (vnited and conuited to ruine their estate) should inuade their power.

Johns succours the Florentines

The King had beene long tired with the insolvency and ambition of the Pope and his sonne. Hee did foresee that the intrigues of accord being broken with Maximilian, the Venetians would loose crosse him, and that hauing open war with the Spaniards, the vading of Tuscane, done by the secret practices of others, would proue very preiudiciall vnto him. And therefore he sent four hundred Lances to succour the Florentines in commandement to Vittelloze and his adherents. Not to molest those any more which had receiued into his protection, the which hee declared to all those that should incurre his indignation. In the meane time the Duke of Valentinois vpon the coming of Arezzo, went out of Rome with his army, and vnder a false pretext to take Castell (hauing before to weaken Guilddobald Duke of Vrbin, drawne men and artillery from his leapes into that Duchy, and takes all his estate without any opposition, except the Duke of Saine Leon, and Mauiolo, to the great discontent and amazement of Piselloze, the Prins, and Petruccio, who by anothers ruine began plainly to discouer their own. This conquest had made the Valentinois to assaile the Florentines, if the commandment made him from the King, or rather the committing of his Maiesty had not diuerted him. Camerina was the object of his armes. He tooke it, and with a barbarous inhumanity caused Salus of Varane Lord of the said place, to be strangled with his two sonnes. The King arises at All, and Lewis of Tremouille comes into Tuscane with two hundred Lances, three thousand Suiffes, and great store of artillery, for the recovery of Arezzo in uenue of the Florentines.

The Duke of Valentinois his enuie.

The Pope with his Borgia, foreseeing that the King (being incensed against them, as the chiefe motives of this war) would spoile Borgia of Romagna, & other places which he possessed, and that they were too weak to withstand this storme, they returne to their accustomed practices, imputing the rebellion of Arezzo to Vittelloze, and his adherents, whom they could not (say they) neither by prayers nor authority diuert from this enterprise. And to pacifie the King the Valentinois sent word to Vittelloze, that if hee did giue vp Arezzo and other places belonging to the Florentines, hee would call him to by force. Vittelloze was ready to beare the whole burthen, but by what meanes considering the weaknes of his forces, and that the strongest were ready reconcile themselves, and to leave him in the miew: he therefore makes no delay but conuies Arezzo and the other Florentine towncs, which the violence of his forces had put into his power, to Saint Souin, Chastillon a Arezzo, Cortone, and the rest of Valdichiane: all which were presently by the Kings commandment restored to the Florentines. The affaires of this world require euery man to shroud himselfe vnder the strongest. The King hath no sooner set foot into Italy, but all the Princes and Common-weales (according to their accustomed manner) flie vnto him, some to get pardon, some to maintaine their estates, and all in generally to draw his Maiesties forces against the Pope and his sonne. But doth it not commonly fall out, that what many desire succeeds but seldom? Their private importunities and respects, are most commonly contrary to their outward shewes and desires. So the King, not so much moued by the Popes exact diligence (who by all meanes and measures sought to pacifie him, and to returne againe into fauour) as by the Cardinal of Amboise's persuasion (who to entertaine the Pope in vnion with the King, presumed to raise himselfe a ladder to mount vnto the Popedomme, and to aduance some one of his house to be Cardinal) he happily followed of two waies the world, fauouring the Pope and his followers. The wise reader may iudge thereof by the euent of the history.

Another alliance betwix the King and Pope.

True it is, the Emperours was a chiefe motive to draw our Lewis to this accord. His in-gers itched, he could not be quiet: and vnder colour of his passage (which hee did so much affect) to receiue his Imperiall Crowne of the Pope, he might happily trouble the state of Italy, to the Kings great preiudice; and indeed he had already sent many horse and foot to Trent, making great offers to the Pope in fauour of this passage. Moreover, the King was not ignorant how vnwillingly the Venetians did see the state of Milan and the realme of Naples in his hands. Adding thereunto, the Imperious threats which foure Cantons of the Suiffes made. That if the King did not yeeld them the rights hee had to Bellinzane, and giue them Volterre, Schafonze, with other outrageous demands, they would compound with Maximilian. But to add more crosses, he must dispute the conquest of Naples by the sword. All these considerations made our Lewis desirous to entertaine the Popes friendship, whereby Maximilians designs were suddenly disappointed. So the King (hauing more liberty to prouide for the estate of Naples) sent a fresh supply by Sea of two thousand Suiffes, and ten thousand French, the which ioyned to the Viceroy, who had already taken all the Capitanate, except Manfredonia and Saint Angelo. They camped before Canole, the which Peter of Nauarre yeelded by composition, to depart with bag and baggage. The taking of this place did shut Genoa into Barlet, without moneys, with little victuals, and lesse munition. And the French Captaines alledging (against the aduice of the Lord of Aubigni) that the army could not all campe about Barlette for want of water, and many other reasons, they refused, a part of the army should remaine thereabouts, to maintaine a kinde of siege, and the other should seeke to recouer the rest of the realme. After this counsell, the Viceroy seized vpon all Apulia, except Tarentum, Otranto, and Gallipoli: and then he returned to Barlet. The Lord of Aubigni entering Calabria with the other part of the Army, tooke and sackt the Towne of Cosenza, with some other places.

The Suiffes braue the King.

The exploits of the French in the Kingdom of Naples.

But our prosperity lasts not long, wee commonly sleepe in the midst of our course. This happy beginning made our Lewis more carelesse then the cause required, the which if he had continued, he might easily haue expelled the enemy (before hee had beene supplied out of all the State of Naples: but hee took his way for France, after hee had treated anew with the Pope, and receiued the Valentinois into fauour againe, vpon condition, To aide him in the wars of Naples, when neede should require: and a promise from the King, to giue the Valentinois three hundred Lances, to helpe him to conquer Bologna for the Church, and to suppress the Vrins, Bailion, and Vittelloze, against whom the King was wonderfully incensed for the outrages they had done to the Florentines, and for that they had shewed themselves too slacke in the execution of his Maiesties commandments, especially Vittelloze, who had refused to yeeld the Florentines the artillery, which hee had taken from Arezzo.

This reconciliation made the Valentinois fearefull to all Italy. And doubtlesse who soeuer is neighbour to a cruell and inexorable man, hath neede to stand vpon his guard. Moreover, a wicked man hauing so firme & strong supports in the Kings Council (where the Cardinal of Amboise ruled all) how could he but daily presume to commit new iniuries: The Venetians were wonderfull ialous of Borgias greatness, increasing daily, hewing the King by their Ambassadour, how much it did derogate from the honour of the house of France, and the glorious surname of most Christian King, to fauour a Tyrant, borne for the ruine of people, and the desolation of Prouinces; disloyall, cruell, thirsting for humane blood, by whom so many Gentlemen and Noblemen had bene treacherously slaine: who sometimes by the sword, sometimes by poison, gleited his vpon vpon his allies, his kinsmen, his brethren, and vpon them, whose age euen the barbarous Turkes would haue respected.

But the King did not build so much vpon the Popes friendship, as hee doubted his hatred. Moreover, he thought (being firmly vnited to him) no man should dare to attempt any thing against the authority of his crowne in the estates of Milan and Naples. The Kings answer was, That hee neither would nor ought to hinder the Pope from disposing as his pleasure, of places belonging to the Church. The Venetians therefore forbearing to crosse the prosperity of the Valentinois, for his Maiesties respect: beheld many fine brookes ioyned together, make a brauue. The Prins, the Duke of Graining, Vittelloze, John Paul Bailion, Lionel of Ferris, Hermes for John Demetrio his father, Anthony for the Signois, with many other heads, make an offensive, and a defence due league; by means whereof, and by the surpris of the Castle of Saint Leon, exdobald recovered all his Duchy of Vrbini. They goe to field with seven hundred men armes, and nine thousand foot, but they displeas the King, arming themselves with his authority, hoping (it may be) that he would not bee discontented to haue the Valentinois molested by another.

The Valentinois flies to the King, and speedily prouides for conuenient remedies he pacifieth the Cardinall Vrsin, by the means of Intini his brother, and by diuers policies did so cunningly practice, first one, then another of the confederates (confused and troubled with the succours, which the King gaue commandement to the Lord of Chammont to send to Borgia, with expresse charge to countenance his affairs by all means) that the first which was taken in the snare, was Paul Vrsin, whom he held to be a fit instrument to dispose of his companions, and to draw them innocently into danger. But what did these poore Commanders, capitulating with a wicked wretch, whose sweet words were snares for their death, and who must shortly serue as an instrument of Gods iudgment against them. Truly whilst they employ the forces (which they had leauied to supplehim) in his fauour, for the taking of some places, and that they suffer themselves to be led asleepe with his goodly shewes, and sweet speeches, he prepares for their ruine. After they had by his commandement taken the towne and Castle of Sinigalle: he cometh ther the next day, with all his companies in order: he causeth them to be taken prisoner, strips their troops: and to make the last day of this year famous, he strangles Pittello, and Linerot of Fermo, the first must follow the miserable course of his house, all his ther brethren (and according to the order of their ages) being dead of violent death.
John was slaine with a Cannon before Ofime, vnder Pope Innocent, Canillo with a staffe before Circelle, Paul was beheaded at Florence, and Linerot felt in his person, therefor whereby he had in a banker treacherously murdered John Frangiane his Vncle, with many Citizens of Fermo, to vlturpe the Seigneury thereof.

Now wee shall see a yearefull of memorable and famous accidents, begun with the Popes impiety and treachery, but hee was ignorant what should presently befall his owne person and state. Being aduertised of his sonnes exploits at Sinigalle, he calleth Cardinall of Vrsin to the Vatican: who (trusting in his faith, whom all the world knew to be faithlesse) was lately come to Rome. Being arriued, he is taken prisoner, and with him Rainold Vrsin Archbishop of Florence, the Protonotaire Vrsin, and the Abbot of Aluiano, brother to Bartholomew and James of Saint Croix a Roman Gentleman, whom some few daies after hee caused to bee deliuered vpon a good caution: but the Cardinall ended his daies there by poyson: and the Valentinois hearing that the Cardinall was prisoner, hee caused the Duke of Graiue, and Paul Vrsin to be strangled. Then he approached to Siena, meaning to seize thereon vnder colour to expell Pandolfo Peruzzi, as an enemy and disturber of the quiet of Tuscane, promising, that when hee had chased him, hee would presently returne with all his troops to Rome without endamaging their territories.

The Sienois thinking it no reason, that the whole city should incur so great danger to maintaine the power of one priuate Citizen, and Pandolfo desiring rather to accept that with euery mans good liking, which in the end the peoples hatred and the perill of his person would force him vnto, parted out of Siena, leauing the same guard and the authority with his friends, so as his departure bred no alteration in the government. This enterprize displeased the King, for although he were not sorry to see Pittello, ze and his adherents punished, yet desired hee not their total ruine, the which with the conquest of so great estates made the Pope and his Borgia too mighty. He desired therefore from this attempt, not so much to obey the King, as finding the taking of Siena difficult, being a great towne and strong: conuerting all his forces to the total destruction of the house of Vrsins, John, Intini, Francis, Adrian and Organtini, who having toyed with the Saueili were in Ceruete, and had taken the bridge of Lamerane, and fortified all the Country.

When hee had restrained their courses, hee invaded the possessions of John, Intini, was then in the Kings protection and pay, bearing armes for his seruice at Naples. The King was greatly moued herewith, and to comouele the presumption and insolency of the Valentinois, hee commands him to forbear to molest the estate of Intini, & to returne his excessive

A excessive couetousnesse, hee procures an vnion betwixt the Florentines, Siennois, and Bo-lognois for their common defence, to take from the Pope and his sonne, all means to extend themselves any farther into Tuscane. The Spaniard fortifies himselfe in the mean time in the realmes of Naples, and our affaires decline. The Earle of Meier, the Princes of Salerno and Bisignan, were incamped at Villanoua, and Don Hughes of Cardone (passing from Messina into Calabria, with a thousand six hundred foot, Spaniards, Calabrians, and Sicilians, and an hundred men at armes) marched to succour it, going through a narrow plaine betwixt a mountaine and a little river, ioyning to the way with a caufey, desiring rather to enter into Villanoua, then to fight. The Earle encountered them beneath the river, and not able to draw them into the plaine, hee passeth the water to cut off their way to Villanoua, and to charge them. But very indirectly, for being troubled with the caufey, they were easily defeated and the towne relieved. And behold, Menes of Benauide (having Anthony de Leua with him, who of a simple souldier became a brave Captaine, and shall win many victories) leading two hundred men at armes, two hundred Genetaires, and two thousand foot, takes Losarce at the second assault, where the Lord of Ambriecourt was lately entred with thirty Lances, and the Earle of Melete with 1000 foot. Ambriecourt was taken, but the Lord of Aubigni, approaching with three hundred Lances, and five thousand foot, forced the victors to retire to Villanoua, and gaue the Earle means to saue himselfe and to keepe the Castle. Aubigni following them in the Cayle to the foot of a high mountaine, cut off threecore men at armes and some 1000 foot, with thirteene hundred prisoners, taking 15 Ensignes. But this was with the death of Griqui, a braue Captaine, who led the company of the Earle of Caiazzo, being dead of sicknesse a little after the taking of Capoua. At the same time Poria Carrera brought two hundred men at armes, two hundred light horse, and two thousand foot, who dying at Rhegium, left the command of his troops to Ferdinand Andrada his Lieutenant.

Few daies after, Gaspaloe departing from Barlette, set vpon the Lord of Palisse, who lodged in Rubos with a hundred Launces, and three hundred foot, as securely as in an affured place, and hauing surprisid him suddenly, battered it furiously & made a breach:
he forced him to yeeld the place, and to remaine prisoner with his troops, and then he returned lately to Barlette, notwithstanding the Duke of Nemours Companies lodged for their safe in diuers places about Barlette, whilst Gaspaloe endured (with an admirable patience) both hunger and pestilence within the same City. Moreover, fifty French Lances sent to surprize some money which was brought from Tran to Barlette, were defeated by such as Gaspaloe had sent for the conduct thereof. All these petty losses were without doubt fore-tellings of a change of our good fortune. But what need was there in the beginning of this so visible a Catastrophe, to hazard a fruitlesse combate, for falling to our disadvantage, it must needs greatly diminish our reputation, and make the whole nation to be scorned, although the honour and valour of a whole Country consists not in the combate a few priuate persons? A trumpet returning from Barlette (where hee had breached of the ransom of some prisoners) reports some speeches which hee had heard to the preiudice of the French: who offended therewith, they desire the Spaniards and Italians. Thirteene French, make offer to fight with thirteene of theirs. The field was chose betwixt Barlette, Andrie, and Quarate. It chanced that hauing broken their Lances, with no advantage to either party, falling to their other armes, a French man overthrew an Italian, and aduancing to kill him, hee himselfe was slaine by an other Italian that came to rescue his companion. In the end, after a rough and bloody fight of some houres, the Italians (having slaine many of the Frenchmens horses) remained masters of the field and bodies, leading their enemies prisoners to Barlette.

Whilst a State stands firme, euery one feares to attempt against it, but vpon the first disfauour euery one seeks to pull a plume. Some Cantons of the Suisse, seeing themselves troubled with water, and to obtaine by force what they could not get by fauour: which was Bellinzona, the which they had surprisid in Lombardy. To this end they come before Locarne, camping towards the wall, vpon that great lake which flops the descent from the mountaine into the plaine: and the other Cantons seeing the enterprize succeed well in fauour of the first assailants, runne to aide their companions, to the number of three thousand. There were too many mouths in a straight and barren Country, where they must looke faim, for want of Artillery, Victuals, Money, and Horse.

Troubles by the Suisse.

The Lord of Chaumont did wisely foresee all this, who furnishing his Castles vpon the mountains, and keeping his troops in the plaine, kept this great swarme from coming into open places; whilst that hee assembled all the forces of Lombardie, and the allies of Bologna, Ferrara, and Montoua. The Venetians (being required to send the succours which they were bound vnto for the defence of the State of Milan) sent some companies, but so late as they were vnprofitable. Thus the Swisses wanting victuals, the French hauing sunke many Barks which brought them prouision vpon the Lake, and the Swisses themselves beginning to be diuided, for that the whole gaine of their armes redounded to them alone that possessed Bellinzone, they retired in the end, vpon condition to deliuer what they had taken of the Kings, except Musocque, as not belonging to the Duke of Milan, and Bellinzone at a certaine time.

A counterfeite peace with the Spaniards.

Thus ended this great shew, and Philip Archduke of Austria, returning from his voyage, armed with authority from his Father in law, and Mother in Law, to make a peace with the King, it was concluded at Blois: That the Realme of Naples should be enioyned according to the first diuision; but Philip should keepe those Provinces, for the which they had taken armes, That from that day Charles his sonne, and Claude the Kings daughter should be called themselves Kings of Naples, and Dukes of Apulia and Calabria: and both the Kingdoms should be gouerned in the name of the two Children, untill the consummation of the marriage: when as the King should giue his part for his daughters dowry. This peace was of a happy consequence. Armes were laid aside betwixt two mighty Kings. It bred loue betwixt the Emperour and our Lewis; and new designs against the Venetians, whom the King desired to annoy: and it may be the Pope (being hated of all the world) had been forced to vndergoe a Councell, a matter which he feared exceedingly. Doubtlesse there is alwaies an Antipathy betwixt bad Popes and good Councells. But this peace was counterfeited by the Spaniards: yet it seemes not that Philip proceeded therein like a Father, considering his quiet spirit, and the alliance he made with this Crowne. Lewis and this sent presently to proclaime it at Naples, and to command the Capitaines That attending the King of Spaines ratification, and holding what they did possess, they should abstaine from all acts of hostility. The Viceroy surceaseth: but Gonfalue had his watch-word, howe durst he disobey Philip? Gonfalue answered, That until he had received commandment from his King and Queene, he might not lay down his armes. He grew the prouder for that the King trusting in this peace, had neglected things necessary for wars, and kept backe three thousand foot which should haue beene imbarcked at Genoua, and three hundred Lances leauiued to that end, vnder the Lord of Perfi: contrariwise, Gonfalue was newly reinforced by two thousand Lansquenets, which the Venetians (against the articles of their accord made with the King) had suffered safely to passe by their Gulph. The Viceroy (foreseeing that he must stand vpon his guard) sends for all the French companies which hee had dispersed into diuers parts, and the forces of the country, except those which made war in Calabria vnder Aubigni, but in the assembling thereof, he gaue the first blow to the ruine of the French in the realme of Naples. The Duke of Arri and Lewis of Ars, a French Captaine, were ioyned together to goe vnto the Viceroy, knowing well that Peter of Nauarre was so lodged, as he might endamage them being diuided. Lewis of Ars finding his opportunity, passed without attending his companion, and the Duke advertised that the Nauarrois had taken the way of Matero, to ioine with Gonfalue following the tracke of Lewis of Ars. But it chanced at the same time that Rutilliane, (a towne in the Countrey of Bari) being reuolted, had called backe the Nauarrois, who being vpon this occasion turned from Matero to Rutilliane, encountered the D. of Arri, charged him, and defeated him, John Anthony his Vncle being slaine, and himselfe prisoner.

And to increase these mischieties, Prician Pringinala knight of Rhodes, was come into the haue of Otranto with foure French Gallies, with promise from the Venetian Magistrate, not to suffer them to be molested by the Spanish Fleet, which haued heard abouts: who entering soone after into the same Port, Prician (to the end his loss should not benefit the enemies) freed his Gallies, sinckes his Gallies, and saues himselfe by land with his people: another injury which shall greatly inuense our Lewis against the Venetians. Hereafter all things fall out opposite for our men: but see, their violent rage makes them run headlong to their total ruine: Calabria is the meane. They had commandment from the King to temporize, and onely to keep themselves from surpris-

A expecting either a confirmation the peace, or some greater succours. But what meanes is there to temper the furious courage of the French, the enemies lying so neare them? Manuel of Benauide hauing repaired his army, and fortified it with five thousand men, which Ferdinand had sent him, was ioyned vnto Iohn of Cardone, and the two armies approached within a leaguer and a halfe. Aubigni within Gioie, the Spaniards at Seminara. Aubigni was fortified with foure peeces of Cannon vpon the riuier side, whereas Gioie is feared, to hinder the enemies passage: the Spaniards being resolute to passe, they caused their fore-ward (led by Manuel Benauide) to march on directly to the riuier to entertaine Aubigni, who was planted on the other side, vnder colour of some parle, whilst the barrell and the reere-ward passed a mile and a halfe aboute Gioie. Aubigni discouering this cunning stratagem, flies thither in great hast without any artillery, to charge them before they were all passed, but it was too late. All marched in order of battell to withstand our French, running thither without order, and almost out of breath. The charge was furious, and the issue doubtfull, fighting with great obstinacie; and no man seemed desirous to turne his backe. Doubtlesse the full decision of controuersies approached to the confusion of our men; who being the smaller number, and having lost many in this obstinate encounter, they were in the end forced to giue way to the Spanish horse, and every man to seeke for his safety as he could. Ambricourt was againe taken prisoner, and some other French Capitaines, with the Duke of Somme, and many Barons of the Realme. Aubigni saued himselfe in the fort of Angirole, but being presently inuested and vnsustained of succours and defence, he was forced to yeeld himselfe prisoner. Such is the alteration of this world. This noble and valiant Captaine had but few years before defeated Ferdinand Gonfalue in the same place: and now by a strange alteration he is charged, defeated, and a prisoner. Moreover, that the end of a misfortune in Calabria might be the beginning of another in Apulia: Gonfalue being forced by famine and pestilence, to abandon Barlette, and to retire to Carignole, a towne betwixt Conose (where the Viceroy remained) and Barlette: the Viceroy (foreseeing that Gonfalue, pushed vpon this first successe, would attempt some higher enterprizes) he calls vnto the Lords of Ars, Alegre, Palisse, Chondiou, Traian Carraciolo, and other Commanders. And as he propounded vnto them on the one side the enemies forces, growne glorious by many notable victories, and now presenting themselves to make triall of a new battell, on the other side, their owne weak troops diminished and daunted by reason of the former disgraces, asking their aduice, whether they should accept or fly the hazard of a battell: many were of opinion to referre it vntill the next day, seeing there remained scarce an houre: when Alegre (in a manner alone among many) blamed the feare and cowardise of such as sought delays. Then the Viceroy said: For my part I am ready to fight, but I feare this braue Councillor will repose more trust in his courfers legs, then in the valour of his arme, when it shall be needfull to fight: foretelling the issue of the fight, and the flight of Alegre. He therefore puts his men in battell, and leads the fore-ward with Captaine Ars, the battell he giues to Chandiou, and the reerward to Alegre.

The French
defeated.

prisoner.

It is a trifolous ceremony to call a councell, and contemne good aduice, preferring opinions that doe but resemble the truth. And what reason had our men, so far from succours, hauing so many enemies in front, to hazard all vpon a shew of valour? Seeing the discommodity of the way, being barren of water, and the exceeding heat, beyond the ordinary of the moneth of May, required rest. But man cannot auoide his fortune, when it approacheth he runs after it. The Duke of Nemours takes the way to Cirignole, sending some troops before to seize vpon the place: but the Spaniards being armed first, lodged in certaine Viney ards, & entrenched their lodging with a large ditch. The French arming (not able to iudge whether those they did see before them, were all, or a part of the Spanish army), for that the light horse led by Fabrizio Colonne, the Launces of the men at armes, and the fennell stakes which were very high in the Countrey, tooke from them all knowledge: did assaile the enemy with great fury. But the smoke and dust which the Spanish Cannon raised in the ayre, blinded our men, who could not cometo handy blows by reason of the enemies trench. The Viceroy seeking to force them by another way, is slaine with a Harquebuse, extinguishing in him the name and familie of the Earles of Armagnac, and daunting the courage of the whole army, the which by the death of their Commander presently fled, being fauoured by the approaching night whose darkenes couered their retreat) preferring some from death, & others from prison. A Chandieu (otherwise called Chandener, a Gentleman of Poictou, neere vnto Niort) was likewise slaine fighting at the same ditch: & Ar seeing the most part of his men slain, and that d'Aligre had fulfilled the Viceroyes prediction, cursing the wilfulness of the man, who by his contumacy, at an vnreasonable time, had made a shamefull breach in the honour of the French nation, and diuerted the Viceroy from the true meanes to make war: in the end he saues himselfe in Venouse. Aligre running vp and downe, gathers vp the peeces of this shipwrack, with the Prince of Salerne, and many Barons of the country, whilst that Gonsalue, following his good fortune, tooke his way to Naples: at whose approach the French shut themselves vp into the new Castle: and the Neapolitanes the fourteenth of May, received Gonsalue, vpon condition to maintaine them in their rights, and priuileges. Auerte and Capoua were as light in their change.

But what vrgent necessity thrust our men to this hazard? They had strong places enough to maintaine themselves foure or fise moneths, during the which either some notable succours, or the approaching winter, might breede some alteration. Out of doubt the impatency of the French (who cannot temporize) was the cause of this last losse of the realme of Naples, rather then any necessity that forced them: yet Lewis of Armagnac had equalled the reputation of the brauest Capitaines that had bene long before him. When as good Commanders haue managed an vnfortunate war, wee must iudge modestly of the issue of humane forces, and confesse that they haue done their dutie: & that others might haue encountered the like difficulties; and raise our considerations higher, to him that placeth and displaceth Kings from their thrones, as it best pleaseth his diuine providence. The King resolved to send two mightie Armies, one by sea, and another by land, to saue the Castles of Naples, Caiete, and some other places, which yet held good: and to invade Spaine with two other armies, the one in the Countie of Roussillon, which ioynes to the Mediterranean sea; the other towards Fontarabie, and other places lying vpon the Ocean: and at the same instant, with an army at sea to invade the Coast of Catalognia and Valencia. But whilst these were preparing, Gonsalue battered the Cittadell, and Peter of Nauarre made a myne, where hauing giuen fire, the violence of the powder made a breach, by the which the Spaniards (attending in battell the issue of this Stratagem) enter some by the breach of the wall, some by scallado. On the other side, the French issuing out of the new Castle, to expell them the Cittadell, the Spaniards turne head, and repelling our men towards the auelin, they enter pell mell with them: and aduancing with the same fury to the gate, they force the French to yeeld them the Castle. Very happily for the enemy, for the next day there ariued from Genoua, to succour them, six great ships, and many other barks, laden with victuall, armes, munition, and two thousand foot. But this was physicke after death, and the worke being ended, this army retires towards Caiete. The Castle de l'Ono was taken by the like myne.

The French enjoy Caiete yet, with other places thereabouts, and in Abruzzo, Aquila, the Rock of Euander, Rossane, Maralone, with many other places belonging to the Barons of the Angeuine faction: and Lewis of Ars, being with the Prince of Meli (worthy doubleste of our history, seeing that Gonsalue, hauing offered to leaue him his state absolute, if he would ioine with the Spanish faction, he chose rather to depart with his wife and children) being fortified in Venouse, hauing surprisid and vanquished Valentine Benauides with some Spanish troops, he annoyed the whole countrey. The conclusion of this war consisted in the keeping or losse of Caiete: hauing a very convenient haueen for Ships that came from Genoua or Prouence. Gonsalue therefore bends his forces thither. But Aligre hauing drawne forth foure hundred Lances, and foure thousand foot, preferred at the battell, the which he had lodged in Fandi, Itri, Tracette, the fort Guillianne and else where, enters into Caiete, abandoning the other places to the victors discretion, to saue that which did most import: who hauing battered the wall, made a breach, & received great losse at two assaults, hauing intelligence of the arriual of the Marquis of Saluce (made Viceroy by the King in the D. of Nemours place) with six great Gallies, six other ships, and seuen Gallies, followed by others, carrying a 1000 foot of the Ile of Croficia, and three thousand Gascons, he retires his men to Naples wel diminished with skirmishes, assaults, & with his retreat; amongst others, of Sancho, Armentis, Alphonso Lopez, John Liffen a Germane: but above all Gonsalue grieved for Don Hugues of Cardone.

A Cardone and Rodericke Mahrique slaine with a Cannon shot. These finall good haps were crowned by taking of the fort of Euander, Aquila, and all other places of Abruzzo, the which drew all Calabria to the Spanish obedience. The King in the meane time sent 7000 foot, and eight hundred men at armes, commanded with the title of general, by the Lord of Tremouille (who then by common consent was held one of the chiefe for martiall affairs: but surprisid by sicknesse at Parma, he gaue the charge thereof to Francis of Gonzague Marquis of Mantoua) and eight thousand Suisses, to the which the Florentines did adde two hundred Lances: the Duke of Ferrara, the Bolognois and Gonzagua a hundred men at armes, and the Siennois a hundred more: the which being ioyned with those troopes that were in Caiete, made about the number of a thousand eight hundred lances, French and Italian, and aboue eightene thousand foot, besides the army at sea, wherein were great forces. For the passage of this army by land, the King desired to be satisfied of the Popes intention, and of the Valentinois; for the Pope (who made an ordinary traffick of other mens losse and calamity) signified, that as a common father (said he) to both parties, he would remaine a newter, suffering either of them to leaue troops indifferently in the territories of the Church, hee granted free passage to the said army. And the Valentinois offered the King to ioine vnto his army five hundred men at armes, and two thousand foot, but some letters intercepted from the Valentinois to Gonsalue, disclosed the very bottome of his thoughts, capitulating, that Gonsalue hauing taken Caiete, and consequently all the Realme of Naples, the Valentinois should seize vpon Pisa, and then ioyning their forces they should invade Tuscane. But as the Pope and his Borgia would serue two masters, and the King pressing them vehemently to declare their minds plainly, beheld a strange Catastrophe of the Popes Tragedy. The Pope and Borgia had before-time paysoned the Cardinals of Saint Angelo, of Capoua, of Modena, Vrsin, and many other rich men, whom commonly by their death they did rob of their goods. They had likewise sworne the death of Adrian Cardinal of Cornete. They were so coolly in an arbor in a garden belonging vnto Adrian: and for the effecting either designe, the Valentinois had sent before some flagons of paysoned wine, whereof began the charge to a groom that was ignorant of the businesse, with expresse commandement, that no man should touch them. It chanced that the Pope comming before the cloth was layd, dis tempered with heat and thirst, called for wine.

The faster, thinking this flaggon had been especially recommended for the Popes own mouth and his sons, filled of this wine to the Pope; And as he was drinking, the Duke of Valentinois comes, to whom (being desirous to drinke) they gaue of the same flaggon. Thus Pope Alexander the sixt, dyed the next day, the 18 of August: whose immoderate ambition, vn-restrained arrogancy, detestable trechery, horrible cruelty, vnmeasurable couetousnesse, selling both holy and profane things, had infected all the world, verifying in his person: That the wicked man labours to bring forth out-rage, but he shall bring forth that which shall deceiue him: he had made a pit, and is fallen into it. And, The eternall God searcheth out murders and remembers them. The Valentinois, through the vigor of his youth, and speedy counter-poisons, (being put into the belly of a moyle newly killed) prolonged his daies, to feeble many deaths in his soule not dying so soone.

He had often fore-seene all accidents that might hap vnto him by the death of his father, and provided remedies for them all: but he reckoned without his host, not supposing to see his father dead, and himselfe at the same instant in extreme danger of death: And whereas hee did alwaies presume after his fathers decease, partly by the feare of his forces, partly with the fauour of the Spanish Cardinals, which were eleuen, to cause a Pope to be chosen at his pleasure, he is now forced to apply his Councils, to the present necessity. And imagining, that he should hardly at one instant withstand the hatred of the Colonois and Vrsins, if they were ioynly banded against him: hee resolved to trust them rather whom he had onely wronged in their estates. So restoring to them their lands and possessions, he presently reconciles himselfe with the Colonois, and others of their faction, who by the comming of Prosper Colonne to Rome, had already filled all the City with ielousies and tumults: some fearing lest this reconciliation should draw the Valentinois to the Spanish party: others apprehending the comming of the French army. Moreover, the Vrsins assembled all their partisans, and thirsting after the Valentinois blood, sought to reuenge the outrages which all their family had sustained. So as in hast tered of the deceased Pope and his sonne, they burne the shops and houses of some Spanishe Merchants and Courtiers at Mont-Jordan. All the other Barons in the dominions of the Church, by their meanes, returned to their lands and goods.

The Piselli returned to Citta de Castello. John Paul Bailion chased from before Perugia at the first siege, returns, and by a furious assault takes it. The towne of Plombin receiveth her first Lord. The Duke of Vibin, the Lord of Pefer, Camerin, and Sinigalle are established in their possessions. The Venetians assemble many men at Raenna, and give cause of suspect to invade Romagnia, which onely remained vnder the Valentinois command, desiring rather to serve one onely and a mighty Lord, then to have a particular Lord in every Towne. Notwithstanding all these disgraces, yet both the French and the Spaniard made great instance, to entertaine him, or to winne him to the party: the French, for that he might (being armed) crosse their passage into Italy, if hee discomfited himselfe in fauour of the Spaniard, and molest them in the estate of Naples: the Spaniard, for they desired to make vse of his forces, and to get (by this meanes) the suffrages of the Spanishe Cardinal: for the election of a future Pope. But the French army approached Rome, and the King might hurt or helpe him more then the Spaniard, both within Rome, and his other Estates. He therefore passed this accord the first of September, the Cardinal of Saint Seuerin, and the Lord of Trans, Ambassadors, vndertaking for the King, To ayde the King with his forces in the warre of Naples, and in any other enterprise against all men, except the Church. And his said Agents bound his Majesty, as well to protect the person of the Valentinois, as all the Estates which he possessed, and to ayde him to recover those which he had lost.

The Cardinal of Amboise vpon the first newes of Alexanders death, posts thither, to labour for the Popedom, building chiefly vpon Cardinal Ascanius promises: whom two yeares before hee had drawne out of the Tower of Bourges. But so many ambitious braines, fraught rather with diuisions and partialities, every one for his owne private interest, then assisted with the holy Spirit, to whom notwithstanding they giue the first voice of their election, did in the end frustrate both the French and Spaniard, to install Franco Riccolomini, Cardinal of Sienna, being old, worne, and sickly: to which the whole Colledge agreed both for that this neutrall election might disperse the diuers pursuits of the pretending nations: as also, for that the new Popes infirmity gaue them hope to proceede shortly to the subrogation of another. To reuiue the memory of Pius the second his vnckle, who had made him Cardinal, he was called Pius the third.

Yet this election did not pacifie the troubles within Rome. The Valentinois and the Vrins being within the walles, fortifie themselves dayly with new companies, resolved to obtaine by force, the Iustice which their reasonable demands could not get of the Colledge of Cardinals, when as their partisans should be ariued. This contention did greatly trouble both the Court and the people of Rome, and did mightily preiudice the French affaires: for this vehement affection, wherewith they see the Valentinois supported by France, drew the Vrins to the Spaniards pay, whose forces were of no small consequence for an absolute victory. But the desire the Venetians had to see the King disappointed of the Realme of Naples, and the liberty they gaue the Vrins to leave their pay, made the world to iudge, that either they had perswaded this family to the Spanishe party, or at the least they had consented therunto. And this was another cause of discontent, to be reuenged of them in time.

The Vrins being intainted by the Spaniard, and reconciled with the Colonnois, by the mediation of the Ambassadors of Spaine and Venice, and ioyntly resolved for a common reuenge vpon the Valentinois, they fall vpon his troops in the Suburbs: the which (being vnable to withstand so furious a charge) were forced to giue way vnto their violence, and the Commander to saue himselfe in the Castle Saint Angelo, hauing like wife with the Popes consent taken the Capitaines oath, to depart when he pleased. The tumult being thus pacified, it gaue them free liberty to attend a new election: for Pius nothing deceiuing their conceited hope, of his short Popedom, dyed the 26 day after his creation. But alas! Alexander had serued but as a scourge for that great Iudge; but now he takes his rod in hand, to breake Italy in peeces. The Cardinal S. Pietro, mighty in friends, in reputation and in wealth, was chosen, the last of October, and named Julius the second: by nature factious, and terrible, vnquier and turbulent: but stately, a great defender

Was the third chosen Pope.

The Vrins and Colonnois, reconciled, bandy against the Valentinois.

Julius the 2, chosen Pope.

A defender of the liberties of the Church, and a most franke receiuer of the loue and fauour of all those that might aduance him to this dignity.

The Valentinois flight to the Castle of Saint Angelo, and the dispersing of all the troops he had with him, made the Townes of Romagnia (which had till then continued constant and firme in his obedience) to call home their ancient Lords, or to embrace sundry parties. And the Venetians, good fishermen in a troubled water, aspiring to the command of all Romagnia, had seized vpon the Castles of the valley of Lamone, of the towne of Ferlinopole, of Rimini, Faenza, Montefiore, S. Archangelo, Verrucque, Gatere, Sauignagne, Meldoles, Scin in the territory of Imola, Tossignagne, Solariale, Montebattile, and had easily seized vpon Imola and Furl, if by the new Popes complaints (whom they had strangely discontented) they had not put their men into garison. The Venetians usurpations did wonderfully displease Julius: but what could hee doe, being newly advanced to the chaire, vnprouided of forces, or of any hope of succours from the Kings of France and Spaine, being not yet resolved whose ensignes to follow? To remaine (in fauour of the Church) some places which the Valentinois yet held, and to oppose him in some sort against the Venetians (although hee loued the Valentinois heeles better then his face) he agrees with him, that he should goe to Ferrara and Imola, to reduce such forces as he could leaue. But he is no sooner parted, but a new desire of command suggests, that it should be good the Valentinois should deliuer vnto him such Castles and places as he commanded, to the end the Venetians should not invade them in his absence. And to this end he sends vnto him the Cardinals of Volterre and Surenate. Vpon the Valentinois refusall, the Pope being offended, sends to arrest the Gallies, wherein he had embarked at Ostia, and caused him to be brought from Magliana to Vatican, honoured and much made of, but safely guarded. Thus you see the Valentinois power reduced to nothing, spoiled in a manner of all hee had viurped, his troops stript by the Florentinois, and himselfe at this instant so well watched as he could not goe the length of himselfe. But let vs see what becomes of so many great and goodly designs of our Leo. He intends not onely to recover his losses in the realme of Naples, but also with one breath to crosse the affaires of Ferdinand in Spaine.

The Valentinois a prisoner.

The Lord of Albret, and Marshall of Gie, marched towards Fontaraby, with foure hundred Lances, among the which Peter of Foix Lord of Lautrec, and the Lord of Lescun, so famous in our historie, made first shew of their vertues, and five thousand foot, Gascous and Suisses. And to make warre in the country of Roussillon, was sent the Marshall of Rieux, accompanied with Gaston of Foix, Duke of Nemours, by the death of Louis of Armagnac, the Vicounts of Paulin and Bruniquet, the Earle of Carmain, the Lords of Montaur, Terride, and Negrepelisse, leading eight hundred men at armes, and eight thousand foot, French, Gascous, and Suisses. And at the same instant an army was ready at Sea to invade the Coast of Catalonia, and the realme of Valencia: but he that engripes himselfe holds little: these were but shewes without effect. For the Lord of Albret being entered into the Province of Guiposcoa, whether that the enemies forces were greater then his, or fearing lest the Castilian should be reuenged of the King of Nauarre his sonne, he retired and went into Languedoc, to the Marshall of Rieux, to beseege Saulles with their ioynt forces.

But the King of Spain, hauing assembled a great army at Parpignan from all his realms, and marching in person with a resolution to raise the siege by some notable stratageme: our men finding themselves too weak, retired to Narbonne, with a successe contrary to the Lord of Albours, in the yeare 1496. And the Spaniards after some roads and spoiling on this side the mountains, content to haue repelled the enemy, concluded a truce for six months, mediated by Fredericke: (whom Isidore King of Arragon and Catalunna, fed with hope to restore him to his throne) and Queene Anne moued our Leo therunto, onely in regard of that which concerned the affaires of France.

A truce betwixt Spain and France.

By this truce, the thoughts and forces of these two Kings are conuerted to the warres of Naples. The French army hauing passed the cities of Valmontone: and of the Colonnois, marched through the possessions of the Church, with an intent to take in the Castle of Séque. Here our men received their first affront, Séque well fortified, was well defended, causing our men to retire vnto the despising to win Saint Gemmaine, take their way by the Sea Coast. But the question was how to passe Garillon, which was not to be waded through at that season. Gonsalve was encamped on the other side: our French by reason of their Cannon, win the passage of the river, make a bridge thereon, and adventure to passe. The Spaniards repulse them, even to the midst of the bridge, and by the fury of their shot, force them to goe to land, having lost five hundred men; French and Swisses, and some hundred drowned: the enemy two hundred, and Fabius the sonne of Paul Virgile; a young man and of great hope.

It is a matter of dangerous consequence, to attempt to passe a river in the face of a mighty army, and commanded by a discreet Capitaine, if they be not well fortified with trenches. This second disgrace encouraged the Spaniard, terrified our French, and made them lose all further hope. Doubtlesse the most important part of an army, is a good Commander, and commonly few do willingly vndergoe the command of a stranger, if he be not especially fauoured by the heauens, and hath won great credit, and given good testimonies of his valour. Herein the Spaniards did exceed them: and this defect in the French armie, had bred great contempt of their Generall: and more confusion in the concord among the Capitaines. So as the Marquesse of Maxima Lieutenant to the King, either thinking himselfe vnfit to gouerne so great an army, or (as Sandricourt charged him) carrying away with him the Italian forces, that the French might bee so much the weaker, or for that having receiued this double repulse, hee would no farther impute his honour, parted from the army, laying all the fault vpon the contumacie of the French.

All difficulties conspired their ruine, the hard season of the winter; the sterility of the moorish Country, the continuall raine and snow, want of pay, the impatience of the coyles of war, and moreover the great sufferance of the enemy, who furnished with a deep ditch, and two battions in the Front of the enemies army, continually guarded the passage, whilst that our men wasted themselves with fruitlesse attempts, and by their miserable stay, the which quailed as much the heat of their courage, as the care of the provision of their Victuallers, the ordinary theft of the Treasurers, the dissension of Capitaine, and the disobedience of souldiers, vsuall in troops, wanting a vigilant Command, and of authority, and the increase of ordinary diseases did hurt them. Being incouraged with these difficulties, the enemy hath a new supply by Bartholomew of Aluano with the rest of the Viscons. And Gonsalve finding himselfe to haue nine hundred men, at armes, a thousand light horse, and nine thousand Spanish foot, aduertised moreover of the disorder and continuall decay of our army, the which being stronger in chieualry, then in footmen, those being cut in peeces which they had lately left at Castle Guillaume, were so dispersed as their lodging contained ten miles in circuit; a grosse error of the Marquis of Saluce, having an enemy in front, who could well embrace all advantages: he secretly casts a bridge ouer the Garillon, foure miles about that which our men had made the passage of Suio, where the French kept no guard: he passeth the 27 of December in the night, and so passeth Suio. The Marquis vnderstanding that the Spaniard did passe, suddenly breaks his bridge, and causeth the army to march towards Caiete. Gonsalve hinders his passage by Eraser Colonne, and the light horsemen, that being molested by them they should be enforced to march the more slowly: he byrreth them right against Scandi, and sties them with continuall skirmishes, until the Gonsalve comes vpon the reward of them. An army that mixes with feare, it receives the first stroke of death when they are skirmished with. Our French were driven to the passage of the bridge which is before the Mole of Caiete; & whilst the Viceroy stayed there to give the Spaniards time to passe, the battell, and reward of the Spaniards arise. Armed did destroy the Barbets of Cramons and Saint Colombe, with some Countess of French and Italian, make it good a long time, and fauour the retreat of the foot: until that by the death of Colonne and many others, with the wounding of S. Colonne, the rest of these horsemen seeing the troops to haue gotten some ground, doe likewise take their way to Caiete, alwayes beaten behind, euen vnto the head of two waies: whereof the one leads to Tiri, and the other to Caiete. Here all disband those which are best mounted save the Scandis: the two weakest wounded, the sicke, the Cannon, and the munition, remaine at the victors deuotion. At the same time Bartholomew having passed the river with five hundred horse and an hundred foot, spoiled the companies of Ladomile of Miranda, Alexander of Triumet, and Der of Medicis (who followed the French army) retiring by the

to Caiete with many Gentlemen, and foure peeces of artillery, their barke ouer-taken with a storme in the mouth of the river was swallowed vp in the waues, and all in it drowned. Gonsalve knew well, that so great a multitude of men being retired into Caiete, would breed a sudden famine, and soone yeeld him the Towne: Hee besieged it, and our men not able to dispose themselves, to endure the tediousnesse of a doubtfull expectation of succours, made the first day of the year, one thousand five hundred and foure, famous by this accident, which him: To depart with liues and goods out of the Realme of Naples, either by land or by sea, and that the Lord of Aubigni, and all other prisoners, should be deliuered on either side.

So our French are againe dispossessed of the estate of Naples, and exposed to cold, hunger, and to a long and painfull retreat, that although of so great an army, few were slaine by the enemies sword, yet the most part of them which departed after this capitulation, found their graues in hospitals, market places and streets: and oft such as took their way by sea, few suruiued long the extreame discommodities which they had endured: amongst others, the Marquis of Saluce, Sandricourt and many Gentlemen of marke. It were better to fore-see all these difficulties, before we part from our homes, then to goe so farre to seeke our graues. Capitaine Bayard returned, admired greatly euen by Gonsalve himselfe, hauing purchased great glory and reputation amongst the French.

Doubtlesse, besides the discord and bad gouernment of Capitaines, the sharpnesse of the time, and impatience of our men in military labours: two things principally had wrested this victory from the King. The one was the long stay of his army in the territories of Rome for the Popes death, so as winter came, and Gonsalve had leisure to practise with the Viscons before this army entered the realme. The other was the treacherous couetousnesse and theft of the Commisaries and Treasurers, who commonly empty the Kings coffers to fill their owne bagges, to the preiudices of the souldiers pay, and the order they should be for victuals. John Heron Treasurer, condemned of theft, was publicly executed: Aligre Sandricourt and others, were for a time in disgrace with the King. The losse of Naples, the death of so braue a Nobility, the infinite numbers of men slain in these attempts, had filled the Realme and Court with great heauinesse and mourning, euery man curing the day wherein that miserable desire to purchase new estates in Italy, had first entered into the hearts of our Kings of France. The King seeing well how much his reputation would be blemished with strangers, and how much the losse of so flourishing an army, would weaken his forces, was not without feare: either that Maximilian would alter something in the state of Milan, or that Gonsalve (following his course) would employ his victorious army to the subuersion of the said duchy: and those which followed the French party in Italy, feared, lest in his way he should alter the estate of Tuscane. Without doubt it was likely, that the King, wanting money, weak of men, and the French daunted in courage, and without any desire to repasse the Alpes, would without any resistance, haue given place to the victors violence. But Gonsalve content with the surname of Great Capitaine, which the Spanish boasting had given him, restrained his desires within the limits of his happy victory. True it is, that many extremities kept him backe. Hee did owe much vnto his army, who made great instance to be paid, and put into garrisons. Moreover, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, to lead his Army out of the Realme, from whence the enemy was not yet fully expelled. But that which stayed the course of his prosperities, was a dangerous sicknesse, so as hee could not execute any further in person: hee sent Bartholomew of Aluano, against Enrico of Ars, who during the stay of the army vpon the bankes of Garillon, had seized vpon Troy and Saint Sclere, and had put all Apulia into ashes.

This stay of Gonsalve, held the rest of Italy rather in iealousie, then any way troubled it. And the Pope (forbearing yet to discover his designs,) laboured to get the possession of such Castles as the Valentinois held at Furli, Celene and Bettinoie. The Valentinois was content for Celene: but the Pope having sent Don Pedro d'Onida a Spaniard, to asseigne it in his name, the Capitaine of the place holding the composition of no force, (for that the Valentinois was a prisoner) caused him to be hanged. So as the Pope despairing to get it without his liberty, agrees with him. That hee should bee put into the Castle of Osia, with commandment to the Cardinall of Saint Croix to release him, him, when he had consigned the said Castles. This consignment made, the Valentine escapes with the Cardinals permission, and retires to Naples, from whence Gonsalve sent him afterwards to Ferdinand his King, who confined him prisoner to the Castle of Medina del Campo. An act in truth worthy the sincerity of a great Prince, but not worthy of this Duke, who not satisfied with the wickedness he had formerly done, desired a new, to trouble other mens estates, and to sowe dissensions throughout all Italy. A prison which did greatly comfort all Romagna, being freed from the evil spirit, which so tormented it.

A common necessity is usually the mother of a peace, or truce betwixt Princes, the have long tormented one another. Behold the Kings of France and Spaine, both weary of war, conclude a truce. Lewis sought it, and Ferdinand accepts it willingly, thinking this means to confirme his new conquests, with more safety, upon condition: That it should be lawfull for the subjects of either party, to trafficke throughout all their Realmes and dominions, except at Naples. The Kings of Spaine have alwaies treated, upon advantage with our Kings. Gonsalve doth cunningly make his profit of this clause, placing vpon the frontiers of those places, which the French did yet possesse, (as Rosene in Calabria, Oin in the land of Oranto, Venouse, Conuerlan, and the Castle of Mont in Apulia) guards to watch that no man living should conuerse in any place that was held by the Spaniard. The which brought the inhabitants to so great a streight, as resolving to yeeld to the enemy, Lewis of Aris, was forced to retire into France.

But what auails it to auoyde one danger, and fall into another? Wee haue not yet breathed from our trauels past, and see, wee now study on new iarres and confusions. In truth the estate of this world is like a chesse-board, where Princes with a varible chess, play most couetous games, sometimes with losse, sometimes with gaine: and oftentimes (treating with men in whom there is no trust) they fall out of one mischief into another inconueniencie. At the same time, Ambassadors being come from Maximilian and Philip, to confirme that which had beene propounded, by the coming of the Bishop of Cisteron, and the Marquis of Final, sent expressly by the Pope for that business: this peace was in the end concluded: "That the marriage of Claude the Kings daughter, with Charles the Arch-Dukes eldest sonne, should take effect: that all the former injuries of the Duchy of Milan being disanulled, Maximilian should grant the inheritance vnto the King, for himselfe and his heires males: and for want of males, should give it in fauour of the marriage of Claude and Charles: and if Charles should die before the consummation of the said marriage, to Claude and the Arch-dukes youngest son, in case he married with her: for which possession the King should pay vnto Maximilian, vpon dispatch of the letters patents, threecore thousand florins of the Rhin, and threecore thousand more within fixe moneths after, and euery year, on the birth day of our Lord God, a paire of spurres of gold.

All these Princes were wonderfully incensed against the Venetians, by reason of the usurpations made by them in their estates. They make a League for their common defence, and to offend the Venetians, meaning to pull from them what they had usurped. And for that the promises which Maximilian had vainly giuen to Lodowike Sforze, were the cause to hasten his ruine: hee was a meane the King should set him at liberty, and giue him some good pension to liue withall in France. But this was a short comfort for Lodowike, whose turbulent spirit would haue practised some alteration. This capitulation being so profitable to all these Princes, the Pope being comprehended therein, it was easily it should hold. But there must bee stronger bands to tie it, that is, a reciprocal league without the which all treaties are fruitlesse. The end of this year is famous by the death of Fredericke, sometimes King of Naples, who was deprived of all his vaine hopes, to recover his Realm of Naples, by the accord of these two Kings, and by that of Isabel Queen of Castile, a vertuous Princess, noble, wise, and beloued of her subjects.

The year following disposed the two Kings and the Potentates of Italy, to lay asid armes: Ferdinand of Arragon hauing new designs, and foreseeing that by the death of his wife, Philip his sonne in law would challenge the Crowne of Castile; (as hauing married the heiress of the said Realme) desired onely to prelerue the Realme of Naples, by means of the capitulation lately made. Our Lewis was not altogether freed from doubt, for that Maximilian delayed (according to his usual cunningness) to make the peace;

The Venetians
reconciled to the Pope.

A peace. The Pope desired inuocation, but his forces were too weak without the support of some mighty Prince. The last League had put the Venetians in alarme, hauing thereby three mighty enemies against them. To pacifie the nearest, they offer vnto the Pope to restore all they had vsurped, except Ferra, Rimini, and their appurtenances. And the Pope knowing, that the Emperours warre against the Elector Palatin, would hinder his passage into Italy, ioyntly with the King, for that year, accepted the obedience the Venetians offered him, in regard of the said places, without making them any shew of a more mild and tractable disposition. The King (for the accomplishment of that which had been treated of) sent the Cardinall of Amboise to Hagenau a towne of Alsacia newly taken from the Count Palatin where the Emperor did solemnly sweare, and proclaim the articles agreed vpon, according to the which, the Cardinall payed halfe the money, promised for the inuestiture of Milan.

During this ratification, there grows new seeds of dissention in Italy. The Cardinall Ascanius, brother to Lodowike Sforze, treated with the Ambassader of Venice at Rome, and had also (according to the common opinion) some secret intelligence with Gonsalve. It was in shew to invade the Duchy of Milan, the which they knew to bee vnsurmountable of French soldiers: the people inclining again to the name of Sforze; and (that which made them the more bold,) the King being surprisid with so dangerous a sickness as the Physicians despayring of his health, the Queen prepared to send all her ieiue into Britany; if the Marshall of Gie had not placed men vpon the way to stay them: for the which, the King afterwards was as well pleased, as the Queen, by her dislike, sought to bring him in disgrace. Doubtlesse the people should oft times suffer much, if their counsels were not stayed by the providence of God. The King recouers his health, and the Cardinall Ascanius dies suddenly of the plague, at Rome, interring with him the designs of Milan.

The King is freed of one danger. And as God by meanes unknowne to men, doth change great stormes into calme sun-shines: our Lewis, who till then had the greatest of the Archduke Philip in ialousie, fearing to make him his enemy, hee findes now that the death of Isabel of Castile doth free him of this feare: for that the Archduke (reiecing the testament of his mother in law) deuised to take the government of the Realme of Castile from Ferdinand his father in law, the which could not bee done but by their common quarters, and the weakning of their forces, the King (remaining betwixt both, free from troubles,) should thereby fortifie himselfe, with men, money & munition, for the aduancing of his designs. And the Arragonois, on the other side, forced to seek a support against his son in law, desiring a peace with the king, he obtains, in by the marriage of him and Germaine, sister to Gaston of Foix daughter to his Maiesties sister, vpon condition, that the King should giue her in dowry that part of the Realme of Naples which belonged vnto him: the king of Arragon binding himself to pay him within ten years 700000 ducats for the charges past; and to indow his new spouse with 20000 ducats. Which dowry (Germaine dying in marriage without children) should reuenge to Ferdinand his dowry he died first, it should go to the Crowne of France: a happy conclusion both of a peace, and of the year, if it could haue entailed long benifits on these two Princes: But it shall be soon broken, and alwaies our peace with the Spaniards hath been full of dissention.

Let vs now open the springs of new warres: The Pope had without the Kings priuie giuen all the benefices that were fallen voyde in the Duchy of Milan by the death of Cardinall Ascanius and other Clergy men. Moreover in the creation of many Cardinalls, he had refused to aduance into the society the Bishop of Auch, Nephew to the Cardinall of Amboise, and the Bishop of Basle Nephew to the Lord of Tremouille. And in the which he had armed some galleys to be in his aid in case (as some came out) to the Genoua from the government of the French, in case the King died, as some feared, and others did hope. All these considerations, together with the Kings discontent, seemed to breed some dissension with the Pope: yet his friendship was profitable for the King in these times, hee had stood against the Venetians against whom he knew the Pope to be well affected, for that desire he had to recover the towne of Romagna. He therefore sent the Bishop of Cisteron his Nephew into France, who proposed vnto him many offers and designs, for the execution of them, through some other title. Whereupon the Pope seeing himselfe, as it were, to be in the Kings hand, to procure the Cardinall of Amboise his legation in France, and for his ialousie he had that this Cardinall opposed by all means, as the Pope himselfe had could for the defence of the state of Milan, in favour of the King, they would not oppose them. A felues to any of his advancement. And in truth, being loth to offend Maximilian, or to give to the King occasion to presume too much, they did not seeke into him for any new league, hoping thereby that Maximilian leaving their frontiers in peace, would turne his forces either against Bourgonne, or against the duchies of Milan and Genoua.

The king seeks to hinder the
passage.

To prevent all inconueniences, the King had sent great troopes of horse and foot, towards Milan, and did Nasie (with the permission of the Catholike King his nephew) two thousand five hundred Spaniards, five hundred Lances in Bourgonne vnder Tremouille command, four hundred French Lances, and four thousand foot, jointly with the Venetians; to prevent any alteration that might happen towards Trent: and to distract the Emperours forces into diuers parts, he fauoured the Duke of Gueldres, who molested the Country of Chablais, grand child to Maximilian. And to begin his voyage, Maximilian being come to Trent, caused a proclamation to be publicly made, the third of February: That he was resolved to passe in hostile manner into Italy. And from that time hauing the name of King of Romans, tooke vpon him that of chosen Emperour. But this was to brag of mountaints, and to bring forth mole-hills. He goes from Trent with sixe thousand horse, and four thousand foot, nor of that number which had bene promised him at Constance, but of the ordinary traine of his Court, and leaued in his owne territories, and the Marquis of Brandebourg with five hundred horse, and two thousand foot. But there was no reason the seruant should be more happy then the master. The Marquis returned, having onely presented himselfe before Rouere, and demanded in vaine to be lodged within the towne. And Maximilian hindered by many trenches which the Moontainers of Siaghe had made, retired backe foure daies after his departure. If he had gone backe to take a greater leape, (as the Prouerbe saith) it had bene a good signe, but to turne his backe, it was a disgrace.

The vaine attempts of Maximilian.

Behold an open warre, and the Venetians are needd with these weake beginnings, but conquests of Villages, are like benefices of straw. Maximilian taking the way of Friul, for the commoditie of the passage, and the Country being more open, with sixe thousand men leagued in those marches, hee did runne about forty miles into the Venetian territories: having taken certain Villages of small moment (performing the office of a simple Capitaine, rather then of an Emperour) hee returned towards Iusbruch, to engage some Jewels, and to make prouision of money by some other means, which failing had caused eight thousand Swisses to leaue his pay, whereof five thousand went to the King, and three thousand to the Venetians. And to increase the mischief, Maximilian had left nine thousand foot and horse at Trent. Bartholmeu of Aluiane (sent by the Venetians to succour Friul) seized vpon the passages of the Valley of Cadore, by the which the Germanes might saue themselves: he charged them, slew about a thousand, and took all therof (in a manner) prisoners. So the careful valor of Aluiane made vaine the former exploits of Maximilian.

Soone Swisses

Maximilian

It is all one to be well or ill beaten. The Venetians put in practice this common saying, but nor without some offence to the King, who did not willingly behold the prosperous course of their victories, in regard of his owne designs. They were forced to take armes, and before they lay them downe, they take from the Empire Trieste, Portocon, and Plume: then pass the Alpes, Possionia. On the other side, the Germane army towards Trent; had put to sword three thousand Venetian foot, set to guard Mount Brontice. The Bishop of Trent encouraged by this small stratagem, with two thousand foot, and some troopes of horse, went to besiege Riue Trente, a great bough vpon the Lake of Garde; but as he did batter it, two thousand Grisons, which were in the Germane Campe, fell into a mutiny by reason of their pay, and spoile the victuals of the whole Campe. So all being in disorder without respect of command, and without obedience, the Grisons being gone, all the rest of the army (being about 7000 men) were forced to retire. Thus ended all these great shewes; and Maximilian hauing rashly given credit to the Popes suggestions, reaped nothing for his indiscretion, but shame, losse, and contempt. Being thus perplexed, he seekes to withdraw himselfe out of the Country, finding the Venetians well disposed to make an end of this war, and to preferre by means of a truce the places which they had conquered in these garboiles: hee easily obtains a truce for three months, whereby they lay downe armes, to resume them sooner, but

As but with more dangerous effects. This was the 20 of April. In corrupt bodies, the remedies we apply to diuers one inconuenience, doe commonly engender another more dangerous. So the truce (made betwixt Maximilian and the Venetians, wherein they had exceedingly neglected the king, instead of quiet and rest which they expected, bred more horrible calamities then the former wars. The Venetians fought in their insolent manner of proceeding. The Emperour studied by what means hee might repaire the infamy and losse he had lately receiued: and now they incense him more, rectifying Aluiane into Venice, in a triumphant manner. And the King found himselfe much wronged, for that presuming to name him in this truce, and to comprehend him as an adherent, they had notwithstanding provided for their owne safety, and left him charged with the cares and troubles of the warre: seeing that in their fauour he had opposed himselfe against Maximilian, as we haue seene. The Emperour being then so weakly assisted by the forces of the Empire, and finding his owne too feeble, desired to vnicte himselfe with the King against the Venetians, as the onely remedy to recover both his estates and his honor lost. Moreover, this new disdaine reuiued in the King the ancient remembrance of the wrongs hee had receiued by them in the warres of Naples, and since in diuers other accidents thrust forward with an exceeding desire to wrest out of their hands Verona, Cremone, and many other Townes possessed of long time by the Dukes of Milan. And the Pope possing them, possessed with that first desire to regouer those places which they vsurped of the Church, taxing them that the banished men of Furl had of late dayes, by means of their Senate, sought to enter into the said towne; discontented moreover, that the Venetians had, (in contempt of the authority of the Sea of Rome) given the Bishopricke of Vincenza, to a Venetian Gentleman, contrary to the Collation which the Pope had made to his nephew Sixtus, he perswaded the King against them, desiring rather to remaine a neuter in the midst of these contendants, and be a spectator, then to invade. In the end (vnder a colour to treat a peace, betwixt the Archduke Charles, sonne to Philip, and the Duke of Gueldres) they meet at Cambray. For the King, came the Cardinal of Amboise: and for the Emperour, Marguerit his daughter Gouvernesse of Flanders, assisted in this treaty by Matthew Lange, a trusty Secretary to the Emperour: and for the King of Arragon, an Ambassador of his. The ninth of December they conclude a peace betwixt their Masters, and a perpetuall league against all men, euery one to recover from the Venetians the places which they had taken from them, and to spoile them of the territories of the Church vsurped by them: whatsoever we treat, the Church must be one, but more with a colour, then any deuotion. The Emperour did solemnly confirme this new league. The Arragonois feared the increase of the King his Vnckles greatnesse, and preferred the safety of the Realme of Naples before any thing which the Venetians enjoyed: yet disturbing his conceits, he performed all solemnities required. The Pope was more scrupulous: hee had sent his commission, but had not yet conferred. Many considerations moued him thereunto: a desire to recover the Townes of Romagna, and a disdaine against the Venetians. Moreover, hee feared to incense the King, rectifying this association: yet he held it a very dangerous thing for him, that the Emperour should extend himselfe in Italy. Thus troubled in minde, hee reloues, for the mildest course, to obtaine a part of his desires by an accord, rather then all by warre. He lets the Venetians vnderstand, that the storme which threatened them by the vnion of these Princes, would proue farre more tempestuous, if they forced him to give his consent. That yielding willingly the places they had taken from the Church, it should make him refuse to raise the treaty of Cambray, made in his name, but without his approbation: without the which their alliances would easily turne to smoke; if they refused, hee would pursue them with spirituall and temporall armes. Oft-times, those which haue the name, the age, and countenance of wise men, conclude to the ruine of their Country. The Venetians at this time follow the worst aduice. And the Pope ratifies the treaty the which he had deferred vntill the last day assigned for the ratification.

Thouars, the Earle of Montmorancy grandfather of the Countable that now lives, the Lords of Palife, Andoins, Grandmout, Cutton, Boilli, Coligni, Effourcille, and almost all the Nobility of France, which followed, (as to a certain victory) with joy and courage, attempting to forty thousand fighting men, besides three thousand horse and foot, which Chabmont brought out of the Duchy of Milan, and the troops of Anthony Duke of Lorraine, who accompanied his Majesty in this voyage. The King having passed the Alpes, leads Monsieur his Herald, presently to proclaim warre against the State of Venice. And for that the Pope complained that the time specified in the capitulation expired without any effects of warre, the King commands the Lord of Chabmont to begin.

He thereupon passeth the river of Adde, the fifteenth of April, and camps before Trevi, barres and forteth it to yeeld at discretion, taking prisoners Iustinian Morosin, Commissary of the Venetian Stradiots or light horse, Finnia de Citta di Castello, Vincens of Nadde, and other Senators; and with them a hundred light horse, and a thousand foot: then he repasseth Adde, to attend the Kings coming at Milan. The Emperor was sent into Flanders, to require a raising of money, from the subjects of Charles his grandchild, a testimony that hee could not begin the warre within forty dayes after the King, as his promise was.

The Venetians prepared, and seeing a great part of Christendome armed against them, they seeked to dissolve this union by reasonable offers. But the Pope could not more accept that which he had before desired. The Catholike King had not credit enough to divert the talk. The Emperor for little of disdain, would not so much as see John de l'Esquille their Secretary. As for our Lewis, they hoped for nothing from him, but by the sword. They therefore entertaine two thousand men at armes barded, foure fighting men for every Lance; 3000 light horse and Stradiots, fifteen thousand foot, of the flower of Italy, and fifteen thousand others chosen out of their territories: they arme many vessels to guard the banks of Romagnia, the towns of Apulia, the approaches of the Lake of Gard, Po, and other neighbour places, fearing to be molested by the Duke of Ferrara, and the Marquis of Mantoua their enemies. But behold bad signes, and prodigious fore-runners of losses, whereunto (besides the threats of men) the Venetians shall bee shortly subject. A Barke carrying ten thousand ducats to Ravenna, was drowned. The Castle of Brescia was fiered with lightning, the place where the Charters of the common-weale did lie, was suddenly ruined. And that which did most terrifie them, their great Council being assembled, fireooke their Arcenall, whereas the salt-peeter did lie, and burnt twelvehundred, with a great quantity of munition.

Moreover, having entertained Iulius and Rance Vrsins, & Troile Saueili, with five hundred men at armes, and three thousand foot, the Pope commanded them upon grievous censures (as dependants of the Church) not to depart out of Rome. And presently he did publish in forme of a monitory, a horrible Bull, containing "The Vsurpation the Venetians had made in the sea of Rome, the authority they did arrogate to the prejudice of the Ecclesiasticall liberty, and the Popes jurisdiction: to give Bishopsricks and other spirituall livings being vacant: to decide spirituall causes in secular Courts, and other things belonging to the censure of the Church: specifying moreover, all their disobediences past, and admonishing them: To yeeld vp within foure and twenty dayes next ensuing, the townes of the Church which they possessed, with the fruits received since they enjoyed them, upon paine to incurre not onely the censures and curse of the City of Venice, but also of all the territories vnder their obedience, and of all others that should receive any Venetian, declaring them guilty of high Treason, and detested as perpetual enemies to all Christians, to whom he gave power to take their goods in all places, and to make their persons slaves. Against this Bull, they cast forth a writing about Rome, containing (after a long protestation against the Pope and our Lewis) An appealation from the monitory, to the next Council, and for want of humane justice, to the feet of Iesus Christ, a most iust iudge; and the soveraigne Prince of all.

The Venetian army being assembled, made their beginning famous by the recovery of Trevi, after the retreat of Chabmont. But it was dimall to the conqueror: for during the heat of the spoile, the King (who came to relecue it) passed the river of Adde with his whole army, without any let, the ninth day of May. And Triunist seeing the army pass,

A This day (said he) O most Christian Kings have we wonne the victory. The King lodged with in half a league of the Venetian campe, and holding it more glory, if of himselfe without the assistance of any other he ended this war, he drew thither by all means to a battell. The enemies designe was, to keepe themselves close in places of strength, to shew the necessity of fighting, and to keepe the French from attempting any manner of assaults. So both armies continued a whole day one in view of another. The next day the King stood foure houres before the enemies lodging, with his troops in battell, and though his volute, in their view, without making any other shew, then to shew courage to fight. Necessity must then force them to it, hunger drove the Vols out of the wood, the King too cut off the victuals that came to them from Cresona and Cremas, raised his Campe up lodge at Vaile or at Pandin: and the Venetians (to engage their enemies in the like difficulties) resolve to follow them at the heels, and abayas to lodge in places of advantage. There were two waies to the said places: The one was longer and lower, which going bis against the river of Adde, was in forme like a bow, the other shorter and higher, but straight as a line. The King takes the lower, the enemy the higher, Chabmont led the forward of the French, Aluianthe the Venetian. They approach nere unto Agredeli, where as Aluiane being forced of necessity to fight plants his peeces of artillery upon the caufrey of a brooke which was then almost dry, which parted the two armies, & his foot in the Vineyards adjoining to it, & comes resolutely to charge our foreward. The combat was long and doubtfull, for that by reason of the strokes and branches the Frenchmen could not fight commodiously. And now the Swisses begin to waver, when as the King sending Charles of Bourbon to encourage them, and advancing himselfe with his battell into a more large and open place, he redoubled the stroke, favoured by his artillery, the which the enemy could not discover by reason of certain small trees and bushes. So as after an obstinate fight of either side above three houres, the Kings preference not suffering any one to faint, and the Swisses returning to their first heat, the Venetians wonderfully spoiled by the horse and Cannon, and hindered by the raine and haine which beat in their faces, began to yeeld both in courage and force: and finally resolving to sell this victory to the French very deare, failing rather in brack then courage, they desired rather to lose their lives then their honours, by turning of their backs.

The Earle of Petiliano (with whom was the greatest part of their forces, encountered with a Squadron of their owne men lying crested that Aluiane had contrary to his duties presumed to fight, and thinking that his endeavours would prove little to obtaine the victory) desired rather to save the rest of the army, than to see all lost by the rashness of another. The Earle Bernardin du Mont was slaine, and some men at armes, and about ten thousand foot. Bartholomew of Aluiane was prisoner, and hurt in the eye, and twenty peeces of great artillery lost. Of the French, no men of make, but some 500 foot were slaine. The King caused the dead to be buried, and for a trophie he built a Chappell in that place of battell, the which he named S. Mary of Victory. So ended the battell of Agredeli, or Giardadade, (as others call it) of Valleshe 15 of May. This happy Victory purchased the King the next day Caravage, and then Bergamo, Brescia, Crema, Cusina, Pisquero, Pesquiere, and other places, whereof the King would not accept one but upon condition, that the Venetian Gentlemen that were within any of them should yeeld themselves prisoners upon ransom. On the other side, the Pope with four hundred men at armes, took hundred light horse, eight thousand foot, to the artillery of the D. of Ferrara, took Servia, Solarole, Bresquille, all Valdelamone, Granarole, all the townes of the territory of Faenza, Ravenna, Imola, and all the townes of Romagnia; but more through favour of the Kings Victory, then by his owne forces. The Marquis of Mantoua recovered Afale and Lunare, which the Venetians had shipped from Triunist his great grandfather, and the D. of Ferrara, Polino of Romagnia, Christophe Frangipani invaded Bisente and Divisio. The D. of Bavaria, entering into Friul, for the Emperor, took Beltri, Bellong, Treviso, and then Verona and Budova returned to the obedience of the Empire. The Earles of Loiron seized upon Agredeli Castles and Villages in their jurisdictions, and the Bishop of Rome got for his share, Ravette, Trente, and Agrette. The King of Arragon making his profit of another mans paine and charge, recovered Brindes and Tromauis. So every one pulling his plumes, yet Crow (according to the Proverbe) remained almost bare. Such are the fruits of a battell.

well won in a Country not fortified. This checke had abated the natural pride and haughtinesse of the Venetians; but their ruine toucht the hearts of the Italians diversly. Some were well pleased for this without any observation of faith or equity (trusting on with an inevitable ambition and covetousnesse) they made profession to seize upon all that opportunity offered them: Others began to sigh, lamenting the generall calamity of Italy, ready to yield to the servitude of a stranger. The Pope was one of the first that grieved at this great fall, and fearing the Emperours power and the Kings, he desired how to cross their affaires; and to take from them all means to ruine this Common-weale, the ancient seat of liberty. He accepted of the Venetians Ambassage and submission, and revoked the sentence by the which they were excommunicate. The which gave them a beginning of hope, but more when they see the King content to have recovered his owne, and not to exceede the limits of the capitulation of Cambray. And that which reuined their spirits, certaine banished men, newly restored at Treviso by the Venetians, to make the memory of this benefite famous, tooke together, plant the banner of S. Mark in the Market place, and expell Leonard of Bresfine, who without any armes or force, had received the City in the Emperours name, they bring in seven hundred Venetian foot, and consequently, all the forces they had assembled in Sclauonia and Romagnia.

The Venetians
begin to recou-
rer their losse.

Without doubt Trenio alone repaired the Venetians honour, and the chiefe cause of this accident, as also to put the Venetians in more hope, was the negligence and ill government of the Emperour, who during the course of so many victories, had made shew but of his name onely; and these importune delays had caused the King to take his way towards Milan, to returne speedily into France. The Kings dislodging of his army, gave courage to the Venetians to recouer Padoua, which they knew to be vnfortified of men for the defence thereof. Andrew Gritti one of their Commisaries, had assembled 2000 men of the Country, with 300 souldiers, and some horse, & finding by chance the port of Codalungue halfe open, by reason of some Carts laden with hay, that were lately entred, he seized there on without noyse, and kept it, untill the Companies led by Cheslin Polpe, Zitole of Perugia, and Lazzaro of Bergamo were ariued, who held it almost an houre before that any alarme was giuen in the towne. This repisall made the way to recouer Legnague, a very commodious towne, and annoy Vincenza and Verona.

One of the ancients said, That we must not trust our fortune, else she will win her selfe terrible. Hereafter she leaues the Emperour and returns to the Venetians. The Marquis of Mantoua lodgeth in the Ile of Escala, in the country of Verona, attending the preparations which the Bishop of Trent, Gouvernour of Verona, made to besiege Legnague. Duke Malheureux with 200 light horse, and Zitole of Perugia, with 800 foot, and 1500 of the Country, besides the garison of Legnague, entring one morning into the said Ile, surprised the Marquis his troops sleeping, spoile them, leading the Marquis, with his Lieutenant Boiss (Nephew to the Cardinall of Amboise) prisoners, leauing a lesson to Commanders in the war, to be vigilant, to weigh their owne forces, and not to contemne their enemies. On the other side the Venetians in Friul recovered Valdesere by force, E Bellone by composition, & fortified themselves in the Vincentin, by the taking of many other places, as of Seraluade, a passage of great importance, the which Maximilian recouered soone after, with the like crueltie vpon the Italians, as the Italians had vsed vpon the Germans at the taking thereof; for hauing not yet assembled sufficient forces to go to field, they make small attempts, besieging now one bourgh, then another, with small honour and reputation for the quality of an Emperour: soliciting notwithstanding all his confederates, to vnite their forces for the taking of Venice. But who should haue reaped the profit? The Pope would neither haue the Emperour nor King possesse it: and the Catholike King detested this enterprize as vnjust and dishonest, moued therunto, not with shew of vertue, but with enuy the which he bare to the greatnesse of our Lewis his Vncle, who he thought should haue the greatest benefit by this conquest.

Whilest that the Emperour filled all Italy with a vaine feare of his force, he sent the Prince of Anhalt with 10000 men into Friul, who at his entry tooke Cadore with a great burchery of those that defended it, and the Duke of Brunswicke (whom the Emperour had likewise sent) did put to rout 800 horse, & 500 foot, which John Paul Gradenige, Commisary of Friul, brought to the succour of Ciuital of Aultria, which the Germans besieged. Christopher Frangipan did also defeat the Venetian Officers, followed by the forces of

A of the Country, he wasted the Country, and seized vpon Chasteaufort, Fiume, and Rauprich. And the Venetians sending Angelo Trenio generall of their army at sea thither, recouered Fiume and Rauprich. I conclude, by hungry prizes and repries, men goods and liues were continually in prey.

The Emperour hauing now assembled all his forces, prepares for the siege of Padoua. Besides the forces of the Empire, he had seven hundred French Lances, commanded by the Lord of Palisse: two hundred men at armes, which the Pope had sent him. Two hundred more from the Duke of Ferrara, vnder the command of the Cardinall of Este: six hundred more at armes vnder diuers Italian Captaines, eighteen thousand Lansquenets: six thousand Spaniards, six thousand aduenturers of diuers Nations, and two thousand foot, which the said Cardinall brought vnto him for the Duke, with so wonderfull a preparation for peeces of battery and munition, as the issue of this siege held all Italy in suspense. The Emperour had already taken Limini, neer vnto Padoua by force, when as there chanced a signe of happy successe for the Padouans and Venetians. Philip Roffe, and Fredericke Gonzaga of Bossole, went with two hundred light horse, to guard the artillery that came out of Germany: six hundred horse issuing out of Padoua, hauing intelligence thereof, charge them in the night, defeat them six miles from Vincenza, and take Philip Roffe.

The siege of Padoua.

The Emperours
army.

And in exchange, Maximilian hauing extended his companies about twelve miles off from Padoua, to be assured of the commoditie of victuals and pasture, takes by assault and takes the bourgh of Este, Montefice, and Montaguane, ouerthrowes 3000 peasants at the bridge of Bouolente, and carries away a great prey of Cattel, which they had gathered together. At length after many delaies (which gaue the Padouans leasure to fortifie and furnish themselves with victuals) he is planted before the towne walls the 15 of September. As for the defence of Padoua, the Venetians had furnished it with 600 men at armes, 1500 light horse, and 1500 Stradiots or Albanois, commanded by Captaines of great experience, the Earle of Pentillane, Bernardine of Montone, Anthony Pie, Luc Malheureux, John the Grec, and twelue thousand choise foot, vnder the charge of Denis de Nal, Zitole of Perugia, Lazzaro of Bergamo, Saccasio of Spoloto, and many other of D meane quality, and 10000 foot, Sclauones, Grekes, and Albanois. And why should not 20000 foot, and 3600 horse defend Padoua, with that multitude of Venetian youth, who (to make proofe of their valour and piety to their Country) had willingly thrust themselves into the towne, seeing they could not haue forced them in field, within any small trench? Padoua was furnished with great store of all kinde of artillery, victuals, and a great number of peasants, who continually labored in the fortifications.

The fortifica-
ons of Padoua.

The ports, and other fit places were furnished with ballions without, and euery vault vnderneath full of bartells of powder, to blow vp such as did assault them. And within round about the City a Palissadoe, or fortification of piles, trees, and peeces of timber; fortified with a deepe ditch, sixteene fadome broad: flanked with Casemates and small towers full of artillery: and behinde the ditch a rampier of the same breadth, round about the towne, except some places where they could not plant any artillery, and before the rampier, a parapet of seven cubits high, to couer them that should defend the rampiers.

Behold all the Imperiall army is now planted before Padoua, but this was not to attempt a towne besieged, but rather an army camped in a towne, which made head against an army, holding the field. The artillery thunders eight daies together, and preuailes so much, as it seemes they need not to shor any more. They giue an assault to the Bastion; at the point of the port of Codalungue.

The Spaniards and Lansquenets (seconded by some men at armes on foot) win the bastion, and plant two Ensignes: but both the fortresse vpon the ditch, the valour of the defendants, the abundance of instruments for defence, artillery, stones, wilde-fire, and all other kinde of offensive armes, force them to abandon it in hast; many remaining dead or wounded, so as the army being ready to assault the wall (the bastion being wonne) hee retired and disarmed without any further attempt. Maximilian despairing of victory by these preiudiciall beginnings, after seuentene daies siege raiseth his campe, and passing (in his retreat) by Vincenza and Verona, receiues their oath of fidelity, he then dismiseth almost all his army, and tooke the way to Trete; determing to make a truce with the Venetians for some months. ciates to aide him fo coldly, and fupposing that a furreafing of armes would be preiudiciall all vnto them, they prepared to recover Vincenza, Ciuitelle, Baffan, Montefice, Moitagnagno, Este, Polefine, and in the end to make war againft the Duke of Ferrara.

But he that vnderakes too much, repents fometimes. Defire of reuenge is a dangerous Counfeller, and the refolution not to endure a wrong either done, or pretended to be done, grounded rather vpon paffion then reafon, is commonly the caufe of the authors ruine. Alphonfo D. of Ferrara recovering of Polefine, had (in hatred of the Venetian name) wonderfully fpoiled the gentlemens houles of the country; he receiued the towne of Este from Maximilian in fee, and Montagnagne in mortgage. The Venetians (building the motives of their difdaine thereon) fend their Generall Angelo Treuifan with 17 Gallies, and a great number of other fmall veflels, towards Ferrara, and a good number of horfe by land, to fecond their army at fea, the which being entred into the Riuer of Po, and hauing burnt Corbole, and fome other Villages neare adioyning, they fpoiled all the Countrey euen vnto the Lake of Scure, and without difficultie recovered all the territory of Polefine. To withftand thefe violent courtes, the Ferrarois plants his artillery vpon the bankes of Po, to ftop the paffage of this army, and forceth Treuifan to caft anchor in the midft of the riuer, behind a fmall Ifland right againft Palicelle, a commodious place to moleft the Ferrarois, and there he fortifies himfelfe with two bafions vpon the bankes, the one on the fide of Ferrara, the other oppofite, whileft that other veflels affailing the Duke of Ferraras country in another part, take Comache.

army in 1501.

The Duke ftrengthened with 150 Launces, which the Lord of Chaffillon brought him, and 200 men at armes which the Pope fent him (difcontented that the Venetians had invaded this Duchy, without refpect of the fuperiority which the Church hath over it) fauoured with the knowledge of the country, and the nature and opportunity of the riuer, hauing brought his cannon to the bank oppofite to the enemy, being covered with a ftrong cauley, after an affaile giuen to the bafion, where his men had the worft, he fiftured the Venetian fhips fo furiously, as fome not able to refift, yeelded: others fired with the fhore, were miserably burnt with the men that were in them; others finking, efaped the enemies hand, and the Generall faved himfelfe by flight in a cocke-boat, his Gally flying, fhooting and defending it felfe; was in the end fenne.

To conclude, the riuer being full of blood, fire and dead men, fiftene gallies came in to the Dukes power, fome great fhips, many foits, and other fmall veflels in great number: threefcore enfignes taken, and 2000 men flaine. This army defeated, Alphonfo fent prefently Hippolito Cardinall of Este his brother, againft that army which had taken Comache: but the losse of the other hauing forced them already to retire, the Cardinall employed his forces to recover Loreto, which the Venetians had fortified.

This done, the Pope defirous to tye the Duke of Ferrara vnto him, to the end that acknowledging the good he fhould receiue by his interceffion, he fhould depend more vpon him, then on the King, againft whom hee laid the foundation of great hatred, was a meanes the Venetians fhould yeeld Comache to the Ferrarois, & fhould no more moleft his eftate. And to reconcile them with Maximilian, he fends Achilles de Graffe B. of Perfetia his Nuncio vnto him. But through the Emperours exceffive demands, and the Kings Ambaffadors croffing it, Achilles returned without effecting any thing. The fafon made them proceed coldly in matters of war, vntill the end of this yeare. Maximilian and Ferdinand had contended before the King for the gouernment of the realme of Caffile: the firft for Charles his grand-child, the fecond building vpon his wifes teftament, as wee haue feene before. In the end, the Cardinall of Amboife (not confidering how much this accord did preiudice the Kings affaires) drew Maximilian to confent, that the Catholike King, in cafe he had no heires male, fhould be gouernour of the realmes of Caffile and Naples, vntill that Charles his grand-child fhould come to the age of 25 yeares, and fhould pay vnto the faid Charles forty thoufand ducats yearly, fifty thoufand to Maximilian at one payement, and fhould aide him according to the treaty of Cambray, to recover that which belonged vnto him. A convention which gaue courage to Ferdinand to encounter the Kings greatneffe, the which in regard of the realme of Naples hee alwaies feared. Doubtlefle ambition did to blind the eies of this good Cardinall, as he could no more difcouer this groffe policy, then fore-fee that death prepared him a Biere in ftead of a pontificall Chaire. In the end of this yeare died the Earle of Petillane, generall

Although they proceed flowly in matters of war, yet Princes mindes were diftracted with many diftemperatures, efpecially the Emperours, who defpising to get the victory of the Venetians by his owne proper forces, perfwaded the King to attempt the recovery of Padoua, Vincenza, and Treuifo, receiuing a fufficient recompence. The King knew well, that whileft the Venetians poffeffed a foot of land, he fhould ftill be fubieft to continual charge and dangers. But he was diuerted from paffing of the mountaines, by the fickneffe of the Cardinall of Amboife, to whom only he committed all his affaires: fearing likewife left a new army fhould wholly withdraw the Pops affeetion, who long before deified, by what meanes he fhould diflodge the French out of the eftates of Italy, and fearing (as we haue faid elfe-where) left the King (being armed) fhould difpoffeffe him of his chaire, to place the Cardinall of Amboife in it, he laboured to draw the English from the Kings friendfhip, he praftised to ioyne with the Suiffes, by meanes of the Bifhop of Sion, to the preiudice of this Crowne, and protected the Venetians.

In truth, we may behold three Princes act three diuers perfonages vpon this Theater. The King of a faithfull allice: the Emperour of a weakie; and the Pope of a midloyall. In the end, the King (the better to fupply the affaires of Italy) goes to Lions with an intent to pacifie the Pope, or at the leaft, to keepe him from being his enemy. To this end hee fends Albert Pie Earle of Carpi, with commiffion to offer the Pope both the Kings forces and authority in all occurrents, to impart vnto him the affaires that were now handled: the requetts which the Emperour made vnto him, and to leaue it to his difcretion, to paffe or not into Italy: Were not thefe fufficient fubmiffions to pacifie any difcontented minde?

Contrariwife, Julius receiued the Venetians into fauour, and the 24 day of February gaue them full and absolute remiffion. He ftill follicits the English to take vpon him the title of Protector of the fea of Rome, againft the French King, againft whom (faid he) if he made war, many others (to whom his power was odious) would rake armes. But hee drew the Suiffes with more efficacy to the protection of the Church, paying a hundred florins yearly to euery Canton. The boldneffe and prefumption wherewith they refused to renew their alliance with our Lewys (but vpon condition to augment their penfions) had iuftly difpleafed the King: but this vnreasonable repulle fhall proue very peiudiciall to this Crowne. The King in exchange allies himfelfe with the Valaifans and Grifons, who binde themfclues to giue paffage to his people, and to deny it to his enemies, and to fene him for pay, with fuch forces as they could make. The Pope fortified with this new alliance, bends all his thoughts to fupport and raife the Venetians, to reconcile them to the Emperour, and by their rifing to pull downe our Lewys.

But the Pops alienation ferued onely to kindle new fires in Italy. The Emperour and the King difcontent with the fhewes which the Pope made in fauour of the Venetians, diuided themfclues more ftrictly together: and the D. of Ferrara gaue the King occafion to auance his forces, for the protection of his eftate: for the Duke hauing felt an impoff vpon all the merchandife that paffed by the Po to Venice, the Pope commanded him to free it, as not being in the difpofition of the Vaffall to impouere a tribute without the liberty of the Lord of the fee. And in cafe hee difobeyes, he denounceth war againft him. The Duke thus threatend, fies to the King, who had before taken him into his protection, giuing thirty thoufand ducats; his eftate alfo importing the King much for his affaires of Lombardie: yet loath to contend with the Pope for the Duke of Ferrara, he propounded conditions, whereby the Pops might reft fatisfied of the intereft, which the Church and he pretended againft the Duke.

In the end, as the Pope (the more hee fees himfelfe fought vnto) fhewed greater fignes of bitterneffe, the Lord of Chaumont enters into Italy with fiftene hundred Launces, and ten thoufand foot: to whom the Duke of Ferrara fent two hundred men at armes, five hundred light horfe, and two thoufand foot. At their firft entry they take Palicelle, Montagnagne, and Este. Then the Prince of Anhaute, Lieutenant to the Bifhop of Bour, paffing from Verona with three hundred French Launces, two hundred men at armes, and three hundred Lanquens, ioynd with Chaumont, and jointly together they march againft Vincenza.

He to Chaumont to obtaine some reasonable conditions of the Prince, who wonderfully moved with their rebellion, would not receive them with any other condition, but to have their goods at pleasure, and their lives saved. These victories were fruitlesse, without the taking of Legnague, the which the river of Adice diuides into two parts, whereof the les is called Porto. This river is diuided into many branches about Legnague, passing the last branch, they encounter some footmen, set to guard Porto. Our men charged them, repulse them, kill a great number, chase the rest, and enter pell-mell with them into Porto. The taking of Porto made the meanes easie to batter the towne on either side then: for the effecting whereof Chaumont sent Captaine Molard with 4000 men, and six peeces of artillery, who having in a manner battered downe the bastion, which was upon the causie, at the point of the towne; the Venetian Commissary retired himselfe into the Castle, and the Capitaine which commanded the bastion, yielded to depart with bag and baggage. The bastion taken, the towne was sackt by Molard, and the Castle battered, yielded the next day, upon condition, that the Venetian Gentlemen remaining Chaumonts prisoners, the souldiers should depart with white wands in their hands. At this time died the Cardinall of Amboise, vncle to the Lord of Chaumont, a man of a great spirit and long experience in affaires, but with the seruice of his master he did not forget the content of his owne priuate ambition.

Ciuitelle, Marostique, Basciane, Feltré, l'Escale, and other places thereabouts (abandoned by the Venetians) opened their gates vpon view of the Cannon. To conclude, all places where the armies passed, were expoid to takings and retakings, sacking and burning, and all pactions were at the victors mercy. Manfred remained yet. The towne is situate in a plaine, and the Castle on the mountaine, compassed in with three walls, whereof the lower required 2000 men for the defence thereof. By reason then of a new contention betwixt the King and the Emperor, that his army should continue yet a month longer in Italy, and that the extraordinary charge, about the payment of the Companies which the King had till then defraied, should afterwards be payed by the Emperor, and the footmen also for that month, and in consideration of 50000 crowns, which the King should add to 50000 others that he had formerly lent the Emperor, Verona with the territories thereof should remaine in pawne to his Maiestie, vntill it were satisfied: Chaumont besieged it; Seven hundred foot and some companies of horse, having vpon their approach abandoned the towne, kept the first wall. He battert it, and makes a breach in diuers places. The French (followed with 1500 Spanishe Launces, newly arriued, vnder the command of the Duke of Termini) mount to the assault, chase the Garison, and skirmishing with them, they enter pell-mell within the other two walls, and so into the Castle, the most part being slaine. Such as were retired into the dungeon, yielded: when as the Germans setting it on fire, burnt both the place and the men, so as of this number few escaped either the fury of their armes, or of the fire. The towne was likewise consumed to ashes: This done, a new commandement from the King, calls backe Chaumont, with his army, into the Duchy of Milan: which the Pope began to disturbe. Moreover, two armies of diuers nations ioyned together, to make priuate conquests, hardly can the Commanders remaine long vnited in one will. And the Germanes (who can doe little alone) lodged in Lonigie.

We haue hitherto seene, that Pope Innocent designs tended, not onely to restore the Church to her preroged estates, but also to expell the French out of Italy. His first project was effected; And now many considerations draw him to the second. The Venetians are partly restored, and all at his deuotion, hauing reuoked their censures. He is strictly allied with the Swisses. He knows well, the Arragonois will be alwaies glad to see the Kings greatness diminished, to haue the better meanes to settle himselfe at Naples. He findes the Emperors forces and authority to be feeble. He is not out of hope to draw the King of England into armes. And that which feeds his couetous passion, he is well informed, that the King hath no will to make war against the Church; and that at all times it shall be in his power to make peace with him, and this is the last helpe the Popes hath alwaies relied on. But with what colour may Innocent arme against our Lewis? The King will not giue over the protection of the Duke of Ferrara, and Innocent desires exceedingly the possession of his Duchy, grounded (although the Seignorie of Comache, whence Alphonse drew the last, belonged directly to the Emperour) vpon the dislike for the

At the salt pans, and customes which Alphonse leaued vnlawfully, and without the leaue (said he) of the Lord of the Fee. This was a crosse device to cloake his couetousness: To colour this, he vrgeeth the King againe to renounce the protection of the Ferrarois: vpon his refusal, he protesteth to fly from the treaty of Cambray: that he will not ioine with him, neither yet be opposed vnto him, and that without trying himselfe to any person, he will hereafter seek to maintaine peace in the Church. But on S. Peters day, he discouers in effect the motions of his minde: that day the rents due to the Apostolike see are paid; he refuseth to accept those of the Duke of Ferrara, alledging for his reasons, that Alphonse under the sixth marrying his daughter Lucretia, could not (to preiudice the See) reduce four thousand Ducats to an hundred. And the same day (having before refused to giue the French Cardinall leaue to return into France) advertised that the Cardinall of Auch was gone to field with his dogges and nets, he sent to pursue him, before he fughe; and held him prisoner in the Castle of Saint Angelo. And to win vnto him the Catholike King, against the Most Christian, he grants him the inheritance of the regnone of Naples, vpon condition to pay the same rent which the ancient Kings of Arragon had paid; and entertainment for three hundred men at armes; for the defence of the Church, when it should be demanded.

A leaue bestowed vpon and the Pope against the King.

But behold a strange turbulent spirit, who attempting at one instant to assaile Ferrara, Genoua, and Milan, toiles himselfe infinitely to bring forth paine and confusion. The Ferrarois offered to giue him the salt made at Comache, & to binde himselfe, there should be more made: yet proceeding against him, as against a notorious offender, hee sends his troops by the D. of Vrbin into the territory of Ferrara: who at his first arrival, and at the onely summons of a trumpet, takes Cante, Pieue, Bagnacual, and Lugo: But as he camped before the Castle of Lago, Alphonse coming with his people & some French companies, the D. of Vrbin raised the siege, leauing three peeces of Cannon behind him (it is dishonour for a Commander to lose his artillery) & retired into Imola; giuing Alphonse means to recouer that which they had taken from him in Romagna: But the army of the church was no sooner refreshed, but they take the same places, & likewise Modena. He sent eleven Venetian Gallies against Genoua, whereof Grille Comarin was Generall: D and one of the Popes, in the which were Ottavian, and Iohn Fregosse, Ierome Dacie, and many other banished men. And by land Mark Anthony Colonne with an 100 men at armes and 700 foot. About the same time 6000 Swisses (in the beginning of September) passing by Bellinzone, camped at Varese, where 4000 more ioine with them: but this proues but a fire of straw. Innocent hoped that Genoua being assailed both by sea and land, it would breed some infallible alteration; that the greatest part hating the French command, would easily maintaine the name of Fregosse, and that the French amazed with this alteration at Genoua (being likewise prest by the Swisses) would recall into the Duchy of Milan, all such Companies as they had both with the Emperor and the Duke of Ferrara: that by consequence the Venetians would recouer Verona, and he enjoy Ferrara; and then with their united forces invade the estate of Milan. But he reckoned without his host: for now hee the proceedings of these armes. They shut those gates against him which he expected to finde open. Chaumont at the first brute of the enemies approach, had manned Genoua with some Companies. Freian a Prouencal was entred the port with six great gallies, the sonne of Iohn Lewis of Fiesque, with 800 men of the Country, and a Nephew to the Cardinall of Finall, with no lesse number, was come into the towne, for the King; and these together presented all insurrections. So the Pope and the banished men, frustrate of their chief hope, retire to Rapalle. And Colonne foreseeing that he should hardly recouer any place of safety by land, for that the Commons were risen, hee shipt himselfe in the gallies, with three-score of his best horse, and sent the rest by land to Speite, who for the most part were spoiled vpon the Marches of the Genouois, Luxois, and Flouentines. On the other side, the Swisses which camped at Varese, vnder colour (as they say) to go to serue the church, found in the end, to their losse, that they did but serue the ambition of one priuate man. Chaumont hauing manned all the passages with sufficient forces, sends Triumle to Mont Brian, that with his troops, & the helpe of his Country men, he might keepe the Swisses from seizing on the passage: and he himselfe coasting along by them, and still skirmishing with them, with his horse and foot, and many field peeces, cuts off their victuals, and performing the duty of a good Capitaine, without hazarding of anything he annoyed them at the passages of rivers. To defeat a poore but a warlike nation, there is nothing but blows to be gotten: & in losing, they hazard an estate. In the end, besides the continuall charges of the French army, oppressed with want of victuals & money, they free our men (who are not accustomed to spend much in spies) of the doubt which troubled them, whether they would passe to Ferrara by the Duchy of Milan, or turne by the hills vnder Como, Lecque, Bergamo and Brescia, or else by the Galears, through the territory of Mantova: for taking their way by the high places of Como, they went to lodge at the bridge of Trese, where (brought to extremities for want of bread and money) they retired by troops to their houses. Whilest the French were thus busied, the Venetians (making profit of their absence, & of the Germans retreat) without tolls, Esse, Montefice, Montagnone, Marosique, Bassano, & Fincenza. They besieged therein Verona overthrew them. They besieged it with 800 men on horse, 3000 light horse, and 10000 foot, besides an infinite number of peasants, and battered from a mountain opposite, being contrary battered, and wonderfully spoiled by the artillery from the towne. But the Venetians desire was great to conquer this City, and the value of the besieged was no lesse to defend both their honours and liues.

They had four hundred French Lances, three hundred Spaniards, a hundred German, and Italian, five hundred French foot, and four thousand Germans, which the Prince of Anhalt (dead some few daies before) had left there: a thousand foot, with some hundreds of French issued forth in the night, put them to the sword that kept the artillery posted two peeces, and carried them away, when as Zitole of Perugia, flying to the rescue, and being slain with almost all that followed him, Denis of Nalce arrived, who recovering the prey, repulsed and beat them within their walls. But the Venetians dashed with this check, seeing no rising of the people, as they expected, advertised of the Sufferers great, and that Chamont came to succour them, retired to S. Boniface. The war continued in Friul and Istria, with the accustomed insolencies and cruelties on either side, but more to the ruine of the Country and buildings, then of the people. At the same time the Marquis of Mantova came out of prison at the Mantovans suit to Baiatzet Prince of the Turkes, in whose loue the Marquis had many years held himselfe.

The Pope was not grown wise neither by his owne nor other mens losses: his vaine attempts had nothing daunted his hopes: and they found the prowerbe to be true: He that hath a companion hath a Master. A wit blinded with presumption: who (seeing his practices now discovered; the port of Genoua furnished with a strong army; the Towne prouided of all things necessarie for defence) hopes to obtaine that now which he could not get when the port was disarmed: he periwades the Venetians to a second attempt: they come to Genoua with fiftene light gallies, three great, one Galliesc, and three Biscane ships. The French fleet going out of the haven, with two and twenty light Gallies, after they had giuen order that the contrary faction should not rise, met with them at Porto Venere: where by the thunder of their Cannons, and by the Tower of Codifa, they forced them to retire to Ciuita-uechia, whence the Venetian fleet parting to recover the Gulfe, a tempest cast five Gallies vpon the Coast of Messina: the others beaten and bruised, were driven vpon the Coast of Barbary, and in the end recovered the port of Venice, halfe lost. The army which came by land led by the Archbishop of Salazie, brother to Ottavian Fregese, by Iohn of Safarelle, and Romer of Salate the Popes Capitaines, seeing the fruitlesse attempts of the fleet at Sea, instead of Genoua, went to take Faiane in the mountaine of Modena. A small recompence for so many vaine attempts.

This disgrace did rather increase the Popes obstinacy, then make him faint. He might easily obtaine a peace of the King, and with such conditions, as might well content a Conqueror. The King was content to referre the Duke of Ferraras cause to Justice, and gave power to the Pope, to name such Iudges as he pleased. But Julius following the holy Oracles, Lined cursing, and cursing followed him: and for that he took no pleasure in blessing, it forsooke him seeing the King yield to so reason able conditions, he impudently demands, that Genoua be set at liberty, & with such bitterness, as the Duke of Savoyes Ambassador (offering his Princes intercession for their peace) hee puts him in prison, & tortured him as a spy. He conuerts all his thoughts against Ferrara. The Venetians thrust him forward, fearing (left in the end, losing the hope of his designs) hee

A should be reconciled to the King. And the King sufficiently informed of the Popes bad affection, resolues to defend the Ferrarois; and both by spirituall and temporall armes, to troffle the Popes insolencies.

In the end of September the Pope comes to Bologna, with an intent to assaile Ferrara, both by water and land; the Venetians on the one side, and he on the other, perswading himselfe, that at the same of his forces, the people would rebell against Alphonso. But the Venetian companies having brought many barks by the river of Po, into the territory of Mantoua to make a bridge, the Duke of Ferrara, with the French forces, set upon them unawares, took them, and many vessels in certaine Chancells of Polefine, with the Venetian Commissary. Then was there discovered a practice which the Venetians had in Brescia, for the which the Earle Iohn Maria of Martingone was beheaded there. This stay of the fleet did nothing discourage the Pope, but perswading himselfe that his owne forces were sufficient to conquer Ferrara, he assembled them all at Modena, vnder the Duke of Valbin being General, the Cardinal of Paucy, Iohn Paul Bailion, Marc Anthony Colonne, and Iohn Vielli, Capitaines of authority: whilest that Chamont encamped right against them at Rubiere and Marfaille, trying them with daily skirmishes; hee gave the Ferrarois means, with the Lord of Chaffillon, to recover Polefine, Final, and Genere. Having lackt and burnt it to ashes, he went to ioyne with Chamont, upon as three hundred men at armes, many light horse, and four thousand Venetian foot came to win the passage of Po, and to ioyne with the Popes forces; having already taken Fiequeras and Stellato on the other side, and forced Alphonso to goe to the succour of his Country. Thus the two Venetian fleets, having free passage vpon Po, did greatly annoy the Ferrarois territory by daily inroads and spoiles: when as the Duke issuing out of Ferrara put to rout that fleet, which was entered the river of Po, by Primare, & came vnto Adria: the other which consisted of foists and small vessels, being entred by Foraces, and come to Puliselle, seeking to passe into the river of Adice, by a river adioyning, they found the water so low, as they could not enter, but were so battered by the Ferrarois artillery, as they abandoned their ships, seeking to save themselves and their Cannon.

The Pope seeing he could preuaile nothing by his temporall forces, he flies to the spirituall, excommunicating Alphonso of Este, and all those that were or should come to his succour, namely Charles of Amboise, with all the chiefe of the French army. This furious course made the King to assemble all the Prelates of his realme at Tours, with the most famous Doctors of all his Vniuersities, as well in diuinity, as in the ciuill and canon lawes, who resolue vpon eight notable conclusions against the Pope. "That it was not lawfull for the Pope to assaile any temporall Princes, by force, in their territories not belonging to the Church. That it was lawfull for any such Prince for the defence of his subjects and Country, not onely to repell this iniury by force, but also to innade the territories of the Church possessed by any such Pope; not with an intent to hold them, but to the end (the Pope being dispossessed thereof) should haue no more meanes to molest his estate: seeing the Pope had, through the aide of the said Prince, recovered the same lands, usurped before by certaine tyrants. That for so manifest a wrong and vniust attempt, any such Prince might withdraw himselfe from the Popes obedience, for the defence of his temporall estate, seeing he had stirred vp many other Princes and Common-weales, to invade the Dominions of the said Prince, who deserved reward and loue of the Apostolicall See. That this subtraction being made, they should obserue in France the common and ancient law, and the Pragmaticke sanction, enacted at the Councell of Basile. That any such Prince might by force defend another Prince his confederate, and of whom hee had lawfully taken the protection, for those Seigneuries which hee had long enjoyed, and with a iust title, seeing this confederacy had been made with the consent of the said Pope, who as the chiefe was comprehended therein and that this Prince allied according to the forme of the league, had giuen aide for the recovery of the patrimony of S. Peter: that the Pope pretending any thing due for any rights belonging to the Church of Rome, and the Prince on the other side challenging to hold of the Empire, and should refer this controversy to the censure of indifferent Iudges, as equity required, that in this case it was not lawfull for the Pope, without further knowledge of the cause, to make war against any such Prince: the which if he did, the said Prince might oppose his forces with other princes his confederates, so as that right had not been possessed by the Roman church within

 Ambassadors to Inliu, in the name of the French Church, to admonish him by brotherly ly and spirituall correction, that leauing his desires, he should attend to peace, concord, lous and charity, and reconcile himselfe with the foresaid Princes: vpon refusal, they should summon him to call a general Councell, according to the decrees of the holy Councell of Basill. That his answer heard, things should be ordered according vnto reason. In the meane time forty light horse and six hundred foot (hauing at the first summons of a trumpet yodelled Carpe to Alberti Pies) were encountered by foure thousand foot, led by Chaulisse, defeated, and in a manner all slain. And Chaumont desirous to charge the French forces, before they should ioyne with the Venetian companies, and three hundred Spanish Launces, which Ferdinand had sent him, in consideration of the im-pture of Naples: but not able to draw them, but to some light skirmishes, by the persuasion of the Venturiers, he turned his forces against Bologna, where the Pope remained sicke, both doubtfull of the peoples faith, being besieged, and so discontented with the long stay of the Venetians, as he protested publicly to Ierome Donat their Ambasador, that if their succours entred not the next day into Bologna, he would agree with the French. And at that instant sent he Iohn Francis Pic, Earle of Mirandole, to treat with the Lord of Chaumont. Chaumont not to alter this good disposition, vnder-standing the Kings pleasure, keeps his troops within their lodgings, and sent backe the Earle with these propositions: That, Alphonse of Este, and all those the Pope had comprehended in his censure should be absolved: That in regard of the Venetians, nothing should be done contrary to the treaty of Cambrai: That the controuersies betwixt Alphonse and the Pope should be decided within six monthes by Iudges chosen by their common consent: That Modena should be restored to the Emperor, Corignole to the King, and the Cardinall of Auch set at liberty: and that the gift of all benefices within the Kings dominions should be according to his nomination.

But Chiappin Viselli entering into Bologna with six hundred Venetian light horse, and a squadron of Turkes which they had in pay, made the Pope to sing another note, That there was no means of accord, if the King did not absolutely abandon the defence of the Ferrarois. And Chaumont seeing that neither by the treaties of Peace, nor by force he preuailed any thing, the people of Bologna holding themselves quiet, and at the Popes deuotion, being also afflicted with the winter, and want of victuals, he returned to Chastilaunc & Spilimberge, the which he had lately taken. Chaumont is no sooner gone, but the Pope strangely incensed, exclaimes against the King to all Christian Princes, as thirsting after his blood and the territories of the Church, hauing caused him to be besieged with all his Cardinals and Prelats in Bologna: and returning to his former course with more vehemency, he sends his troops to field augmented by 500 men at armes, 1600 light horse, 5000 foot, and 300 Spanish Launces. But whilest this army iournes about Modena, some squadrons running toward Rhegium, being defeated by the French, they lost an hundred horse, and the Earle of Matelique was taken prisoner. Moreover, the D.
 of Ferrara with the Lord of Chastillon encamped vpon the Po, betwixt Hospitale and Bondin, opposite to some other Venetian companies that were on the other side of the river: they sunke nine of their vessels, & forced the rest to returne to Venice. These small victories were crost by taking of Salsole & Forminge, whilst that Chaumont refresheth himselfe within Paia & Asigara at Rhegium. These conquered towns incensed Idione more violently against Ferrara, the which he knew was well furnished with men, and things necessary for defence: & the French through the continual toile of the war, were tired both in bodies & minds. And presuming to make the enterprise more easie, he went himselfe in person the 2 of January before Mirandole, advertised that Chaumont had made an escape

A to Milan, drawne thither (as they said) with the loue of a young Gentlewoman: A iour-ney which did greatly quail the courage and hope of them that defended Mirandole, who see themselves abandoned, not so much by the negligence, as by the dissention betwixt Chaumont, and Iohn Iagues of Triuulce, (who then was gone into France): whereby it may be, he was not much displeased to see the Earles of Mirandole (grand children to Triuulce, by reason of Francis their Mother, his bastard daughter) deprived of that place. In the end, after all the duties that might be performed by men besieged, despairing of succours, seeing a breach made, and the water of their ditches so frozen, as it bare the souldiers, they obtained in the end (by the intercession of the Cardinals which assisted the Pope) to depart with bag and baggage: vpon condition, that Alexander Triuulce Gouverneur of the towne, and all the Captaines should remaine prisoners: and to restore the towne from sacke, which he had promised to his souldiers, they should pay a certaine summe of money.

Mirandole to ken.

After the taking of Mirandole, two things were propounded in Councell by the French: whether they should assaile the enemy, or besiege Modena or Bologna, to draw the Popes forces out of the Estate of Ferrara, and by that means to draw them into a convenient place for a battell. Great Capraines hold it for a firme maxime, and experiences hath alwaies taught it, That we ought neuer to vndergoe the hazard of a battell, but for some great aduantage, or when as vrgent necessity doth constrain. This was the ad-uice of Triuulce, newly returned to the campe, and accordingly resolution was taken to go to Modena. But let vs obserue a Spanish trick. The policie & secret aduertisements of Ferdinand did more harm to the King his vnkle, then the Popes open force. He thinks this to be a means to pacifie the Emperors spleene, and to sow some diuision betwixt the King and him. Modena was held time out of minde, to be a see of the Empire, and the boyles of Este had not enioyed it but by the Emperors inuoluntarie. Ferdinand then adiusteth the Pope, to the end the French should not haue it, to restore it to the Emperour, as a towne of his iurisdiction. So Vitfruch, Maximilians Ambassadour, hauing receiued it in that forme, gaue notice vnto Chaumont, that Modena did no more belong vnto the Pope, but to her ancient and lawfull Lord. And to enioy this restitution quietly, Pittfruch D and Chaumont agreed together, that the French forces should not offend Modena, nor the territories thereof: and during these garboiles betwixt the King and the Pope, it should fauour neither party.

Then died Charles of Amboise, a Captaine, whom the name of the Cardinall of Am-boise his vnkle, and the government of the Estates of Milan, and of the Kings armies, holding great reputation in Italy: a faithfull seruant to his King, but (to beate so great a burden) he wanted a longer experience in the art of war: seeing that after the death of his vnkle, through that defect he was become contemptible to his souldiers: to whom to keepe them the better at his deuotion, he gaue too much liberty. Iohn Iagues of Triuulce, as Marshall of France tooke vpon him the command of the army, attending the Kings pleasure: and inflamed with an honest ambition to performe something worthy of his vantage, hauing in the month of May gathered together twelve hundred Launces, and some thousand foot, he besieged, took, and sacked in one day the towne of Corone, and aduon Chastilaunc by composition. Then approaching Bologna, he demanded the Pope, as hauing founded the Bolognois mindes, and drawne from them an expectation of help, he left the Cardinall of Paia there, and retired to Rauenna. He is no further grieved, but the people looking to the preservation of their priuie, and present estate, rather than themselves furnished with two armies, they take armes and hinder the Cardinall from bringing in of any forces. The Cardinall fainting, & fearing the vnkle must see should see some damage for their honourable Citizens: whose heads he had lately cut off, as trophies to the Venturiers, flies in the night disguised into the Chastilaunc from thence towards Imola with an hundred horse.

Bologna taken

The next night being knowne, the people began to found out the name Papale, with great murmur and tumult. Laurence Ariosto, Francis Rimbis, and other Captaines of the town, were sent to the Barbale to runne to the gates of S. Felice and S. James, break their way, call the Populares and receive them into the towne. The Duke of Vermigli ad-uised the Legats to go and see the people smiling, disguised in the night, (being half past of his rate and poulions standing) with all his army, except such as for the guard of

the campe were on the other side of the river towards the French, to whom he gave as intelligence of his departure. The people understanding of his retreat, and the pefians coming downe from all parts, with great cries and shouts, pursue them, take fifteen peeces of great artillery, and many lesse, the D. of Urbins standard, their munition and baggage. The souldiers had time to save themselves, whilst that Raphael of Passy, one of the captaines of the Church, made a stand at the bridge of Rene, untill that by the taking thereof, and rout of all his people, the whole army had a free passage to Bologna. A victory extraordinarily happy, having in one night conquered a great city, and without perill or fight broken a whole army. The Bishop Vitelli held the Cittadell, and Vilfridi posting thither in the night, perswades him to deliver it into the Emperors hands: but three thousand Ducats which the Bolognois gave him, made him to open the gates: the people having recovered it, and to free themselves both from subiection, and the jealousy of nations, and also from the feare they had lest the King should retaine it, ruined it to the ground. The Duke of Ferrara making his profit of this victory, recovered Cento, Pieve, Cotignole, Lugo and other townes of Romagna.

At the same time the Emperors and the Kings Deputies, assisted by the Cardinals S. Croix, S. Mala, Baieux, Casense, Albert, and many others, publish a Councell at Pisa for the first of September, the which was lately returned to the obedience of the Florentines. To crosse this Councell, the Pope (following the advice of Anthony de Mui of S. Sanjoan, one of the eight Cardinals newly created at Ravenna, appointed a general Councell the 1 of May, at S. Iohn de Lateran in Rome. And to keepe the Kings quiet, he colourably gave care to a peace, which the Bishop of Tioli his Nuncio, and the King of Scots Ambassador treated for him with the King, and the Cardinals of Nantes and Strigonia with the Pope. But these practices of Peace are broken by the Popes infirmity, the which having brought him even to the pits brink, gave him yet a spit to stir up long calamities. Julius is no sooner freed from the danger of death, but makes a new league with the Senate of Venice and the King of Arragon, against the French: to maintain (said he) the union of the church, to defend it from apparant schisme, and to recover all such places, as mediately or immediately depended on the Church.

The first of September was come, when as the Cardinals Attornies, in their names, celebrate the acts appertaining to the opening of the Councell of Pisa. And the Pope much incensed, that the Florentines had yielded to the celebration of this petty councell (as he termed it) in their estate, declared Florence and Pisa, subiect to the Ecclesiastical censure, by vertue of the Bull of the councell which he had caused to be published: and he pronounced the above named Cardinals fallen from the dignity of Cardinall, and subiect to the punishments of hereticks and schismatics. The Florentines and Pisans appeale from this curse to the holy Councell (not of Pisa, but to erre least in their termes) of the vniuersall Church: and by the Magistrates commandement, the Priests continue the publique celebration of diuine seruice in their Churches. The pretext to reforme the Church was goodly and of great profit. But oh pleasant reformers! the Authors of this Councell, thrust on by their own priuate ambitious desires, vnder colour of a general good, contented of their own priuate interest, so as euery one might plainly see, that the sooner should be chosen Pope, would have no lesse neede of reformation, then they now undertook to reform. So as euen at their first entry the Cardinals tried both the tempte & hatred of the Commons. They call the Clergy to assist in the cathedral Church at the first session. No one appeares, the Priests deny their ornaments to the Cardinals offering to celebrate the masse, and that the Church doores, so as the Cardinals, fearing they should not remaine safe at Pisa, vnlesse they were back with forsaige forces, and the Florentines vnwilling to admit any, remembering the Pisans rebellion vnder Charles the eighth, they decreed to haue the Councell transported to Milan. They founde like difficulties at Milan. The Clergy abstaine from saying seruice, as before accused persons: the Commons curse them and laugh at them in open streets, namely at the Cardinal of S. Croix chosen President of the Councell, whom euery one noted to bee the author of this assembly, hoping by fauour thereof to make himselfe a foot-stoole to climbe to the Popedom. This refusal of the Milanois made them againe to transport the Councell to Lions. A he did not only excommunicate all the French, but also granted Bulls of pardon & remission, to any one that should kill a French man: giuing the Realme of France (& that of Navarre, in hatred of Iohn of Albret allied to the King, and at the perswasion of Ferdinand King of Arragon, who had long gaped after some occasion to lay hold of it,) in prey to the first conqueror. So this councell did nothing but increase their spleenes and kindle new troubles. But as the King had an intent to assaile Romagna, or to maintain the war in another Country, attending his owne coming in person the next spring with all the forces of his Realme, behold 16000 Suisses, with seven field peeces (new raised by the Cardinall of Sion, vnder the authority of Julius) enter by Varese and Galere, and from thence they send a trumpet to desce Gaston of Foix, D. of Nemours, who with the Count of Triulze commanded the French armies, as Lieutenant General to the King his Vncle. Gaston (having speedily assembled 700 horse, and such foot as the vrgent necessity would suffer him, the companies being diuided into sundry garisons) presents himselfe before Galere, with much artillery. The Suisses go forth in battell: yet vnwilling to fight in so open a place, they retire to Buzi. In the meane time, the companies of men at armes, and foot, come from all parts to Milan. Captaine Molare with his Gascons came from Verona, & the Lanquenets from Carpi, who reuiued the spirit of the Milanois, being somewhat danted by this sudden descent. And the more, for that certaine letters were surprised, which the Suisses had written to their Lords, that they had no newes, neither of the Pope, nor of the Venetian army. So as having found some difficulty to passe the river of Adde, they tooke (as in their first journey) the way to Como, and so euery one to his home. Shewing, that for want of conduct, assistance and pay, they doe commonly terrifie more then hurt.

After the Suisses retreat, behold all the townes the Ferrarois held in Romagna were exposed in prey to the Spaniards, being ioyned to the forces of the Church, who assembling at Imola, a thousand men at armes, eight hundred Genetaires, and eight thousand Spanish foot, with many Barons of the Realme of Naples, vnder the command of Fabrice Colonne, their General; and for the Pope eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, and eight thousand Italians, vnder Marke Anthony Colonne, Iohn Vitelli, Mad Auguston to Iohn Paul Bailon, Raphael of Passy, and others, all subiect to the command of the Cardinall of Medicis, Legat in the army, resolving to bessege Bologna. The Duke of Nemours had put into it, (besides the inhabitants and some horse and foot entertained by the Bentiuoles) two thousand Lanquenets, and two hundred Lances vnder Oder, son to Peter of Foix Viconte of Lautrec, Tues of Alegre, Anthony of Fayer, Peter Terrail, surnamed Captaine Bayard, and in the meane time assembled all the forces of Italy together at Final, to preferre Bologna from the enemy. Already a hundred sadome to the wall neere to S. Stephens gate was layed euen with the ground, the Tower at the gate was already abandoned, and the Spaniards had planted an ensigne vpon the wall, when as the besieged placing their Cannon in counterbattery, and hauing slaine some of them that were mounted, they forced them to retire in disorder.

These first attempts had troubled the people, if Gaston had not suddenly re-enforced the Towne with a thousand foot, and a hundred and fourescore Lances. The besieged thus fortified, a strange successe doubles their courage. Peter of Nauarre having set fire to a myne which he had made at the port of Chastillon, where there was a chappell, both the wall and the Chappell leaped so into the aire, as the army without discovered the towne plainly, and the souldiers prepared to defend the assault, but both the wall and Chappell falling downe, settled in the same place from whence the violence of the fire had forced them. Doubtlesse the Bolognois had reason to make a miracle of this accident, and to believe, that this fall vpon the same foundation, was a manifest testimony of Gods assistance. This happy successe brought Gaston to Brescia, whither the Venetian army marched, to effect some intelligences: but perswaded by the Captaines of Bologna, that his absence would double the enemies courage, he parts from Final, and marching all night (notwithstanding the snow, and violent winds) entered the City in the morning, with thirteene hundred lances, six thousand Lanquenets, and 8000 French and Italians, before the enemy had any notice thereof: who being assured of the truth, retired their artillery secretly, and took the way to Imola. In the meane time Andrew Gritti, general of the Venetians (perswaded by Count Lewis Auogare, and the most part of the Countrymen) had had taken the towne of Brescia by assault, where James of Aillon Lord of Lude kept the Castle hill. People newly conquered do commonly the like in all occasions. Bergamo (the two castles excepted) Orcinoue, Orcinoue, Pontuque, and many places thereof, obey the victors. The Duke of Nemours leaving 300 lances, and 4000 foot in Bellonia, posted with all speed to Brescia, and having intelligence that John Paul Bailion lodged in the life of Escale, with 300 men at armes, 400 light horse, and 1200 foot, heges to charge them with 300 lances, and 700 Archers; having overtaken them (as they were ready to passe the river of Adice) at the tower of Magnanin, he chargeth them, defend them and kills almost a hundred horse, takes many prisoners (amongst others Guy of Raigon, and Balhazar Signiore of Perugia) dispersed all his foot, (whereof the most part were drowned in passing) and takes two Fauconneux which he had. The next day, in an encounter, he defeated Melager of Furl, Capitaine of the Venetian light horse, the commande remaining prisoner: so continuing his designe, he arrived at Brescia nine daies after his departure, besieged it, takes it by force, and sacks it. Doubtlesse this braue Prince did hazard his owne ruine, if he had not, with great iudgment and order, commanded; that no man should looke to any spoile, before the towne were fully at his command. And hee did well put it in practice, as the first that made shew to abandon his ranke, was slaine by his companions. But who doth use such discipline at this day, when as being greedy of booty, they lose to goodly occasions? Our French lost some men at armes, and many foot: but the enemy lost about eight thousand: some being inhabitants armed, some Venetians, who were five hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, two hundred Souldiers or Carbins, and eight thousand foot. Frederick marion Commisary of the Stradiots was slaine. Andren Griiti, Anthony Iustinian, John Paul Marston and his sonne, the Cheualier Polpe, Balhazar of Scipion, one of the sonnes of Anthony of Pie, Count Lewis Augere his two sons, and Dominique Busche capitaine of the Stradiots were prisoners. Count Lewis and his children (the chiefe authors of this rebellion) were afterwards beheaded. A reuolt dearly bought by this City, which yielded not to any other in Lombardy, in Nobility and dignity, and in wealth (next vnto Milan) it exceeded all the rest.

This chastisement made Bergamo and the other reuolted Townes, to call backe the French whom they had lately expelled. These prizes and reprints, conquests & happy successesse, prolonged the stay of the French in Italy, and yet they did nothing fertile thereof, seeing what they enioyed, was rather a charge and expence to them, then any profit. But behold strange crosses both by land and sea, doe hereafter bandy against the happiness of our men. They giue the King intelligence from Rome, that Henry the eight King of England (notwithstanding his promise) was ioyned in league with the Pope, and it was confirmed by writing, that a Gallies laden with wines, corne, & other provisions, arriving in England from the Pope, had exceedingly altered Henry, with the Nobility, Clergie, and commons of England. That he should with his army at sea invade the coasts of Normandy & Britany, and send 8000 foot into Spaine, to begin war in Guienne ioynly with the Arragonois. And they made already great preparations of men and shipping in England, and likewise of ships in Spaine, to passe into England.

Moreouer, the Emperor was altered and changed in his affection, complaining that the King (contrary to the capitulation of Cambray) did hinder the aduancement of the Empire in Italy. He required that René the Kings youngest daughter should be promised to Charles his grandchild, giuing him Bourgonne in dowry; and that the Lady should then be presently deliuered into his custody. That the conquests for Ferrara, Bologna, and the Counsell should be referred to him. And moreover, having made a truce with the Venetians for eight months, hee protested, not to suffer the King to increase his state in Italy. But these were but bare shifts to couer his bad intent. Besides, the Carrons of the Swisses were so incited against this Crowne, that although the King sought to win their loues with store of gold, yet the persuasions of the Cardinall of Sion (whom they may see that Cardinals haue bene alwaies dealers in matters of State) had him made them grant to the confederates a leaue of sixe thousand men. And the Pope straine all his strings against our Lewis, fearing lest his extreame rigour should induce the Florentines to follow the Kings fortune, to the preiudice of his designes, he reuokes without any lye, the censures whereunto he had bound them. To quench this fire before it flamed farther, the King commanded his Nephew to march

army in Italy.

A march with speed against the confederates army, of whom he promised himselfe the victory, being amazed and the weaker, and then to assaile Rome & the Pope with all violence desirous that this war (so seeme the lesse odious) should be made in the name of the council called first at Pisa, and that a Legat deputed by the Councell, should receive the conquered Townes, in the name thereof. The Cardinall of S. Severin was appointed Legat of Bologna in the army. So the duke of Nemours furnishing all places with men necessary for defence, gathers together all the forces the King had in Italy, hee makes an army of 1600 Lances, 5000 Lanquenets, 5000 Galscons, and 8000 French & Italians, to whom the Duke of Ferrara added an hundred at armes, two hundred light horse, and a great quantity of good artillery: Gascon having left his at Final by reason of the bad way. The enemies army was 1400 men at armes, a thousand light horse, seven thousand Spaniards, and three thousand Italians newly leauied.

Gascon thrust forward aswell by the Kings command, as by his owne valour and desire of glory, was desirous to see if the enemy would willingly try the hazard of a battell. They on the other side temporized, attending their Suisses, and that the English and Spaniards beginning war in France, should force the King to call backe all, or the greater part of his troopes: and yet coasted alongst the French army, lest the townes of Romagna should be left in prey, and the way layed open to goe to Rome, lodging alwaies in strong places, neere to some strong towne, which might serue them for a retreat at need. So the Duke of Nemours (not able to cut off their victuals through the commodity they had of the townes of Romagna, nor force them to fight, without great disadvantage) goes and intencampes before Rauenna, hoping they would not be so base minded, as to suffer such a City to be lost before their eyes: and by this means an occasion should be offered to fight with them in an equall place.

The enemy discouering this purpose, sends Marke Anthony Colonne to Rauenna, with three score men at men of his company, Peter of Caltre with an hundred light horse, Salazar and Parades with sixe hundred Spaniards: The towne is seated betwixt two riuers, Ronque and Montone, which descending from the Appenine hills, straiten themselves neere vnto Rauenna, with so small a distance, that on either side they passe close to the D walls, then ioyning together they run into the sea three miles from thence. Gascon intencampes himselfe betwixt the two riuers, and plants his artillery, some against the tower of Ronconne betwixt Port Adrian and Ronque, and some on the other side of the riuier Montone, whither almost halfe his troopes were passed to batter in diuers places, and to hold the riuier at his will. He batters the wall, makes a breach of thirty fadome, chooseth ten out of euey company of men at armes to couer the foot: diuides his army into three squadrons, and giues a furious assault, although they could not mount but with ladders, the wall remaining yet about three yards high. Those within maintaine it valiantly, and fighting the space of three houres, in the end they repulse our men with the losse of three hundred foot and some men at armes, with a great number hurt: amongst others the Lord of Chastillon, master of the Ordnance, and Spineuse, who being hurt with the Artillery from the Towne, died within few daies after. In the meane time the Citizens auzed, and fearing a more dangerous charge, treated of their yielding without the consent of Marke Anthony Colonne, when as beheld, the enemy comes, marching to their succour, who camps at Moulinache three miles from Rauenna, fortifying themselves with a trench, such as the shortnesse of time would permit, leauing an entry of about twenty fadomes.

Gascon raiseth the siege, turns the mouth of the Cannon towards the enemies, on Easter day the eleuenth of Aprill, passeth Ronque, leauing his reuerward led by Louis d'Alger vpon the riuers side towards Rauenna, to succour the army at need, to make head against those that should issue out of the towne, and to keepe the bridge which they had made vpon the riuier of Montone: then disposing of his troopes, hee giues the alarme, guard to the Duke of Ferrara, the battell to the Lord of Palisse, and the Cardinall of Saint Severin, who great both in mind and body, couered from the head to the foot with most glittering armes, performed the office of a capitaine rather then of a Prelate. Gascon referred to himselfe no priuate charge, but would be free, to see, and succor in all places: the beauty of his armes, his callocke, is cheerefull countenance, his eyes full of vigour & sparkling for toy, made him very apparent. The enemy seeing our French passe the riuier, were ranged in battell battell. Fabrice Colonne led the foreward, the Cardinal of Medicis, Legat of the Council of Lateran, the battell: but (a fatal signe) in a peacefull habite: Carnagial a Spanish Capitaine, the reerward. So the two armies approaching one the other, stood immovable about two houres, the enemies being loth to abandon the circuit of their palliade. The Spaniards artillery thunders, and at the first volley overthrew many French.

The French answers, but with a greater losse to their horse. Peter of Nauarre having caused the foot to couch flat vpon their bellies, Fabrice cries, presteith, and importunes, to go to the battell, and not to suffer them to be consumed by the Cannon. The Nauarrois contradicts, presuming that the more the danger increased, the more famous would the victory be which hee expected. But the Cannon had so scourged their men at armes and light horse, as they could no longer keepe their ranks. There might you see men and horse fall dead to the ground, heads, armes and legges flie into the aire, when as Fabrice cries out: Shall wee die shamefully here, by the obstinacy and malice of a villaine? Shall this army be consumed, without the death of any one enemy? must the honor of Spaine, and Ith, be lost for the pleasure of a Nauarrois? Speaking thus, he presteith out of the trench with his company, all the horsemen follow him, the foot rife, and with fury charge the Lanque-nets. All the squadrons ioyne, danger, glory, hope and hatred of nation against nation, besth them in the combat. Fabrice Colonne is already taken by the Duke of Ferraraes compaignie, Alegre chargeth in flanke with his reerward. The Viceroy of Naples and Carnagial are put to flight, leading with them almost a whole squadron. The light horse are dis-ranked, and the Marquis of Pescara their Capitaine prisoner, being covered with wounds and blood. The Marquis of Padillia is likewise defeated with his squadrons, and taken prisoner. The Italian foot shrunke and began to turne their backs, if the Spaniards had not speedily come to second them against the Lanque-nets. But all the best men fled, and the Spanish Battalion retired in order, when as Gaston turning to charge them with a great troop of horse, not holding the victory absolute, if those retired whole, he went courageously to assaile them. But alas, as they charge the hindermost, they are inuironed by this battalion, cut in peeces for the most part, and hee (throwne vnder his horse) was slaine, being thrust into the flanke with a pike. Doubtlesse a happy death for him, hauing this content in his soule, to die in so young an age, honored with so much glory, the which he had purchased in few moneths by so many and so notable victories: but a fatal victory, polluted with the death of so braue a Commander, who but euen now began to make his name and his valor knowne, and by his fall caried with him the happiness of the French, and the strength of this army.

The Vicount of Laurec his cousin, remained almost dead by him, maymed with many wounds: but led afterwards to Ferrara, and being carefully looked vnto, hee escaped, to doe the King notable seruice. Gaston being dead, the Spaniards retire without trouble or lett: the rest of the army is broken and disperfed. The baggage taken, ensignes and artillery: prisoners of marke, Fabrice Colonne, the Marquises of Pescara and Padillia, Escelle and Bitonto, the Earle of Monteleon, Iohn of Cardone, Peter of Nauarre, many Barons and Noblemen Spaniards, Neapolitans and Italians, and the Legat of the Council of Lateran. There were slaine according to the common estimation, ten thousand, and a third of the French, amongst which were Alegre and Vierrois his sonne, Raimond of S. Maur, Melare and some other Galloine Captaines, Iacob Colonell of the Lanque-nets, a braue man, and commended to haue assisted much with his troope for the winning of this victory. Two thirds of the enemies, but almost all their chiefe Captaines and the bravest of their army, a great number hurt, and most of them that fled, were stript & beaten downe by the Countreymen, which lay in troopes by the way. And (for the last act of this Papall tragedy) Rauenna is taken by assault and cruelly sacked, and spoiled. Imol, Furly, Cesena, Rimini and all the forts of Romagna followed the victors fortune, and the Legate of the Councell of Pisa, receiues them all in the name of the said Councell. The body of Gaston was caried to Milan, with an honorable conuoy, in a litter followed by the aboue-named prisoners, and interred with a wonderfull mournfull pompe, namely of the souldiers, whose hearts he had so wonne, as they protested that nothing was impossible vnto them, vnder the leading of such a Commander. And the King his valetre, receiuing these heavy tidings, I would to God (said he) I were driven out of Italy, so my nephew de Foix and the other Noblemen liued. I wish such victories to mine enemies. A quith once more after this fort we shall be vanquished. Without doubt hee had reason, for from that time this armie (not able to finde a Commandeer of that credit) on the one side rich with spoile, on the other weake both of force and courage, by this so bloody a victory, seemed rather vanquished then victorious. This battell had killed the Court of Rome with terror and tumult, and the Cardinals running to the Pope, prest him with instant prayer to accept a peace, with such conditions as the King offered by the Cardinals of Nantes and Strigonia, wherewith the King was yet content, notwithstanding the happy success of his affaires: That Bologna, Luganum and all other townes, which Alphonso held in Romagna, should be restored, and the Councell of Pisa dissolved. Rais seeing these conditions very honourable for him, and that vnder colour of these paises he should flay the Kings army, vntill he heard the resolution of those, on whom hee grounded the rest of his hopes, subscribed these articles nine daies after the battell, promising on his faith to the Cardinals, to accept them: But our Leuis must try once more, how dangerous it is to moue a warlike nation. The Suisses wonderfully discontented with the Kings refusal to increase their pensions, by whose valour (said they) hee had conquered so great Estates without his R calme, and for that he had entertained Lanque-nets, as if he had meanes to make warre without their forces, they haue no sooner receiued a florine of the Rhine for euery man from the Pope (whereas before the King was enforced to giue much gold, and great presents to their Colonels, to haue them fight) but descending into Lombardy with ten or eight thousand men, they force Palisse Lieutenant generall of the Kings army, to retire to defend the Estate of Milan, Robert Vrsin, Pompey Colonne, Anthony Savelle, Peter Margant and Rance Mancin had (since the battell) accepted the Kings pay, and now the descent of the Suisses, and the dislodging of Palisse, makes some to lead such men as they had leauied with the Kings money vnto the Pope, others retain the money to themselves, only Margant (more modest then the rest) restores it againe. All this freed the Pope from feare, and confirmed him in his obstinacy. He begins the Councell of Lateran the 3 of May, pronounceth a monitory vnto the King: That he deliver (vpon the paines yet downe by the holy Canons) the Cardinal of Ardicke, taken prisoner in the warre, being at Milan: and after some sessions hee recourse, to attend the war.

The recovery of Iulius.

A new descent of Suisses.

Iohn Paul Bailion, Generall of the Venetian army, attended the Suisses in the territories of Verona with foure hundred men at armes, 800 light horse, and 6000 foot: being ioynd, they surpriseth a letter which Palisse did write to the Generall of Normandy, who remained at Milan: That it would be very hard to resist the enemies, if they turned towards the Duchy of Milan: A sufficient instruction to direct them in their course, which makes them to march towards Milan. Palisse had not with him above a thousand lances, and fixe or seuen thousand foot, all his other troopes being diuided into places for defence, and this generall of Normandy, as bad a warrior as a treasurer (I would not forget to name him, if I had learned his name) hauing after the battell of Rauenna, vnder color of sparing for the king, contrary to the disposition of present affaires, indifferently discharged the Italian foot & some French. And besides the small number of men, the dissention and disobedience of Captaines, and the souldiers contempt of their Commander, ioynd with the discomforts of a tired army: a Generall little regarded, ill accompanied, in a Country farre from succours, enuironed with mighty and many enemies, must needs produce losses great and sudden disorder.

Disorders in
army.

The best meanes our Captaines could finde, was to abandon the field, and disperse their troopes into the most important places. In Brescia 2000 foot, a hundred and fifty lances, and a hundred men at armes of the Florentines: in Crema fifty lances, and 1000 foot in Bergamo, a thousand foot, and a hundred men at armes of the Florentines. The remainder of the army consisting of six hundred lances, two thousand French foot, and four thousand Lanque-nets retired to Pontique, a strong place of situation, and sit to seer Milan, Cremonia, Brescia, Bergamo, and to withstand the enemy. But it is a great inconvenience to rely most vpon foraigne forces, so subiect to change. The Emperor giues the first stroke, hee calls home his Lanque-nets, and their departure making Palisse lose all hope of possibility to defend the Duchy of Milan, hee retires to Piquetion. So the Cremonois abandoned yeelde (except the Castle) at the first approach of the confederates, and pay forty thousand Ducats to the Suisses: Certaine banished men returning into Bergamo, cause a revolt, and Palisse being too weake to stop the enemies passage over the river of Adde, puts himself into Paula. But hee fought to prevent the ruin of a great building with a rush. Then John Jaques of Triulce, the General of Moravia, Anthony Maria Paleogio, Galeas of Genoa, and many other Gentlemen and Frenchmen the King, saving themselves in Piedmont, leave Milan in prey, which bound it the first summons to pay a great summe of money. Paula battered, and abandoned by the French, is saved by the great meane from spoile. All towns except Brescia and Crema, make haste to doe the like.

All the Country calls upon the name of the Empire. All is taken and governed in the name of the holy League (for so they called it) the Cardinal of Sion governs all at pleasure, and causeth all the taxes of the conquered townes to be given to the Swisses, as vpon the brute of this money, an infinite number of other runne and toyne with the first. Rimini, Cefenne, and Rauenna returne to the Popes obedience; Placentia and Parma yeeld willingly vnto him, as members of the government of Rauenna. The Swisses seize vpon Lucerne, the Grisons (who also in this crosse left the French alliance) vpon Volosine and Chiavenna, Genoua rebels, expels the French, and John Fregese, a Captain in the Venetians army, returning, causeth himselfe to be created Duke, as his father had bene. At the same instant the Pope recouers all Romagna, the Beniti also abandon Bologna, and the Duke of Vrbis seizeth thereon in Iulius name: So eery one polishes peece from the whole, and all these estates conquered with so great toyle, so much money, and such losse of blood, are lost at the first attempt, after this great victory of Ravenna, with little labour and lesse blood-shed. Truly, the best waies are confounded in iudgment of these things, and we must confesse, that the issue of humane affaires depend of a higher Councell then that of Man. Nowwithstanding, according vnto many whom I shall we impute the cause of these accidents, but to the death of the Duke of Nemours: for if he had liued, it is likely, that gouerning well his victory, hee had (which helpe that giues and takes) reaped many worthy therof. But greauis comes vnto from the East, nor from the West, nor from the desert, for it is God which gouernes, hee will downe one and raise up another.

The Pope still gaped with his old ambition, to haue Ferrara in his power. But by the tercession of the Marquis of Mantua, the Ambassador of the King of Arragon (for Alphonso was borne of a daughter of old Ferdinand, King of Naples) and the Colonei, Alphonso hauing demanded and obtained pardon of the Pope, vpon promise to doe the deeds and duties of a faithfull feudatary & vassall of the Church, Iulius turns his reuenge vpon the companies, wherewith the Florentines had ayded the King, whom he caused to be spoiled by the Venetian souldiers, with the consent of the Cardinal of Sion, who notwithstanding had giuen them a passport to passe safely into Tuscane. And by the practices of the said Iulius, who (according to the ancient desire of all Popes) fought to haue authority in this common weale, the Medicis, with the helpe of the confederates, returned to Florence, and seized themselves by force in the dignity which their father was wont to enioy. Italy being for this time freed from the feare of the French, the King holding nothing but Brescia, Crema, Legnague, the Chasteler and the Lanterne at Genoua, the Castles of Milan, of Cremona, and some other forts: all these confederates gaged after the Duchy of Milan: and the Swisses (on whom the Pope then partly depended) opposing themselves, not to suffer this estate to fall into the hands of any other Prince, but of such one as could not maintaine himselfe without their ayde and succor, Maximilian grand-child to Lodowick Sforze, was named D. of Milan, who made his entry in the end of December, receiving the keyes from the hands of the Cardinal of Sion, as confirming the said Maximilian. That hee held the possession of Milan in the Swisses name. An honorable act and worthy of their generosity, not to yeeld the honor which belonged vnto them to the other confederates, the which notwithstanding they should much esteeme, and (it may be) might haue obtained it for money. Nauarre returns soone after to the obedience of Sforze.

Then the Genouois recouered the Chasteler of Genoua, for ten thousand Ducats, given to the Capitaine, and the Venetians besieging Brescia, Asprigh who defended it, resolves to deliuer it to the Spaniards, to breed a ialousie betwix them, euen as a few dayes before Palis had giuen Legnague to the Emperour, to nourish a discord betwix the Emperour and the Venetians, who besieged it. Othman Sforze Bishop of Lode, and

A new league
where the Venetians are excluded.

A gouernor of Milan, sent foure thousand Swisses to conquer Crema, for Maximilian Sforze: but Benedict Cribario, corrupted by gifts, deliuered it to the Venetians, with the consent of the Lord of Duras, who kept the Castle. This was of purpose to breed a diuision betwix the Swisses and the Venetians. A Councell generally concluded by the French, which remained of this shipwrack, the which in the end wrought some effects: but the losse fell vpon the French, for with this first diuaine of the Venetians against the Emperour by reason of Legnague, beheld a new leuaine of discontent is layed by the Bishop of Gurce, Maximilian ambassador at Rome. He made great instance, that the Venetians should deliuer Vincenza to the Emperour, wherunto, neither solicitings, intratings, nor the Popes threats could induce the Venetians. The Pope (desiring to gratifie Maximilian: that in his fauor hee should approve the Councell of Lateran against that of Pisa) protested to the Ambassadors of Venice: That he should be forced to pursue their common weale both with spirituall and temporall armes. So as nothing moued with this proclatation, the Pope, the Emperour, and the Arragonois renew the league of Cambray, declaring the Venetians to bee excluded. So the Emperour (by the Bishop of Gurce, in the next session of this Councell of Lateran) disauowed all them that had vied his name in the Councell of Pisa, and allowed that of Lateran.

In the meane, the six thousand English (promised by Henry King of England) were staid at Fontaraby, a towne seated vpon the Ocean, and frontier of the realme of Spaine towards France, to assaile ioyntly (according to the conuentions of the two Kings of Arragon and England, father in law and son) the Duchy of Guienne, vpon this pretext the Arragonois had intreated John, sonne to Alain of Albret King of Nauarre, (by reason of Katherine of Foix his wife, heiress of the said Realme) to remaine a neuter betwix the King of France & him, and that for the assurance thereof, he should deliuer certaine places into his hands, promising to re-deliver them when the war should be ended. But the Nauarrois, knowing well the demanders intent, obtaines a promise of succor from King Lewis, who, to free himselfe from the Arragonois forces, treated with the Duke of Alua Lieutenant general for Ferdinand in this army. But when the one party is vigilant and politique, and the other slothfull, there soone appears great effects. The industry and vigilancy of Ferdinand, the slacknesse and too great facility of Lewis, who (abused with the policy and deuices of his nephew) did equally hurt the Nauarrois, who suffered himselfe likewise to be deceived with the fraudulent hopes wherewith the Arragonois entertained him, who (seeing the succors of France far off, the Realme vnfurnished of forces, and the places not yet fortified) enters into Nauarre, takes Pampelune, and the other Townes of the Realme, abandoned by John (being vnable to defend it) who fled into Bearne.

And hauing no lawfull title to possesse it, publisheth, that he is lawfully seized thereon, by the authority of the Apostolike see, whereby the said Realme was giuen to the first that should conquer it, by reason of the alliance which John had with the French King, a lawne enemy to the Church, and by the Popes bull, who being subiect to the censures, as heretikes and schismatikes. Without doubt the Pope holds not this prerogative of John Christ, to giue Kingdomes, and to expose them in prey: for he exhorted to yeeld to, and not to take from Cesar: & the Apostles did not busie themselves, to diuide earthly possessions. Moreover, is it lawfull for the Pope to vsurpe another mans right, giue away that which is not his owne, and consequently to vse the spirituall sword against those he cannot iudge, hauing declared himselfe a party? After the Conquest of Nauarre, the English persuaded Ferdinand to the siege of Bayonne, who without this place made no reckoning of the rest of Guienne. But he held that which he long wished for, as a commodious Country and very necessary for the safety of Spaine, and could not affect the war on this side the Pyrene mountains. So as the English, seeing that Ferdinand did vse them onely to further his priuate couetousnesse, tooke shipping and sayled into England.

To recouer this vsurped Realme, the King sent Francis Duke of Longueuille, gouernor of Guienne, Charles Duke of Bourbon, son to Gilbert late Vice-roy of Naples, Odet of Foix Vicount of Lautrec, John of Chabannes Lord of Pallise, Marshall of France, Peter of Terrail, the Lords of Maugiron, Lude, Barbezieux, Turenne, Elcars, Ventadour, Pompadour, and other valiant Captaines, with the old bands and Gascous, which hee assembled from all parts. But the army being diuided by the dissention of the Duke of Longueuille, who as Gouernour of Guienne, pretended the command to belong vnto him:

and the Duke of Bombon unwilling to yeeld unto him, by reason of his quality, proved fruitlesse for the King of Nauarre. Thus the Realme of Nauarre was invaded by the Spaniard, who remained master thereof. The departure of the English, and the enterprise of Nauarre being made frustrate, the King affects the affaires of Milan, with greater valency, whilst that the Castle, and that of Cremona held good: but the opposition of so many enemies bred many lets. There were many hopes to draw some one of these from this common alliance. The Bishop of Gurce had courteously given care to a friend of the Cardinall of Saint Seuerins, whom the Queene of France had sent vnto him, and bid him one of his people at the Kings Court to make a motion, that the King should bind himselfe to aide the Emperor against the Venetians: that Charles grand-child to Maximilian should marry with the Kings youngest daughter, to whom he should giue the Duchy of Milan in dowry: that the King should yeeld vnto them the rights he pretended in the Realme of Naples, and that the said duchy being recovered, Cremona and Guastalla should be held by the Emperour. Moreouer the Venetians were wonderfully grieued at the Popes new treaty with the Emperour: which put the King in hope to draw the Venetians vnto him. The Arragonois came betwene by a politicke stratageme: to make a new conquest of Nauarre, he had sent two Fryers into France (it is the Spaniards custom to manage affaires by the meanes of religious persons), to make their negotiations more graue, and to colour their policies with more subtilty) to treat with the Queene, touching a general peace, or a priuate, betwixt the two Kings. The amity of these did import much, but remembering that by their forces, Charles the 8 had first moued the peace of Italy; Lewis his successour, by meanes thereof had conquered the Duke of Milan, recovered Genoua, and ouerthrowne the Venetians; that at this present the Pope and other Potentates of Italy paid them annual pensions, to be receiued into their confederacie: They grew obstinate in refusing the Kings alliance, which hee sought by the Lords of Tremouille and Triuulce. In the end, the King (being reiecte by the same) seekes to the Venetians, who conclude to make a league with the King, according to the capitulations made formerly betwixt them, by the which Cremona & Guastalla should remaine to them. Robertus, Secretary of State, Triuulce, and almost all the members of the Councell approved this league. But the persuasions of the Cardinall of S. Marin opposite to Triuulce, and the Queens authority, (who desired much the gratification of her daughter by the foresaid marriage, so as the might remaine with her vntill the consummation thereof) made the King and his Councell incline to the Emperours parte. But discovering that these were but practises of the Emperour, to make the King succede more coldly in his courses, hee soone gaue it over.

Whilst that armes ceased on all sides, the Popes passions increased. Hee resented his designs against Ferraro, Sienna, Luques, Florence and Genoua; and as if hee were in his power to beat all the world at one instant: he thrust the King of England into war, in whose fauour he had dispatched a Bull in the Councell of Laceran; whereby the Duke of Most Christian was giuen vnto him, and the Realme of France againe abandoned to him, that should conquer it. But as he deuided of all these things, and without doubt of many other greater designs (according to the capacity of his turbulent spirit) death ended the course of his present toyles, the one and thirtieth day of February at night.

A Prince doubtlesse of great courage, of admirable constancy; and most worthy of glory, if he had directed his intentions to aduance the Church by peace, as he sought to grow great in temporall things, by policies in warre. John Cardinall of Madrie succceeded him, and was called Leo the tenth. The happy memory of his father, his lowly condition, free from bribes and simmony, his faire conditions, his liberality and mildnes of spirit, gaue great hope of the quiet of Christendome. Yet soone after his death, he shewed plainly that he was rather a successor of his predecessors hatred and obsequious passions, then of S. Peter. According to the treaty of the above named Fryers, the Kings of France and Arragon concluded a truce, whereby our Lewis, hauing more liberty to manke of the warres of Milan, resolved to send an army, knowing well that the people of that estate, oppressed with excessive taxes, leaues to pay the Swisses, and with the lodging and payment made to the Spaniards, desired earnestly to returne to his obedience. And to make this enterprise more easie, he accorded propoies before with the Venetians was againe renewed: so as the Venetians considering, that a concord with Maximilian

Peace betwixt the King of France and the Venetians.

(keeping Verona from them) was not sufficient to protect them from troubles and dangers, and that hardly they should get such an occasion to recover their estate, they binde themselves by Andrew Gritti: To aide the King with eight hundred men at armes, fiftene hundred light horse, and ten thousand foot: to recover Ast, Genoua and the Duchy of Milan. And the King, to assist them, until they had recovered all they had possessed in Lombardy, and in the Marquissate of Trensio before the treaty of Cambray.

The King knew well, it was but labour lost to seeke the Pope, who desired to haue no Frenchman in Italy. Yet the deuotion hee had to the Romane sea, made him sue vnto Leo, not to hinder him in the recovery of the aboue named places, offering not only not to passe any further, but also at all times to make such peace with him as hee pleased. But Leo treading the steps of his Predecessor, perswades the King of England to ioyne with the Arragonois in the inuasion of France, according to the Bull giuen by Inlio, hee protested to continue in the league made with the Emperour, with the Catholike King, and with the Swisses.

The King thus frustrate of a peace with the Pope, sends the Lord of Triuulce, with fiftene hundred Lances, eight hundred light horse, and fiftene thousand foot, halfe French and halfe Lanquenets. The whole Country was already in a mutiny; the Earle of Mulsacques, son to John Iames of Triuulce, was entred into Ast & Alexandria: the French had taken Cremona, Sonzin, Lode, and other places nere, and the Milanois had excommunicated themselves to their Duke, who was at Nauarre: for that hauing no man to defend them, they made their composition with the French, yet giuing him hope to returne to his subiection, when as the Swisses and his confederats should ioyne in field. Bartholomew of Aliuane, Generall of the Venetian army, had taken Valege, Pelquiere & Brefcia, when as the Kings army at sea approaching to Genoua, and finding Othobon and Simband, the sons of Lewis of Fiesque, leading foure thousand foot, and on the other side Antemel and Teroge Adornes, with a great number of the Countreymen: they tooke Genoua from the French, where the victors entring (transported with the fury of reuenge) the two Fiesques brethren, caused Zachary brother to the duke of Genoua, to be slaine, and then to be tied cruelly to a horse taily, and dragged through the City, being perished a little before, at the death of Jerome their brother, who coming out of the Palace, had bene murdered by Lodowike and Fregosin, brothers to the Duke.

Genoa taken.

All this succeeded well, but forty thousand ducats, lately sent by the Pope to the Swisses, had drawne an infinite number into the estate of Milan, thrusting themselves into Nauarre, at the first brute that the French meant to besiege it. It was the same Nauarre, where in Lodowik Sforze, father to this present duke, was taken prisoner. In the Kings campe were the same Captaines, Tremouille and Triuulce, some of the same Ensignes and Colonels which had sold the father, accompanied the son in this warre. And these presumptions caused Tremouille to make this over-bold promise to the King: that he hoped to deliuer him the sonne prisoner in the same place, where before he had giuen him the father. The representation of what had past, comforts this hope: but let vs take heed, lest vnder this colour we grow insolent and carelesse. Now the arrogancy of our French, finds a firme resolution in the Swisses, whereof follows a strange catastrophe, and an ouerthrow of the designs. The army batters Nauarre furiously, and layes a great part of the wall euen with the ground: but whereas the defence was wonderful hard and dangerous, so as Tremouille aduertised, that new Swisses were entred into it, and that Aloisius, a very famous Colonell, brought a great number, which coming by the valley of Aouit, approached to Lurec, despairing to take the Towne, hee retired his campe, to goe fight with the succors that came, making his accompt to breake the enemies, rather by their owne disorders for want of pay, then by the force of his armes.

But by the perswasion of Martin, one of their captaines, ten thousand Swisses issue forth in the night, the six of Iune, without horses or artillery, against a mighty army, and better provided: they set vpon our French, not addepe, but in a lodging vnfortified. The men at armes assemble at the first alarme of their Capitalls, rage themselves in battell, and the foot vnder their colors. The artillery layed many Swisses on the ground, when as the Sunne beginning to appeare, the body of their army resolving rather to be cut in pieces then retire, seven thousand of them fall violently vpon the Lanquenets, who guarded the artillery: and 3000 of them plant themselves with their pikes charged against the horse. The Suisses and Lanquenets, thrust on with a mutuall hatred, and a desire of a victorie, Hew one another with a bloody fury: one while the one thrunkes, is chafed and recoyles, and then the other: filling the field with dead bodies, wounded men, and with blood, in view of the men at armes, lodged so as the could not succour the foot, by reason of brooks and ditches, that were betwixt them. So the Suisses after two houres combat remained victors, win the artillery, turne the mouth of it against our men, and put both horse and horse to flight, of whom there is nothing remarkable observed, but that Robert de la Marck Lord of Sedan, understanding that Foranges and Lamets his sons, Colonels of the Regiments of Lanquenets, lay among the dead carcases, moved with fury and a fatherly affection, he runs into the midst of the Suisses troopes, and in despite of them layes the eldest vpon his horse, and the youngest vpon one of his men at armes, bringing them shut out of the conflict, being referred to shew future proofes of their valor. There died about fifteene hundred Suisses, with the author of this glorious Councell: Of ours, the west part of the Lanquenets fighting and of the French flying, vnto the number (as the Italian Authors say) of ten thousand. All the horse in a manner saved themselves: the Suisses not able to pursue them for want of horse, all their baggage was lost, and two and twenty peeces of great artillery, with all the horse appointed for the same. Doublesse it was one of the most glorious batels that euer the Suisses won: whereby wee observe, that be surprized and preuented, takes away all iudgement of command from the best commanders, dants the souldiers courage, and breeds confusion in order. This victorie being gotten, all places which had declared themselves for the French, craue pardon, and purchase their peace for money. Milan for two hundred thousand Ducats, and the rest according to their power, to be distributed to the Suisses, to whom was due the glory and profit of this victorie gotten by their blood and valour. Ottavian Fregese (aided by three thousand Spaniards, commanded by the Marquis of Pescara) enters Genoua, and causeth himselfe (to the preiudice of John his brother) to be created Duke of Genoua. Aluian (having left this happy successe of the Suisses and Spaniards should draw them vpon him) retires himselfe, takes Legnague from the Germans, besiegeth Verona, but in vaine, and then lodgeth his army within Padua. The two chiefe Authors of the Councell of Pisa, Bernard, Caruagial, and Fredericke of S. Suerin, amazed with this rout, went and craned pardon of the Pope, and were restored to the ranke of Cardinals. In the end of the year, the Caste of Milan and Cremona, returned to the Duke of Milans obedience, so the King held nothing in Italy, but the Lanterne of Genoua, the which we shall see taken and razed by the Genouois. Without doubt, he that seekes profit farre from his owne home, is oft times forced to returne poore and naked.

The King thus dispossessed of his estates in Italy, now turnes his thoughts and armes, to crosse the attempts of Henry King of England, who hauing (at the Popes perswasion) resolved to invade the Realme of France, agrees with the Emperour to giue him sixteene thousand Ducats, to enter into Bourgogne at the same instant, with 3000 horse, and eight thousand foot, Germans and Suisses, promising the Suisses a certaine sum of money, to toyne their forces with Maximilian, being content they should retaine a part of Bourgogne, vntill they were fully satisfied. According to this agreement, the English enters the marches of Picardy, and camps before Therouenne, with sixe thousand horse, and about forty thousand foot. But the English forces did not molest France at land onely, the Admirall of England ran along the coasts of Normandy & Britany. And the King to resist their incursions, caused foure Gallies to passe the straight of Gibraltar, vnder the charge of Captain Prigent. At the first encounter the Admirall chased Prigent into Breff. Here Prigent turnes his force, fights with the Admirall, and hurts him, whereof hee died within few daies after. After that, fourecore English ships, and twenty Normandy and Brittons ships, fought with equal forces, ours hauing the winde. But in the end Prigent was a Britton, Capitaine of the Nunne, which Quene Anne had caused to be built, best by ten or twelue English ships, and resolute to sell his death dearely, graped with the Regent, the chiefe ship of the enemies fleet, and firing it, burnt both the one and the other, with all that was in them.

Therouenne was defended by two hundred and fity Lances, and two thousand foot, whilst the King prepared 2500 Lances, ten thousand Lanquenets led by the Duke of Gueldres, sixe thousand others, which the Duke of Norfolk brought (being led

A long before (our of England) and sent thousand French, to succour the besieged, who in the meane time molested the enemy, day and night, with their artillery, with which the great Chamberlaine of England was slain, and Walter capitaine of Calais also legged. The troopes assembled, the King commeth to them, and sheweth the want of Lamets and John d'Albille, Marquis of Retelin, Capitaine of an English Regiment of his own hold. Victuals growdeant in Therouenne, when as the Lord de Pons, Gouverneur of Heandry, and the French Capitaine chose out the most select of all their troopes, and gaue them charge to the individuals to the Towne. And for that their enterprise had happily succored, they raying too confidently, and depending on the cheery of courage, they haue an intelligence of their intent, the English haue sent their horse, and fiftie thousand foot, to cut off their passage, who did ride on their noses disarmed, they charge them vnawares, (being ready to wade through a river that pasteth as Hoch) they kill about three hundred, and take many prisoners: amongst others, the Marquis of Retelin, Regard, de Rages, Clement of Anlon, and Safford Ambroise. All the rest casting away their Lances, and thrusting to their heels, and horses, saved themselves by flight. And therefore they call this battell of Purges, which caused the yielding of Therouenne, the which was almost ready to take away all cause of discord, betwixt the Archduke Charles, (who by ancient right pretended it,) and the English who challenge it, as conquered from the enemy by the sword. Henry the sonne of Charles the Duke of Burgundie, and Henry went to campe before Tournay, following in this resolution, not so much the actions of a good Commander in the warre, (seeing the taking of this place, lying within the Low Countries brought him small profit) as the persuasions of Maximilian, hoping that this towne pulled from the French, might in time returne to the obedience of his grand-child Charles, to whom they pretended it appertained. Tournay was furnished of men of warre, and despairing of succours, for that the King (not being master of the field, nor of sufficient force to withstand the English) could not succor it, saved himselfe from spoile paying a hundred thousand Crowns. To crosse the English at home, the King had stirred vp James King of Scotland (an ancient ally to this Crowne) but the successe of armes was nothing fortunate for him, neither at last, nor at last. After these victories, the end of October approaching, Henry left a great garrison in Tournay, dismissed his strangers, and tooketh his way towards England, carrying so other accompanie for so great, and sumptuous a preparation for warre, but the City of Tournay. But some designs vpon Scotland (fallen into a populls hands,) hapened him home. Another storme threatened France. The Suisses armed according to the former conuention: the King sends Trumouille vnto them, to disperse them, vnder whom many of the Colonels had received the Kings pay. But neither by presents, nor promises, prevailed he any thing: onely he had a secret intelligence given him from some Capetaines, to provide for the defence of his government of Bourgogne, whether the Pope, the Emperour, and Henry did thrust them. And beheld fourteene or fiftie thousand Suisses, with the 10000 of the French County, a thousand horse, and the artillery which the Emperour gaue them vnder the conduct of Ulrich Duke of Wirtemberg, camped before Dijon: Trumouille was returned, with a thousand Lances, and six thousand foot, who by his practices had greatly altered the Colonels, when as he mulctured doubting the faith of their Capetaines, takes the artillery, and battens the walls: Trumouille not able to resist the force of this nation, which increased daily, flies to the last remedy, and without expiating any authority from his Maiesty, agrees with them: That the King should renounce the right he had to the Duchy of Milan, and should paye them 400000 Crowns within a time prefest, which they pretended was due for their seruices in the former warres: and for assurance thereof, he gaue for hostages, his nephew of Mezieres Baisile of Dijon, and foure Bourgeois of the said towne, who saving themselves a while after in Germany, escaped the threats of these people to cut off their heads, if the King did not ratifie it. Doubtlesse these were wise men to saue their heads from the Suisses choier. A very preiudiciall accord for the King, if he had bene constrained to ratifie it: But was it not better to let the Suisses sleepe, then to lose Dijon? Our Lewis is now fixed as in incombustibles, the English, and the Suisses: But the exemption of present dangers freed him not from a relaps, for the English depending threatened to returne into Britany, and prepared already being lecherous, any more to long at the warre. The Emperour had the like intent to annoy him.

The Emperor affects to be Pope.

The Catholic King desired (as he was discovered by a letter, written to him Ambassador resident with Maximilian) the means to draw this Duchy of Milan to Ferdinand their common grandchild, younger brother to Charles the Archduke, shewing that by that means, all the other states of Italy should be forced to take their law from their shawl should be easier for the Emperor, assisted with the arms of Aragon and Naples, to make himself Pope, and which he had always desired since the death of his wife; and being installed in Saint Peter's chair, he should renounce the Imperial Crown in favour of the said Archduke. Moreover, the bad affection of the irreconcilable Swiss was a point. The sight of the hostages had newly incensed them, who threatened Bourgoigne and Dauphine, should not be ignorant of the designs of the said Council.

The Pope desired greatly the whole extinction of the Council of Pisa, especially in matters decided since by the ambition of the said Council, not against the Pope's authority, which (not touched) need needs breed great confusions. Yet could he not obtain abolition before the King did raise it. Three Cardinals were therefore appointed to redress these disorders. But the greatest difficulty was about the abolition of Genoa, which the King said they had incurred, thinking it a thing unworthy of the Apostolic see to grant it if the King did not demand it: the which his Majesty would not yield, whereby both his person and his Realm had been touched of shame. In the end, ruling over-ruled by the earnest suit both of the Queen and his subjects, weakened with so many crosses, resolves to yield to the Pope, will hoping hereafter, by this means, to find it favourable. And therefore at the session of the Council of Lateran, which was done end of the year, the Kings agreed in this name, and by his command, pronounced the said Council of Pisa, adhering to the Council of Lateran, and so obtained full remission of all things committed against the Romaine Church.

The death of Queen Anne.

Amidst so many foreign crosses which did infinitely trouble the King, there came a home-bred affliction, the death of the Queen, his wife. A Prince, indeed, with many virtues incident to an honorable Lady, and for this cause greatly lamented of the whole Realm. This death was the accomplishment of the marriage betwixt Francis Duke of Valois and Eisle of Angoulême; and of the King's eldest daughter, to the which had been deferred so long, for that the Queen had now Lais of Savoy, mother to the said Paul, and affected more to have Charles of Austria, afterwards Emperor, for her son in law. The Realm being reduced to the obedience of the Church of Rome, the Pope (to whom the Kings gave themselves as commonly fearfully) begins now to fear lest his power should be too much suppressed, and that the enemies of France should thereafter joyne their forces to the prejudice of the Romaine Court. To balance things in such sort, as he might sustain the middle, and that the means which ayded once his intentions, should not hurt another: considering that the irreconcilable hatred of the Swiss, might force the King to resign his rights of the Duchy of Milan to the Emperor and Catholic King, in regard of the marriage which they intended (a very prejudicial thing to the common weal of Italy); and holding it also dangerous to have the King to recover it, he persuaded the Swiss, that their extreme hatred might not force the King to take a course less hurtful to the liberty of their common weal: considering the little love which Maximilian and Ferdinand did bear them) then to the Church and all Italy; Maximilian to make the Kings defense into Italy more difficult at all eyes; he labours an agreement betwixt the Emperor and the Senate of Venice: who being resolute, either to have a peace concluded, or open war, would by no means give ear to any treaty, for that had been to leave the Emperors affairs at those towns which he enjoyed.

The Pope's persuasions were fruitless with the Swiss: the Emperor and Venetians made him judge of their contentions, but without decision for either party. He only commands them to forsake from arms; vail the proclamation of his sentence. The Catholic King could not more firmly assure the Realm of Navarre, then by a peace. Our Lewis did he prolong the truce for a year, adding to the former articles another new secret. That during the truce, the King might not molest the estate of Milan: That which the Pope could not get of the Swiss, he obtained of the King of England Henry, discontent that his father in law had againe devoted him; by the prolongation of a truce, his our his content grew daily more unwilling, to make war in France. The Pope desiring by some kindness, to win the Kings love, fearing daily, that Lewis oppressed with enemies would would ally himself, both by a peace and confanguinity with Maximilian and Ferdinand, he sent the Cardinal of York, to persuade his King, that in recompence what redemption of faith he had found in the Emperor; the Catholic King, and the Swiss, left contenting himself with his happy passage and returne, he should forbear any more to assist France with his forces. The Cardinal finding Henry disposed to please, whom the Duke of Longueville (a prisoner taken in the war) had already moved; and whose designs with all his heart, (having sent the General of Navarre) but more made colour to treat of the delivery of the Duke of Burgundie, smother his complaints to prison, they made an agreement betwixt the two Kings, in the beginning of August, for their lives, and a peace after their death, upon condition, that the King of England should deliver the Duke of Longueville, and the King of France should pay him for his ransom. The Duke should be bound to defend the estates one of another, with ten thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse, in land, and six thousand if it were by sea. And the French King should furnish the Duke of England with twelve hundred Lances at need, and the King of England with six thousand foot: but at his charge, that should have need. This peace was confirmed with the marriage of Lewis with Mary sister to Henry. But the Pope was not persuaded, to give so valuable might suddenly be converted into amity, and alliance, for his own good. For, as he had made the first motion, so did he expect to be made acquainted with the conclusion: wherein he made account to reserve this slaverie of Maximilian, which was the Duchy of Milan for a time. The Emperor and Catholic King were exceedingly jealous, yet the last assured himself to receive two comforts. The one, that the Archduke his grand-child was out of hope, to give his sister in marriage to Lewis: the other, that Lewis being in possibility to have heirs males, the succession of Francis Duke of Angoulême should remaine doubtfully, whom he hated exceedingly, seeing him greatly inclined to embrace the Realm of Navarre, to the ancient estate. The Swiss resolved, to use as a condition they bore unto the King, but forseeing that Lewis having peace with the Aragonois, and peace with the Venetians, and English, would employ his forces to recover Milan, and this should be a new whetstone to sharpen their hatred, and make their virtue knowne to the whole world. No man doubted of the Kings resolution hereon, and indeed he prepared for it, having retained the Lais of Savoy, which the Duke of Guelders had brought against the English.

And the Pope, although it were a very troublesome thing unto him, to have the King recover his estate, yet knowing that his persuasions could not disperse the enmities, he desired him (but faintly) not to prolong it, giving him to understand that thing were all prepared to resist. The Emperor had no forces, and as little money, the Aragonois army was growne weak, and not paid: the people of Milan poore, and brought almost to despair; no man could furnish money to make the Swiss march, and Lewis was now out of hope to agree with his Majesty for the Seignoury of Genoa. But Lewis observed this policy: All these negotiations came not from a sincere heart. The Pope fees every thing tired with travells past, and ill provided. And now the French had taken breath, and Lewis used themselves with new alliances: he begins to fear the King, and would suffer himself of histories, in case he came into Italy. Moreover, he began to think that he could not so easily recover the estate of Milan, by reason of a clause mentioned in the treaty with the Aragonois: and if it should fall out by his good digestion and will, should leave him for an excuse with the King, when as he should require either his consent or help. During this truce, the Lais of Savoy and Genoa, being devoted to all enmities for want of victuals, and not able to be sustained, yielded to the Genoyois, who made great use of the canopy. Thus the King was distressed with his conquest in Italy, and not without that the people make beapes of stones of Castles within their towns, when they fall into their powers, for they are but shackles of their liberty.

In the meantime, the new confederacy which the Pope contracted with the Emperor, betwixt whom and the Venetians, he laboured an agreement, to give him the fifth any notice thereof) lending him forty thousand Ducats, and receiving from him Modena in pawn, gave our Lewis new causes of jealousy and distrust. To be resolved then of the Pope's intent, he sends to intreat him, to declare himself in his favour; adding moreover, that it might not be in good termes of friendship with him, he would accept such conditions of Maximilian and Ferdinand as he had refused. On the other side, Maximilian million and the Arragonois wanted no persuasions full of efficacy; to vntite the Pope vnto assist in the defense of Italy: shewing; that if vnited together, they had bene able to shake the French out of the Duchy of Milan, they were not now more vnable to defend it against him. They did not omit to shew; that if the King prevailed in his designe, he would not faile to be reuenged at the same instant of all the injuries hee had receiued; namely, of the money, whereunto Leo had lately thrust the Swisses into Bourgoigne; and the authority of the Swisses (who continuing in their first spleene, offered for the said Florins of the Rhin, to make & defend the passages of Mount Sents, Mount Gennay, and Fochin; and for forty thousand Florins, a month to invade Bourgoigne with twenty thousand men) did strangely moue the Popes minde, who restrained by feare of the most desired, made more slemple to bewray his conceits; giuing them all good hopes, under generall termes.

In the end, being pressed by the King, behold his answer: That he had perswaded the Swisses Italy; when without danger or effusion of blood he might haue reaped an endless glory. That when other Princes haue so ordered their affaires, as there is no more hope to win, but with much hazard and blood. And for that the Turke had lately increased his power much by a notable victory against the Sophi of Persia, Leo therefore forbearing to add, that it was neither conformable to his nature; nor agreeable to his office, to see Christian Princes armes against themselves. That he could not but exhort him to (surrendering some more easie and better opportunity, which being offered, he should alwaies find him the same disposition to his glory and greatness, that he had some few moneths before him of ease and rest.)

This answer was sufficient to quail the Kings hopes of Leo's fauour; yea, to let him understand, that he would oppose both his Councell & forces against this enterprise. And the King, being resolved for the Duchy of Milan, according to the charge he had giuen the Duke of Bourbon. But death, which commonly cuts off the counsellors of men with his life, staied this resolution; to reuine it soone after in his next successor. For as he pleased himself exceedingly in the excellent beauty of his new Spouse, being but threene yeeres old, behold a sudden, accompanied with a flux of blood, frees him from the troubles and cares of this world, to enjoy an eternal and happy rest in heauen, nothing the first day of January with the exceeding griefe which his memory grained in the hearts of all his subiects. He was a godly Prince, iust, chaste, milde, temperate, loyall, loving his Princes, his Nobility and his people; and likewise beloued of them; a friend to truth, plainnesse and equity, an enemy to enuy, lying and flattery. Let vs observe for a testimony thereof this royall Apotheame, being vrged by the flatterers of the Court, to the usage of Lewis of Tremouille, who had overcome and taken him at the battell of Coignac. A King of France (saith he) doth not take vpon him the quarrells of a Duke of Orleans: If he hath faithfully serued the King his Master; against one who was but Duke of Orleans, he will doe the like forme, who am now King of France. But above all, hee was good to his subiects, whom he did alwaies studie to ease: for how many leanes hath hee made both of hisse and theirs, without the oppression of his people by any new impositions? How often haue his subiects willingly granted him an increase of Subsidies, to supply his raigne and domestical affaires, and yet would hee not allow of these impositions? Deferring rather to cutt off the expences of his owne person, and his house, to saue his people from oppression and spoile.

France was neuer scene so populous, so fruitfull, so rich, so well tilled, nor so well built as in this raigne. A happy raigne in the obseruation of Justice, martial discipline, liberty of traffike, increase of goods, cheapnesse of victuals; & which is more, every man to eate his bread quietly at his own board, free from the outrages and insolencies of soldiers. To conclude, neuer King loved his people so much, neuer Subjects loved their King more; neuer Subjects giue with greater joy to their Soueraigne, then the French did to him, that glorious surname of Father of his people.

FRANCIS

FRANCIS the FIRST: The 58 French King.

Fappy is that Realme (saith the wife man) which falls not into a childes hands. This was the first comfort which reuied the hearts of the French, oppressed with mourning and heavinesse for the death of their good King Lewis the twelfth: The second was, that they cast their eyes vpon a worthy Successor, a Prince well borne, iudicious, and of a generous spirit; liberal, courteous, in the prime of his age, and fit for government, affable to the people, fauourable to the clergy, pleasing to the Nobility (who do naturally loue their Princes good countenance) and (that which all subiects admire in their Soueraigne) of an excellent beauty. Thus capable was he of the royall dignity. Francis being then 22 yeeres old; before Duke of Valois, and Earle of Angoulesme, tooke vpon him the government of this Monarchy, as Son to Charles Earle of Angoulesme, Son to John Earle of Angoulesme, who was the youngest Sonne of Lewis Duke of Orleans (murdered by the Bourguignon at Paris, in the time of Charles the sixth) who was also the youngest sonne of King Charles the fifth. He was annointed at Rheims the 25 day of Iannary, being attended on by the Dukes of Bourbon and Alençon, the Barons of Montpensier, Vendosme and S. Paul, & the Prince of Roche-sur-Yon, all of the house of Bourbon. Then having made his entry into Paris, and a solemn Townie kept in S. Anthoines street, he confirmed all the ancient officers of the Crowne; and to supply those which were vacant, he created Charles D. of Bourbon Constable of France, (being void by the death of John the second Duke of Bourbon) Anthony Prat Chancellor; (for then Stephen Pencker Bishop of Paris was keeper of the Seale) Charles of Bourbon Earle of Vendosme, gouernor of the Isle of France, making the said Countie a Duchy, and a Peere of France; the Lord of Lautrec Gouernour of Guien, Palisse Marshall of France, Bosch his gouernour in his youth, Lord Stewart and Superintendent of his house; with whom he ioyned Fleuremunde Robert Secretary of State. With this title of French King, he tooke vpon him that of the Duke of Milan, not onely as descending of the house of Orleans, the true heire of that Duchy, but also as comprehended in the inuestiture made by the Emperour, according to the treaty of Cambray. And for that he succeeded equally both to the Crowne, and the desire his predecessor had to recouer that goodly estate of Milan, he therefore (to waite it with more facility) renewed the peace made betwixt the deceased King, and the King of England, sending home Mary the widow of Lewis, with a dowry of threethou thousand crownes a yeare: who afterwards married with the Duke of Suffolke. Hee also confirmed the alliance this Crowne had with the Senate of Venice. The Archduke Charles sent a very honourable Ambassage to the King, whereof the Earle of Nassau was the chiefe, to do him homage, for the Counties of Flanders, Arthois, and other Lands which held of this Crowne, & (the which gaue hope of a future peace betwixt these two Princes, both being young, but marked for great designs) to treat a marriage betwixt the said Charles, and Renée the Queenes sister; who was afterwards wife to the D. of Ferrara. And for that the said Earle was greatly fauoured by Prince Charles, the King desirous to gratifie him, caused him to marie with the daughter of the Prince of Orange, bred vp in his Court.

Charles was yet vnder age, but so carefully instructed by that wise Lord of Châlons of the house of Croy, whom the deceased King Lewis had made chiefe of gouernment in his youth (for that Philip the father of Charles, had by his testament appointed Lewis to accept the charge of his Son) that euen in his younger yeares he made him capable to vnderstand the affaires of state, presenting vnto him all packets that came, causing him to make report thereof vnto his Councell, & to determine all things in his presence. He did foresee, that after the death of Ferdinand his Grand father by the mother, the French might cross him in his passage from Flanders into Spaine, holding it dangerous to stand in the midst betwixt the Kings of France and England vnited together, and not to fortifie himselfe with this common alliance. Moreover, his subiects of the Low countries would haue no way with the Realme of France. The King likewise desired to take from him all inducement to gouerne himselfe hereafter by the Councell of his two Grand fathers. They therefore agreed; That the marriage proceeding betwixt the Archduke and Renée, the King should give him 600000 Crowns, and the Duchy of Berry for ever, to her and to her heires, upon condition he should renounce all rights of inheritance, both from father and mother, namely, to the Duchies of Milan & Brittany. That after the death of the Catholike King, the King should aide the Archduke with men & ships, to go and receive his Realms of Spain.

The Arragonois demanded a continuance of the truce: but the King meaning to put out that clause: Not to molest the Duchy of Milan during the truce, their parle was fruitlesse. The Emperor (who ioynd his designs to the counsels of Ferdinand) opposed against the amity of the French. The Suisses were as forward as before. As for the Pope, Francis desired to be freed from all bond to him, that he might resolve for the best, according to the course of his affaires. To build vpon these foundations, he now employs his Capitaines, men at armes, & the provisions which his predecessor had first prepared, & makes his army march with speed to Lions, whither his Maiesty comes in July, hauing left the Regency of the Realme to Louise of Sauoy his mother. The D. of Bourbon Constable, led the forward, accompanied with his brother Francis, newly created Duke of Castelleraud, the Marshalls of Palisse, and Trioulet, Charles of Tremouille Prince of Talmont, sonnet to Lewis Vicount of Toulars, the Earle of Sancerre, the Baron of Beaur, the Lords of Bonniuet, Imbercourt, and Telligent Senehall of Rouergue, Peter of Nauarre (whom the King had drawne to his seruice, giuing him his liberty without ransom) commanded 6000 Gascons, and the Lords of Longes (grand-father to the late Montmorency) Pirack of Maugiron, Richbourg, Lortel, Little Laine, Onaitlen, Hercules of Dauphiné, and Capitaine Chamarque, euery one commanding 500 foot, making 4000, and eight or nine thousand Lanquetois, led by Charles Duke of Guelders.

The King led the Battell, followed by the Dukes of Vendesme, Lorraine and Albain, the Earle of S. Paul, Claude of Lorraine Earle of Guise, brother to the D. of Lorraine, the Lords of Laureac and Lescut, brothers to Arual, a younger brother of the house of Albert, Tremouille, René barlart of Sauoy (who was afterwards Lord Steward of France, and Gouernor of Provence, whose daughter Anne of Montmorency the Constable married) and Capitaine Bayard, to whom the King did that honor the day of the battell, to receive his Knighthood at his hands, hoping that the happinesse of so gentle and braue a Knight would accompany his armes. The reward was committed to the D. of Alanson, who had married with Marguerite of France, afterwards wife to Henry of Albret, King of Nauarre, Grand-father by the mothers side to Henry the fourth, lately murdered. At the first bruce of this army, the Emperour, the Arragonois, Sforza, and the Suisses contract a league together, to force the King to renounce his rights to the Duchy of Milan, the Suisses receiving thirty thousand crowns a moneth of the other Confederates, should keepe the passages of the mountaines, and invade Bourgonne, or Dauphiné; and the Catholike King, France by Pargignan or Fontarabia. The Pope (although the King made some account of his friendship, for that Italian of Medicis his brother, had lately married with Philiberte, sister to Charles Duke of Sauoy, and Aunt by the Mothers side to his Maiesty) in the end ioynd with them.

The Duke of Genoua (sworn betwixt two streames, and (as they say) held the Wolfe by the eare: Both the French forces, and the confederates victory were fearfull vnto him, namely the Pope, who vnder colour to keepe this Duchy from any stranger, desired exceedingly to vntie it out of the Church. In the midst of these contrarieties, he yeelds Genoua to the King vpon condition: That he should lay aside the title of D. of Genoua, & take that of Gouernor of Genoua, perpetually for the Kings, with power to giue the officers of Genoua: (This was retaining some markes of Souerainety) & that the King should giue him an hundred markes a year, the order of S. Michael: and a yearly pension during his life. That the King should not repaire the port of Tedeja, and should restore vnto the Citizens all the priuileges, which King Lewis had disannulled. That he should giue certaine Ecclesiasticall livinges, to Frederick Archbishop of Salern, brother to Oscanian, and to himselfe (if he should be expelled Genoua) some places in France.

The army approached neare the Alpes, which diuide France & Italy, & the Suisses, according to their capitulation, had layed vpon the passages of the mountaines and valleys, as well of Montmain which is of the iurisdiction of Sauoy, the shortest way, but the most vnusur, as of the Mount of Geneure, which is of the iurisdiction of Dauphiné, the longer way, but the lesse painefull, being the ordinary passage of the French armies. The

A King had intelligence, that Prosper Colonne was at the foot of the mountaines within Piedmont, with fiftene hundred horse which the Pope had sent to succour Milan, not fearing any enemy, for that the Suisses (as he thought) had seized vpon all the approaches. But (some guides belonging to Charles of Soliers, Lord of Morette, hauing shewed them a passage neere to Rocque Espierre) the King sent Palisse (whom hereafter wee will call the Marshall of Chabannes) Imbercourt, Aubigni, Bayard, Buis of Amboise, and Montmorency, at that time highly fauoured by the King, leading foure Cornets of light horse, vnder the charge of the said Morette and his guides, who hauing waded through the Po, beneath Villefranche, whereas Colonne lodged, they came to the gates not discovered, but by some inhabitants, who run speedily to prevent their entry, but two hardy men at armes of Imbercourts company, which led the Scouts, whose names were Beaumais the braue, a Normand; and Hallencourt, a Picard; set spurs to their horses (so as Hallencourt was vntied into the ditch) and amazed the inhabitants: Beaumais thrusting forward his lance, kept the gate open, vntill the troops arriuing, surprisid both Villefranche and Colonne as he lined; they made booty of the baggage, and about twelue hundred Neapolitan horses, and caried away the Commander and his troupe prisoner to Toslan.

In the meane time the forces passe, some with the artillery betwixt the Alpes towards the sea, and the Codiennes, descending towards the Marquisate of Saluce: the roile of men exceeding all difficulties, which the steepe and craggy mountaines, and the rough downe-falls in the deepe vallies of the riuier of Argentiére, did present vnto them, where the artillery, not able to passe in those straights, the horses being vnproffitable in such daies it was forced vp with reapes by maine strength, in those places whereas neuer Cannon nor horseman was scene to passe. Others, with infinite paines and difficulties, recovered the pace of Dagogniere: some, the high tops of the rocke of the Perroir of Cuni (passing lying towards Prouence) where the Marshall of Chabannes had passed: Thus the Suisses decieued of their hope, abandoned the straight of Suze, where they defended the passages of Mont Senis and Geneure, and that of Coni, returning with shame toward Milan, spoiling and sackeing Chiuas, Verceil and other places, where they entred whilest that Anard of Prie, hauing passed with the first, had with the helpe of Oscanian, Frezeli, reduced Alexandria, Tortone (and all that lies beyond the Po) to the Kings obedience, who hauing passed the Po at Montcalier, and presenting himselfe before Noirare, receiued the towne at his deuotion, and then Padua. The Milanois sent Ambassadors to the Kings lodging at Bufalore, to beseech him to rest satisfied with victualls, and a promise from the people to remaine affected to his crowne, and so to march on against his enemy, assuring him, that Milan should most willingly giue him aid, when he should be master of the field. It is an ordinary stratagem of inconstant townes, to set vp the ensignes of the stronger partie. The King, hauing amightie army in fiour, granted their demands for that time.

Then the Duke of Sauoy did make an accord betwixt the Suisses and the King his Nephew, wherein he preuailed so much, as they concluded, That the King paying vnto them four hundred thousand crownes, promised by the treaty of Dijon, and all which they pretended to be due for their ancient seruices, they should yeeld vnto the King his Duchy of Saluzian, and the vallies which the Grisons enjoyed, and the King should giue vnto Maximilian Sforza 60000 ducats of yearly pension. But some hope to gaine, who lose all, especially in these cases. A new supply of Suisses, by reason of their surpassing victories (being invaded by the Cardinall of Sion) brake this treaty, and bring matters to the same estate they were before. Thirty thousand take the way of Monte, to lodge in the suburbs of Milan, vntill the Papes army, led by Laurence of Medick, and the Spanis by Raymond of Cardone, should ioyne with them, Maximilian Sforza, and the Cardinall pressed them, but distrust of one another staid them. Raymond had surprisid letters of credit, sent from the Pope to the King, and was well aduertised that Laurence had secretly sent (whither vpon his own motion, or by the Papes command he knew not) a Gentleman to the King, to excuse himselfe for the army, which he led against him, being forced by the duty he did owe vnto his vncle, promising, That without offence to his vnicle, or blemish to his owne honor, he would endeavour to content his Maiesty according to the desire he had alwaies had, and now especially more then euer. Meane while, the Arragonois designe was to remaine quiet, so as this army did not threaten his new conquest of Nauarre.

And Laurence on the other side, seeing the delays of Raymond, conceived, that he had some secret charge from the King his master, to forbear to fight, and give others leave to decide the quarrell, and both joyntly feared to engage themselves between the Kings army, and the Venetians, led by Bartholomew of Aluiane, the which was very available for the King. Without doubt all their private intents were to ad this tragedy with the blood and loss of the poore Suisses. Thus these two armies of Arragon and the Pope, did onely labour to keepe the Venetian from ioyning with the French; and the French, thefew from the Suisses. A miserable estate of Italy, the which at one instant was oppressed with five sundry armies, French, Venetian, Suisses, Spaniards and Italians. Upon hope of this treaty of peace, the King had countermanded Aluiane, who was at Landi, and commanded Laurenc to cary vnto the Suisses all the money they could get out of the Kings coffers, or borrow of the Princes and Nobility, but through the perswasions of this mutinous Cardinal, they resolute, both to take the money from Laurenc, and suddenly to give the King battell, when he least doubted any enemy. This counsell had prevailed with some drowie Commander. But Laurenc (aduertised by his spies of the trecherous resolution of these Suisses) left the way and retired into Galere. And the Suisses, failing of their purpose, passed on, to wreake their choller vpon the King. The King was come from Marignan, to lodge at S. Donat, the 13 of September: when as beheld they come with a resolution, and charge the artillery of the vanguard which the Languenets guarded, they overthrow the first they encountered, recover some peeces of Cannon, and amaze a battalion of Languenets, who (supposing that the treaty of peace with the Suisses had continued firme) feared lest they should deliuer them into the hands of their ancient enemies. But seeing the horse, and the King himselfe in person come to seke them, they resume their courage, enter the combat, stay this violence of the Suisses, and with a fore fight maintaine the shocke with variable and doubtfull euent, vntill the dnt and approaching night made them retire. At this first charge were slaine Francis of Bourbon Duke of Chastelleraud, the Earle of Sancerre, Imbertcourt, and many other gallant Gentlemen.

Marignan.

The King seeing the greatnesse of the danger, planted his artillery in convenient places, ordered his battalions, gathered his horse together, sent for Aluiane, and lay all night armed with all peeces but his helmet vpon the carriage of a Cannon. The Sunne was scarce risen, when as the Suisses (growne proud with the conceit of some aduantage) charge the Languenets, and force them to recoyle aboute a hundred paces, and but for some horsemen, who repelled the violent force of the Suisses the issue had beene very dangerous. The Cannon thunders through their squadrons; the French and Gascon (that make a horrible slaughter, the horse charge them in flanke, Aluiane comes vpon their back in the fury of the fight: They had continued many houres very hot in skirmish, when as the Suisses (hauing lost most of their Capitaines, being charged in front, in flanke, and behinde) grow amazed, despaire of victory, turne their squadrons, and make a goodly retreat, some to Milan, others home to their houses. A great number flue themselves into the Constables lodging, where (refusing to yeeld to the Kings mercy) they were all burnt, and many of our men that were entred pel-mell with them; amongst others, John of Mouy Lord of Mailley, who carried the white corner. In this second battell was slaine the Prince of Talmont, Bussy of Amboise, the Lord of Roye, and many other valiant Knights: Gilbert of Leui Lord of Ventadour was hurt, Claude Earle of Guise overthrowen and troden vnder the horse feet, but he was relieved by Capitaine James a Scottisman, a Gentleman of the Kings Chamber. The King was often in danger of his person, receiving many a puff of the Pike vpon his armour.

Without doubt this was the most furious battell that euer the Suisses gaue, the which by the testimony of Trinulle, seemed rather to haue beene fought by Giants then by men. For that the eightene battells wherein he had beene, were like the encounters of small children in regard of this. That which happened to Gaston of Foix at the battell of Ravenne, made the King to give them that fled free passage, leauing fourecore or fiftene thousand slaine vpon the place. The King lost of French and Languenets, about three thousand. The Cardinal of Sion (the chiefe author of this battell) fled at the first charge to Milan, and from thence (seeing the Suisses in a mutiny, as well for their loss, as for three moneths pay, that were due vnto them) into Germany, to Maximilian.

We

We may iustly say, that the Suisses had need of this correction for the remembrance of their forperalled prosperities had made them insolent beyond the bounds of modesty, but they repaid a benefit by their shame, growing more tractable and friendly to them that corrected them. Moreover, this should be a good advertisement to the King, to consider rightly of the warres of Italy, in the which (for want of iudgement) both he and his Realme were afterwards in a manner ruined. After this happy victory, Milan and all other places of the Duchy followed the Conquerors fortune. Peter of Navarre, had by a myne blown vnto the Castle gate. Maximilian Sforza and the Suisses (besieged therein by the Duke of Bourbon) yeeld it, vpon condition, That the Suisses should depart with baggage and baggage, and Maximilian should deliuer the Castle with that of Cremona, vnto the King, and all other places held by him, and should goe into France, where the King during his life should give him threecore thousand crownes a yeare pension. According to this Capitulation, Mauleon brother to Tremouille, Francis Earle of Posseme (with many other Gentlemen) conducted him into France. The King entred into Milan armed, accompanied with the above named Princes, and the Nobility of his army, whither the Potentates of Italy sent vnto him, some to reconcile themselves, others to congratulate this victory.

The Pope did not forget his ordinary practices, to stay the course of the Kings victory, and finding the King very obedient to the Sea of Rome, they concluded a mutual league for the defence of the Estates of Italy, of the Pope, the Church, of Julian and Laurence de Medicia, and the Estate of Florence. By this accord the King gaue the Duchy of Nemours to Julian, who had married a sister to the Kings mother; which Duchy (after the death of Julian) the King did giue to Philip of Sauoy, who tooke to wife one of the daughters of René, Duke of Alancou: to whom the Duke of Nemours now liuing, is Grand-child. And the Pope deliuered Parma and Placentia to the King. These Articles were confirmed by an enteruie betwixt the Pope, and the King at Bologna, in the beginning of December, where they treated of many things touching the Realme of Naples, which the King refused to invade, for the recovery whereof, the Pope promised him his fauor, after the death of Ferdinand (which euery man thought to be neere) or at the least when as the truce were ended. He promised also to giue him power to leaue the tenth part of the reuenues of Clergy within his Realme, and the collation of Benefices, the which before belonged vnto the Colleges and Chapters of Churches; and for the Kings sake he made Adrian of Gonsieres, brother to the Lord Steward, Cardinal. And the King, to gratifie the Pope, granted an abolition of the pragmaticall Sanction, making new conuentions in stead thereof, whereunto the French Church and the Vniuersities opposed.

The Venetians sent foure Ambassadors to the King, the chiefe and most honourable persons of their Senate: Anthony Grimani, Dominic Trevisan, George Cornaro, and Andrea Gritti, to congratulate his victory, and to beseech him to make them partakers of the fruits thereof, that by his ayd they might recover their townes, according to their agreement. At their request, the King gaue commission to the barard of Sauoy, and to Theodore Triulze, to ioyne with Aluiane with six hundred Lances, and six thousand Foot, led by Peter of Navarre. Then leauing the Duke of Bourbon his Lieutenant Generall in the Duchy of Milan, he returned into France about Candlemas, whither the desires of Henry King of England did call him.

Henry did content that the King had taken the young King of Scotland into his protection, and to that end had sent John Steward Duke of Albania, both to gouerne his person and his Realme (which John had punished either with death or banishment, all such as hee found to fauour the English, and euen the mother of the young King, sister to the sayd Henry) for reuenge whereof he thrust the Suisses to new attempts against the King. But returning to their first sincerity, they ioyne in league with this Crowne, binding themselves, To giue vnto the King for euer, in Italy or out of Italy, and against all men (except the Pope and the Emperor) such numbers of men as he should require vnder his pay. The King did also confirme their ancient pensions, promising to pay within a certaine time the sum due by the treaty of Dijon, and three hundred thousand Crownes more, yeelding vnto him the townes and vallies which they held, belonging to the Duchy of Milan. But the Suisses Cantons which did enioy them, hauing refused to ratifie this accord, the King beganne to pay vnto the other eight that part and portion of money which was due vnto them, who accepted thereof, but with an expresse condition; That they should not bee bound to march under his pay, against the other five Cantons. A means to draw the others to the alliance of France.

Maximilian alwayes his mind bent to seeke means to annoy his neighbour. The Kings prosperity, makes the Emperor, with the Kings of England and Aragon, to devise how to crosse him. The Emperor (alwayes desirous of innovations) could not with his own forces hold the townes he had taken from the Venetians: and the English remembering the fruitlesse promises which Ferdinand his father in law had made him (which he respected not where he might gaine) stood waivering betwixt the distrust hee had of his father in law, and the hatred hee bare to our Francis, but this treaty is suddenly broken by the death of Ferdinand, who died in the Month of January. A Prince excelling in counsel, and many vertues, so as it his promises had beene accompanied with their effects, he might well haue bin numbered amongst the most perfect.

Ferdinand dies.

This death seemed to make the Kings enterprise vpon Naples more easie, purposing to send the Duke of Bourbon for the execution thereof: Many reasons moued him thereto. There was some reuolt in the Realme after the decease of Ferdinand. The Archduke Charles was young, and could not come in time to succour it: the Popes fauour might ayd him much (yet the King trusted to him who deceived him in the view of all the world) but about all, the priuate interest of this Crown, to whom the greatnesse of Charles (there to so many Realmes by the death of the Catholique King and future successor of the Empire) should bee wonderfully suspect. But the designs of our Francis are crossed by the Emperors comming with ten thousand Germanes and Spaniards, foureteeen thousand Suisses, and five thousand horse, to succour Brescia, iointly besieged by the French and Venetians, which made them retire to Milan to the Duke of Bourbon. So Maximilian passing the riuers of Mincio, Oglio and Adde, without any lett, had all the Country betwixt Oglio, Po, and Adde, at his command, except Cremona and Crema, the one kept by the French, and the other by the Venetians. Then hauing taken Laude by composition, he sends to summon the Milanois with threats: that if within three dayes they did not expell the French army, he would entreate them more rigorously then Frederick Barbarossa, one of his predecessors had done: who not content to haue burnt Milan vnto ashes, did also slay in memory of his wrath, & their of rebellion. The inhabitants began to rise, and our men grew amazed, when as Albert Peter, leading thirteeen thousand Suisses and Gifons, arriuing, confirms them, he made them to change their resolution, to burne their suburbs, and to resolute vpon defence.

The Cardinall of Sion, and many others banished from Milan, followed the Emperor, feeding him with hope, that at the first brute of his approach, the Citizens would set vp his Ensignes. Marke Anthony Colonne likewise followed his army: with two hundred men at armes, at the Popes charge (a manifest signe of his counsels and dissemblings.) But Maximilian seeing no shew from the towne (the chiefe of the Gibelin faction being expelled by the Constable of Bourbon, as adherent to the Emperor) remembering the treachery of the Suisses to Lodowick Sforze, and fearing lest through the ancient hatred of that nation to the House of Austria, the Suisses in the French army, and those in his (which refused plainly to fight one against another) visiting their forces, should deliuer him to the enemy for that James Stafflet Colonel of his Suisses, had with much arrogancy demanded their pay, he secretly departs from his army in the night, with two hundred horse, so as he was twenty miles off before they were priuy to his departure. His army (wanting both a commander and money) tooke the same course. The Earle of Saint Paul, with the Lords of Montmorency and Lescun, pursuing them, defeated a great number, whereof three thousand part Germanes and part Spaniards, yielded to the French and Venetians, being in campe, and our Suisses (notwithstanding they had beene payed for three months) went home to their houses, except some three hundred which remained with Peter.

retires.

During these garboiles, the Pope smothering his conceits, laboured to be as pleasing as he could to either party, yet was he grieved the Emperour had brought so great forces; for he could not remaine a victor, but hee must afterwards seeke to oppress all Italy, or put Leo from the Papall seat, to hold it himselfe, according to the common report. On the other side (as we iudge of causes by the effects) the King had many reasons to suspect the Pope. He had consented to the Emperours descent. Colonne the Popes pensioner did accompany Maximilian. He refused to lend 5000 men at armes for the defence of Milan, and

A and to pay three thousand Suisses, as he was bound by the treaty of Bologna. So as the King, to let Leo know, that the brightnesse of his Myter did not so dazle his eyes; but he discovered his practices; he made him brewesse of the same bread: declaring, that seeing the league they had made, was fruitlesse in time of warre, he would contract a new one which should not tie him but in time of peace. The Emperours army being dissolved, the Duke of Bourbon returns into France, and of his owne motion resignes his Government into the Kings hands, by whose command the Lord of Laurec taking the charge of the armie, to free the King from that bond, ioyning with the Venetians, returned to Brescia, which pressed with two batteries, one by the French, the other by the Venetians, yielded to the King, their liues and goods saved, and Laurec deliuered it to the Venetians. Verona had a harder issue, for being battered by the French towards Mantoua, and by the Venetians towards Vincenza, giving two assaults: afflicted with want of victuals and munition, and troubled by the hurting of Marke Anthony Colonne, Gouverneur of the City, yet being assured of eight thousand men, led by Count Roguendosse, that came to their succour, they held out vntill Christmas, at what time famine forced the Spaniards to yeeld the towne, the which was in like sort deliuered to the Venetians. The Pope, to make profit of the Kings victory and forces, solicits Laurec to ayd him, to dispossesse Francis Maria of Rouere of the Duchy of Vrbino. The motives of this warre, which Leo pretended against him, were, for that Francis had denied the Pope those men, for the which he had receiued pay of the Church, and had treated secretly with the enemy: That he had slaine the Cardinall of Paui, and committed many other murders.

That in the hottest of the warre against Pope Julius his vnkle, he had sent Balibasar of Chastillon to the King to receiue his pay, and at the same instant hee denied passage to some Companies that went to ioyne with the army of the Church: and pursued (in the estate which he held as a feudatary of the Church) the fouldiers which sued themselves at the defeat of Rauenna. Laurec desiring to please Leo, sent Lescun his brother, the Lord of Chisle, the Knight of Ambrun, the Lords of Aulstin and S. Blimond, and many other Captaines, with good numbers of horse and French foot: who in few dayes reduced the said Duchy to the Popes obedience, who did inuett Lawrence of Medicis his Nephew in the said Duchy. Moreover, the Kings friendship was very necessary for the Catholique King. Charles the Archduke tooke vpon him that title (after the death of Ferdinand his Grand-father by the mothers side) to make his passage more easie from Flanders into Spaine, and to assure himselfe of the obedience of those Realmes.

Fitting therefore his resolutions according to the time and necessity, by the aduice of the Lord of Chieures his Gouverneur, he sent Philip of Cleues, Lord of Rabastein to the King, to make choice of a place where their Deputies might meet, so decidall controuersies betwixt them. Neyon was named: and for the King there came Arthur of Gouffers, Lord of Boissy, Lord high Steward of France: for the King of Spaine, Anthony of Croy Lord of Chieures, both Gouverneurs of their Masters. Nonage, and both assisted with notable personages. Who concluded: "That within six months the Catholique King should yeeld the Realme of Navarre to Henry of Albret, sonne to John of Albret, and Katherine of Foix, deceased the same year: or else should recompence the said Henry within the said tearme, to his content: else it should be lawfull for the King to ayd him to recover it: That the King should give his daughter Louise (who was but a year old) in mariage to the Catholique King, and for her dowry, the right he pretended to the Realm of Naples according to the diuision made by their predecessors: vpon condition, that within three years of marriage, Charles should pay unto the King an hundred and fifty thousand ducats yearly, towards the maintenance of his daughter. That the dying of the King had any other daughter, he should give her to the Catholique King, vpon the same conditions. If he had none, then Charles should marry with Anne, daughter to the deceased King. To propound and conclude marriages to children of so little age, is not possible to mocke one another: Seeing that only two years time brings forth alterations which make Princes to alter their designs, whose minds are often inconstant. This treaty was respectively sworn by both Kings, who appointed an interuiew at Cambray, attending the which they sent their Orders of Knights and other officers: and sent the Emperour ratified these conventions; but we shall see small fruits thereof.

France reaped another benefit of this peace - the Suisses being a source of armed men.

twixt the Emperour and the King) compounded, as the former had done: That the King should pay unto their Cantons, within three moneths, three hundred and fifty thousand ducats, and after that a perpetual and annual pension: That the Swisses should furnish him, whenever he demanded, a certain number of men at his charge. But diversely, for the eight Cantons bound themselves to furnish against all men indifferently; and the five, no otherwise, but for the defence of his owne Estates. As for the Castles of Lugan and Lugarne, strong passages, and of great importance for the security of the Duchy of Milan, they desired rather to raze them, then to take three hundred thousand ducats for the restitution thereof.

Let vs now lay all armes aside for a certaine space, and giue our warriors time to take breath, and returne againe shortly to warre, by the ambitious factions of two most great and mighty Princes. This yeare in February was borne Francis, Dauphin and successor to this Crowne, if his end had not beene violently forced. Lawrence of Medicis did present him at the Font for the Pope his Vncle. A Christning celebrated with ioules, skirmishes, incounters, besieging and taking of places, and other such stately shewes, as the memory of man hath not obserued greater. And the King, to make a more strict league with the Pope, he caused the said Lawrence to marry with Magdalene, daughter to John Earle of Auvergne and Aurague, and of Isane sister to Francis of Bourbon, Earle of Vendosme, who died at Verceil, when as King Charles the eight returned from Naples. Of this marriage came Katherine of Medicis, whom we shall see Queene of France, and mother to the three last Kings of the name of Valois.

At the same time, the King sent Gasson of Breze, Prince of Fonquarmon, brother to the great Seneschall of Normandy, with two thousand French foot, to succour Christierne King of Denmark, against the Rebels of Sweden, who (after they had wonne a battell for the King) being abandoned in the end by the Danes, in a combat vpon the Ice, (where those Northerne Nations are more expert then ours) were ouerthrone, and the most part slaine: such as could escape the sword, returned without pay, without armes, and without clothes.

The death of Edm.

The yeare following, the last of March, Henry the Kings second sonne was borne, who by the death of the Dauphin his brother, shall succeed his father. Henry King of England was his God-father, and gaue him his name. During this surcease of armes among Christian Princes, the Pope motioned, but (with the Originall) rather in shew, then with any good intent, a generall warre of all Christendome against Selim Prince of the Turkes, Baiazet (as we haue sayd) in his latter age studied to install Acomath his eldest sonne, in the Throne of the Turkish Empire: Selim the younger brother, through fauour of the Janisaries and souldiers of his fathers Guard, forced him to yeld the gouernment vnto him. Selim was no sooner in possession, but (as they say) he boysoned his father, and murdered his brethren, Acomath and Cereis, and in the end, all that descended from the line of the Ottomans. Then passing from one warre to another, he vanquished the Adulians, overthrew the Sophist Persian battell, tooke from him Tauris, the chief cite of his Empire, and the greatest part of Persia, rodd out the Sultans of Egypt, and the Mamelukes: tooke Caire, and seized vpon all Egypt and Syria. So as hauing in few yeares almost doubled his Empire, and taken away the hindrance of so mighty Princes, who were ialous of his Monarchy: Christian Princes did not without cause feare the happy course of his victories. Hungary was weake of men, and in the hands of a Popill King, gouerned by Prelates and Barons of the Realme, diuided amongst themselves. Italy discombered by former warres, feared lest the partialities of these Princes should cause Selim to turne his eyes towards it. The Pope and all the Court of Rome (making shew to prevent this imminent danger) thought it expedient to make a great provision of money, by a voluntary contribution of Princes, and a generall taxe ouer all Christendome: That the Emperour, accompanied with the Prince of Polonia and Hungary, and an army of Riches and Lanquenets, he shoud goe to great an enterprise, should assaile Constantnople: and the French King with the forces of his Realme, the Venetians, Swisses, and Potentates of Italy should invaile Greece, being full of Christians, and ready to rebel vpon the first approach of foraine forces. The Kings of Spaine, Portugal, and England, should passe the Streight of Gallipoli with two hundred sayles, and hauing taken the Castle at the entry thereof, they should approach neere to Constantinople: That the Pope should follow the same course, with an hundred great Gallies.

These

A These were goodly plots in conceit. This counterfeit shew to send an army into Turkie, was but a device to fill the Popes coffers, which were made empty by the former warres, especially by that of Verona.

To treat of these Propositions, Leo published in the Consistory a generall Truce for five yeares amongst all Christian Princes, and vpon rigorous censures to them that should breake it: Appointing for Legats, the Cardinall of Saint Sixte, to the Emperour, the Cardinall of Saint Marie in Portico, to the King; the Cardinall Giles, to the King of Spaine; and the Cardinall Lawrence Campege, to the King of England: he proclaimed his Bulls of pardon to all such as should contribute a certaine summe for so worthy an expedition. All Princes accept this truce, and shew themselves very willing to so honorable an action. But the meanes wanted, how in so short a time to make a firme vnion among so many Potentates, who had bene long at deadly warre: Euery one studies of his priuate interest, and finding the danger to concerne one more then another, they care for themselves, and manage these affaires carelesly, more with shew then deuotion.

This negligence of the publike State, and greedinesse of priuate men, was the more confirmed by the death of Selim, who leaving his Empire to his sonne Soliman, young of age, but of a milder spirit, and not so inclined to war: then all things seemed to incline to peace and loae betwixt so many great warriors. The Kings of France and England renewed their friendship by a defensue league betwixt them, vpon promise of a marriage betwixt the Dauphin, King Francis eldest sonne, and the onely daughter of Henry King of England, both very young: which contract, many accidents might hinder before they came to sufficiency. And Henry yielded Tournay for foure hundred thousand Crownes, the one half for the charge in building the Citadell, and for the artillery, powder, and munition which the King of England should leaue in the place: the other halfe, for the expences in conquering thereof, and for other pensions that were due vnto him. Thus oftentimes the loser payes the shot. On the other side, the Kings eldest daughter being dead; whom they had appointed to be wife to the King of Spaine: a peace betwixt these two Kings was reconfirmed, according to the first Capitulation, with promise of the younger. An alliance which either Prince did confirme, with great outward shewes of friendship, King Francis wearing the Order of the Golden fleece on Saint Andrewes day; and the King of Spaine that of Saint Michael, on the said Saints day. The Venetians also, by the Kings meanes had prolonged their truce for five yeares with the Emperour.

A peace concluded with the English.

And with the Spaniards.

But the Soueraigne Iudge of the world (hauing decreed to punish the disorders of Christendome with sundry afflictions) tooke Maximilian out of this world: in whose life wee may obserue a strange alteration of affaires: for if prosperity did often present vnto him goodly occasions, aduersity did as often crosse him in the execution. A good Prince, mercifull, courteous, very liberrall, a great spender (the which did many times hinder his good successe) painfull, secret, well scene in the Art of warre: but his happy beginnings did commonly prove fruitlesse, through his owne delays and inconstancy. This death bred E an equal desire in the minds of the two great Princes, Francis King of France, and Charles King of Spaine. Francis sent the Lord of Bosly Lord Steward of France, to purchase the fauour of the Germane Electors for the Empire. Some promised all fauour for the King his master: yet the cause was not so fauourable for the French, hauing no correspondence with the Germanes, neither in tongue, manners, nor life. Moreover, the Commons of Germany were sutors that the Imperial dignity might not goe out of the Nation. The Pope fauoured the King, but in shew only, hoping that by these demonstrations of loue, he would hereafter giue more credit to his Councils: whereby discouraging, that in his inward thoughts the election both of Francis and Charles were alike suspected vnto him, he laboured to perswade the King (that seeing there was small hope for him to carie it by voyces) he should seek by his authority to aduance some other Germane Prince to this Crowne, rather then Charles. But whilst that Francis feeds himselfe with vaine hopes, giuen him by the Elector of Brandenburg, and the Archbishop of Treues, who (to draw money from the King) gaue him great assurances. Charles in stead of gold, brings armes to the field. An army approacheth neere to Francford, for the K. of Spaine, vnder colour there should be no force in the election: the which encreased their courage that fauoured his cause, made them yeeld that wauered, & troubled the French faction. So Charles of Austria King of Spaine, the first of that name, was chosen Emperour of Germany.

The death of the twenty eight of Iune. The election of a new Emperour consists in the voyce of fixe A Germane Princes. Three are of the Clergy, the Archbishops of Maience, Cologne, and Treuës: Three secular, the Count Palatine, the Duke of Saxony, and the Marquis of Brandenburg. The King of Bohemia is Vnmpier, when as the voices are equal: The Em-perour is chosen at Francford, and crowned at Aix la Chapelle.

Who could doubt, but these two young Princes, hauing so many occasions of iea-lousie and quarrell, would soone breake forth into fierce and cruell warres, the which had taken deepe root in both their hearts. The King desired infinitely to recouer the Realme of Naples, and did greatly affect the restitution of Henry of Albrert, to his kingdom of Nauarre, whereof hee sees himselfe now frustrate by the suddeth advancement of Charles to so high a dignitie, and all that which the French held in Italy was in great danger. The Emperour on the other side was discontented, that the King contemning the accord first made at Paris, and knowing the necessity of his passage into Castile, for the which his fauour did much import, had in a manner forced him to agree to new Articles. Moreover, the King had taken the Duke of Gueldres into his protection (an enemy to the Flemings, who were subiects to Charles) a sufficient cause to draw both Francis and Charles into armes. But aboue all, the recovery of the Duchy of Bourgongne, caused strange alterations in the mind of this new Emperour. The Duchy of Milan was a sufficient motiue of quarrell: the King since the death of Lewis the twelfth had neither demanded nor obtained inuestiture, and therefore they pretended the possession to be of no validity, & his interest to be void:
yet all these were not sufficient motiues to stirre vp those horrible confusions, which so afflicted the Estates of these two Princes for the space of thirty yeares. Ambitious hatred is alwaies grounded vpon light beginnings. In the mean time the Preachers of this voyage against the Turke, dispersed throughout all Christendome, grew vehement, promising (according to the Popes Bulls) pardon for all sinnes, and the Kingdome of Heauen, to such as payd a certaine summe of money. Without doubt Leo vsed the authority of the Apostolike sea too boldly, dispersing throughout the world, without distinction of time or place, most large pardons: not onely for the liuing, but also to redeeme the soules of the dead from Purgatory for money. And ther that euery one did plainly see, that these pardons were onely granted to get money, which the commissioners (appointed for such ex-actions) demanded after an impudent and shamelesse manner; being also well knowne that the greatest part of them had purchased their authority from the Popes officers. Leo incurred great dislike: many were discontented with this insolent proceeding, especially in Germany, where the ministers of this Collection, appointed (according to the common opinion) for the deliuey of poore Christians, fighting vnder the burden of the Turkish yoke, sold for a small price, yea played away in their Ale-houses their authoritie to re-deeme dead mens soules from Purgatory.

And that which did more encrease the peoples spleene, it was generally reported, That Laurence of Medicis had caried a Brieffe from his Vncle to King Francis, whereby hee allowed him to employ the money gathered throughout his Realme for this warre, to what vses he pleased: vpon condition to yeeld it when it should be demanded for the voyage beyond the Seas, and to employ fifty thousand crownes to the benefit of the said Laurence his Nephew. A worthy cause to make the French repine, seeing the money they gaue to good intent, was conuerted to contrary vses. But that which made the Germanes wonderfully impatient, Leo had giuen to his sister Magdalene the profit of the exaction of Indulgences in many parts of Germany, who appointed the Bishop Arembould, a Commissioner in that part, Worthy (saith the History) of such a charge, the which he executed with great crueltie and extortion: Being the more odious for that this holy money went to satis-fie the greedinesse of a woman. So as not onely this exaction, and the Agents thereof, but also his name and authority that granted it, became odious in many Prouinces.

Martin Luther, a religious man of the Order of S. Austin, learned and vehement, began to preach against these Indulgences in his publike Sermons: he taxeth the Popes authori-tie; complaines of Albert of Brandenburg, Archbishop of Maience; and of the doctrine which these gatherers did teach, inducing the people to beleue confidently, That by the purchase of these pardons they must needs be saued: as if the vertue of these money-pa-dons could wipe away any sin, and the money put into the coffers of the Church, or of the Commissioners, could draw mens soules out of Purgatory, and send them into Paradise.

And

A And thereupon he exhorts euery man to beleue soberly, and to gouerne himselfe wisely in this businesse, and rather to employ their money otherwise then in this frivolous merchandise. The people giue care vnto him, find his doctrine plausible: and Frederick Duke of Saxonie his Prince doth embrace it, Luther, supported by the fauour of his Prince and the people, proceeds: he publisheth propositions, wherein he doth dispute at large, of Purgatorie, of true repentance, of the office and duties of Charitie, of Indulgences and Pardons, to seeke out (saith he) the truth, calling al such to dispute as would propound any argument to the contrarie. He intreated all such as could not assist, to answer by writing: protesting, that he would not maintaine any thing, but submit himselfe to the censure of the holy Church: yet reiecting all things that should not be conformable to the holy Scripture and the decrees of the Fathers. In the end he encounters the Popes authoritie, the Images of the Church, the celebrare of Religious persons, restraining the Popes authoritie within the limits of the Bishopricke of Rome, and publishing the doctrine, which hath caused a generall Schisme vnto this day. The Pope to quench this fire, cites Luther to Rome, forbids him to preach, declares him Contumax, if he did not obey, and submit himselfe to the Ecclesiasticall censure. Notwithstanding the Original faith, hee did not reforme many things that were of bad example, which Luther did blame with reason, being very odious to all men, vnto his pontificall office with small reuerence. But this was to cast oyle into the fire. These Ecclesiasticall armes did but encrease Luthers reputation with the people, C Neither the religious men, which Leo sent to preach against him, nor the letters which hee did write to the Princes and Prelates, nor all the other meanes hee employed to suppress him, could any thing withdraw the peoples inclination, nor the fauour of Fredericke from him.

This action seeming still of greater importance to the Court of Rome, made them to fear some great disgrace to the Popes greatness, to the preiudice of the Court of Rome, and the vnion of Christian Religion. Many assemblies were made at Rome, many consultations in the Popes chamber betwixt the Cardinals and Diuines appointed to prevent these inconueniences. Some did shew, that for asmuch as they did not correct in themselves so many vices and damnable things which did scandalize all Christendome, the persecution of Luther, would but augment the hatred of nations against him: giuing counsell like vnto that of Gamaliel in the fift of the Acts of the Apostles, that it had been better to haue winked at such a folly, which happily would haue vanished of it selfe.

Notwithstanding, the hate and violence of others prevailed, so as not onely the persecutions were doubled against him, and his followers (who by his name were called Lutherans) but an excommunication was decreed against Fredericke Duke of Saxony: the which did so incense him, as of a fauourer hee became a vehement protector of the cause: the which since hath been dispersed ouer all Christendome, so as neither prisons, nor banishment, fire, nor water, sword nor tortures, nor any other punishments, could preuaile against it. Without doubt, we haue learned by experience, that Religion is not planted, nor rooted out by violent meanes. The Altars of pietie are enemies to Armes, Drums, and Trumpets. Mens consciences must be gently intreated, not violently forced. Let vs attend this so desired reunion from heauen. The mediation of the most Christian King is necessary:
let vs hope, that the continuance of a holy peace will giue him the means, as he hath a desire to choose men capable thereof, who not regarding their priuate interest, will seeke the advancement of Gods glorie. But let vs returne to our Historie. Whilest that Charles the fift was crowned at Aix, the people of Spaine fore-seeing, that by the means of his advancement to the Empire, he should remaine for the most part out of Spaine, being also incensed against the Lord of Chieures, and some Flemings which had gouerned Charles in his youth, through whose couetousnesse, Offices, Graces, Priuiledges, and expeditions F (which had been vially giuen to Spaniards) were now dearely sold vnto them: they rebelled, refusing to obey the Kings officers. They erected a sort of popular gouernment, with the aduice almost of all Spaine, whilest the Nobilitie sought by force to suppress this popular libertie. The King, by the Popes counsell (who makes his profit of Christian Princes quarrels, that he might haue peace, whilest they are at warre) seeing that the Emperour, being often vrged, did in no sort performe the Articles of the treatie of Noyon, sent an Army into Nauarre, vnder the command of Esparre, brother to Laurens, who in lesse then fiftene dayes reduced Nauarre to the obedience of Henry of Albrert, his lawfull

lawfull King. This was enough for Esparre. It had beene better to returne a victor triumphing with glory and honor, then to follow the aduice of too violent a Councillor. Saint Colombe Lieutenant of Lantress Company (promising to himselfe, it may be, the conquest of Spaine, as easily as that of Nauarre: or fed with a hope to make some good booty:) carried Esparre euen to the frontiers of Catalonia: who hauing taken Fontaraby, did runne as fast as the Grongne. The Spaniards being incensed, (the Nobilitie against the people) had endured the losse of the kingdom of Nauarre, but seeing them to inuade their owne marches, they put in practice the by-word of the dogs, who fighting together, laid aside their quarrell, to fall vpon the wolfe their common enemy. So the, being at great discord among themselves, gaue ouer their intestine quarrels, to pursue their professed enemies.

Taken againe.

The Nobles and Commons ioyne their forces, they encounter Esparre, who to saue the souldiers pay, had dismissed some part of his army, giuing leaue to all that would, in yedding halfe a pay: they charge him, defeat him, and take him prisoner, being hurt in the eye with a Lance, whereof he grew blind. The Lord of Tournon was likewise taken, with many other good men. So the Spaniards finding Nauarre vnurnished of Souldiers, recovered Pampelune, with as great facilitie as the French had conquered it. The first breed of the horrible confusions which shall follow. But let vs see another motiue of warre betwixt these two Monarchs, which rising from a small fire, shall flame ouer all this Realme, and many other Estates.

The Prince of Chimay, of the House of Croy, had before-time obtained a sentence against the Lord of Aimeries, giuen by the Peeres of the Duchy of Bouillon (which iudge souverainly) for the Towne of Hierges in Ardennes: yet through the fauour and credit which Aimeries had with Charles of Austria, and the greatest in his Court, he was released, although he had not appealed from the said sentence in time, grounding the causes of his reliefe vpon the lets and hindrances he had had during the former warres, at which he had alwaies assisted in person. So as a commission being granted before the great Chancellor of Brabant, and a day assigned to the heires of Chimay, to come to heare the reasons of Aimeries reliefe: and if need were, to see the former sentence (giuen to their behoofe) reuoked. They found this commission so vniust and vnreasonable (seeing that both their father and they had beene in long and quiet possession of the said rowne) and that this decree was not subiect to appeale: as they repaired to Robert de la Mark Duke of Bouillon, as to their Lord and protector, that with their right hee might defend the liberties and priuileges of his Duchy. Robert discontented, that his company of men at armes had beene castred for the extortions and robberies they had committed in Italy and else where, had left the King, and was retired to the Emperor. But seeing that iustice was denied him, as well for the priuate interest of the pupils (whose vncke and tutor he was, hauing married their Aunt, sister to the Prince of Chimay) he made his peace with the King, by the mediation of his wife and his sonne Fleuranges (the being daughter to the Earle of Brenne) with the Kings mother.

A bold and insolent fact.

Robert hauing assured his affaires with the King, sent to desie the Emperor at Wormes, where he had called a Diet of the Princes and free townes of Germany, against the new-bred troubles, by reason of Luther. A bold attempt of a petty Prince against an Emperor, mighty in meanes, men, and courage. A great Riuier runs quietly betwixt the bankes that bound it, but at the first breach it ouer-flows a whole Country: so there is nothing more easie then to incense Princes; but being once moued, they are hardly appeased. This desie giuen, Fleuranges the eldest sonne of Robert, notwithstanding the Kings expresse prohibition, made a leaue as well in France as in other places, of three thousand foot, and foure or five hundred horse, with which he besieged Vireton, a small towne in Luxembourge belonging to the Emperor. But soon after he retired his army by the kings commandment, and dismissed it. But their spleenes were wonderfully incensed vpon new occasions. The King, for that the Emperor failed in the payment of the pension for the realme of Naples, and in the restitution of Nauarre: & withall, his preferment to the Empire had greatly discontented him. The Emperor was grieved for the enterprise of Nauarre, and the contempt of the Duke of Bouillon, being also well informed that the King sought meanes to recover the realme of Naples. Francis had sent a Gentleman vnto the Pope to know when it should please him to performe his part for the execution of that which they had concluded

547

A cluded together (the which his Maiestie knew according to the disposition of Leo to be more counterfeite their currant.) And Leo giuing the Gentleman a note of the horse, foot and artillerie, that was necessarie for this enterprise, assigned the King two and twentie dayes to arme, whilest the Venetians might enter into this League.

1521
ambassing.

The Pope had no meaning, that Naples should be subiect to the French. If the King had not in the meane time neglected his affaires, Leo had been forced to runne another course. And the Pope glad to haue some colourable shew of discontent, accuseth the King either to be carelesse, or ill-affected, hauing not drawne the Venetians into the said League, for the defence of Italy. He complains, that his Maiestie had not payed but the first month for the leauiue of Swisses, which they had been forced to make against the Spaniard, who a little before had inuaded the territories of the Church, whereof the King should pay a moitie, and makes a shew as if the King had treated something with the Emperor, without his priuie, and to his prejudice.

Thus Leo seeming iustly displeased, receiued into Rhegium (contrary to his agreement with the King) all the banished men of Milan: he inuested Charles of Austria in the realme of Naples, made a defensie league with him, including the house of Medicis and the Florentines: and devising how to conquer Milan, they agreed: That Farma and Placentia should remaine to the Church, to hold them with the same rights it did before: That Francis Sforza brother to Maximilian should be put in possession of the Duchie of Milan, as hauing right from his father, and his brothers renunciation: and that the Emperor should ayde the Pope against his subiects, and feudatories, namely, to conquer Ferrara. This mutall resolution of allyance was a meanes, by Gods prouidence, to shew his wonderfull iudgements, and a scourge to punish both French, Italians, and Spaniards for many yeeres: whereby followed so many curstions of townes, oppressions of people, desolations of Prouinces, and the death of so many men of valour.

The Emperor in the meane time, leaues a great armie of horse and foot, vnder the command of Henry Earle of Nassau, who tooke Longenes from Robert de la Marke, razed the Towne, and hanged the Captaine, with twelue of the chiefe of his troope. The Captaine of Musancourt, (deliuered by some of his Souldiers, with the place to the said Earle) escaped the gallows at the intreacie of the chiefe of his armie, but twentie of his souldiers were hanged, and the place likewise razed and spoiled to the ground. About this time, there was much controuersie touching the Duchie of Milan, the Emperor pretending it belonged absolutely to him, not onely by conquest, but much rather by inheritance: concerning which, the most learned in the Lawes of the Empire produced many and very probable reasons and arguments. These two prizes caused Fleuranges and Sansey his brother (the sonnes of Robert) to put themselves into Lametz, with a resolution to die or keepe it. The Earle after foure dayes siege, hauing seene the garrisons firme resolution, raised his Campe, to take the way to Fleuranges. The Germans which kept it, yielded vpon both the Towne and their Captaine the Lord of Lametz, the sonne of Robert, into the hands of the Earle, who hauing ruined it, did the like vnto Sansey. Bouillon was afterwards yeelded to him by intelligence. After this, Robert obtained a truce of the Emperor for six weekes. But the Emperor Charles dreamed of a more important warre. If his spleene had beene only against the house of La Mark, why should he graunt them a truce, being thus ruined: and being a Conquerour, and strong enough to subdue the said Robert, why did he still increase his aile?

ruined.

The King hauing intelligence, that waite was proclaimed against him, prepared his forces to withstand the Emperor: and to this end hee gaue a Commission to Francis of Bourbon, Earle of Saint Pol, to leaue six thousand foot, to the Countesse of Bourbon eight hundred horse, and six thousand foot: and to the Duke of Vendosme the like charge. And to rectifie the disgrace receiued by Esparre, he sent six thousand Baniquets, and of whom Francis of Lorraine Earle of Guise was General, vnder William of Cleu, Lord of Conbray, a Admiral of France, to whom he gaue five companies of horse, & commission to keepe that number of Galcons and Balques he should thinke necessarie. The Lord of Lescat was in like sort releued with French and Swisses, for the warre of Italy. The armies on either side were in field: there remained nothing but for the onset to make brach: the battails began. There had been 1586, and a great quarrell betwixt Francis of Bourbon, and the Lord of Liques, a Gentleman of Humaine, for the Abbey

to Rome.

Abbey of Saint Amand which the Cardinall enjoyed, Liques takes this occasion to assault the Abbey, which being of no strength, was delivered unto him by Champeroux, Lieutenant for the King in Tournais, in the which de Leges Gouverneur of Tournay was surprised. We might pretend that these were but private quarrels: but Liques advanced with his forces to Mortagne, a place subject to the King, the which hee said hee had sometimes enjoyed.

In the end Prancy, Captaine of the said place (having no hope of succours) yielded it, not to Liques, but to the Lord of Portien, vpon condition to depart with their lives and baggage. But contrarie to the Law of armes and honestie, they were pursued, stript, and hardly escaped with their lives. On the other side, Fiennes, of the house of Luxembourg, Gouverneur of Flanders, besieged Tournay with a thousand horse, eight thousand foot, and fixe Cannons, continuing there five moneths, whilest that the Bourguignous did take, spoile, & raze Ardres: the Lord of Teligni in exchange did charge, defeat, and cut in peeces sixe hundred Bourguignous, that were entred the Realme to spoile it. In the beginning of these garboyles, Henry King of England did offer himself an Arbitrator betwix these two Princes, Charles and Francis, & Calais was named for the treatie of a good peace. But what meanes was there to yeld to the Emperours vnreasonable demands, to refuse vnto him the Duchie of Bourgondie, with an abolition of the homage which he ought vnto this Crowne, for Flanders? being vnreasonable (as he pretended) that an Emperour should doe homage to a King of France: as if we did not commonly see Princes hold their lands by homage of simple Gentlemen. So this parle tooke no effect.

Hitherto the Imperials dealt vnder-hand, protesting not to make warre against the king, but now they discover themselves, and come with enignes displayed to besiege Mouzon: they batter it in two places, the one by the meddow towards the port of Rheims: the other from the mountaine going to Luoy. The foot-men newly leauied, and not yet trained, grew amazed, and force Montmort the Captaine of that place, to demand a composition: for the obtaining whereof, he went with La Signi, his companion, to the Earle, and obtained, That every man at armes should depart with a curtall unarmed, and the foot-men and archers without armes, and a white wand in their hands: what policie was this, to see two Lieutenants to a King, goe forth off a place to capitulate with the enemy: without doubt they deserved the shame which many haue suffered for the like rashnesse, to be detained prisoners, put to ransom, and forced to yeld the Towne at discretion.

The taking of all these Townes without opposition, drew the Earle to Mezieres (commanded by the Cheualier Bayard) but he found a more generous resolution then at Mouzon. The experience and valour of the Captaines, and the desire which Anne Lord of Montmorency had to doe the King some notable seruice in his youth, had drawne him into the Towne, with many well-minded Gentlemen of the Court: amongst the rest, the Lords of Lorges, Annebault, Luce, Villeclair, Iohn de la Tour Lord of Breumont, Iohn de Bevil, Lord of Berbee, Nicholas of Thours Lord of Suilly, Ataithurin, and Charles de Lorraine, (whose valours and fidelitie deserue a place in our Historie.) Anthony Duke of Lorraine (whose Lieutenant Bayard was) and the Lord of Orual, Gouverneur of Champagne, commanded either of them, a hundred men at armes. Bousart and the Baron of Montmorency, had either of them a thousand foot. This might seeme too much for a small place, but it was strong and of importance. The Cannon did no sooner begin to batter, but all of the foot grew amazed, and in despite of their Captaines fled some by the gate, others over the walls: Bayard by the basenesse of them that fled, tooke occasion to assure the resolutions of such as remained, For (saith he) preferring the Towne with the help of few men, we shall haue the more merit and reputation: our troopes are of the more force, being discharged of this unprofitable burthen.

The Earle coming neere to Mezieres, sent to summon the Commanders to yeld the Towne vnto the Emperour. Report vnto the Earle of Nassau (said Bayard to the trumpet) That before he shall heare me speake of yielding up the Towne, which the King hath given me to charge, I hope to make a bridge of my enemies carriages, over the which I may march. He makes two batteries, and shakes the walls, for the space of a month. But finding by long dry fallies (in the which the besieged did most commonly carry the honour and advantage) the resolution of the Commanders, men at armes, and souldiers, haue also intelligence of the defeat of a hundred choise horse of the Emperours campe, and two hundred

A foot, led by the Earle de Foix, to spoile Arrign, vpon all which Francis of Silli, Bayliffe of Caen, Lieutenant to the Duke of Alencon, had put to the sword, except 5 or 6, which were carried prisoners to the said Earle to Rheims, the Towne hauing been also beleagued, the first of October with a thousand foot led by Lorges, four hundred horse by Reilleg, and some munition, hee heard the first fury of his artillery, and despayning to take the Towne by force or famine, hee raised his Campe, and made his retreat by Mont: Colnet in Aidenes, Maubert, Fontaine, and Aubenon, for Veruin and Guise, spoiling, burning and killing, Men, Women and Children without distinction: a mournfull beginning of the cruelties which haue been committed in the succeeding warres. Bayard for a worthy reward of his vertue, was honored by the King with a company of a hundred men at armes, and the order of Saint Michael. In the meane time the King assailable his forces at Feruacques, to cut off the enemies way about Guise, and to fight with him: during whose retreat, the Cont Saint Paul recovered Mouzon, for the King.

Such was the estate of Picardy, and Champagne, whilest the Admirall of Bonniuet arrived at Saint Iohn de Luz, for the enterprise of Nauarre. His purpose was to surprize Fontarby. To hold the enemy in suspence, he first tooke the Castell of Poignau vpon the mountaine of Roncevaux, then making shew to take the way of Pampelune, he turned head through the mountaines towards the Towne of Maye, and whilest he lodged his artillery, hee called the Earle of Guise (who commanded the Lanquenets) to take the way by the river of Behaube, running at the foot of the mountaines which come from Nauarre, and so passe into the sea before Fontarby: and in the morning he followed with his Army. Having some Spaniards in front, which camped on the other side of the water, hee passed the river at a ford, the said Earle marching before them with a pike in his hand. Don Diego de Vere chiefe of the enemies army, being equal in number, and hauing an aduantage over those that came wet from the passage of a river, amazed at the resolution of our men, left the field, and fled with his men through the mountaines.

The Castle of Behaube kept all victuals from our Campe, and held it in great distresse. But the first Volley of the cannon, hauing split one of their best peeces, & slaine the Governor, with some others that did assist him, the souldiers being amazed, forcetheir Capitaine to yeld at discretion: whereof the Admirall sent the best prisoners to Bayonne, the rest returned away being dispersed. The way being thus layd open to Fontarby, (a place which they held impregnable, and one of the keyes of Spaine) fortified on three parts, with the sea, river and mountaine, in few dayes he made a breach, but not assailable. Notwithstanding the Gascons, Basques and Nauarrois, demanded the assault, the which was defended with as great resolution as it was assailed: but the besieged hauing discovered some peeces, which the Admirall had planted on the mountaine, to beate them the next day in flanke at the second attempt, and knowing the resolution of the assaillants, by the proofe they had formerly made, caused them to yeld, vpon condition to depart, with their baggage and baggage. James of Aillon Lord of Lude, was made Gouvernor thereof.

Let vs returne to Feruacques, where we haue left the King preparing to fight with the enemy. To this end he giues the forward to the Duke of Alencon (who had married Marguerite of Valois the Kings sister) accompanied with the Marshall of Chastillon, (this was the first morie of the Constable of Bourbons discontent, the which place was due vnto him as Constable of France.) He tooke the bataille himselfe, taking the said Duke of Bourbon vnto him, and committed the reeward to the Duke of Vendosme. Bapaume did much annoy the frontier towards Peronne, Corbie & Doullans. The Earle of Saint Paul, the Marshall of Chabannes and the Lord of Fleuranges tooke it, beat downe the defences, and burnt it to ashes. The Duke of Vendosme had Commission to doe the like vnto Landrecy: who arriuing late, foure or five Ensignes of the bands of Picardie march, without commandement and without ladders, and fite furiously to the port, where they plant their Ensignes vpon the draw-bridge, but they were repulld by 7 or 800 Lanquenets and some of their Ensigne-bearers slaine. This furie of the Picards did so amaze the Germanes, as without attending batterie, breach, or assault, they retired into the next towne, where they could not pursue them, by reason of the river running thorough the Towne. Thus Landrecy vnurnished of men, was the next day taken, razed and burnt.

The Emperour was retired with his Armie towards Valenciennes: the King halloied bridge over the river of Elbau beneath Bouchain, either to fight with him, or to make him abandon abandon the countie with dishonour. Charles having intelligence of this bridge, sent twelve thousand Lanqueters, and four thousand horse to stop the passage, but the Earle of Saint Paul with those five thousand men which he commanded, was already in battaile on the other side of the water, in a march towards Valenciennes, and the King followed him secretly with all his Army, which were about sixteen hundred men at Armes, and six and twenty thousand foot with the light-horse. The which the enemy perceiving, he left seven or eight hundred horse to cover the retreat of his footmen, taking the way to Valenciennes. Tremouille and the Marshall of Chabannes offer to charge them in the reare: the Swisses cried out for battaile, to give a testimonie vnto the King, that they desired to see the confirmation of their new alliance with some notable service: and if their aduice had been followed, the Emperour had that day by all likelihood lost his honour, and the flower of his Armie. So the enemy retired without any losse, except the battaile of Aimeries and some prisoners. GOD doth often minister occasions, the which being once neglected, are neuer recovered with so great aduantage. But howsoever, the Emperour retired by night into Flanders with an hundred horse, leaving all the rest of Arme behind him.

The next day, Bouchan yielded at the first summons to the Duke of Bourbon. This shameful retreat of the Imperials draws our armie to Hedin, being vnfurnished of soldiers, when as the inhabitants feared no enemy, being busied at the marriage of a daughter of the Receiuer general of Arthois. The Dukes of Bourbon and Vendosme and the Earle of Saint Paul, with the troopes (commonly called the Blacke bands) notwithstanding the continuall raine, were at the Towne-gates, before the Citizens had any intelligence of their departure from the Armie. The Towne being resolutely attempted was taken by assault, and spoiled by the footmen, the which abounded in wealth: for that in olde time the Dukes of Bourgongne had made their chiefe residence there. But in the midst of the spoile, one quarter of the Towne was fired, contrary to the Commales expresse commandement, the which deprived the Souldiers of part of their booty. The Ladie of Rieux and the Garison of the Castle departed with their baggage: but the Inhabitants that were retired and come into it, were put to ransom. The Lord of Biez had the government of the Castle, and Lorges of the Towne, with a thousand foot. This happened on all-Saints day.

Journey lost.

Winter was come, and the enemy appeared no more: the King dispersed his Army, and giuing the most of the Gentlemen that had followed the Dukes of Bourbon and Vendosme the command of twenty five horse a peece, putting his Companies into Gaen, and disposing of the rest of the Armie he retired to Compiegne, about Christmas, notable for the disemperature of the weather to releue Tournay, necessitie forcing the Lord of Champroux to depart with an honourable composition, armed, their Ensignes played, Drums founding, and their baggage saved.

Now may we see, what effects the Popes league with the Emperour shall bring forth. Being both equally desirous to expell the French out of Italy, they thought it best, before they came to open force, to shadow their practices with a Foxes skin, and by increase of the banished men, to assaile the Duchies of Milan and Genoua at one instant, with the Cities of Parma, Placentia, Cremona, and Crema. But he that attempts too much, performs little: so manyundry enterprizes doe most commonly terrifie more then hurt. According to this plot the Emperours Gallies, remaining at Genoua, the Popes come suddenly into the port with two thousand Spaniards, led by Jerome Adorne, hoping that the partisans of that Family, would not faile to mutinie: but the good order which Frederick had made their designe fruitlesse. On the other side, Lautrec, before his coming into France, to marry the daughter of the Lord of Orual, had expelled many out of Milan, that were ill affected to the King, whereof they said the most part had been banished for slight occasions, or to seize vpon their goods.

Without doubt, severity loseth those hearts, which clemency and moderation in a temperate commander would make vfe of at need. Francis Sforza, Jerome Maron, Manfred Paluissin and Soto of Brindesi, were the chiefe, who having assembled a great number of their Partisans, for the execution of their designs, retired to Regium, belonging to the Church, although neither the Pope, nor the King (according to their treaty) ought to haue supported them in their territories. Lesclap Marshall of Foix, Lieutenant to his brother, advertised

A advertised of these stirres, by Extenderick of Boffele, retired from Milan on Midsummer Euen, accompanied with four hundred Lances, and followed by Raffa, a trading ship, and foot, to require Count Guy of Rango, Gouverneur of the towne for the Pope, the assenting to the Treaty, he should deliver these banished men into his hands. Whiles that Lesclap and Raffa conferred together vpon their fauour, a post came carrying news to Raffa that at the gate which goes to Parma, the one complaining, that contrary to the articles of the league, they did suppose kin to towns belonging to the Church, to be banished men, being assembled to trouble the Kings Estate, and the other, that he had suddenly entered with armes into the territories of the Church: beheld a gate being opened for the hitting in of a cart laden with meale, the Lord of Bonaual aduanced with some men at armes, to seize vpon the Port, but they were repulled, and the gate shut. Some banished men being vpon the wals, discharge their Harguebuses, and hurt Alexander Teincke, whereof hee died two dayes after. Nothing saved Lesclap, but the feare, which the Marquibuser had, that aimed at him, to kill the Gouverneur. The indiscretion of one man, is pernicious to such as accompany him. During this garboile, the Earle, to assure Lesclap person, led him vpon his faith into the ruelin. The men at armes taking this for an imprisonment, fled to eary news to the troops, which stayed two miles from Regium, who standing doubtfull, whether they should march against the towne to recover their Leader, or returne to Parma, thinking it a practice to surpris the towne in their absence: the Marshall arised, being released by the Earle; forbearing to stay him, having giuen him his faith, and received commission not to proceed against the King by open warre. This enterprize, as badly effected as rashly attempted, was of consequence. It was a good colour for the Pope to accuse the King, and to iustifie his confederacy with the Emperour. To prevent this, Lesclap sent La Morte to Les, to disauow the attempt at Regium, and to let him vnderstand, that what hee had done, was neither to attempt against him, nor against the estate of the Church. For answer: The Marshall of Foix (said the Pope) in great choller, hath lodged (in armes like an enemy) upon my territory; I will make him know the wrong hee hath done vnto the King. Presently after this threat, hee did excommunicate the Marshall out of the Church. The designe vpon Como, succeeded no better then that of Genoua; for Manfred of Paluissin, and Soto of Brindisi, having in the night approached to the wals, with eight hundred Italian foot, and Lanqueters, hoping that Anthony Raffa a Citizen of Como, would make a breach for them in the wall behind his house, as he had promised to Benedict Lorne, another of that City that was banished; Captaine Garrou a Balque by Nation, a man well practised in armes, did mingle the townsmen with the souldiers, at the guard of the wall, to prevent the exception of their intelligence, if happily they had any. So as the conspirators not daring to discover themselves, Paluissin despaired of his foolish enterprize, hauing planted his guards about the towne, where he thought most fit to sleep. Garrou issues forth to giue them a skirmish, he kills the greatest part; some seek their safety vpon the lake, others vpon the mountaine. Three Barks were sunke in the lake, and seven taken by Garrou. Many were taken prisoners; amongst others, Manfred and Soto, who after they had confessed the results and practices in the Estate of Milan, were publicly quartered at Milan: and Bartholomew Ferrier their complice, a man of authority in the towne, was beheaded vpon the returne of the Lord of Lautrec; whom the King (being advertised of these disorders) sent presently to Milan. The Lanqueters had leaue to depart into their Country. Seeing the Popes secret practices could not succeed, hee now discouers himselfe, hee complains in the Consistory of Cardinals, of the attempt of Regium: and concludes, that the King is ill affected to the Apostolike Sea, and (concealing the Capitulations hee had secretly made with the Emperour) hee protests that he is forced to ally himselfe vnto him, who (said Lesclap) had neuer committed any thing vnworthy of a Christian Prince, and very zealous to Religion.

So the Wolfe in the Fable accused the Sheepe for troubling the water. Thereupon he presently makes shew to contract with Don Iohn Emanuel, Ambassadour to Charles, the league which hee had formerly concluded; and resolves, by the aduice of Raffa Garrou, to invade the Estate of Milan with six hundred men at armes, and the companies of horse, which the Emperour had in the Realme of Naples; six thousand Italian foot, two thousand Spaniards, (which Adorne had in the River of Genoua) two thousand Neapolitanes, (which the Marquis of Pescara should bring) four thousand Lanqueters, nets, and two thousand Grisons (which should beo named at their common charge) and two thousand Suisses, which had remained voluntarily, of a great number, under the Popes pay.

Whilest this was working, beheld a small signe to our Frenchmen of their instant calamities: for on Saint Peters day, the Sunne being set, and the sky cleare, lightning fell vpon the great Tower of the Castle of Milan, and overthrew the sadomes of the Curtaine on either side, consumed two hundred & fifty thousand weight of powder, twelvehundred fire-pots, the provision of salr for five yeares: and vnder the ruines were slaine Richbourg, Capitaine of the Castle, and about three hundred Gentlemen and souldiers that were walking there. Leo did not forget to triumph at this accident, and to impute it to the wrath of God laid vpon the French.

This heauy accident was a spur to hasten his resolutions, for the ruine of four men. And knowing that the estate of Mantoua did import him much for the wars of Lombardy, he entertained Frederick Marquis of Mantoua with two hundred men at armes, and two hundred light-horse, giving him the title of Generali for the Church: for the accepting whereof, the Marquis renouncing the Order of Saint Michael, sent back the collar to the King, wherewith his Maiefty had honoured him. The Marquis of Mantoua and Prosper Colonne, hauing armed for the Pope, and the Marquis of Pescara for the Emperor, they besieged Parma, seated vpon a Riuer of the same name, and easie to be passed: but after great raine, and the day after the beheading of S. Iohn, hauing battered the Port of S. Croix towards Milan, (which at that time was but the Suburbs) and made a breach of fifty paces, giuen three sharpe assaults and were repulsed, about foure thousand Italians (of six thousand that were within the towne) went out at the breach, and yielded to the enemy. The Marshall of Foix, who had undertaken the defence thereof, the Lord of Pont-Dormy, gouernour of the towne, and the other Capitaines, hauing kept the bafe towne about fiftene dayes, retired into the towne beyond the Riuer, leaving an Italian Capitaine at the breach, to fauour the retreat of their men at armes, who, to worke his owne safety, deceived the enemy by a gentle stratagem, he caused euery one of the Harquebussiers, to lay an end of match, light vpon the rampier, where they did vially make their guard, so as it was an houre after the breake of day, before the enemies had knowledge that the breach was abandoned: which hauing discovered, they passe their artillery, spoile the suburbs, make their approaches to the towne at Noonday, and begin to batter the wall, which defends the other banke of the Riuer.

But small accidents doe often disappoint attempts of great consequence. The same night that the enemy entred into Codipont: (which is the suburb they had abandoned) news comes, that Alphonso of Este, Duke of Ferrara, with an hundred men at armes, two hundred light-horse, two thousand foot (whereof Lantrec had sent him a thousand Italians and Corsegues, and twelve peeces of Artillery) had surprisid Final and Saint Felix, and threatened Modena. Prosper Colonne would not diminish his army, when as he feared the enemies approach. But to assure Modena, they must draw out of the Popes armie two hundred light-horse, and eight hundred foot, led by Count Guy of Rangon, to ioyne with six hundred others that were left within the place.

On the other side, Lantrec approached with his army, which consisted of senca or eight hundred Lances, thirteene or fourteene thousand Suisses, foure thousand French, which S. Wallier had newly brought: five hundred men at armes Venetians, and foure thousand foot vnder Theodore Trinsule Generali of the Venetians, and Andrew Gritti Commissary, accompanied with the Duke of Vrbin, and Marke Anthony Colonne. These two considerations, with the oblatinate resolution of the besieged, forced the enemy to raise the siege, and to take the way of Po, to enter the estate of Milan. Lantrec follows them: but hauing lost two or three dayes in taking the Castle of Roque-bianque, he gaue them leisure to passe the Riuer. It is good to obserue the errors of a Commander, that others may iudge and make their profit thereby. The Popes army lay open to the spoile: the Lansquenets mutined for want of pay, refusing to follow, and refused to ioyne with the French. The retreat was made in confusion: the army was full of feare, for this sudden dislodging: they had in front a great difficulty, being to passe the Riuer of Po: when a great army passeth any Riuer, it is easie to disturb them, if the enemy bee diligent and valiant: were they not then likely to bee put to rout, if Lantrec had pursued them hotly? This they passed

A passed the Po, this first of October, spending a whole day, and a good part of the night at the passage, but the pairing of spies makes Commanders oftentimes not slip goodly occasions, being ignorant of the disorders and difficulties that troubled the enemy.

This is not all, other accidents happen, which being neglected, the French shall receive a shameful disgrace. The enemies army was so weak, as the Spaniards and Lansquenets were too weak to shoue open the thousand, the Italians (for their third part new souldiers) seemed rather to make a number, then for any strength; and lodged at it euey, attending a supply of Suisses, to pass for euery one, as the provision of moneie, which was brought vnto them in small quantity, was distributed to the companies by measure. The Souldiers for want of Ones, shaked their positions vpon the ciphers. Their Suisses came not, many Italians fled away secretly, and all men confessed, that if the French army which lodged at Boirdillane, in quierles neere to the enemies campe, had charged them at their rising from Rebec, halfe vanquished with so many difficulties, there had remained little or no hope of safety. For the more necessity had forced them to retire where they stood, being long, and the enemy neere, the danger had bene too vident, considering that from the Castle of Pont-luy, belonging to the Venetians, they might disorder their battalions with the Cannon. But the fruitlesse and long stay of our commanders at Rebec, after the enemies departure, gaue them leisure to passe the Riuer of Ogny, and to lodge in the village of Orlans, with an intent not to rise before the arrival of their Suisses.

The Feast of All-Saints drew neere, the nights grew long, the continuall raine and cold annoyed our Suisses, who demanded that pay which the law of Armes giues vnto souldiers that haue won a battell, saying, that it was not their fault they had not obtained a victory. But in this case not the will but the effect merits such a pay: so as of all their company there remained about foure thousand. This being full of disdain and discontent; suborned likewise by the practices of the Cardinals of Medici and Sion, who as Legats to Leo, marched in the middle of the army with their crosses of silver, enuironed (saith the Original) with numbers of armed men, artillery, blasphemers, murdherers, and theues: they did greatly weaken the Kings army, to fortifie the enemy, ioyning with Prosper Colonne, and imputing the chiefe cause thereof to the want of pay. Without doubt, it is a great error in

D Kings Officers, especially in an army, to conuert the money appointed for the payment of an army to other vices. As was at the passage of the Riuer of Adde, that the last act of this tragedy must be played: for the defence whereof Lantrec lent the Lord of Pont-Dormy, with his company: that of Ocellian Frége (led be Count Hugues of Pepoli a Bolonis) at thousand or twelve hundred foot, and two falcons. But it pleased God at this time to satisfie the Popes couetousnesse with the spoile of four men, that hee might execute the iust Iudgement of his vengeance soone after vpon his person. The enemy beats backe our guards, and puts them to flight, kils some, and amongst others, Gratian of Luce and Chardon, neighbors to the forest of Orleans: who commanded either of them a Regiment of five hundred men. They passe Adde at Vaudi, and force Lantrec to retire to Callan, and so towards Milan with his whole army.

The passage of Adde recovered Prosper Colonne's reputation, who for the retreat before Parma, and his ordinary tediousnesse, was ill reputed of, as well at Rome, as in his army. Contrariwise, Lantrec wanting neither valour nor braue resolution, but Vigilance and happinesse, purchaseth contempt of his men, and hatred of the Milanois, whom he did the more exasperate, in causing Christopher d'auoisin to be publicly beheaded, a man of great Nobility, great authority, great age, and a long time detained prisoner. Colonne aduertised of the retreat of the French to Milan, lodged at Marignan, and his Suisses in the Abbey of Cleuauay, doubtfull whether he should passe on to Milan, being fortified with so many men: or turne to Pavia, being destitute of Souldiers. Being thus irresolute, there appears from the Marquis of Mantoua, an aged man, meane in shew and apparell, who being brought before Colonne and the other Capitaines, assures them that he is sent from the Parishioners of S. Car of Milan, to let them vnderstand, that at the first approach of their army, all the people of Milan are resolu'd to take armes against the French, by the sound of the bells of euery parish: wishing them to set forward with speed, without giuing the French leisure to bethinke themselves, And so he vanished away, not knowne to any man.

paired his companies, and the Venetians assembled theirs about Cremona; who being joyned with the Suisses, passed the River of Adde, the fifth of March, and John de Medici with them, who persuaded by the Kings great and certain entertainment, was newly drawn to his service. They march like men resolved to assault the rampier, but the trenches stay them, the third day Mark Anthony Colonne and Camille bastard sonne to John Jacques of Triangle, walking together in a house, & desiring to make a mount to shoot from thence with their artillery, betwixt the enemies two trenches, a volley of Cannon shot from the towne, did beat downe the said house, and buried them in the ruines thereof. Thus Lautrec despairing to take Milan by assault, converteth all his thoughts to vanquish it in time by famine, he waits the Country, stops the victuals, breakes the mils, and cuts off their water. But not to fall into their hands whom they feare, they dread not death. The peoples hatred against the French, and the desire of their new Duke whom they expected, makes them to endure all distresses patiently. Francis Sforza comes to Trent with six thousand Lanquenets, who by the taking of the Castle of Croare, having opened the passage of Po, arrived without any lett at Pavia. The way was difficult from Paula to Milan: for at the first brute of their approach, Lautrec went to lodge at Cassin, and the Venetians at Binasque, upon the way to Pavia. There fell out an accident which helps Sforza, the Marshall of Foix came out of France with money, and some troops of footmen. Lautrec sent Frederick of Bossole, to receive him into the Estate of Milan, with four hundred Lances, and seven thousand Suisses and Italians: being joyned together, they went to Nonarre, and through the favour of the Castle, took it at the third assault, with the slaughter of most that defended it. A small gaine which shall cause a great losse.

For Lautrec wanting a great part of his forces, he gave Sforza means to enter into Milan, with his Lanquenets, and three hundred horse, with an incredible joy to the Milanais. The coming of a new Prince is very pleasing to an Estate, whereby the people hope for ease. Lautrec seeing Sforza dislodged from Pavia, and received into Milan, resolves to besiege Pavia, where the Marquis of Mantova commanded, with two thousand foot, and three hundred horse. Lautrec batteries the towne, and makes a breach of thirty fadoms, he gives two assaults, and is repulsed.

Pavia besieged in vain.

There was a posterne in the towne, lying to the River of Tegn, where they waited their horses, which by reason of the River was ill guarded: whilst they did busie the Imperials at the breach, Saint Columbe had charge to passe the River at a ford, with two thousand foot, and Riberac and Rochepey with four hundred horse: of the companies of Lautrec, and the bastard of Sauoy, who marching along the wall, where there was no watchers, should by the swiftnesse of their horses seize upon the posterne, and hold it whilst their foot came. Riberac and Rochepey execute their designe, they enter the Towne, plant a Cannon upon the Posterne: but Saint Columbe was content to bring his men to the River side, without wetting of his foot. So as the Citizens had leisure to come to succour him, and to repulse our men: who if they had beene followed, had taken the towne. Lautrec was faine fighting, and Rochepey had his leg broken with a musket shot. This attempt did wonderfully amaze the inhabitants, considering their want of men, and money, and the Marquis made it knowne, that without succours he should in the end be forced to yield the towne.

Knowing the danger, sent twelve hundred Colles and Spaniards, who marching by night, speaking Gallies, were taken for Catalines, by the Venetians, and passed their sentinels, and meeting with some French scouts, speaking Italian, were taken for Milanais. So as deceiving the Commanders by this stratagem, they passed without discovery, but very late, by the posterns, and so turning their backs, flew some small way off.

The death of Antony, kinne unto Lautrec, made him to double the fury of the Siege, and all prepared for an assault. With this new strength, with 5000 foot, and 300 horse, and comes to Camp at Cassin, three miles from the French. While he was there, there was more to give an assault, having a mighty army behind them, and changed one necessity for another. The money which Lautrec had brought, was spent, and that which came from France, was stayed in Arcole, by the Viscount Cardigne, who was sent to that end from Milan to Buße. The continual rage had cast downe the River of Tegn, and small brookes grew to great rivers: so as the victuals which came from

A Omeline, to the campe, could no more passe, whereby they were forced to raise the sieges, and draw towards Monce, to enjoy the commodities of Laudecan and Cremonois.

The enemy seeing the French Army take the way to Monce, fearing they would recover Milan, went to lodge at Biococque, a Gentlemans house, but of so great a circuit, as twenty thousand men might easily be put in battaille, upon the way from Laude to Milan. Without doubt, the valour and wisdom of Prosper, gave the first wound to the French affaires, but the impatience of the Suisses did vicerly ruin them. Their Colonels gave Lautrec to understand, that their companions were weary of camping so long without any profit, that they demand of three things the one; either money, leave to depart, or a battaille. Our Commanders hoped by famine to drive Colonne out of his borrow, and what reason was there to assault a mightie enemy, in a Fort entrenched, flanked with great platformes, and well furnished with Artillery? But neither persuasions, prayers, promises, nor authority could divert them from their first resolution. Seeing then there was no other meanes to detain them, Lautrec resolved, rather to hazard his army by a battaille, then to give any occasion to be suspected of cowardise. An unfortunate condition of a Commander, who sees himselfe a slave to those he should command: and what a griefe is it to be forced to doe that which must needs bring shame and confusion? But where force reigneth, right hath no place.

Lautrec forced to fight by the Suisses.

The day of Quasimodo, the Army marcheth towards Biococque. The Marshall of Foix led the foreward: Lautrec, the Marshall of Chabannes, the bastard of Sauoy, and Galeat of Saint Seurin, the battaille. Francis Maria, Duke of Vrbin, with the Venetian Army, the reeward. Peter of Nauarre marched before, to make the way. The Lord of Montmorency should assault them on the one side with eight thousand Suisses. Lescars, with three hundred Lances, and a Squadron of French and Italian foot, should charge at the bridge, entering into the enemies lodging: and Pontdormy should march before the Marshall of Foix, with a troupe of horse, to watch lest the Imperials should come behind and disorder the Army; and likewise to succor where neede should require.

Besides force, Lautrec vied this policy, to cause the men at armes to set red crosses upon their Casocks, the make of the Imperiall army, in stead of a white, the luerie of France. But the providence of Colonne made this device fruitlesse, as we shall see. On the other side, Colonne had sent for Sforza, who having suddenly assembled four hundred horse, and six thousand of the Commons, was set to guard the Bridge, and all the troops were put in battaille upon the trench. Montmorency, accompanied with a great number of the Nobility, was come close to the enemies rampier, intreating the Suisses to attend the Artillery; and that the Marshall of Foix should be ready to assault them on the other side: that Colonne being charged on all sides, might be constrained to divide his forces. But a rash fury transporting the Suisses to their owne ruine, all runne furiously to the enemies fort, the Cannon entertaines them before they approach, and kills above a thousand of them. A volley of small shot kills most of their Captaines, and chiefe Soldiers, and the Rampier being above a Pike in height, staves them foudainly. The Earle of Montmorency sent for the Earle of Laual, Milans of Sauoy, Granville, brother to the Vidame of Chartres, Roque-laure, la Guiche, the Lords of Tournon & Longa, Launay, a Gentleman of the Kings Chamber, and many others died there. Colonel Albert Peter (who above all others, thrust into this furie) suffered the paines of his rashnesse. Montmorency was once within the towne, but suddenly reliev'd by the Gentlemen that were about him.

The battaille of Biococque.

In the meane time the Marshall of Foix forced the guards upon the bridge, and charging the enemies within his fort, gave hope of Victory. But this violent heat of the Suisses was once quenched. All retire, yet keeping a kinde of order. The Imperials freed from the Suisses, attack all their forces upon the Marshall and Pontdormy, who had not above three hundred horse; and force them to repasse the bridge with the losse of some men. On the other side, the Spaniards issuing forth; charge the Suisses in the reeward, and find them to rout, if Pontdormy had not by a sudden charge kept them within their fort. The Venetians kept themselves safe from danger, but if they had charged with the Suisses, and men at armes, the Marshall of Foix had beene well followed. The French had won the victory. But when things are done there neuer waits an If. The Suisses had about fiftie thousand men, and two and twenty Captaines. The Enemy lost 15,000 men of quality, but 1000 of Cardone Earle of Cusane. So Lautrec returned with the rest of

of his armie, the Suisses, and the artillery to Monce, from whence the twelfth day after, the Suisses returned to their houses, and the Bastard of Savoy, the Marshall of Chabannes, and Gales of Saint Seuerin retired with them. Now shall wee see this Nation so daunted, as of many yeeres they shall not shew their accustomed vigor.

The remainder of the French hopes was chiefly grounded vpon the towne of Laude, for the passage of the river of Adde, and prefection of the country of Cremona. Lantrec sent John of Medicis, and Fredericke of Boffole thither with their troopes, which were about four hundred men at armes, and three thousand foot, comprehending those which Bonneuil, Captaine of the place had. These Companies tired with their march in the night, arrived in the morning, and leaving the guard of the towne to Bonneuil, they took their lodgings, to refresh themselves and their horse. The Marquis of Pescara followed them, and his forward marching neare vnto the towne, gave occasion to the garison to come forth to skirmish; in which our men were so roughly repulsed, as the enemy entred with them pell-mell into Laude, and surprised most of the soldiers in their beds at noone-day. Thus four hundred men at armes, and three thousand foot, were shamefully taken in a towne without battery, without breach, and without ladder. John de Medicis, and Boffole saved themselves in Cremona.

The losse of Laude from the French, was the cause the enemy recovered Pisqueton, one of the strongest places vpon Adde. Hereupon Pont d'ormy offers to put himselfe into Cremona, with such as would follow him, and being strong or weak, he would fight withall that should come, desiring rather to dye by the enemies Sword, then to fall into the mercy of villaines, or returne into France without armes, and honor. Lantrec yeelds, and he gathers together a troope out of many companies. The Marshall of Foix would haue his part of this glorie, five or six dayes after, the Imperials Campe before it. At their arrival, John de Medicis mutines, hee demands pay for fiftene or sixtene hundred men, which he had gathered together presently after his retreat: he seizeth vpon one of the gates towards the enemies Campe and threatens to deliuer it for want of payment. They search their purses and pay him the summe demanded.

But he was corrupted, and our men seeing his treacherous intent, having no hope of succours, did capitulate: That if within three monthes the King did send a strong army able to passe the river, they should depart with their baggage, armes, & all their artillery, marked with the armes of France, and should be conducted in safety vnto Savoy; and the said Marquis should deliuer into Prosper hands, all what soeuer was held in the Kings name, in the state of Milan, except the Castles of Milan, Cremona, and Novarre. This capitulation was found of hard digestion: for, Montmorency was in possibility to renew the league with the Venetians, but aduertised of this composition, they changed both affections, and partie. The reason which made Prosper yeeld to so honourable a composition, was the desire he had to restore the Adornes into Genoua before the leauy of four hundred Lances, and fourtee thousand Galscons should be ready to enter into Italy. Prosper Colonne plants himselfe before Genoua, which was then gouerned by Ottavian Fregose, a man of excellent vertue, who for his Iustice, and other commendable parts, was as much beloued as any Prince might be, in a Citie diuided into factions, having not yet lost the remembrance of the ancient libertie. Fregose seeing Ierome and Anthony Adorne take armes in fauour of the Imperials, and the people inclined to sedition, created of an accord, when as Peter of Nauarre enters into the port with two gallees, and some two hundred, to assure the towne attending the succors of France. But a Tower which the Marquis of Pescara had battered neere vnto the gate, made them returne vnto their parte. Being ready to conclude, the Spaniards discouraging the small guard they made within, vnder colour of this hope, seized on the Tower, entering the Towne thereby, and by the wall which was pynched, killing all they met, and getting a great spoile; Fregose being sicke yeelded to the Marquis of Pescara, and within few dayes after died.

Peter of Nauarre was taken fighting in the market place. The Archbishop of Salern brother to Ottavian, and many Captaines saved themselves by sea. Anthony Adorne, chosen Duke of Genoua, and within few dayes received the Citadel, the Chastelle, and the Chaytel of Saint Francis by composition. Six thousand men newly leuied by the King vnder the command of the Lord of Logres, for the succour of Genoua, and the Marquis of Claude of Orleans, Duke of Longueville, to separate the affaires of Lombardy, returned turned without any effect, being already entred into the territory of Asti and Exfol, prest by the terms limited by the composition, deliuered Cremona to Colonne, leaving Ranen, Captaine of this Castle. Thus the French were againe expelled out of Italy. Lantrec, seeing the impossibility of laudemade fruitlesse, his Armie ruined, the Suisses and Venetians retired, he returned into France, bringing to the King, rare instructions of hostilities, with any signs of his victories; imputing the cause of their disorders to want of money, without which they could no longer keepe the men at armes together, who had served eight or ten monthes without any pay, the Kings mooder having raised foure hundred thousand crownes, appointed for the payment of the Armie, which summe (the said) he had placed on the Treasurie of Prince Hercuron, and King appointed certain Iudges and Commissioners to determine of this contumacie, and to arraigne the said Semligny, for the which he lost his life, and was beheaded.

Let vs now passe over the Pirenee mountains, and thence we will returne to the frontiers of Picardie, and other Theatres where there was likewise a mournfull and bloody Tragedie. The Admirall Guennart was no sooner returned into France with his troopes, but the Spaniards went and encamped before Fontarabie, and had so prest ir with sieges for the space of a yeare, as many were dead of hunger. The Marshall of Chastillon marched with an armie to relieve the towne, and Lude, being then Gouernor, continuing to Dan (six leagues on this side Bayanne) he died of a violent sickness. A Nobleman of great experience and credit, Montmorency (who was then at Venice) succeeded him in the office of Marshall, and the Marshall Chabannes in that of Lieutenant General for the King in his Armie; who having gathered together his troopes, lodged in Endauy, hauing a riuer betwixt the Spanish Armie and him; attending Larigues Viceadmirall of Britany, with an Army at Sea, for the victualling of the towne. But not appearing (either through lack of misfortune) he resolves of an other course: he passeth the river, dislodged the enemy with his Cannon, and by continuall skirmishes, makes them flee through the mountains. So Chabannes, having victualled the towne, returns, leaving Franquet to gouern there in the Kings name: he was Lieutenant to the Marshall Chabannes, leading away Dido, to refresh himselfe in France. (Without doubt, Lude deserves to be registred in this History, having (saith the Originall) won such honour in the defence of this place, as he may well bee compared to any that haue maintained sieges in our daies, or our forefathers. Contrariwise, Franquet shall purchase as much infamy as his predecessor did honour. During these confusions beyond the Alpes and Pirenee mountains, the warre continued throughout all the garisons of Picardie, sometimes with gaine, sometimes with losse. The day of the Ammonition; twelve hundred Lansquenets going out of Arras, having spoiled Bernaillie, and other Villages thereabout, led away their booty, when as Espre, commanding the company of the Duke of Vendosme, which was in Garison at Doullans, advertised hereof, goes to horse about midnight with 30 men at armes only, fifty Archers, and three hundred of the country-men without pay: he attends them at a passage of the river of Othie: vpon their retreat, hee chargeth them; decicates them, and kills an hundred and fiftie, making the rest to leave their prey. And if this handfull of men could giue them so great a checke; what had bene the issue if their foomen had come to fight in this encounter were slaine the Lord of Rieame, and the bastard of Dampout.

The enemy grieved at this disgrace, sought to be reuenged by the surpris of Doullans, where there were no foot-men. With this designe the Earle of Bures, Lieutenant General for the Emperor in the Low countries, incamps before the towne with all his garisons; batteries it with fix peeces of artillery; makes a breach neere to the Tower of Corriere, gives an assault, and plants many ladders. Here the Inhabitants shew them selves braver Menemen, then in our late troubles; who backey this small troope of men at armes, repulse the enemy, and overthrow a good number dead in the ditch.

To raise this siege, the Earle of Saint Paul (vnder the authority of the Duke of Vendosme his brother) gathers together such forces as the garisons could furnish, whereof the Bourguignons aduertised, they shamefully returned to Arras, leaving their ladders within the trenches; Durnal, Bruell, and other places about Becunie (wonderfully annoying the Frontier) were ruined by the Duke of Vendosme. But oftentimes a small going is crost with a notable losse. Telligny came from Monstreuil, to ioyn with the Dukes troopes

troopes at Mouchy le Cayen; when as passing by Heslin, hee encountered aboute a hundred Bourgignons foot, drivinge the booty before them: hee charged the battell, slew many, and tooke others. A very preiudiciall victory, in regard of that valiant knight, so well experienced in martiall affaires, who beinge shot into the shoulder, hee dyed within a few daies after. In the meane time the Emperour passed into Spaine, to pursue the business of the sedition before mentioned; impairing his deigne to take the King of Englande this voyage, was not fruiteless, they remained well satisfied, one of absolute, to the satisfaction of the Crowne, both equally desirous to reunite. But it shall be told in another place, that the favour of heaven against their common attempts, was quite too barren for them. The first effect of their treaty, was to send the Ambassadors jointly to request the Emperour, to require the Senat to ioyne with the Emperour, for the defence of Italy. For the second; The King of England, complaining that the King did not continue to pay him the fifte thousand Crownes yearly, which hee ought him (as wee have said) hee proclaimed warre against the King by his Herald, in case he would not make a generall treaty with the Emperour, comprehending the Church, the Duke of Milan, and the Florentines. Thinking that this was, and as for the pension, it is not reasonable (said he) to give to your enemies, that aids mine enemies with money. Henry King of England had before that time a summe of money to the Emperour; but not discouering himselfe openly, hee sent the Duke of Suffolk, husband to Queene Mary, widow to Lewis the twelfth, to Calais, and the Emperour ioynd his forces with him, being led by the Earle of Burgh, till that no more was said.

The King opposed the Duke of Vendosme, commanding aboute a thousand men, Armes, with their archers; and eightene thousand foot, assisted by that veteran blinde man Lewis of Tremouille. The enemies Army was not ready in fiftene daies. The Duke there fore diuided his forces into Bologne, Therouenne, Heslin, Montreuil, Abbeville, and other places subiect to the enemies invasion. He must not suffer their courage to quicke through idleness: Bapaume serued them for an exercise. The Earle of Saint Paul led the Earle of Guise and Lorges thither, equall in charge, with foure hundred men at Armes; five hundred foot and foure Cannons: who hauing taken blimt and razed the Towne and Castle, they tooke their way, to the passage of Sluce, and finding it guarded by the Bourgignons, they charge them, and chase them to the gates of Douay. Here Francis brother to the Duke of Loirain and Earle of Guise, of the age of sixteen or seenteene yeeres, carried his first Armes, who seeing in this chase, seuen or eight Bourgignons on foot, seeking their safety within the woods: being alone, not seene by his followers, hee lights and chageth them, but Martin du Bellay arises happily, accompanied with ten or twelue horse, by whose means these run-awaies were cut in peeces.

The English
land in France.Heslin besieged by the imperials and English.

Hereupon the English arise at Calais, and at their first entry, they become masters of the castle of Comtes, betwixt Montreuil and Heslin. To prevent these incursions, the Duke sent the foresaid Earles into the trench of Bologne: Andres was there ruined and lost, who by the recovery of the said castle, put all to the sword they found within it, except the Capitaine: and afterwards overthrow many other troopes, that were dispersed in the land of Oye, while the two Armies, English and Bourgignons assembled betwixt Andres and Saint Omer, consulting upon the first object of their forces. Heslin seemed the easiest to be attempted, yet it must needs cost blowes. The Lord of Biez commanded there with thirty men at Armes, and two hundred dead-paies: Scam with a thousand foot, and La Lande with five hundred. The battery continued fiftene dayes; and a breach was made of forty fadome, but no assault given: the enemy being diuersed by continuall alarms: The Earles of Guise and Pont-dornay, vnderstanding one day amongst others, that foure hundred English were gone towards Biez, and the Commander of Oison, they part from Montreuil with their companies, and some of the Duke of Vendosme, they ouertake them, charge them, and kill or take them all. Some few dayes after, Pont-dornay encountering some other troopes, which had burnt Fressin, a house of his elder brothers, hee put them all to the sword.

Thus kept within their lodgings, by continuall enterprises, and assisted with a generall aux, which went through their Army, proceeding in part by the continuall raine, after five weekes siege, they raised their campe with shame, to march towards Dourlans, which was not defensible. At that time there was no castle, and from the mountains where it was built, they discovered the towne on all sides. The Earle of Saint Paul prouoked the enemy,

A and (lest they should make vse thereof) he spoyled the victuals, and tooke off the gates: then he retired to Corby, to withstand the attempts of the English. Then arrived the Marshall of Montmerney, bringing with him the two hundred Gentlemen of the Kings Chamber, with authority from his Maiestie to command in Corby, if the enemy did besiege it.

But there was too great a resolution in Corby, the wayes were too foule, the infirmities were many in the English and Bourgignons Armies, and winter approaching (it was about all-Saints) inuited them to set faile. Being able to doe no worse, they burnt Dourlans, and the villages about, and retired into Arthois, putting the Bourgignons into Garison, and the English toke their way for England. Let vs conclude this yeere with an inglorious and fatal losse for the Christians. Seliman did not forget to make his profit of these horrible confusions, who by a painefull and constant siege, for the space of eight moneths, brought the Isle of Rhodes vnder his obedience; where (to the great contempt of our religion) hee made his entrie the day of the birth of our Lord and Saujour. In the beginning of the following yeere, the cattle of Milan (preft with diseases and want of all things) compounded to depart with bag and baggage, if they were not releued by the fourth of April. But death preventing most part of the garrison, hindered them from enioying any benefit of the Capitulation.

At the same time Linet, a Souldier of the garison of Guise, treated with the Duke of Alfort, to deliuer him the Towne (but not according to the buyers intent) by the consent of Nicholas of Buslu Lord of Longueval, captain of the castle. The party was well made, and the plot cunningly laied, to take the merchants when they should come for their possession. The Lord of Fleuranges, with three hundred men at Armes, and foure or five thousand foot, should lie betwixt Auennes and Guise, to stop the enemies retreat. The Duke of Vendosme, with five hundred men at Armes, foure thousand Germanes, and foure thousand French, should cut off their way betwixt the Abbey of Bonhoury and Guise, so as the enemy seeking to retire, had the one before him, and the other behind. The chiefe of all their troopes would bee partakers of this enterprise: When as newes comes vnto them, that the King (who would countenance this exploit with his presence) was come in post to Genlis, neere vnto Chauns. This made them turne head without any effect, giuing him the strappadoe that sold it, and was their guide, the which Longueval required with the like to the hostages, which the Duke of Arcefoot had giuen him for the performance of covenants.

His maiesty, to make vse of these troopes which he had assembled, commanded them to victuall Therouenne, the which Fiennes besieged with fiftene thousand Flemings and six hundred English, the King had a little before repaired it. Baileul upon the hill, a strong place, betwixt Arras and Dourlans, and defended by three hundred Spaniards, was a hindrance to this designe. The Duke of Vendosme tooke charge of the Army, whereof the Duke of Norfolk led the Germanes, the Lords of Serquy, Bourmonville, la Hergerie, Fouvent and Heills commanded the French. Brian had foure hundred archers of the Kings guard, and la Fayette commanded the artillery: he made his approaches at noone day, without any trenches, but with the losse of three Gunners that were slaine, and the Lord of Pienres shot into the arme: he barred it the same day, gaue them their lues that were within it, and razed the Castle. The enemy lodged in Andinfont and Dellente, halfe a league from Therouenne: and la Lude Marshall of the Campe (hauing lodged his Army at Fougernberg, to haue victuals more commodiously from Montreuil, & to keepe them from the enemy) did cut off the way to Saint Omer, and the garison of Therouenne; that of Aire, Fiennes seeing them approach so neere, dislodged in the night, and went to Campe at Elfaur. The Duke of Vendosme followed, with an intent to fight, whilst that Brian marching directly to Therouenne releued it with such victuals as were brought from Montreuil. The Earle of Dammartin and the Lord of Eguilly began the skirmish, when a sudden feare surprising the Flemings, puts them in rout towards the riuer of Coldees, where many were drowned in the passage, not able to be staied, although no man followed them: for that Brian returning from Therouenne, brought commandement from the King to the Duke of Vendosme, not to hazard a battaile, but to keepe his forces whole for the voyage of Italy, which his Maiesty pretended to make in person.

fresh for some dayes. The victuall and carriages being ready, and the troopes camping A before Andinon, vpon the River of Lis, the foreward led by the Marshall of Montmorency, was on the one side of the River, and the battaile on the others the Flemings and Botrugnions (advertis'd of these divided lodgings) come and charge them both by night at one instant, fall vpon the guards of the light horsemen of the battaile, and repulse them to the men at armes, whereof part being then on horse-backe, they sustaine the shooke; and if they had not buſied themselves with the spoile, before a small victorie, it would have caused a great disorder in the Armie.

The Marshall had fortified his guards. Tiguerette, a man at Armes of his company commanded them, who at the first alarm given by his Skouts, being advanced to discover, B he was compassed in and taken prisoner. Our Historie owes the report of his name, to the faithfull affection he bare vnto his country: for, fearing lest the Campe should be surpris'd, he respected not his life in regard of the advertisement he might give, in crying to armes. So the enemy seeing himselfe discovered, made the victualling of Therouenne easie by his retreat. This exploit increased the Kings desire to repasse the Alpes. With this intent he sent the Marshall of Montmorency, to make a leavy of twelve thousand Suisses, appointing the Rendezvous for his Army at Lions in the beginning of August, he dispatched the Admirall of Bonniuer, with six thousand French, led by Lorges, to get the passage of Suze, vntill he might follow with the rest of his forces.

The Venetians, hauing tried in former times that the neighborhood of the French C King, and the Emperours of Germanie, had caus'd them to attempt against their common weale, desiring that the Duchy of Milan might remaine in the possession of Francis Sforza, whose power they nothing feared; and for that the Emperour, not able to proceede further, inclined to the restoring of Sforza, they embraced his friendship, and concluded a peace and perpetual league with him, with Ferdinand Duke of Austria, and with Francis Sforza, Duke of Milan, whereby they bound themselves; To arme for the common defence of Italy, six hundred men at armes, six hundred light-horse, and six thousand foot. And the Emperour, with the like numbers of men should defend all that the Venetians possesse in Italy. Moreouer, Pope Adrian, desiring (in shew) the generall peace of all Christendome, had soone after his coming to the Pontifical seat, made some D shew to interpose his authority for the reconciliation of our warriors.

But he had beene a long time at the Emperours deuotion, so as he did willingly giue care to such as perswaded him, not to suffer the French King to repossesse the Duchy of Milan. And certaine letters of the Cardinall of Volterres, intercepted by the means of the Duke of Sessa, Ambassador for the Emperour at Rome, thrusts him on to make his declaration against the King. This Cardinall aduiled the King, by the Bishop of Xaintes his Nephew, to assaile the Island of Sicilia, with an Army by Sea, to constrain the Emperour to turne his forces to the defence thereof, and to make the way more easie to recouer the estate of Milan. And according to this counsell, a practice was discovered in Sicilia, in the Kings fauour, which was the death of the Earle of Camerata, the Master E of the Ports, and of the high Treasurer of the Island, who was quartered. These reasons and the landing of the French, which was bruited throughout all Italy, did easily draw the Pope to ioyne with the Emperour, the King of England, the Archduke Ferdinand, brother to the Emperour, the Duke of Milan, the Florentines, Genouois, Sienois, and Luquois, who agreed to leauy an army to oppose it against any one that should invade any of the confederates in Italy. Neither the Emperours league with the Venetians (who had plaid the turne-coates) nor the vnion of so many Princes and Estates conspired together, could daunt the resolution of our Francis: and now the rumour of his coming bred new tumults in Italy. Lionel, brother to Albert Eie surpriseth the towne of Carpi, which the Emperour had taken from him, proclaiming him a rebell to the Empire.

Francis Sforza, riding one day from Monce to Milan, and his troope remaining behind, left they should annoy the Duke with the dust which their hories did raise, Boniface Visconti, a young Gentleman (grieved that a kinsman of his had beene put to death within Milan, by the consent (said he) of the said Duke) watching his opportunity, pricks forward with a dagger in his hand to strike Sforza in the throat: but being mounted vpon a little Moyle, and Boniface vpon a tall and swift Turkish horse, Sforza had meynes to slip aside, so as he hurt him in the shoulder, & then the murderer began to strike him with his sword

A sword, but his traine coming to his rescue, they forced him to leaue him, and so by the swiftnesse of his horse, he saved himselfe in Piedmont. Galeas of Birague followed by the banished men of Milan, and some French souldiers which were in Piedmont, seized vpon Valence, but hauing no time to fortifie it, Anthony of Leua besieged it, battered it, and the second day of the siege tooke it by force, with the slaughter of foure hundred men, and many prisoners taken, of which number was Galeas chiefe of the troope.

The French Armie passed the Alpes in small troopes, and the King prepared to follow them. But it is a matter of dangerous consequence for a King to thrust a great Prince into despair, who hath means of reuenge, if without respect of his degree or quality, B they seeke wholly to oppresse him. Notwithstanding Princes should forbear to cause any innovations, if they did but duly examine the causes and reasons whereby men colour their bearing armes against their country. The Kings journey is staied by the like occurrent. We have noted before, that the leading of the foreward (giuen by the King to the Duke of Alençon, and to the Marshall of Chastillon) was the first moue which estranged Charles Duke of Bourbon, Constable of France, from the Kings seruice, and this other did wholly withdraw him. Of the marriage of Peter Duke of Bourbon, and Anne, sister to King Charles the eight, Susanne was borne, their only heire, the which being made sure to Charles of Valois, Duke of Alençon, Charles of Bourbon, Earle of Montpensier, and afterwards Constable, commenced a suite, after the decease of the said Peter, C that all the lands of his succession belonged vnto him, as the heire male issued from a younger brother of Bourbon. To end this controuersie, a marriage was made betwixt the said Earle of Montpensier, and Susanne, and he called himselfe Duke of Bourbon. Susanne dying soone after the first discontent of Charles Duke of Bourbon, the Kings mother being Regent (by the counsell as they say of Anthony Prat, then Chancellor) pretended, that such lands as came by the succession of Peter of Bourbon, and were held by gift, belonged to the King: and such as were held by inheritance, appertained vnto her, as the next heire, and daughter to a sister of the said Peter married with the Duke of Sauoy.

The suite depended in the Court of Parliament at Paris, and Charles either distrusting the equity of his cause, or fearing lest the Regents authority should preuaile against his D right, and so by consequence dispossesse him, choosing rather to abandon his country, then to liue in want, he practiseth with the Emperour, by the means of Adrian of Croy Earle of Rieux: and to make the articles of his transaction the more strong, he obtains a promise from the Emperour, to marie Eleanor his sister, widow to Emanuel King of Portugal.

The King being past the Alpes, the Constable should invade Bourgongne with twelue thousand Germans, which should be secretly leauied by the Emperour and King of England, who at the same instant should invade Picardie, whilst the Spaniards recovered Fontarabie, as they did. Of their conquests, he onely referred Prouence, pretending to call himselfe King of Prouence, as belonging vnto him (said he by the house of Anjou, yielding all the rest to the English). A practice sufficient to shake France, before the King (being absent with his forces) should return in any time to succour it. But they reckoned without their host, and the Guardian of this Crowne did prevent them: for Argoules and Maignon, Gentlemen of Normandie, and household seruants to the Duke, had aduertised the King of his pretended retreat to the Emperour, but they were ignorant of the agreement made betwixt them. To diuert him from this resolution, the king passing by Molins, did visit the Duke in his chamber, who made a shew to be sicke, and that cunningly. "I vnderstand (said the King) of some practices which the Emperour makes to withdraw the loue you undoubtedly beare vnto the Crowne, as issued and ascribed to the house of France. I doe not beleuee, that you haue giuen care to any such persuasions, moued E with any dislike of me, or of my realme. Some feare of distrust to lose your Offices, hath perchance made a breach in the loue you haue alwaies made shew of. Let not this conceit trouble you, I promise you, in case you should lose your suite against my selfe & my mother, to restore you to the possession of all your goods. Prepare therefore to follow me after your recovery, in the voyage of Italy. The Duke (being very wise) dissembled his intent cunningly, confessing vnto the King, that in truth the Earle of Rieux had sought him for the Emperour; but he would giue no date vnto him, that his intention was to haue aduertised his Majesty at the first view, being loth to commit it to any mans report; that the Physicians gave him hope to be soone able to goe in a Litter, and that he would not faile A to come to Lions, to receive his Maiesties commandements. But, considering that he had to deale with too strong a partie, and that hardly he should enjoy his goods, which were already sequestred by a Decree of the Court, he retired to Chantelles in the beginning of September, a house of his owne, where he had the most sumptuous mouables that any Prince could have. From thence he sent the Bishop of Autun, of the house of Burians to the King, with instructions signed with his hand, promising, To serve his Maiesty well and loyalty in all places, whensoever it should please him, during his life, and without any breach, upon restitution of the possessions of Peter of Bourbon.

The Duke of
is disguised.

The King finding this manner of proceeding hard and insolent, sent the bastard of Savoy, Lord Steward of France, and the Marshall of Chabannes, with four hundred men at armes, the Captaines of his Guards, and the Prouost of his house, to besiege the Duke in Chantelles. And understanding that many Lansquenets did troope together vpon the frontier of Bourgogne, he caused the Bishop of Autun, the Chancelor of Bourbonnois, the Lord of Cars, Saint Valler, Buffy brother to Palisse, Emard de Prie, la Pangaion, and many others to be taken prisoner, who for the loue of him were content to abandon their Country, families and goods, notwithstanding they found grace with the King. But the Duke (despairing of his estate) resolved to hazard all; and to beginne a furious Tragedie, in the which we shall see our Francis act the part of an vnfortunate prisoner of the warres, and Charles referred for a bloody and tragick end. He disguised himselfe, and taking the Lord of Pomperant for his onely companion, whole seruant he seemed to be. After many turnings being often feared, as appears in the Originals, the waies being laied, and the passages stop, or full of troopes, marching into Italy, he recouers the Franche countie, and so by Ferrete, crossing through Germany, he came into Italy, and according to the choise which the Emperor gaue him, either to passe into Spaine, or to remaine in Italy with his Army; in the end he continued at Genoua, to see the end of these two great Armies.

The Marshall and Lord Steward seized vpon Chantelles, with the mouables of Carlus, and generally of all the lands of the house of Bourbon for the King. In the meane time the Marshall of Montmorency had made such speed, as his twelue thousand Suisses were ioyned with the Admirall, attending the Kings coming at Turin. But his presence was necessary in France: there were strange practices against him. He therefore sends part of his forces to the Admirall, and commands him to execute the enterprise of Milan, as they two had concluded. He had eightene hundred Launces, twelue thousand French, ten thousand Suisses, six thousand Lansquenets, and three thousand Italians, a sufficient army for a great attempt: but want of iudgment to imbrace occasions, and negligence of his businesse, made the Admirall lose the opportunity to recouer Milan at the first, and to be vnfortunate in this voyage.

Prosper Colonne, considering the Venetians league with the Emperor, and the treachery of the Duke of Bourbon, could not beleue that the King should continue constant in his resolution, to invade the Duchie of Milan that yeare. This persuasion had made him carelesse to make necessary prouision for his war. But now (notwithstanding his infirmities) hee imployes all his meanes and forces to keepe the French from passing the River of Tefin, neglecting to repaire the Bastions and Rampiers of the suburbs of Milan, being for the most part ruined and spoiled. But the French finding the waters low, some passed at a Ford, others in Boats about some foure miles from the Imperial campe, making a Bridge for the Artillery. Colonne, knowing that an encounter of the French is very dangerous, in their first heat, retired into Milan, and finding the Citizens and Souldiers wonderfully amazed, seeing no meane to keepe the Citie in the estate it was, hee abandons it, to provide for the defence of Laude. Without doubt the capricious propositions of an enemye must bee duly examined: and moreover an assault, that hath prevented his enemye, should not lose any houre neither by his two great lenities, nor his baste negligence.

Hereupon Galeas Visconti gives the Admirall to vnderstand, that if he enters forcibly into Milan, there will be no meane to saue it from spoile, and so by consequence, the King shall make no vse thereof against his enemies; but if hee would suffer him to goe and compound with some Citizens, which did sollicite him, hee would giue order the Imperials should depart, and furnish the King with a good sum of money, which might greatly

A greatly auail him in his affaires. The Admirall is carried away with these persuasions. But whilst that Galeas Boyer, General of Normandie, and some others doe treat, they spend some time in vaine by the River of Tefin, during the which, Prosper deluded out with parles, reuiued the hearts of his men (who had already packt vp their baggage for their retreat) and with exceeding diligence, puts the Rampiers in defence. And then knowing his forces vnable to defend the whole Duchie, hee restrained them to keepe Milan, Cremona, and Pavia; whilst the fury of the French should grow cold by an idle abode, and the winter approaching neare, ruine them.

The Admirall, finding the error he had committed by his too great credulity, employed all his forces against Milan, but too late, the Citizens had gotten heart, and Prosper B had now gathered together eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horse, foure thousand Spaniards, six thousand five hundred Lansquenets, and three thousand Italians; besides the Inhabitants, who were all armed. He doth notwithstanding besiege it, betwixt the wayes to Laude and Pavia, and seeing other places abandoned, hee takes Monte for the King, to cut off the victuals from Milan: he sends Buffy d'Amboise, with 2000 Frank-archers, to seize vpon Alexandria, and the Cheualier Bayard, with four hundred men at armes, eight thousand foot, and ten pieces of artillery to Laude, where leaving a strong garison, he went suddenly to attempt Cremona. The Castle held yet for the King, but the enemies had made two great trenches betwixt the towne and the Castell. There

sieged.

C Rance de Cere, a Baron of Rome ioyned with him, leading foure thousand Italians. This supply encouraged Bayard to attempt the towne in another place. They make their approaches, and within three daies make a reasonable breach. But all fall out crossly for the French, being ready to goe to the assault, a continuall raine of foure daies, made the ascent so slippery, as they went as much backward as foreward, and did so breake the waies, as no victuals could come to the Campe from any part, euen so it chanced to Lautrec before Pavia. Moreover, the Venetians came on the one side, and the Spaniards on the other, cut off their Victuals. So Bayard prest with famine, resight the Castle with men and victuals, and returned to Milan. Without doubt Bannon with the whole garison that kept this Fort, deferred great commendations: where hauing continued two yeares in extremitye necessity, desiring all rather to dye, after the example of their Captaine then to yield the place by treachery, there remained onely eight souldiers, whom Bayard found languishing, but resolute in their constancie.

Wee haue vnderstood, that by the intelligences of the Duke of Bourbon, the Emperor at the same instant should assaile Bourgogne, and Champagne; the English Picardie, and the Spaniards Fontaraby. According to this designe, and to make the siege of Fontaraby easie, the Spaniards campe before Bayonne the seuenteenth of September. Lautrec, Governor of Guienne, although he were vnprouided of men, (the Kings forces being dispersed in Italy, Champagne, and Picardie) furnished the towne with victuals, munition; and such men as the time and necessity could afford; and hee himselfe went into it: where the valour of this Noble man, who continued three daies and three nights continually vpon the walls, providing for all things necessary, especially for the entrie of two Rivers which passe at Bayonne, giuing such courage to men, women, and children, as euery one falling to worke, the most coward made shewes of great willingnesse.

So as the fourth day of the siege, the enemy finding that hee did but lose his time, left Bayonne to besiege Fontaraby, which shewed no proofes of like valour. It was furnished with good store of men, and other things necessary. Francis commanded there, as we haue formerly declared. He was an ancient Gentleman, and all his life had had the reputation of a good Souldier. But now to saue his goods, not attending any force, hee yielded the towne which was not to be forced. A cowardice which brought him to a scaffold at Lions, to be there degraded of his nobility and himselfe, with his posterity declared base, for that hee had beene so faint-hearted and carelesse, to prevent the conspiracy, which hee said, Don Pedro of Nauarre (the Sonne of Peter Marshall of Nauarre, whom the Spaniards had lately caused to die in prison) had with the Spaniards. On the other side, the Lansquenets which had beene leauied for the Duke of Bourbon were come into Champagne, vnder the command of William, Earle of Buxtemberg, and spoiled the Province, after they had taken Collic, a place vpon the confines of the French Countie of Montreuil, a Castle seated vpon a mountaine, neare to Chaumont in Bassaigne. The Duke of Burgundy whom the King had made his Lieutenant generall in Bourgogne, in the place of the Lord of Tremouille, lately advanced to the government of Picardie: having with his company of an hundred men at armes, those of the Dukes of Alençon and Vendosme, joynt with the forces of Ornel, Gouverneur of Champagne, and some other troopes, making about six hundred men at armes, so restrained the enemy, as having no means, for want of horse, to guard their foragers, they were in few daies famished, and forced to seeke their retreat at Neuf-chastell in Lorraine. The Duke of Guise, advertised of their course, sent some three hundred men at armes before, to charge them in front, at the passage of the River of Meuse, whilst that he should set on them behind, being laden with a great bootie. The Duke came, and finding them halfe past, he cut the remainder in peeces, and recovered the bootie. But a quarrell chanced betwixt Courville and Chastelet a Lorraine, Ensigne-bearer to the said Duke, the which (Courville being thrust through the mouth with a sword) overthrew the better part of this goodly enterprise. The Duke of Suffolke was lately landed againe at Calais, with fourteene or fifteene thousand English, which joynt with the forces of the Earle of Bure, made five or six thousand horse, and about five and twenty thousand foot. But if in their former voyage, they made a great stirre, and reaped small benefit, so likewise, they will make but a bare conquest by this last descent.

Tremouille (although he had so few men, as he was forced, when he had left the place, to retire his men, to put them into that whither the enemy seemed to bend) had so furnished the townes with valiant Commanders, and all things necessary, as the Duke and Earle, having made a shew to besiege Theroenne, Hedin, Dowlans, and Corbie, in the end they Campe before Bray vpon Somme: the wall was weak, and three mountaines commanding the towne, were the cause they could not fortifie it: yet that brave Pontdormy had thrust himselfe into it with an hundred and fiftie men at armes, and some fiftie hundred foot, to defend this passage against the enemy. Let vs not blame a valiant Captain, if he receive a disgrace in a weak place. He made his account (in case he were forced) to retire by the Causey, and to breake the Bridges after him. But he was so prest, as he had no means to retire, but in disorder, with the losse of foure-score, or an hundred men: and if he had not maintained the fight with his men at armes, whilst his footmen recovered Corbie, there had bene no hope of safety for the rest.

But see how he reuenged this disgrace. The enemy threatened Montdidier: and the small forces Tremouille had, made all men vnwilling to lead any succors thither. Pontdormy was neuer daunted with the difficulty of any enterprise. Night being come, hee goes to field, and without any encounter, puts Rochebaron an Auernac, into Montdidier, and Fleuras Lieutenant of the Earle of Dammarins Companie, either of them commanding fifty men at armes, and René of Pallaciere, with a thousand French. And fearing lest Tremouille should haue need of him, hee had not the patience to attend for night to make his retreat, hee doth it at noone day, resolute to charge all he should encounter, having but his owne companie, with that of the Vicount of Lauedan. With this resolution hee meets with five hundred horse, chargeth them with such fury, as hee puts them to rout. But two thousand men, coming to succour the rest, he was forced to leave the chase, to fauour the retreat of his troope. In the which, his horse being slaine, he left Barnieules, and Canaples his brother & nephew, to beare the shock with twenty men at armes, whilst that hee saued the rest in Amiens, the enemy cutting off the way to Corbie. Barnieules, and Canaples, ouerthrowne from their horses, were taken prisoners, with seven men at armes of their Company. So Roy remained at the enemies mercy, who having taken and burnt it, marched to Montdidier, where a breach being made, they within distrusting of their forces, departed with their baggage, and came to Tremouille.

The enemy had opened the passage of Qlfe, and approached within eleven leagues of Paris. But their courses are staid, and Paris is assured by the arrivall of the Duke of Vendosme, with four hundred men at armes, so as the English and Bourguignons fearing to be compassed in by the Duke and Tremouille, and so famished, tooke their way to Artois, and alke after All-Saints day (a notable season for the losse of corne, which was frozen generally throughout the Realme) they dismissed their armie, carrying no other spoiles of their victory, but the taking of the Castle of Bohain, which was yielded vnto them without any assault. But the enemy was no sooner retired, but Tremouille, before the Duke of

Vendosmes

A Vendosmes arrivall, made so furious a battery with six Cannons, as the Garrison, seeing their armie broken, yielded by composition. Thus Picardie is freed from a mighty Avemie, which at their departure held not one foot of land of their conquest.

In like sort, the Duke of Bourbons attempt against Bourgogne returned to snooke, for wanting money to pay his Lansquenets, the King did practice some of their Captains, who came to him with their troopes. So despairing to get any thing in France, he retired to Milan. Adrian the Emperor ioued treason, but not the traitor. So the Emperor Charles ioued his actions, but not the Duke of Bourbons person. To keep him from passing into Spaine, vnder hope of marrying with Elenor, sister to the Emperor Charles, he made him his Lieutenant General in Italy, whilst that hee prepared to passe into France in person, as we shall see.

Let vs now returne into Italy, where we shall see a Pope of a more turbulent spirit then Adrian, who died the fourteenth of September, little lamented; and of small esteeme. He was a stranger, and little acquainted with the affaires of the Court of Rome: he was learned, and not greatly vicious. The Colledge of Cardinals repined to see any other set in S. Peters Chaire, but an Italian, or at the least, one bred vp in Italy: Nicolas Cardinal of Medici, after many & sundry strifes and contentions, euery one of the Cardinals seeking the choise & election by the support of such as favoured him, in the end carried it; the nineteenth of November, Through the fauour (saith the Originally) of the great revenues of his Ecclesiastical living. In all his Actions we shall see him discover a spirit wonderfully ambitious, of a great courage, aduise, desirous of innovations, given to affaires especially of the world; not much subiect to his pleasures, and gluing hope of great and extraordinary matters: and for that presently after his insalment, hee vsed clemency to the Cardinal of Volterre, declared vninsufficient to come into the conclau: by Adrian, for this subiect we haue formerly noted: hee therefore tooke vpon him the name of Clement the seventh. In the meane time our Admirall tooke cold before Milan, which hee thought to famish, cutting off the Conduits that went into the towne, and beating downe the Milles: but the great number of hand-milles (which Goleme had caused to be made) preserved the Citizens from famine. And to cut off the victualls that came from Lauedan to the French Campe, Colonne had put the Marquis of Mantoua, with five hundred horse into Pavia. The Admirall fearing lest hee should seize vpon the Bridge hee had made at Vigé, by the which victualls came vnto his Army, hee commanded Bayard and Rance, to come and lodge at Vigé: But by their dislodging from Monce, the passage was open to the enemy, and then victualls entered abundantly into Milan, which caused the ruine of the French Army.

Nothing succeeded happily with them; whom the providence of God doth not fauour. The hope to famish Milan is frustrate; and the intelligence which the Admirall had within the towne, with one Morgand, a Corporall of the Squadron of Isabelle de Medici is discovered; with the losse of all their hues, that had consented the should haue receiued the French into a bastion, when the guard thereof fell vnto him. Moreover, the enemy growes proud of small advantages and light victories; who being accustomed to overcome by degrees, resolves to vanquish all at once. John de Medici being to guard the victualls that came from Trefle to Milan, with five hundred horse and a thousand foot, met with foure-score French Lances, and by a skilfull retreat drew them into an ambush of five hundred Harguebuziers which hee had laid: he easily defeats them; slew some, and takes the rest.

In another encounter, Sucere a Bourguignon, put to rout three score men at armes of the companie of the Master of the Horse. Our men being in guard at the residence, whilst were made to go vnto the rampiers, assisted by many skirmishes, had most commonly the worst. So decreasing in number, prest with abundance of snow, and the sharpness of the winter which they had endured six months together, the Admirall leaved his armie to lodge it in Bizias, & other places thereabouts. He sent the Earle of S. Paul to Bizias with Rance de Cote, and Louise, General of the French foot, to besiege Arona, a towne vpon Laco-Maiore. They make their approaches, plant their Ordnance, batter about five and twenty daies, and give two or three assaults: But Colonne foreseeing this designe, at the retreat of our men, had manned the towne with twelve hundred soldiers, who made our attempt fruitlesse. Thus which they could not do by assault, they seeke to effe by myne, blowing vpa great part of the wall. But they kick against the pricke. The wall falls vpon the same foundation, and stands firme. So frustrate of their intention, hauing lost many good men, they retorne to the Campe.

At that time Prosper Colonne, the chiefe pillar of the Emperours affaires in Italy, dyed the last day but one of the yeare. A famous Captaine throughout all the course of his life, well practised in matters of warre, slow to imbrace the occasions which the weaknesse or disorders of his enemies might present him: but commended to haue managed the warre more by counsell, then with the sword. Don Charles of Lauoy, Viceroy of Naples, was substituted by the Emperour: Don Charles, hauing taken vpon him the gouernment, employed all his wit to expell the French out of the Duchie of Milan, either by force or famine: and to approach neere vnto them, attending a supply of six thousand Lanquenets out of Germany: an occasion was offered to make the first fruits of his armes famous.

They giue him intelligence, that Bayard Mezzeris, and Saint Mesme with two hundred men at armes, and Lorges with the French foot; whereof he was Colonell, lodged at Rebecq, two miles from Biagras. To giue them a Canuissado on the sudden, hee sends the Marquis of Pescara, and Iohn de Medicis, who came from the taking of Marignan by composition. Sometimes renowned Captaines are lulled asleepe with conceit of their owne reputations: and although the enemy feares them, yet hee most obserues them, and desires most to circumvent them.

But Bayard was sicke, and that day had taken Physicke. The Spaniard falls vpon the French guards two howers before day, and presently beates them backe vpon their men at armes; Bayard (being sicke) and Lorges, gather together what men they could, and maintaine the shooke whilst the rest retired to the Campe: few men, but all the baggage was lost. Hereupon the Lanquenets arise, and the Imperiall army ioyned with the Venetians: and the Popes (a right Florentine, and no lesse counterfeiter then Leo the tenth, his kinsman, for hee assured Saint Maxent, the Kings Ambassador, that hee would asside neither party, and yet hee did ayde the Emperour both with men and money) being come to lodge at Caserte, five miles from Biagras. There were in the Imperiall troopes, fixteene hundred men at Armes, fiftene hundred light horse, seven thousand Spaniards, twelue thousand Lanquenets, and fiftene hundred Italians. The chiefe Commanders were the Dukes of Milan and Bourbon, the Viceroy of Naples, the Marquis of Pescara.

The Duke of Vrbino commanded for the Venetians, six hundred men at armes, six hundred light horse, and seven thousand foot. Iohn de Medicis led the Popes forces. The Admirall, besides his companies diuided into Garisons, and the French troopes camped at Biagras (attending six thousand Swisses to refresh his army) had with him eight hundred Lances; eight thousand Swisses (and within few daies after three thousand more ioyned with him) four thousand Italians, and two thousand Lanquenets. The lodging was safe, and no means to force them: onely feare of famine must dislodge them. With this designe the Imperials passe the riuier of Tefin, and lodge at Gambale, to cut off the victuals that came from Omeline to the French: they take Garleas from them, and Saint George, seated about Monce. Garleas furnished their army with victuals, which came freely to them from Pavia: and Saint George cut off the prouision that came to our men from Biagras.

So the Admirall fearing to be distressed for victuals, and to lose the other places of Omeline, the which being taken, hee had bene in a manner besieged of all sides; hee leaues an hundred light horse, and a thousand foot in Biagras, vnder terrence Caraccioli, a Neapolitan, and went to lodge at Vigewe. He was farre inferiour in number, yet hee presents his army in battaile three daies together, but the enemy refuseth the combat; he would not hazard a victory which hee held assured without losse of men. It was better to dislodge the French from Vigewe: for the effecting whereof, the Imperials march to Sartrane vpon the Riuier, fit to cut off the victuals from our men: Hugh Earle of Perpoli, and Iohn of Biraghe seek for the King. The Admirall followeth them to save both the men and the place. But vpon the way hee had newes that it was forced; most part of them slain, and the Commanders prisoners. Marsil supplied our men with most part of their necessary victuals. The enemy by the means of Ernst of Erlow, thus vp the Chapelle, being stronger

A stronger then the Guelphes in the said City, who by their mutiny bring in the Imperials, which gaue them great hope to haue the French army at their mercy for want of victuals: and if need were, to stop their retreat into France; and to this end they seize vpon the passage of Camarian. Mischiefe vpon mischiefe is no safety: Monteian, and Boutieres Lieutenant of Bayard his company, had chosen an hundred or six score of their best men at armes for the execution of an enterprise they had plotted. But being ill guided, they encountered a stronger party, were defeated, and all taken prisoners: a great weakning to an army in an after-season. The Admirall did still temporize, grounding his hopes vpon four hundred Lances which the Marquis of Rotelin did bring: who passing by the Mount of Geneure, should ioine with ten thousand Swisses, and Rance de Cere brought six thousand Grisons, by the country of Bergamo, to passe at Laude to Fredericks of Boheme, who led a great number of Italian foot, to assaile the Duchy of Milan on that side, and force the enemy to re-passe the riuier of Tefin. With this designe the Admirall comes to lodge at Nourarie.

But the ruine of our men approached. Sforza sent Iohn de Medicis against the Grisons, with fifty men at armes, three hundred light horse, and three thousand foot, who ioyned with three hundred men at armes, three hundred light horse, and four thousand foot of the Venetians, and stopp their passage, so as being discontented, hauing no ayd of horse nor foot as Rance had promised them, they returned to their Country. This thorne pulled out of the Imperials foot, Iohn de Medicis takes Carauage, batters downe the bridge which the French had vpon Tefinar Bufalore: and nothing remaining of all the townes betwix Milan and the Tefin, but onely Biagras, which lying vpon the great channell that runnes to Milan, did cut off the victuals which were wont to come to the towne in great abundance: Sforza followed by all the youth of Milan, besieged it, accompanied with Iohn de Medicis, he battered it foure or five dayes, and was repulsed from the first assault; hee forced it at the second, and spoiled it. A spoile deely sold to the Milanois. Biagras was infected with the plague, so all the houses of Milan, whither any of the booty came, were infected with the same contagion, which was the death of aboute fifty thousand persons. Biagras taken, (to stop all the passages from the French) the Viceroy went to lodge at Marignan: and the Admirall, considering that it was better to hazard the rest of his army, then to perish by famine and pestilence, which had greatly diminished his troops; hee took the way to Romagnan, to ioine with eight thousand Swisses which were come to Yurce. But they stricke the last stroke. They send him word, that it should suffice them to retire their companions, and conduct them into Suisse, seeing the King had broken his promise with them; by the which they should meet at Turin with Claude of Longueville, and four hundred Lances to convey them. Their country-men which remained in the Campe, understanding that their companions were vpon the banks of the riuier of Stesie, dis-banded for the most part, to ioine with them that were newly come.

In the meane time the Imperials, by the perswasion of the Duke of Bourbon, followed the Admirall at the heeles, who to take from the enemy the knowledge of the Swisses disorder, endured the shooke with such men at armes as hee could gather together: but being hurt at the first charge with a shot in the arme, and forced through the griefe of his wound to leaue the retreat of the army to the Earle of Saint Paul, and to Captaine Bayard, Bayard and Fandenesse (performing wondrous deeds of armes) died there: Fandenesse presently Bayard thrust through the body, caused him selfe to be layd at the foot of a tree by his sword, his face turned to the enemy, as hee thir neuer turned his backe. The Duke of Bourbon pursuing the chase, firing him in this pitifull estate, I am sorry for you, said hee, hauing sorrow you should die a Knight. Sir (said Bayard, drawing towards his end) there is no more left A wordy speech of Bayard, I die an honest man: you are to be lamented, who force against your Reason, your Conscience, and your oath: and soone after hee gaue vp the ghost. Lorges arliuing with aboute few French, which remained, repulsed such as passed vnto the body of their arme, as the Earle of Saint Paul hauing passed the riuier with the losse of few, but the bravest of his men, deliuered his artillery to the Swisses, who made their retreat by the valley of Aoste, and himselfe by Turin, Laude, Alexandria, Nourarie, and generally all which the King possesse in Italy, remained at the Vicers deuotion. The Duke of Bourbon, who had followed the French, and was now at the foot of the mountain, saw the French army, and being much amazed, hee sent to the Duke of Bourbon, and desired him to let him see the French King. England did willingly giue care vnto it. The fauour, the authority, the many followers, A and the great intelligence which the Duke of Bourbon presumed to haue in France, invited him thereunto. To this end the Emperor treated with the English, and the Duke of Bourbon: "That the Duke should enter into France with a part of his army which was in Italy: That hauing passed the Alpes, the King of England should pay him an hundred thousand crowns for the charge of the first moneth, & should continue the same monethly, vntill he would inuade the Realme with a mighty armie: That France should be conquered for the English, and Prouence for the Duke of Bourbon, according to the Treaty we haue before made mention of: That the Emperour at the same instant should make warre vpon them from the confines of Spaine, and should procure the Potentates of Italy to concur in this enterprise, for the freeing of themselves for euer from the inuasion of the French.

Marfeilles is a commodious port to annoy France, and to passe from Spaine into Italie: According to the Emperours desire, and the former treaty, the Duke of Bourbon, and the Marquis of Pescara, march to the conquest of Marfeilles. The King aduertised of their designe, sends Rance de Care, a man well experienced in war, and the Lord of Brion, with two hundred men at armes, and three thousand foot, for the guard of Marfeilles: repaired his army, and sent to make a leauy of foureene thousand Swisses, and six thousand Lanquenets.

The Duke and Marquis had now lyen six weekes before Marfeilles: the King hauing vinited his forces, marcheth with an intent to fight with his enemies, who seeing to great a power to approach, embarked their great Ordnance for Genoua: the lesser they layd vpon Moyles, and so made a speedy retreat. The Marshall of Chabannes, who had the leading of the fore-ward, sent four or five hundred horses after them: who ouerthrew many, and returned with great spoile, every one leauing his baggage behind him, and the souldiers casting away their armes, to bee more light to runne away. The King seeing himselfe to haue a goodly army ready, and his enemies retired, resolues to cut off their way, or to come before them into Italy: many dissuaded him, the reason might well diuert him (for it was in the middle of October) the Regent his mother aduised him to make war by his Capitaines, and not in person: and the Bishop of Capua came from the Pope to treat of a general peace: But the heat which transported this good Prince to his owne ruine and dishonour, made him to say vnto the Bishop: That he should treat with him by Letters, and attend him at Anignon with his mother. If the King makes haste to pursue, the Duke and Marquis made as good haste to arriue in time for the defence of Milan: so as in one day the King arriued at Verceil, and the Marquis at Albe: the Duke followed a day after him with the Lanquenets.

At that time Claude Queene of France died at Blois, leauing three sonnes by the King and her, Francis the Daulphin, Henry Duke of Orleans, and Charles Duke of Angoulême: and two daughters, Margdalene married afterwards to the King of Scots, and Marguerite, which shall be Duchesse of Sauoy: The Vice-roy seeing the King to march directly towards Milan without stay, he put Anthony de Leua into Paui, with twelve hundred Spaniards, and six thousand Lanquenets: posing himselfe with exceeding speed to Milan with the rest of the army: Milan had changed her mind, the plague had wonderfully wasted the Citizens: many (to auoid this danger) had absented themselves: there was no such store of victuals within it as was usual: the traffike had ceased, there was no means to recouer money: they had made no account to repaire the fortifications, and the King had from Vigee sent Michael Anthony Marquis of Salusses, with two hundred men at armes, and foure thousand foot: who at the first ouerthrew the Spaniards that were sent to guard the suburbs of Milan: beat them into the towne, and kept the suburbs: notwithstanding their continuall sallies, by means of the Lord of Tremouille, who came to second him. The Vice-roy finding the Citizens minds to be little at his deuotion, went out by the Port Romane, seeking with him the Duke of Bourbon, the Marquis of Pescara, and the rest of the army to Laude. The Milanais freed from the danger of the Imperials, retired in the Marquis of Salusse and Tremouille. The Imperiall army retired in great confusion and disorder, vntill they were forced by the way, hauing lost many horse and armes: If they had beene hotly pursued, without doubt they had bene easily ouerthrowne. Moreover, if our men had presently gone to Laude, the Imperials had not dared to stay there: and

A and it may be, passing the Riuer of Adde with speed, they had disordered the rest of the army with the like facility. But when as the prouidence of God meanes to chastise a people, he blinds the eyes of their vnderstandings, in such sort as they cannot iudge of occurrences, but oftentimes they embrace those counsels which be most dangerous.

Thus it fell out with our Francis: for according to the aduice of such (as held it not for his Maiesties affaires, to leaue a strong towne behind him, manned with many souldiers) he turned head to Paui, in the end of October. He had with him Henry of Albrer king of Nauarre, the Dukes of Alancou, Lorraine, Albany, and Longueuiller, the Earles of Saint Paul, Vaudemont, Laual and Tonnerre, the Marshalls of Foix, Chabannes and Montmorency, the bastard of Sauoy Lord Steward, the Admirall of Bonniuet, the chiefe author of this counsell, Lewis of Tremouille, the Marquis of Salusses, Anthony of Rochefcault, the Lords of Brion, Elcars, Bonneau, Fleuranges, Paulmy, Roche-du-maine: the Vidame of Chartres, Aubigny, Clermont, Buffy d'Amboise, de Conte, Fontenay, a younger brother to Rohan, d'Anmour, and a great number of others: two thousand Lantes, eight thousand aduenturers, eight thousand Lanquenets, six thousand Swisses, and foure thousand Italians, which number did afterwards greatly increase.

The Imperials gathered together the remainder of their ship-wraoke, and made a new leauy of twelue thousand men in Germany: but want of money did greatly trouble their affaires. The Emperour could not helpe them: to draw any out of the Duchy of Milan, there was no meane. From their ancient confederates, they hoped for small or no succors at all. The Pope and the Florentines contented them, but with generall words. Clement sought to maintaine himselfe in the middle of these stormes, and would make no league with any other Prince. The Venetians, vrged by the Vice-roy, to furnish the men wherunto they were bound by the Capitulation, made cold answers: They grew now more jealous of the Emperours ambition. All Italy complained, that he would not iustly sforare the Duchy of Milan, vnto which the Popes authority did moue him: to whose example, and counsels they had then great regard, being willing in like sort to frame themselves to present occurrences. And the King of England, instead of furnishing them with the money he had promised, demanded all that which he had lent. All these considerations, made our Francis resolute, to the siege of Paui. He battered in in two places, makes a breach, and gives an assault, they winne the breach, but had not meane to enter: they find large and deepe trenches to stay them, and the nearest houses furnished with shot, forced them to abandon the breach after the losse of many good men.

As they despaird to take Paui by force, James of Sully, Bayliffe of Caen, propounds a more easie meane to force it. The Riuer of Tesin diuides it selfe into two branches, two miles about Paui, and ioynes againe a mile beneath the towne before it runnes into Po. By reason of the depth of the water, the wall was nothing fortified vpon the greatest streame, hee vndertakes to cut this arme, and to diue all the streame into the lesse, hoping that the coule of the water being dried, and making a sudden and furious batteric on that side, the Towne should bee forced, before the enemy had any meane to prevent it.

They spend many dayes, employ an infinite number of men, and make a great expence in this worke. But the water is of more force then the labour of men, or the industry of engineers. A continuall raine did so swell the Riuer, as breaking the sluices and banks which were made within the Channell in one houre it made all this great labour fruitlesse. So like the attempts of our men were reduced to a hope, so forth them to yeeld at length by necessity. The Pope in the meane time (moued with the Iudiciall spoile, and conquest of the Duchy of Milan, by the Kings desire to settle his affaires and business, and to pacifie Italy the better, sent John Mathieu, Gilbert Bishop of Verona his Datarie, to exhort the warrours to peace and concord. The Vice-roy trusting in the strength of Paui, refused to giue care to any agreement of composition, whereby the King should hold any sort of landing the Duchy of Milan: the King on the other side, such up with his good dugges, the greatness of his army, the hope not onely to maintaine it, but also to therewith to preserue vnto himselfe the Estate of Milan, to recover Genoua, and afterwards to assault the Realme of Naples, made him as vnwilling to yeeld to any negotiating, but to stand on. Thus the Pope being failed, to reconcile these two Princes, the chiefe author by the sent his Datarie, took effect. Clement had with him Francis the first, and Henry the second, open open secret against the King. And the King received the Pope and the Florentines into A his protection, especially to maintain the family of Medici in their greatness. The Pope supposed the Emperour should goe to the wall, but he will soone repent him. This agreement drew the King to the enterprise of Naples: for the execution whereof, hee made John Steward Duke of Albany his Lieutenant generally, accompanied with Rance de Core, six hundred men at armes, three hundred light-horse, ten thousand foot, and ten or twelve peeces of artillery. His intent was to force the Vice-roy to abandon the Estate of Milan, to flee to the defence of Naples; whereas there remained no Garisons. But hee should have consulted hereof after the absolute conquest of the Duchy. The enemy will make his profit of this indiscreet division of his army in so unreasonable a time. He did foresee, that in succouring Naples, the Duchy of Milan would be wholly lost. The Vice-roy having resolved to make head against the King within Lombardy, sent the Duke of Traiteur to give order for the defence of the Realme, in case the French did assaile it. Let vs leave the King a little at his siege, and see some exploits of armes.

The Marquis of Saluces, Lieutenant for the King at Savonne, had in the beginning of March sent two thousand men in garison to Varas, a small towne, all walled upon the sea-shore, mid-way betwixt Savonne and Genoua. Don Hugues of Moncade, Vice-roy of Sicily; then Gouverneur of Genoua for the Emperour, brought the Emperours Gallies to beat downe the gate of Varas with their Cannon, hoping that the weakness of the place would force the souldiers to make their retreat to Savonne: and with this designe he put himselfe in ambush with four thousand men, betwixt Varas and Savonne. The Marquis advertised of this battery, flies thither with those few men which the present necessity would suffer him to gather together. At his approach, the besieged take courage, and rampier up their gate quite ruined. The Gallies of Genoua grow amazed, and turne their prowes. The Marquis pursues them. Don Hugues seeing himselfe abandoned by his forces at sea, begins likewise to make his retreat to Genoua along the shore. La Mailleray, by the commandement of the Marquis, goes to shore, draws forth the garison of Varas, and leads them in the pursuit, whilest that he coasted along, seeking to disorder them with his Cannon, being forced to march by the sea side, by reason of the mountains. Moncade falls into the rearward with some of the chiefe Captaines to endure the shooke. They charge him, and put his troops in rout, and he, with all them that did accompany him, are taken prisoners. The Marquis takes two gallies, and pursuing his victory, finds the Admirall of Genoua in the road: he forceth her to yeeld, and makes a great booty of artillery, munition, and other riches. And if his forces had beene sufficient to assaile Genoua suddenly by land, as well by sea; considering the feare which had seized upon the City, it had beene in danger to have beene lost for the Emperour.

On the other side, Anthony of Crequy Lord of Pontdormy, parting from Monstruel, at such time as the King lay encamped before Paula, to put victuals into Therouenne, and to try if he could force Neufosse (which was a great trench full of water, that shut up the valley of Caffel) from Saint Omer unto Aire, furnished with bulwarkes at every entry with artillery, and well manned to guard the entries and passages of the said valley, whither they retired all their goods and cattell; he came to Haucumberg with three hundred men at armes, some twelve hundred foot and two Culverins. And after the men at armes had had their horse, having put the victuals they had brought into Therouenne, he passed for the execution of his enterprise; and coming to Neufosse before day, hee forced the passage, carrying away an inestimable prey. & passing in his retreat neere to Arques, half a league from Saint Omer, he overthrow the Garison of the said Saint Omer, which issued forth to succour the valley. In this charge *Efrise*ooke Lieues, Lieutenant to the Duke of Alencon, who the same day had married his mistress, to whom Efrise was likewise a servant but with a courtesie neuer enough to be praised, at the request of the new bride, he sent backe his mistress. Those of Aire and Betune likewise came posting, to the number of eight or nine hundred naturall Spaniards, five or six hundred Wallons, and three hundred horse of their Ordnnances, and joyned with the troops of Saint Omer, to stop or hinder the retreat of the French. Pontdormy chargeth them, beats backe the horse upon their Spanish foot, and entring pell-mell, beates them, slue two hundred and forty, and taking away eight or nine hundred prisoners to Therouenne, all which hee sent backe to Aire upon pay, and for hostages retained their Captaines.

A Moreouer, Pierres Gouverneur of Flanders, having suborned a Souldier of the Garison of Hedin (which had beene taken in the warres) to deliver him the Castle of Hedin: the souldier advertised Pontdormy of the means he had to deliver into his hands the said Governor, the duke of Alencon, and most of the Noblemen of the Country. The souldier brings this troop at the day appointed. Pontdormy is there with two hundred men at armes; and cōters bolls of wild-fire with straw, in a ravelin of stone, where the enemy must passe, into the which those that were about the gate should cast fire, when as they should see a sufficient number of the enemies entred. Men encounter their enemies both by fraud and vertue: but fraud is oftentimes fatal to the author.

B Pontdormy having his mouth open to speake, the fire was so suddenly cast by him that had it in charge, as entering in at Pontdormys mouth, it burnt his bowels, whereof he died two dayes after. Cannable his Nephew, had his face likewise so burnt, as there remained no forme thereof: so as their enterprise to charge the enemy behind in this disorder, came to nothing. Fourscore or an hundred Bourguignons being entred within the Ravelin were burnt: the rest saved themselves in this amazement, and many were lost in the wood upon their retreat. But all were not sufficient to repaire the losse of that worthy and valiant man of warre.

The siege of Paula was continued, when as the Duke of Bourbon bringing five hundred men at armes Bourguignons, and six thousand Languishers, the Imperials resolve to succour Paula, and to that end part from Laude the 23 of January. The Imperials approach assured the King he should have battell; and to provide for it, hee had caused Tremouille, whom he had appointed Gouverneur of Milan to come into him, leaving Theodore Triunlee with Chandell within Milan. John de Medicis with three hundred light-horse, and three thousand foot, was newly come into the Kings pay, and had wonne him many Italian Captaines: amongst which, Guy and Francis Earles of Rangon, and John Lewis Salusis, brother to him whom Lantree had beheaded at Milan. Tremouille, the Marshalls of Foix and Chabannes, with other Captains of great experience, advised the King to retire his army from before Paula, and to encamp in some strong place, whereof there are many in that Country, by reason of the Chamells which overflow the meadowes. They gave him to understand, that the enemies army being unfurnished of money, they should be forced within few dayes to breake, and to put their companies into Calison: That the strangers for want of payment of their money, would make some dangerous mutinie: That the enemies did not maintaine themselves together, but with hope to give battell: and if they did see the warre prolonged, they would be engaged in many difficulties and confusions. To conclude, it was (say they) exceeding dangerous, to thrust betwixt a Towne defended by five thousand men, and an army that came to succour it, being mighty in numbers of men, in valour and experience.

But all this was to cast oyle into a fire which already flamed. The King will not leave the siege, and yet will he keepe the enemy from entering into Paula. He referred (saith the Originall) the government of the army to the Admirall: hee selected his counsell onely, and gave care to Aire of Acquimorette, and Philip Chabot Lord of Briant, men pleasing unto him; but not yet of any great experience in matters of war. Moreover, he had not that number of men in his army, as they gave him to understand. The Duke of Albany had led away part of his horse: some remained for the guard of Milan, many were dispersed into townes and villages about. There were but eight hundred Lances in the Campe: and the negligence of his Officers, with the desert of his Captaines, especially the Italians, abused him; notwithstanding the number of footmen, for the which they received pay. But howsoever, hee must needs fight. Behold pittifull first-fruits, fore-runners of a general overthrow.

F Two thousand Villains lodged at Saint Simeur, betwixt S. Lanchranc and Paula; They with charge them suddenly, and disperse them. Pierres brother to Frederick of Boffole, held the Castle of Saint Angelo with two hundred horse, and eight hundred foot. This place lay betwixt Laude and Paula, stop the victuals which might be brought from Laude. Ferdinand of Aualo approacheth with his Spaniards, takes away the defenses, and forceth the garison to yeeld: that Pierres, Emilie Chaurane, and the three Sonnes of Philip Gonsalves remaining prisoners, all the rest should depart without armes or horses, and for a month should beate no armes against the Emperour. the other places which lay behind them, except S. Colombain, which they had so besieged A as no man could issue forth, came into the power of the Imperials.

Moreover the King caused two thousand Italians to come of those which had maintained the siege of Marcellis. Passing the confines of Alexandria, neere to the river of Vibé, wearied and toyled with the tediousness of the way, Gaspard Maine Capitaine of Alexandria, chargeth them suddenly, breaks them, and chaſeth them into Chastellat, and there forceth them to yeeld with ſeventene Enſignes. The like ſucceſſe had Iohn Lewis Palaiſin. The King had ſent him to ſurpriſe Cremona, which was guarded onely by five or fix hundred foot. Sforza advertiſed that he lodged at Caſſal the great, with four hundred horſe, and two thousand foot, ſent Alexander Bentiuole with ſome number of horſe, and two thousand foot, ſuddenly leaued, to Cremona. Too great confidence doth no leſſe prejudice men then feare. Paluiſin (holding himſelfe ſtrong enough without attending of Francis of Rango, who came to ioyne with him with three or foure thousand men) abandons his fort to fight with them, marcheth directly to the enemy, and at the firſt puts Sforza's horſemen to flight: but Bentiuole coming with his footmē, Iohn Lewis was overthrowne in the middelt of the combat, taken priſoner, and all his men put to rout, which was a great prejudice to the Kings affaires. Behold another diſgrace of no leſſe importance.

Iohn laques of Medicis, a Milanois, Capitaine of the Caſtle of Muſ, had intelligence, that the Capitaine of Chiauenne, a Caſtle vpon the Lake of Como, belonging to the Grifons, hauing no enemy neere to annoy him, went daily to walke without his Fort (the taking of this place was a fit meanes to diuert fix thousand Grifons, newly come vnto the Kings Camp) Iohn laques lying one night in ambuſh cloſe to the Caſtle, ſailed not of his prey, but holding this inſufficient Capitaine, he brought him before the gate, with a dagger at his throat ready to ſlab him, if his wife had not let downe the bridge. The gate being open, three hundred men iſſue forth of another ambuſh, ſeize vpon the Caſtle, and ſo on the Towne. The Grifons ſuppoſing that Medici had other enterpriſes vpon their places, call home their men, who notwithstanding the ſhame they ſhould purchaſe in forſaking (vpon the point of a battell) a Prince, whoſe pay they had receiued, and to whom they had giuen an oath, returned five dayes before the fight. All theſe difficulties chancing D one vpon another, were inſupportable fore-runners of ſome great diſaſter: which when he ſees come, he ought carefully to provide for the preſeruatiō of his Eſtate, or with a firme and conſtant reſolution, try the hazard of a battell. A Commander may lawfully try this laſt remedy: but a King muſt vie the other.

The two armies approached within halfe a mile: the fore-ward led by the Marſhall of Chabannes, lodged with the Suiſſes at Ronces, in the Suburbs neere to Saint Iuſtins gate: the King at the Monafteries of Saint Paul and Saint Iames, places of advantage, neere vnto Pavia: the Duke of Alanco, at Mirabel with the rereward, ſo as holding Pavia girt in of all ſides, the Imperials could not enter, vneſſe they did paſſe the River of Teſin or the Parke of Pavia. The Imperials lodged at Prati towards Saint Iuſtins gate, and extended E vnto Treleuere and La Motte, and in a wood by Saint Lazare, ſo neere as they did greatly endamage one another with their Cannon, being diuided onely by a little brooke, which they call Vernicule. The lodging of both armies had in front on their wings, and on the left ſhancke, great rampiers enuironed with trenches, and fortified with battions. But the Imperials had this advantage, being approached ſo, neere vnto Pavia, as in a day of battell they might be aſſiſted by them within the town. In the meane time Anthonny de Leua did greatly annoy our men by continual ſallies, and in many ſkirmiſhes had moſt commonly the better.

The 17 of February, Iohn de Medicis to be reuenged of a diſgrace which his troops had receiued by a former ſally, laid a bait for them of the town, ſeconded with a double ambuſh, the one in the trenches neere vnto the town, the other farther off. The Spaniards drawne on by their former victories, purſuing them which had charged, they diſcouer the fartheſt ambuſh, and beganne to retire, when as the neerer cutting off their way, puts them all the ſword. But this ſmall victory did greatly prejudice the generall. Iohn de Medicis had the bone of his heele broken with a ſhot, and was caried into Placentia. His troops were ſo diſperſed after his hurt, as the army was diminiſhed about two thousand, and his abſence did coole his ſouldiers courage and heat in ſkirmiſhes and aſſaults: for he

A was a great ſouldier, and the good ſucceſſe of a battell doth partly depend vpon the preſence of ſuch perſonages.

The Imperials had no more meanes to maintainethemſelues within their Fort, want of money had ſoone driuen them forth: yet they conſidered that by their retreat, Pavia would be loſt, and they were out of hope to preferre the reſt, which remained in the Duchy of Milan. To aſſaile the French within their lodging, were a dangerous and vaine attempt. Alſo the enemies reſolution was not to giue battell, vneſſe ſome advantage were offered them, but onely to retire their men that were within Pavia, and to man it with freſh troops, the which they could not do without paſſing in view of the French Campe. B They therefore prepare themſelues to two effects, either to execute their deſigne, or to fight if the King iſſuing out of his fort would ſtop their paſſage.

The night before S. Matthias day, the 25 of February, the day of the Emperor Charles his Natiuitie, they diſquiet and tire our men with many falſe alarmes, and make two ſquadrons of horſe, and foure of foot. The firſt vnder the command of the Marquis of Guſt, conſiſting of fix thousand Lanſquenets, Spaniards, and Italians. The ſecond vnder the Marquis of Peſcara. The third and fourth of Lanſquenets, led by the Viceroy and Duke of Bourbon. They come to the Parke wall, caſt downe about threeſcore ſadome, enter within it, and take the way to Mirabel, leauing the Kings armie vpon their left hand.

The artillery planted in a place of advantage, doth much endamage their battalions, C and forceth them to run into the valley for ſhelter. Here impatience tranſports the King. He ſees the enemy diſordered, and thinks they are amazed: moreover, hee had intelligence, that the Duke of Alanco had defeated ſome Spaniards that would haue paſſed on the right hand, and had taken from them foure or five Cannons. Thus the King, loſing his advantage, ſeekes his enemies, and paſſing before his owne Cannon, hinders their execution. The Imperials deſired nothing more, then to haue the King out of his fort, and to be coered from his artillery. They now turn head againſt him which was directed to Mirabel. The King (ſupported with a battalion of his Suiſſes, being his chiefe ſtrength) marched directly againſt the Marquis of Saint Ange, who led the firſt of the horſemen, overthrowes them, kills many, and the Marquis himſelfe. But, oh villany! The Suiſſes D in ſtead of charging a Battalion of the Emperors Lanſquenets, which did ſecond their men at armes they whele about, and goe to ſaue themſelues at Milan. The Marquis of Peſcara came to charge the King with his battalions: Francis brother to the Duke of Lorraine, and the Duke of Norfolk, who led about five thousand Lanſquenets, marched reſolutely againſt him, but they are ſuddenly inuironed with two great battalions of Germans, defeated and cut in peeces: the Suiſſes thus retired, the Lanſquenets loſt the whole burthen of the battell lay vpon the King, ſo as in the end, being hurt in the leg, face, and hand, his horſe ſlaine vnder him, charged on all ſides, defending himſelfe vnto the laſt gaspe, he yeeded vnto the Viceroy of Naples, who kiſſing his hand with great reuerence, receiued him as priſonour to the Emperor.

E At the ſame inſtant the Marquis of Guſt had defeated the horſe that were at Mirabel, and Anthonny de Leua iſſuing out of Pavia, charged our men behinde. Thus (ſeeing the pitifull eſtate of the Kings perſon) all giue way, all ſeeke to ſaue themſelues by flight. The Duke of Alanco ſeeing no hope of recouerie, preferres the rere-ward in a manner whole, and paſſeth che riuier of Teſin. The Vant-guard (for a time) maintained the fight, but in the end it thrunk by the death of the Marſhall of Chabannes. This day deprived vs of a great number of the chiefeſt Noblemen of France, among the which the Marſhalls of Chabannes and Foix, the Admiral of Bonniuet, Lewis of Tremouille, about threeſcore and fifteene yeares old, (a worthy bed for ſo valiant a Nobleman, whoſe counſell deſerued to be followed) Galeas of Saint Seuerin Maſter of the horſe, Francis of Lorraine, the F Duke of Norfolk, the Earle of Tonnerre, Chauumont ſonne to the great Maſter of Amboiſe, Buſſy of Amboiſe, the Baron of Buzangois, Beaupreau Maſarſin the chiefe Quire of the Kings Stable, and about 8000 men. The Baſtard of Sauoy, Lord Steward of France died of his wounds, being priſoner. There were taken Henry K. of Nauarre, the Earle of S. Paul, Lewis of Neurs, Fleuranges ſonne to Robert de la Marke, the Marſhall of Montmorency, Lual, Brion, Lorges, la Rochpot, Monteian, Annebaſt, Imbercourt, Frederick of Boſſole, la Roche du Maine, la Maileray, Montpeſat, Buſſy, Curion, Langey, and many others. Of the enemy there died about 700, few men of marke beſides the Marquis of Saint Ange.

Triuſſe

Triunice, and Chendious, who remained at Milan, advertised of the ruine of their Armie, returned with their men into France, so as the very day of the Battaille, all the Duchie of Milan was fired from the French Forces. The next day the King was led to the Castle of Piquetou, vnder the guard of Capitaine Alarçon, alwaies intreated according to the dignity of a royall person, but so far-forth as the quality of a prisoner would permit. The Duke of Albanie was farre engaged in the realme of Naples, and all passages by land were by this disgrace stoppt. To draw him out of danger, the Regent, Mother to the King, giuing order for the affaires of the Realme, sent Andrew Doria General of the Kings Gallies vnto him, with La Fayette the Viceadmiral being at Marseilles: who (without any losse of men, but of some scoures, chased by the Colonniois euen to the very gates of Rome) returned safely into France. The estate seemed now neare a shipwracke, as well by the imprisonment of the head, as by the death of many worthy personages, who might haue serued greatly in the preservation thereof. But God by many corrections would often chastise France, but neuer ruine it. And now touching the King of England (who was then ready to imbarke for Calais) he suddenly changeth his hatred into loue, so as growing ielous of the Emperours exceeding greatnesse, the Regent, hauing intreated him by John Iachin a Geneuois; her Ambassador, to giue care to some milde treaty, rather then to invade the Estate of a captiue Prince: hee promisseth all succours both of men and money for the Kings deliuey, and without any demand of restitution for his charges hee dismisseth his armie.

In the meane time, the Emperour adueth in Councell, what course hee should hold with the King. The Bishop of Osime, the Emperours Confessor, is commended to haue aduised him to shew a brotherly loue, and to set him free, referring this notable victory to the expresse will of God: shewing that the chiefe vse thereof should bee the peace of Christendome, threatened with a total ruine by the Turkish armes, whereof wee shall soone see farall effects. But the aduice of Fredericke Duke of Alba, a man of great authority with the Emperour, was of more force. Hee yielded to the Kings libertie, but with so excessiue conditions, as it might haue bene the means for Charles to lay the foundation of an absolute Monarchy in Christendome.

According to this aduice, he sent the Barly of Reux, his Lord Steward, to offer the King liberty, so as he would resigne all the rights he pretended in Italy: restore the Duchie of Bourgongne, as belonging to him by right; with Prouence and Dauphiné for the Duke of Bourbon, to incorporate them with other lands which he had formerly enioyed, and to make all together a kingdom. Moreover, the Emperour offered to giue him his sister in marriage, propounding many other conditions, so absurd and void of reason, as it is better to let the curious read them in the Originalls themselves. Amongst all losses, that of liberty toucheth nearest: but our Francis hauing learned to withstand all aduersity with a constant resolution, I will die (said he) a prisoner, rather then make any breach in my realme for my deliuerance: whereof I neither will nor can alienate any part without the consent of the soueraigne Courts and Officers, in whose hands remains the authority of the whole realme. We prefer the generall good before the priuate interest of Kings persons. If the Emperour will treat with me, let him demand reasonable things, which are in my power, then shall he finde me ready to ioyne with him, and to fauor his greatnesse. And to redeeme his liberty with honour, and his subiects content, who wonderfully desired his enlargement, he then offered, To marie his said sister, widow to the King of Portugal, and to hold Bourgongne for her dowry, the which should belong to the children that should come of this marriage: to resigne his interest to the Realm of Naples and the Duchy of Milan: to accompany the Emperour with an army both by land and sea, when he should go to Rome to receiue the Imperial Crown. Was not this properly to giue him all Italy in prey? To yeeld vnto the Duke of Bourbon his offices, lands, and moueables confiscated, and the reuenues receiued by reason of this seizure, and to giue him to wife the Duchesse of Alarçon his sister, newly a widow by the death of the Duke of Alarçon, in stead of Eleanor, the widow of Portugal, which had bene promised him: to content the King of England with money: and to pay what summes of money should be set down for his ransom.

Hereupon the Earle of S. Paul, hauing corrupted his guards, escaped out of prison, and ioyntly with the Earle of Vaudemont, and the Marquis of Salusses, treated by the means

A of Francis Earle of Pontrefme, with certaine Princes and Captaines of Italy, to stay the King from being transported out of the Duchy of Milan, hoping that the Potentates of Italy (feareing lest the Emperour should seeke to supplant them) would seeke his Maiesties deliuey with their common forces. And the Venetians being now aduersified of the reconciliation of the English with the King, retired themselves from their league with the Emperour. But the Viceroy discouering these practices, gaue the King to vnderstand, that he had commandement from the Emperour to passe him into Spaine, that being there, their maiesties by a gracious and fauourable enteruiew, would easily conclude a peace, which should cause his liberty. So the King vnderstanding that the Duke of Bourbon pursued his marriage in Spaine with Eleanor, yielded to this passage, hoping hee would rather desire to marie a King of France, then a Prince disinherited. They imbarke the seauenth of Iune, and within few daies after the Emperour hauing commanded, that hee should be receiued, with all the honour that might be, as he passed they arriue happily in Castile: the King was lodged at Madril, a place of hunting and pleasure, but farre from the Sea, or the confines of France.

The Emperour would not admit the King to his presence, before the accord were made, or in such rearmes, as there were no doubt thereof: for the aduancing whereof a truce was concluded vntill the end of December, during the which Marguerite the Kings sister, Duchesse of Alarçon, came with a large Commission into Castile, to treat with the Emperour. Her arriual was very pleasing and healthfull to the King: who finding him so sicke, as few men hoped for his recovery, he did more reuiue him then all the Physicians art. But hauing found the Emperour (who was come to visit the sicke King) constant in his vnreasonable demands, especially for the restitution of Bourgongne, whereunto the King would not yeeld, but vpon the former condition, or that they might trie it by law, to whom it belonged, and seeing that the King had recovered his former health, hee returned into France leauing with the Emperour, the Archbishop of Ambrun, afterwards Cardinal of Tournon, and Iohn de Selus, chiefe President at Paris, to pursue the treaty begun, bringing with her an ample declaration from the King, whereby (resigning vp his crowne) he gaue her power to inuest the Dauphin his Son, the King remaining resolute, rather to continue in perpetual prison, then to pass any thing to the preiudice of his realme.

But the Emperour seeing the King constant in this resolution, in the end yielded to his Maiesties deliuey, whereof we will set downe the most important points: "That within six weekes after his deliuey, he should consigne the Duchie of Bourgongne to the Emperour; and with all the dependances, as well of the Duchy, as of the Countie, the which should hereafter be sequestred from the Soueraignty of the realme of France. That at the very instant of his enlargement, they should deliuer into the Emperours hands, the Dauphin, and with him the Duke of Orleans, the Kings second sonne; or twelue of the chiefe Noblemen of France such as the Emperour should name, to remaine as hostages, vntill the restitution of the said lands, and ratification of the peace, with all the Articles, by the generall Estates of the realme: and vpon the restoring of the Hostages, they should deliuer vnto the Emperour the Earle of Angoulême, the Kings third sonne, to be bred vp with him, the better to assure and maintaine the peace. That hee should resigne vnto the Emperour, all his rights pretended to the Estates of Naples, Milan, Genoua, and Ast: That he should quitte the Soueraignty of Flanders and Arthois; and should marie Eleanor, sister to the said Emperour, with two hundred thousand crownes dowry, and Jewells fit for her estate; and the Emperour should renounce all his pretensions to any place belonging to the Crowne of France, especially to Peronne, Montdidier, Roye, Bologne, Pontieu, & other Seigneuries, lying on either side the Riuer of Somme. Without doubt these were hard conditions and beyond all the bounds of reason. But the King being a prisoner, guarded, and nor his owne man, of what validity could they bee in law? It was therefore in his power to redeeme his Children by money. These be the fruits the Spaniards would gather by his victory, to teach the French not to fall againe into their hands. The iudicious Reader may consider whether they be growne wife by their owne losse.

Then the King and Emperour did visit one another againe, with great demonstrations of loue: they shewed themselves together in publicke places, had often, long, and secret discourses, they went in one Carosse together, to see Queene Eleanor, to whom the King was made liue. But for that in the midst of all these shewes of loue, the King was at no more liberty then before, but more carefully guarded: who would not have held this accord to be full of discord, this alliance without love, and the most part of the articles extorted by force, would bring forth the fruits of their ancient jealousies: A lesson for Princes that be victors, to containe themselves within the limits of reason; for, whatsoever is forced by violence, is not durable. Some daies were spent in these actions: then the King was conducted to Fontarbie, where exchange was made of his maiesty, with his two sonnes being yet very young. At Bayonne the Ambassadors of Charles demanded the ratification of the treaty which the King should give at his entry into the realme; but he could not alienate the Bourguignons without their consent, and therefore he answered, that he will shortly assemble the Estates of the country, to know their mindes. Let vs see then what followed, and begin somewhat higher.

After they had transported the King into Castile, Francis Sforza fearing lest the Emperor should retaine the Duchy of Milan to himselfe, together with the excessive summe of twelve hundred thousand Ducats, which he demanded for the expences hee had made in the conquest, and defence of the said estate; considering also, that part of the Spaniards were gone into Spaine with the Vice-roy, part were with the Duke of Bourbon, many laden with spoile were retired into divers places; and the Marquis of Pescara was in bad termes with the Viceroy: he persuaded himselfe, that the rest of the troops might be easily overcome, if the Marquis would give his consent. Sforza therefore by the advice of Jerome Moron his Chancellor, did found the Marquis his minde; hee propounded unto him to cut in pieces those companies which remained within the Estate of Milan, and to make him King of Naples, if the Pope and the Venetians would agree. A sufficient spur to prick forward an ambitious man. The Pope did not dislike it, the Venetians shewed themselves most affectionate, all ioyntly doe malice the greatness of Charles. The Marquis at the first gave eare unto them, but having discovered the whole practice to the Emperour, and growing suspect vnto the rest, having accepted the Lieutenantancy of Lombardy of the Emperour; he publicly put in execution what hee had in charge, to prevent these imminent dangers, as he should thinke most fit. And first hee seized upon Moron (whom he made to confesse all the conspiracy, charging Duke Sforza, as culpable and consenting to all that had passed) he made him to resigne vnto him Cremona, Treffe, Lecque, and Piquetion, the Keyes of the Duchy of Milan, hee forced the Milanais to take the oath of fealty vnto the Emperour, and Sforza to shut himselfe into the Castle of Milan. But when as the Marquis had reduced him to all extremities, death takes him away before he could enjoy the fruits of his malice. The Duke of Bourbon did succede after him.

A league
against the Emperour.

There was great likelihood, that the Emperour being in quiet possession of the estate of Milan, all the rest, especially the Pope (lying betwixt Lombardy & the realme of Naples) would remaine in prey. To prevent Charles his attempts (who made shew to invett the D. of Bourbon in the Duchy of Milan, if Sforza were found guilty of the crime, whereof they accused him) a league was made at Cognac, betwixt the Pope, the Kings of France and England, the Venetians, Florentines, and Suisses, for the common liberty of Italy and the restoring of Francis Sforza to the Duchy of Milan, being besieged as we have said.

This league was signified by the King to the Viceroy of Naples, to the Duke of Trieto, and to Alarcon, whom the Emperour had sent, to be fully satisfied of the Kings intent, who, excusing himselfe that he could not performe his promise for the alienation of Bourgongne, as very preiudiciall to the Crowne; hee offered to accomplish all the rest, and for the ransom of his children to pay two Millions of crownes. According to this treaty, the Pope sends to fight eight hundred men at armes, seven hundred light horse, and eight thousand foot, vnder the charge of Gui Earle of Rangon, and Iohn de Medicis Colonel of the Italian foot. The Venetians sent eight hundred men at armes, a thousand light horse, & eight thousand foot, commanded by Francis Maria D. of Vrbino. Laude was the first object of their armes, the which by the intelligence of Lodowike Visarin, a Gentleman of that town, they surprised from 1500 Neapolitans, whom the Marquis of Gual & Anthony de Leua had lodged there, vnder the charge & command of Fabrisio Marama.

These happy beginnings should have made the heads of the league to have proceeded in their course speedily, and valiantly. By the taking of Laude the way was openen'd to the Gates of Milan: the enemy had no more meanes to succour Cremona, and if they

A they had speedily advanced towards Milan, they had found them in great perplexity and confusion: the Citizens oppressed by the tyrannicall yage of the Spaniards, breathed nothing but rebellion; but the Duke of Vrbino, terrified with the very name of Spaniards, marching slowly like an Abbot, and staying a whole day in every lodging, to attend the Suisses, without which he thought it dangerous to approach neere Milan, by his slow and faint proceeding, hee caused an irreparable losse and belemit to his owne reputation, and to his matters. For having by his long delays, kept the Duke of Bourbon leisure to enter into Milan, with eight hundred Spaniards; before the Army of the league could approach, the souldiers of Milan refused courage, charged the Artillery in the night, and so terrified the Duke, as he presently retired his Army, desiring rather, said he, to repaire the forepassed error, then to persist in it, seeing they had approached so neere Milan; contrary to his opinion, where expecting no resistance he knew that a longer aboad would wholly ruine the league. He trembled for feare at the report of the Spanish forces, and yet would make shew as though he had to deale with men made of snow, who without striking stroke would suffer him to reape the fruits of his pretended victory. So the Duke retired to Marignan, being resolute, not to dilodge: untill he were fortified with twelve thousand Suisses: without doubt a hundred thousand men cannot assure a fearfull minde. It was a foule error, at the beginning of a long and dangerous voyage. The Imperials freed from this army, repaired the Rampiers and Bulwarkes of the Suburbs, disarmed the people, thrust forth such as were suspect, and lodged the Souldiers in the Citizens houses: who insulting over their hostes, as in a towne of conquest, forced them to furnish victuals, cloaths, and money, abused their wives and daughters, compelled servants to discover their masters wealth being hidden; to conclude, they practised all acts of inhumanity, which licentiousnes doth commonly breed in this nation being a conqueror.

The miserable estate of Milan.

Being thus oppressed, they repaire to the Duke of Bourbon, being newly ariued, and with pittifull complaints, teares, and lamentations, they beseech him to ease their miseries. The Duke (after he had imputed the causes of these insolencies to the want of pay for the army) promised to lodge them else-where, so as they would provide thirty thousand crownes, for the entertainment of one month: and the better to countenance his promise, he wished, In case that ever any extortion were committed, that he might be slain with a halbebufe, at the first enterprize he should be at. A praier which wee shall soone see take effect. The money was gathered, but the people finding no fruits of his promise, the pittifull estate of the multitude being spoiled, nothing mollifying the cruell insolvency of these barbarous souldiers, many not knowing to whom to haue recourse, cast themselves head-long from the tops of their houses, many hanged themselves, many ended both their liues and miseries, by other horrible and strange kinds of voluntary torments.

The second
sage of Milan.

Francis Sforza was at this instant ready to yeeld vp the Castle, when as the confederates, fortified with sixe thousand Suisses, newly ariued, drew the Duke of Vrbino a second time before Milan: but this was to make a second discomfey of his indifferetion and cowardise; for being still ready to number his souldiers, possessed with a strange feare, and seeking rather meanes to flee then to fight, Sforza, preff by famine and want of courage in the Duke of Vrbino, yeelded vp the Castle of Milan, to the Duke of Bourbon, the 24 of July, and retired himselfe to the confederates, who put Laude into his hands. Then the Kings army ariued lead by Michael Antonie Marquis of Saluces, consisting of foure hundred men at armes, five hundred light horse, and foure thousand Gascons; and within few daies after, the twelve thousand Suisses, leaued in the Kings name, encouraged the Duke of Vrbino to returne towards Milan, where leauing part of his men at Armes, the Popestroopes, and the foresaid Suisses, he went with the Venetian foot to fortifie Alatresse Baillon, who with three hundred men at armes, three hundred light horse, and eight thousand foot, besieged Cremona, and so preff it, as they yeelded by composition, the which was likewise deliuered vnto Sforza.

Euery one hath his turne, saith the Prouerbe: the Pope had bene the principall author of the Kings sending the Duke of Albany into the estate of Naples, and now hee sollicit his confederates againe to inuade the realme, supposing things could not succeed happily if the Emperour were no where else encountered, but in the Duchy of Milan. But whilst hee seeks to fire and burne his neighbours house, it falls vpon his owne head. Ill counsell is commonly dangerous to the giuer. All these warres had bene plotted in the Councillor at Rome, was it not reason he should reape what he had sowne? The Pope agreed his confederates to lend a part of their Sea-forces into the Realme of Naples; which consisted of foure Gallions, and sixtine Gallies for the King, thirteene Gallies for the Venetians, and eleuen for the Pope, ouer all the which Peter of Nauarre was appointed Generall at the Kings instance, notwithstanding the Popes pursuit in fauour of Andrew Doria, whom he had entertained. The Colonne, vnable to resist such forces, did cunningly make faile, and to buisie the Pope vntill the Vice-royes returne from Spaine with the armie at Sea, they did capitulate with him the two and twentieth of August. To retire their shippes to Naples, with the which they did molest the territories of the Church; and on the other side the Pope should remit all offences past, and reuoke the manitory which he had published against Cardinall Colonne. This reconciliation made the Pope in a manner to admitt all the horse and foot, which he maintained vpon the territories of the Church, against the Colonne, and to disperse the rest into townes about Rome, growing cold in his designe to invade Naples.

The Colonne, cared not to wrong the Pope with the prejudice of their honour, but hauing no meanes to make open warre against him, they straine all their wits to circumuent him by fraud. Payning therefore to suppress Agnane, defended by two hundred men in the Popes name, they flic with all speed to Rome the twentieth of September, with eight hundred horse and three thousand foot, they seize vpon three gates, sacke the Popes Palace, and the ornaments of Saint Peters Church. There were present in person Arsenio Colonne, Don Hugues de Moncade, Vespassian, sonne to Prosper Colonne (the mediator of the accord, and who had plighted his faith, for himselfe and the rest.) Cardinall Pompey Colonne, so far transported (saith the Originall) with ambition and fury, as hauing conspired to put the Pope cruelly to death, hee had refused to force the Cardinalls to make choise of himselfe, and to install him in the chaire being vacant. The Pope in the beginning grew resolute, like vnto Boniface the eight, when he was surprised by Sarre Colonne, but in the end conuired by the Cardinalls that were about him, he retired himselfe into the Castle of Saint Angelo, where Don Hugues hauing receiued the Popes oath, and the Cardinalls, Cibo and Rodolphe his Cousins, for hostages of his safety, capitulating with him in tearmes of a Conqueror, he forced the Pope to promise, To retire the army of the League out of the Estate of Milan, and not to giue any succours to the Confederates for foure Moneths.

Times for punishments are noted in the Councell of Gods diuine providence, who meant to giue two notable strokes with one stone, as we shall shortly see. This truce was wonderfully commodious for the Emperors affaires. Milan had bene vanquished at length: Genoua oppressed by the Confederates armie at Sea, cryed out for bread; and the small store of victuals which came by land, did but keepe them in breath for some few daies. But behold two great effects diuerted by the comming of George Fronsberg, who knowing the extremity of Gasper his sonne, Colonell of the Lanquenets, which were within Milan, hauing stirred the Germans, with hope to enrich themselves with the spoile of Italy: he led a good number of horse, and foureteene thousand Lanquenets, who receiving euery man a crowne, followed him to the succour of Milan. The Marquis of Saluffes, and the Duke of Vrbin, aduertised of these succours, abandon the siege of Milan, with an intent to cut off their victuals, and to charge them at the passage of some river. But the Dukes accustomed delays had giuen Fronsberg leasure to assure himselfe of the field, so as the league could no way annoy him but by light skirmishes: in one of the which Tobin de Medicis hauing his thigh broken with a faucon shot, retired to Mantoua, and there died, within few daies. This death was an absolute victory to the aduersary party, for he was young, wise, and a valiant Captaine. Laude and Cremona did cut off the victuals from Milan, and the Duke of Bourbon being freed from the siege, hauing no more meanes to maintain his army, after he had by strapadoes and other tortures wristed some money from the Citizens to pay his Spaniards, he left Anthony de Leua in the Citie, and entred the territories of the Church, with an intent to possesse Placentia. To prevent him the Marquis of Saluffes (leaving the Duke of Vrbin in field) put himselfe into it, so as the Duke of Bourbon (seeing the towne well manned, and the Venetian armie to follow him) left Placentia, and by the Duke of Ferrarais aduice (whom the Emperour had won vnto him) being ioyned with Fronsberg, he marched directly towards Rome.

A The Pope (to be requented of the outrage received by the Colonne) called the Earle of Vaudemont, brother to the Duke of Lorraine, vnto the House of Anjou, a House greatly detested by the ancient partisans thereof to the Realme of Naples; the Earle was conducted by René de Gerc, with about ten thousand foot, and some horse, into the Realme, had taken Aquila, Salerno, and many other places, chased Don Augustin Colonne, and raised the siege of Iericon, which the Imperialists had besieged, when at the Vice-roy of Napels required of the Pope in the Emperours name a summe of money to maintain his army so long and heavy a burthen of the warre, the Pope had no money to maintain his army so long and heavy a burthen of the warre, the Pope was greater difficulties in the enterprise of Naples then he expected, the King did not seeme willing to make warre out of Italy, as he had promised in the articles of their Capitulations neither did he furnish besides his part of forty thousand crownes a moneth for the Common warre, the twenty thousand which he ought to giue monethly for the expedition of Naples, the French gallies were so ill furnished both with men and munition, as they remained fruitles at Saouonne, not attempting any thing; the succours of the King of England were farre off, and vacetraine; the tedious and variable proceeding of the Duke of Vrbin did vex him; the approach and threats of the Imperiall army at the gates of Rome, did amaze him; All these considerations made him conclude a truce with the Vice-roy for eight moneths, whereby either party called backe his men speedily deliuered vpon the places taken, and caused the army at sea to retire. This was another meanes to lull the Pope asleepe a little before his ruine.

For threethou thousand ducats which Pope Clement had giuen in regard of this truce, were not sufficient to satisfie two payes due to the Duke of Bourbons Lanquenets; the Germans and Spaniards gaped greedily after the sacke of Rome, which had bene long promised them. The truce did nothing stay them from shewing all acts of hostility, they spoiled the Countiees of Bologna and Romagna, and then camped before Rome, the next day, the Duke of Bourbon causing a furious assault to be giuen, marching in the head of his troops, with a ladder in his hand, was slaine with a Harquebus shot. Philippe of Chaulon, Prince of Orange (who marched besides him) to conceale him from the soldiers, caused his bodie to be covered with a cloake, and following the charge hotly, he forced the suburbs and the City. The victors entering, put about foure thousand men to the sword. It is to be becupplied, the slaughter had bene greater; if the death of their Generall had bene knowne; they spoile friend and foe indifferently, Prelats, Temples, Monasteries, and reliques. They ranfome both secular and religious men. They sacke the Cardinalls Palaces (except such as had redeemed their goods, and such as were fled into their houses) with exceeding summes of money. And which is worse, many being spoiled by the Spaniards, were saced againe by the Lanquenets, being seasoned for the most part with Lutheris doctrine, and by consequence passionate enemies to the Sea of Rome. To conclude, Rome is subied to all the infolencies of a conquered towne which they meant to ruine.

B The Pope besieged in his Castle of Saint Angelo, sent for the Vice-roy of Naples, hoping that he would make him some better composition. But coming to Rome, he found the Imperials nothing pleased with his government, who had chosen the Prince of Aranges for their Generall, with whom the Pope (void of all hope of succours) agreed the sixt day of Iune: To pay vnto the army foure hundred thousand ducats, a fourth part presently, the rest at sundry termes: to remaine prisoner with thirteene Cardinalls that did accompany him, vntill the first hundred and fifty thousand were paid, and then to goe to Naples, or to Caite, to attend how the Emperour would dispose of them: To giue in hostage for assurance of the money, the Archbishops of Signe and Pisa, the Bishops of Pistoia and Verona, Iames Saluati, Simon Ricafoli, and Lawrence brother to the Cardinall Rodolphe: To deliuer into the Emperours hands (so hold so long as he pleased) the Castle of Saint Angelo, the fortress of Ostia, Civita vecchia, and Civita Castellana, with the Cities of Placentia, Parma, and Modena. The Accord being made, Alarcon entred the Castle with three Companies of Spaniards, and three of Lanquenets, lodging the Pope very straitly, and with small liberrie.

This insolent and hard proceeding against the Pope, to the scandal of all Christians, dome, caused the Kings of France and England to make warre in Italy at their common charge, to free the Pope and his Cardinalls being besieged both with warre and pestilence, and and to restore him to the possessions of the Church: the King of England contributing A for his part three score thousand Angels a moneth: and to confirme the league betwixt the King and the Venetians they promised to entertaine ten thousand Suiſſes in common, the Kings furniſhing the first pay, and the second, and so consequently. The Duke of Milan with the Venetians should likewise entertaine ten thousand Italians. Odo of Foix Earle of Laureac was made General of the whole army, and passed the Alpes with a leaſy of five thousand horse, six thousand Lanſquenets, ten thousand French and Gascons, and ten thousand Suiſſes. Then Andrew Doria was entertained by the King with eight gallees, giving him thirte thousand crownes pay every moneth.

Before they came to open warre, the two Kings sent jointly to the Emperour, to demand the Pope's enlargement: the restitution of the children of France, with an offer of two millions of crownes for their ranſome, the preservation of the Estates and Governments of Italy: and finally, a general peace, which the Emperour accepting, the Duke of Orleans should marrie with the daughter of England: but having refused the articles, they did swear and solemnly proclaim their league the eight day of August. The expectation of Lanſquet forces was great, and the confusions of the Imperiall army great, being dispersed by the plague about Rome, and to diminished, as there scarce remained ten thousand men of all the Emperours forces.

Lanſquet had no sooner set footing in the marches of Lombardy, but having intelligence that the Earle of Lodron had sent two thousand Lanſquenets to Boleo, in the territories of Alexandria, he beleaguered them, battered it night and day, and the tenth day of the siege forced them to yield at his discretion, who keeping the Captaines prisoners, dismissed the souldiers: but upon condition that the Spaniards should returne into Spaine, through France, and the Lanſquenets into Germany, through Switzerland: but these were afterwards received into the Kings service: under the Earle of Vaude-mont, Colonel of the Lanſquenets. This small victory was the fore-runner of another of greater importance. Andrew Doria General of the Kings Gallies, made hot warres against the Genevois, so as no ship durst goe to sea along the river of Genoua: and Caspar Frigese advertised by his friends that were within Genoua, of the great scarcity of victuals which did presse the inhabitants, being sent by Lanſquet with two thousand men by land, he kept D them so short, as in few dayes there was neither corne nor cattell for the inhabitants. The belly is an importune solicitor, especially when many mouths cry for meat. The Genevois had no more hope of helpe, but in hazzarding some gallees to sea. They arme some, and send their out by chance to seeke victuals, foure laden with corne were taken by the French gallees, foure returned fraught with corne, and one with other merchandize: and nine were sent forth of Genoua to waite them, when as having newes of Proges approach, they abandon their gallees to goe to charge him. In the meane time Andrew Doria arrives, he compasseth in these gallees in the port of Genoua, burnes one, and takes all the rest, whilst the Genevois (having overthrowne the first they encountered) chased them so far, as they being cut off by the French betwixt the towne and them, they were all defeated and Gabriel Earle of Martinegue their General taken prisoner. This misfortune, with sundry other crosses and losses of money and diuers ships, the famine having brought them to the last extremity, reduced the towne to the Kings obedience, whereof Lanſquet made Theodore Trimle Governor.

The losse of the Lanſquenets had wonderfully daunted them of Alexandria, so as although Alberis of Bel-joyeuse had somewhat reuited them with a supply of a thousand men, yet the rough and continuall battery of Lanſquet, forced the Earle of Lodron to enter into composition, whereby the Lanſquenets departed with their baggage, taking an oath not to carry armes against the King, nor his allies for six months. The taking hereof brought Rigues, with all the Country of Lomeline and Biagras to the Kings obedience. Anthony de Leua had not within Milan above a hundred and fifty horse, and five thousand Lanſquenets and Spaniards, being ready to abandon the towne (doubting to bee vnable to defend it, with so few men, and so many difficulties) and to retire to Pavia. But Pavia was ill victualled: and moreover, his army could not live there upon extortion and spoile, as it had done at Milan. He therefore sends Ludowick of Bel-joyeuse to Pavia, and two thousand five hundred men, and resolves himselfe to defend Milan. Lanſquet follows him, and besiegeth it on the Castle side, and the Venetians on the other part: he makes a breach, and

Pavia taken,

A and takes the towne at the second assault, he leaves it eight dayes in spoile to the souldiers, and leads away Bel-joyeuse (who lately for a quarrell with Fredrick of Boffole, had forsaken the King) prisoner to Genoua. All which places according to the treaty were restored to French Sforza. Milan wauered, the confederates did sollicite the taking thereof: But it was thought good to leave this thorne in the Venetians feet and Sforzas, for being both freed from feare of the Emperour, (who having this passage stop, should draw no succours out of Germanie) would have beene lesse affected to fauour the King in his enterprise of Naples. Moreover, it was a meanes for the King to make a more easie treatie of peace with the Emperour, of whom (leaving the Estate of Milan) he might with more ease obtaine the liberty of his children, according to the treaty with the Emperour, by the Ambassadors of France, England, and Venice. But the King desiring that Sforza should still stand in need of helpe, gave the Emperour meanes to speake bigger. He was of a great spirit, and never daunted in aduersity. He protests, that neither loue nor force shall make him to alter any of the conditions before propounded: and his proud demands make prooffe, that he had no inclination to peace. As the Venetians and Sforza laboured to stay the French forces in Lombardy, so the Pope pressed them to driue the Imperiall army out of the territories of the Church. He therefore passeth the river of Po, the 18 of October, with an intent to attend the rest of the Lanſquenets, commanded by the Earle of Vaude-mont, which were not yet arrived, to be in the Suiſſes place, being for the most part retired.

Lanſquet had no sooner turned his backe, but Anthony de Leua came and recovered Biagras, the eighteenth day of the said moneth, and prepared to passe into Lomeline to take Vigue and Nouarre: but Lanſquet advertised of this attempt, sends backe Peter of Nauarre with six thousand French foot, and some men at armes, who chased the Spaniard into Milan, and seized Sforza in Biagras.

The Lanſquenets being arrived, Lanſquet took the way to Placentia, where the Duke of Ferrara (it may be) well pleased to see the Pope, against whom he had beene long incensed, receiue some disgrace, leaving the Imperials, ioynd in league with the King, and there was concluded the marriage of Hercules his eldest sonne with René the youngest daughter to King Lewis the twelfth. The Marquis of Mantoua, a friend to the strongest, did likewise ioyne with the confederates.

The Emperour then foreseeing, that the inuasion of the Realme of Naples by Lanſquet, would force him to call backe his forces which he had in the territories of the Church, he sent his Commission to let the Pope at liberty, which done, after many treaties he agreed, the last of October, To attempt nothing against the Emperour, neither for the Estate of Milan, nor the Realme of Naples: To pay three hundred and fifty thousand ducats, that is, three score thousand presently to the Lanſquenets, and thirty five thousand to the Spaniards, the like summe within fifteene dayes, and the rest three moneths after.

The Pope to free himselfe from prison, fled to those remedies, which he had before his E restraint neglected, he made Cardinals for money, the most of them (saith the History) being unworthy of so great an honour. Necessary it was that the Court of Rome should thus be disgraced, that they might meddle lesse in worldly affaires, and looke to their spiritual duties. The tenth of December was come, when as the Spaniards should conduct the Pope to a place of safety, but knowing the bad affection of the Spaniards, especially of Don Hugues de Moncade, Vice-roy of Naples, by the death of Launay, and fearing a worse condition, or some other change, he deceived his guards, and the night before (disguised like a Merchant) he went secretly out of the Castle, and saved himselfe in Oruieto: but his hostages payed his ranſome.

A rare example to be noted in the Church, since the time it came to that greatnesse: To see a Pope issued from one of the greatest Families in Italy, fallen from so great a dignity, to lose Rome, to be a prisoner, and to haue all his Estate possessed by the violence of Christian armes: then in few moneths, to bee restored to his seat, and by the meanes of the eldest sonne of the Church to recover his Estate, greatnesse and authority. Without doubt the Emperour, suffering himselfe to be so much prest for the Popes deliury, shewed that the Councell of Spaine was more governed by ambition then deuotion.

The Pope being at liberty, he exhorted the confederates to draw their companies out of the territories of the Church, that by their example the Imperials might make their retreat retreat according to promise, as indeed they did: he gave thanks to Lantrec in particular, for that he had assisted him in his deliverance; adding, That hee was as much bound vnto the King and him, as if he had bene freed by his forces. But the Moore changed not his hue. He held (saith the History) his accustomed disposition, hauing not (by his imprisonment) left his craft and couerousnesse. As the Kings of France and England, requiried him to re-joyne his armes and meanes, with them and their allies: sometimes he fed them with hope that he would employ himselfe for a generall peace, and the good of all Christendome; sometimes with excuses, that wanting men, money, and authority, his vniou with them would be fruitlesse, and giue the Imperials occasion to wrong him in many respects.

Lantrec stayed at Bologna, attending directions from the King, either of a full resolution of peace, or to proceed in his course of armes. The Emperor offered to settle Assise in his Estate, and to compound with the Venetians, Florentines, and other confederates. But the Emperour and the King stood vpon the point of honor, which should trust other. A point which plainly discovered the bitterness of his spleene. The King would not be bound to draw his army out of Italy, before he had recovered his children, yet he offered to put hostages into the King of Englands hands, for performance of whatsoever hee should be bound vnto, if vpon the deliuey of his children he did not presently withdraw his army. The Emperor grew obstinate, saying, that he could not trust him, who had once deceived him. The Ambassadors of France and England tooke their leaues of the Emperour, and according to their Masters Commission proclaimed war against him. The Emperor accepts it cheerfully; but to stay the Ambassadors instantly, to send them fiftene leagues from Bourges (where then the Court of Spaine remained) to giue them a guard of foot, and halberds, and not to suffer them to conferre, or to write in any fort. Was not this to violate the law of Nations? The fire is now kindled, they dreame of nothing but war. Lantrec proceeds in his course, he takes the way to Rimini, Ancona, and Recanate, chafeth the Imperials before him into the Realm of Naples, where we shall soone see the exploits of his armes.

The King aduertised of the detention of the Bishop of Tarbe, his Ambassador, who was afterward made Cardinal of Grandmont, he committed Nicholas Perrenot Lord of Granuelle, the Emperors Ambassador, to the Chastellet at Paris, and stayed all Merchants, subjects to the Emperor. But this was not all. The Emperor had before time at Granada, when as they treated of a peace betwixt them, sayd; That he would willingly end all controuersies with the King by a single combat of his person against the Kings: he now deliueres the same words vnto the Herald that denounceth war vnto him: adding, That the King had basely and treacherously broken his faith with him. The King would not haue refused it, but his Ambassador did then wrong him, in concealing this speech. It may bee the Emperour had such an intent. He was a most valiant Prince, but our Francis did yeeld nothing vnto him in courage. He had no sooner intelligence of his challenge, but calling together, the twenty eight of March, all the Princes, all Ambassadors, with the whole Court, into the great hall of the Palace at Paris, sitting in his royall seat, he caused Iohn Robertet, one of his Secretaries of State, with a loud voice to reade a cartell signed with his owne hand: that the Emperour, accusing the King to haue falsified his faith, had spoken vntruly, and as often as he did speake it, he did lie. To the end therefore he should not deferre the deciding of their controuersies, hee wished them to appoint the field, and hee would bring the armes, the King protesting, that if afterwards the Emperor should write or speake any thing prejudiciall to his honor, the shame of the delay should redound vpon himselfe, seeing that the combat is the end of all writing. Without doubt, this proceeding had bene more seemly for Knights, then for such Princes; and no enterprises are commendable, but so far forth as they agree with the dignity of their persons and States. And for that Granuelle refused to take vpon him this charge, the King dismissing him, did accompany him with a Herald, to present this writing vnto the Emperour. Within few daies after, Henry King of England sent him the like desie, and did put away Katherine his wife, daughter to Ferdinand and Elizabeth King of Spaine, whom he had married, being widow to Arthur his elder brother. A divorce which Pope Clement granted, vpon promise, that Henry should, for his safety, maintaine him a guard of foure thousand foot.

A plause of the people, as, whether for affection of the French, or hatred of the Spaniard, almost all the townes, sent to offer their keyes and gates. Peter of Nauarre had chased the Prince of Melphy out of Aquila, and reduced all Abruzzo to the Kings obedience, the whole Estate of Naples was ready to set vp the banners of France, when as the Prince of Orange hauing assembled within Troye, and thereabouts, fise thousand Germanes, fise thousand Spaniards, and fiftene hundred Italians, hee made Lantrec to vniue his forces, which were dispersed, and to turne head to the enemy, with an intent to fight with him. He wanted the finewes of warre, the Kings assignations failed, so as hee could not long maintaine the burthen of the warre: the aduantage of men, victuals, and the field, did inuite him, he must therefore attempt some great matter. He goes to field with three thousand French, whereof the Lord of Bury was Colonel; foure thousand Gascons, vnder the command of Peter of Nauarre, and the Lord of Candale, eight thousand Germanes commanded by the Earle of Vaudemont, three thousand Suisses vnder the charge of the Earle of Tende, with ten thousand Italians, and approached neere the enemy, but there was no meanes to draw him out of his fort. Many dayes were spent in skirmishes. In one of them, three hundred horses coming out of their battalions, which marched after the artillery, were charged by Morice and Pomperant (it is that faithfull Achates to the Duke of Bourbon, whom the King had drawne to his seruice, and honored with a company of fifty men at armes, for the good seruice hee had done him at his taking at Pavia, hauing freed him from some souldiers that had enuironed him, and not knowne him) were wholly defeated, and their guidons caried away.

Lantrec offered battell, yet well pleased not to fight in the absence of Horatio Bailion, who brought thirteene Ensignes of foot, whom Iohn de Medicis had long before trained in the exercise of armes. But behold, a heauy signe of a farall disaster, the windes were so violent, and the sky so troubled, as all the tents in the French campe were ouerthrowne, and many men slaine.

Bailion arises, the enemy packes vp his baggage, stops the bels of his moyles, and marcheth through the woods directly to Naples, without sound of drumme or trumpet. It had bene a goodly thing to pursue these run-aways. The French Captaines flew after them in their hearts, but Lantrec said, I will haue them at my mercy, and without losse of my men. But the wit of man is ignorant of future destinies. Don Hugues de Moncada and other chiefe seruants to the Emperour, did so hate the Prince of Orange, as without doubt, they had shut the gates of Naples against him, the which had giuen the French a great aduantage, but the soueraigne Iudge of armes had otherwise decreed. The Prince of Orange being dislodged, Lantrec sent some troops of French horse and foot with the blacke bands (which were those of Bailion) to go before Melphy, which might cut off the victuals from the army lying before Naples: the Prince thereof defended it with three thousand men, who by their continuall sallies had much endamaged our troops. They made a small breach with two Cannons, and the Gascons burning with heat, offer themselves to the assault; the black bands follow them, without any commandement or direction from their Captaines. A volley of shot makes them retire, kills many Gascons, and some three score of the black bands. At night they renew the battery, and make a second attempt, but with like success, yet at length they carie it.

The next day they haue a supply of artillery, wherewith they make two great batteries. The peasants (which were in great numbers within Melphy) mutine for feare, that they are indeed more fit to amaze, then to serue at time of need. The souldiers terrified with this tumult, abandon the defences, and recover the Castle: they enter the towne, spoile it, and kill of souldiers and inhabitants fix or seuen thousand: they take the Castle by composition, and the Prince with his wife and children prisoners. Barleta, Trani, Venouse, Acofti, with all the places thereabouts, except Manfredonia, yeeld to the victors fortune, who prepared a great masse of victuals for the siege of Naples: the Venetians troops hauing fortified the army with about two thousand men. Capoua, Acerre, Nola, Auerce, and all places thereabouts, hauing voluntarily opened their gates, made the way easie for Lantrec, who campt before the wals of Naples, in the end of April the Imperials were refused, onely to defend Naples, and Caiete. It was a great matter to haue chased the enemy out of the field, and to keepe them chopt vp within the capital citie.

But alas! what shall become of so great a multitude of men: our French must learne once

ged.

The discommodities of the figge.

once more, to their cost, that all their strange enterprises attempted farre off, haue beene A mournefull graues vnto them. The issues of death belong to the eternall God.

Lantrec employs all his wits in the siege of Naples: but who can hope for any happy successe? The City was full of men of defence, and the means to famish it very vncertain: for the gallees of Phillipp, Nephew to Andrew Doria, being unable to stop up the ports, some ships fraught with meale stole in: those of Venice came not, the enemies light-horse (which were many) cut off the victuals from our men, the ordinary grosseffe of the ayre, the continuall raine, the difcommodities of the souldiers, who for the most part lay open, filled the campe full of diseases: the Kings slow prouision, and the negligence of the Treasurers, were the cause that no money could passe the mountains: the Venetians, of two-and-twenty thousand ducats which they should contribute every moneth, did owe threecore thousand, and that little which Lantrec did gather of the custome of the cattell of Apulia, was employed for the defraying of his ordinary expences. The number of the defendants was great, their experience in deeds of arms well tried, being 9 or 10000 old souldiers. It was therefore better to beseege, then to assaile Naples, and to provide that they might not be relieued with victuals, neither by land nor sea; Phillipp Doria kept the gulf of Salerne, and the Imperials relying vpon the valour and strength of their men, conceiue a hope to overcome him.

This resolution was necessary for the Spaniards, they make choice of a thousand Spanish ship, and divide them into five Gallies, four Poibts, and two Brigantines. Don Hugu the Vice-roy, Gobbe an old sea-Captaine, and almost all men of command, will be partakers; and to amaze Doria a farre off by a shew of a greater number of ships, they make a long traine of Fisher-boats, and send two Gallies before, giuing them charge to retire at the enemies approach, that they might draw them into the open sea. Doria aduertised of the Imperials counsell, by faithfull spies, makes three of his Gallies to disperse themselves as if they fled, to the end that turning, they might (through fauour of the wind) charge them in flankes and in poope: and followed with five gallies, hee marcheth towards the enemye. The greatest stratagemes consist in expedition: the first blow is worth two. The Spaniards presumed, that compasing in Doria, with the smoake of their Cannon to take from him his sight and mark. Doria presents them, and for the first check, he carries away D with one Cannon-shot, forty men out of the Admirall, amongst the which was the Captaine and many officers: the other peeces flye discharged, doe likewise disorder them. On the other side, the Gally of *Don Hugu*s discharging her Cannon, kills the Captaine of *Doria*s gallee, and hurts the Master, with some others. The approaches are made, and a furious charge is giuen with their shot and other armes. These two fight with great courage; three other Imperials preece two Genotouilles, and seemed to haue the better, after the death of many men of either side, when as the other three which made shew to flye (having gotten into the open sea) they turne the prow against the enemy, beat in pieces the Admirall, and another called Gobbe, take their Poibts, sincke some, burne others, kill their men, breake their armes, and fighting hand to hand, and foot to foot, in the end they get E both the advantage of the combat and the honor of the victory.

Don Hugues de Monaco Vice-roy of Naples, Fieramosque, with many other Gentlemen and Captaines, and about a thousand men were slain, and remained as a prey for the filth. Two Spanish Forts forsoe battered recovered Naples with great difficulty: the Prince of Orange caused the Master of one of them to be hanged, the other went and yielded to Philippin Doria. The Marquis of Guast, Africanus and Camillo Colonae, the Prince of Salern, Saint Croix, le Riz, Gobbe, Serenon, with a great number of chiefe men, were taken prisoners.

These are goodly beginnings in so famous a siege, which fill the French with great hopes of a happy success, and the Imperials with a strange amazement. They see the flower of their men buried in the waves, they have lost the command of the sea, and are blockt up so neere at land, as they have no means to be relieved with victuals, they have no moneie but their hand-mills, no money for their soldiers, the plague did daily diminish their numbers. Staby, Saint Germaine, Fondy, and all the Country about, yields to the Conqueror: the Prince of Melphy joynes to that party, the people of Calabria seeme very willing to come under their command; but the point of a totall victory consisted either in the conquest or the defence of Naples. Our men were much annoy'd for fresh water.

A fresh-water disease increased, the which did greatly wast the army; the enemy being stronger in light horse, did cut off their provisions by their daily sallies.

 horfemen difperfed at Capoua, Auferre and Nola, fo as the blacke-Bands hauing no hope to fecond them, came off with difaduantage from their skirmishes. The report way that they prepared an armie for the feaft Martilles, but it was only in imagination. The Venetians more careful of their private intereft, then of the generall good, filled them-felues of thofe places which fhould be their portion of the conqueft. The Pope had no other defigne, but to recouer the authoritie which his houle was wont to enioy at Florence. Thus there appeared many difficulties on either fide, yet fuch as there was an expectation of victory for the French, for in the end there arifes two and twenty Venetian Gallies in the gulph of Naples, the tenth of Iune, which deprived the befieged of all commodities at sea, and threatened them with a generall famine. But see what caufed the totall ruine of our French, The Emperour in the midft of a losse, makes a great gain. We doe commonly finke vnder our owne burthens, and are the caufe of our owne miseries:
 The infidelicke of the Genouois is herein detestable: but we may obserue a goodly lesson for Princes, to endure much of a rude fervant, when he is profitable vnto them; and that they must neuer hope to recouer him, when he is chased away or lost. Lauterbrudert led of the fore-said victory, commanded they should send the ambassadors

C Philippin puts them into two Gallies, with that intent, But the boocie was too good, and might easily draw a Genouois soule to dispenche with his faith. As they passed by Genoa, Andrew Doria layed them, covering his secret designs with this pretext; That the King had not satisfied him for the ranfome of the Prince of Orange, and other prisoners, which he had taken at Porte-finding during the siege of Paia (the which had bene set at libertie, as hee being concluded at Madril with the Emperor) neither yet for the entertainment of his gallies, without the which hee could no longer maintaine them. That fit pleased his Maieitie to doe him right, and yeeld unto the Genouois their accustomed commands upon Sauonne (the King thinking to keepe Genoua in awe, had transformed the traffick of merchandise, and the custome of Sixto Shauonne) with their ancient liberties, and priviledges, hee would deale with the people, that for allurance of his faith, the Moitay furnish the King with twelve gallies maintained, in the which he might place all his Capitaines, and Souldiers, as he should thinke good, referring only two gallies for the service of the port.

— A strange and insolent courtier for the servant, to prescribe a law to his Master, and the loss of such a servant was the loss of Genoux, of the Realm of Naples, under the name which hefiged it. But these demands of Doria, being found unreasonable by the Chancery, especially by the Chancellor de Pons, a Frenchman, and of great authority, he sent Anthony de la Rochebouché, Lord of Barbezies, with the office of Admiral, into the East-seas, and a Commission to seize vessels on his Majesty's gallees, as of those of Doria; yea and of his person, if he might find them any. Anthony succeeded in this charge, retreating him to his gallees, and pursued him to the bottom, till he could carry off to supply him with money and men in their roomes that had died of the infection. The King lent the Prince of Naurre, brother to Henry King of Naurre, but with so small a troop (whereof the greatest part were voluntary young Gentlemen, who marched only for pleasure and to win honor) as he was forced to lend some out of the way to conduct him safely from Nola to the campe, and to receive some money which he brought. This charge was given to Candeller, Nephew to the Marquis of Saluces, who passing in his returne, before Naples, was charged by the Imperials, who issued forth in great troops, being burnt his men put to rout, and himselfe taken prisoner and brought to Naples, and then redeemed by exchange for one of theirs that was taken in the fight; he died of his wounds. Hugh Earle of Pepoli was likewise exchanged for another, and their troops were diminished about two hundred that were slaine and taken. A hard fore-runner of a fatall checke, which within few dayes shall daunt our warriors.

Now behold a pitiful Catastrophe of these two armies. The Imperials, by their daily fallies, provided them things necessary, and doe often cut off the victuals from the French armie, take their baggage and forage, euen at their forts, and their horses; at the watering, their hopes encrease with their advantages : their Lanquents mutine no more : euerie one effectes it a glory to haue suffered. Contrariwise, the others decay, both in force and courage, the horse disband, some to refresh themselves, others to avoid the plague : the footmen faint, hauing no horse to second them ; the plague beegane to cease at Naples, and encreased amongst our men. The Earle of Maudemore, Gruffy, with many other Captaynes were already laid in their graves : the Prince of Muscare, Simen Trimale, and almost all the men of command were sicke; and that which did most import, Leutens stricken with sicknesse, could not redresse those things, which did hourly tend to ruin. Raice de Gers, whom he had sent towards Abruzzo, to make a levy of foure thousand foot and five hundred horse, found the Treasurers who payed him with their ordinary pay, I have not as farthing, the King hath no money in his coffers. The enemies did so beleaue wayes, as they could not goe to Capoua : euerie man almost was sicke in the armie, the footmen were much wasted. Simen Ramais, a brave Knight, and of the French partie, had bene detained in Calabria. Some had benee taken with the slaughter of a troop of men at armes, and light-horse. Most commonly these were no valiant, but they were taken water, all the eithers being deayd, and no hope to their millicies; Amere by the 15 of August, interred with him all his brave defenses.

The head failing, all the members faint and loone decay. Moreover, we obſerve in this Nobleman that no man (how wife and valiant he ever) is always happy, ſo vertue and fortune, neither waye can be hated and morall warre. Thinking did henceby his ſineſſe of puniſh ſuch Church in Paris, with a mourning ſong beſet for one of his ſouldiers. The Marquis of Saluſſes rook upon him the government of the army. A ſort of couſage, boldnes and will followed by men of warre, it but it Deceayed, and diſorders increaſed. Can

The force of Sami with a thousand Spaniards, chased their hundreds foot from Sami which were in garbion boats, and followed with a greater crabbe the took boats from the force of Sami who being wared into the callos attacked two thousand men which the Marquis sent him the number being charged in the plains of the Indian war from the Florida Marquis, a force of Naples with four hundred men and finding Capotina in manner for taken or might any, sent the justice in the Florida's banding Pozzo in the garbion into Africa a place of great importance for the camp.

A armes, horses and baggage, but such as had command might every one carry away a horse, or a mule, at their choice : That the strangers should not beare armes against the Emperour for six moneths. So all the companies were defeated, all the Capitaines dead, taken or fled : and this accord was a conclusion or scale of the miserie of the French in the Realme of Naples, and a confirmation of the Spaniards greatness in Italy.

Things having succeeded after this manner, the Marquis was caried sicke in a Litter to Naples, where within few dayes after he died. During the siege and after, there died the Earles of Lautrec and Vaudemont, Charles Prince of Nauarre, Candelles, the Barons of Grandmont, Buzançois, de Cony, the Lord of Tournon, and his brother, Claude of Estampes Lord of la Ferte Nabert, la Val a Dauphinois, Gruffy, Morice, d'O, Pomperant, Montadragon, Lonpé, Cornillon, Grutuze, Maunourri, the elder Iarnac, Bonivet, Hugh Earle of Popoli, Count Wolfe, with fogreat a number of others, as for so many men at arms there remained not a hundred, and of so many thousand of foote there hardly escaped foure thousand : but let vs see the successe of our forces in the estate of Milan.

The Duke of Brunfwick, having paſſed the river of Adice the tenth of May, with ten thouſand Lanſquenets, and fix hundred horſe well armed, hee marched to the ſuccour of Naples. And the King, to croſſe his deſignes, oppoſed the Earle of Saint Paul, brother to the Duke of Vendome, with five hundred men at armes, five hundred light horſe, vnder the command and government of Boiffy: fix thouſand foot ſold by Lorges, and three thouſand Lanſquenets by Montenai. The Earle had commandement from the King, to follow this Germane Duke at the heeles, if he directed his courſe to Naples, and to engage him betwixt the two armies: but neceſſary prouiſions for his troops cauſing the Earle to make a fruitleſſe ſtay at Aſt, gaue the Duke liberty to take by compoſition, Pefcara, Riuolte, Lunata, & almoſt at the other places vpon the lake of Garde. This little ſucceſſe drew him to the ſiege of Laude, but in vaine; the valour of the beſieged, the plague among the beſiegers, the policy of Anthony de Lena, (who would haue no companions of the booty, nor ſo great forces as might preſcribe him a law in his government) tooke from them all hope to recouer any money, conſidering the poverty of Milan, and the difficulty of victuals, whereof there was great want in Lombardy: the Lanſquenets mutining, returned home in diſorder the thirteenth of Iuly.

The Earle being thus freed from this thorne, and ioyned with the Dukes of Vrbin and Milan, recovered what the Imperials had feized on, and all that they held betwixt Po and the river of Tefin vnto Pauia, which then obeyed the Emperor : for after the pallage of Laurence to Naples, Anthony de Leua aduertified that it was carelefly kept by Peter of Lumene, with four hundred horfe, and a thoufand Venetian foot, and by Hannibal Pifinar a Cremonois with three hundred foot, he fcaled it in the night, and furprifed it. Biagras and Arone were by the fame meanes brought vnder his obedience. The confederates meaning was to affaile Milan fuddenly, but a continuall raine breakes their way going to the port of Verceil, by the which they fhould enter, fo as they change aduice and went to E campe before Pauia. They battered it with twenty Cannons, and made a reasonable breach, where they difputed who fhould haue the point of the affault, the French and the Venetians affecting this honor equally. The lot fell to the Venetians, who gaue it : but skirmifhing coldly and farre off, Lorges moued with choller and impatience to fee them fo faintly pufhe the aduantage which fortune had giuen them, thrufts himfelfe betwixt them and the breach, and takes it by force, before the Venetians could approach. Florimond of Chaillly and Granfay (who did fecond Lorges on either fide, if need fhould bee) were there flaine, and the Enfigne which marched before them. Peter of Birague died, being fhot in the thigh. There were flaine within, about foure hundred, almoft all Lanquenets. The towne being taken, the caftle yeelded by compulfion.

But this victory is crossed with a notable losse. The plague was great at Genoua, and for this reason the towne was almost defoliate. Andrew Doria embraceth this occasion; he approacheth neere the towne with some Gallies, enters it with small resistance, ruines the Chafelte speedily, and in the end receiues it by a composition made with Theodore Triulze, being vnurnished of men and money. The Geneuois being restored to their liberty, raze the Chafelte, establish a new forme of gouernment, name a Councill of foure hundred Citizens, by whom all the offices and dignities of the City should be chosen: they abrogate the law, whereby all Gentlemen were excluded (a good expedient to hanish all partialities) they refuse in their important affaires, the prehemence which Andrew Doria had deferred in recompence of the liberty which he had purchased for them, who (neither medling with the election of their Duke, nor any other magistrates, neither yet with the government of the treasure) made his authority lesse hatefull, and this new policy more pleasing. Afterwards they rooke Sauonne, and the better to hold it in subjection, they ruined the fort, and filled vp the haven with stones.

The Earle of Saint Paul, relying on the word of some Citizens, who promised to giue him meanes to surprize the towne, parted with speed out of the Duchy of Milan, with three thousand foot and some horse to second them : but hauing no prouision of victuals, but for foure and twenty houres, and no artillery with them, all turned to smooke, and he retired to Alexandria, to winter the rest of his troops, his Lanquenets being already retired, and the French halfe diminished of their numbers for want of pay. The Spring being come, the Earle of Saint Paul goes to field with those small troops he could gather together : he takes Mortare, a strong towne well flanked, and with double ditches full of water : Nouarre abandoned by Conte Philippi Tormiel, Vigec and almost all other places on this side the riuer of Tefin : yet all this was nothing, seeing the towne and castle of Milan, with other chiefe places were in the Emperors power. The Dukes of Vrbino and Milan aduertised, that the French army kept the field, came and ioyned with them at Marignan : yet all these armies vnited, were not sufficient to assaile Milan, the Venetians hauing not the moiety of twelue thousand men, which they should entertaine by the articles of the league. Moreouer, Anthony de Leus was newly relieued with three thousand Spaniards, which came from Naples : They resolute therefore, that (to cut off the victuals from the Imperials) the French should march to Biagras, the Venetians to Cassan, and Sforzato Pavia : but the Earle of Saint Paul did wonderfully affect the enterprize of Genoua. Andrew Doria departed the eight of Iune with his galleys, to guard the Emperor, who passed into Italy. This absence put the Earle in good hope, that Cesar Fregose (to whom the King had promised the government of Genoua) would make the towne reuolt with some few foot.

Enterprize
vpon Genoua.

This was to take a mighty Wolfe by the eares, which will bite them shrewdly that thinke to lay hold. They had behind them too vigilant an enemy. According to this designe, the Earle in stead of Biagras arises at Landriane, the twentieth of Iune : but in the night a great raide doth so swell the riuer, as he had no meanes to passe his artillery. Anthony de Leus aduertised of the Earles stay, parts from Milan, overtakes the Earle, (who was busie in pulling downe an old house, to haue some pieces of timber to put vnder the cariage of a peece, that was mired) and chargeth him before he had in a manner discouraged him. At the first, the Earle forceth the Spanish shot to retire into the battalion of their Germanes ; and the French Lanquenets had repulsed those that had passed a little Riuer which diuided the two armies : but pursuing and following them to the bankes, they were greatly annoyed by them that were opposite on the other side. Gay Earle of Rangon, had in the morning taken the way to Pavia with the fore-ward, so as hee had no notice of the fight, vntill it was past time to succour them. John Thomas of Galere and the Castellain of Laude, Colonels of the Italian foot, were already well advanced : and leaving them engaged that were desirous to fight, they retire on the one side and saue themselves likewise in Pavia. John Ierome of Castillon, and Claude of Rangon, Commanders ouer two thousand Italians, performed wonders. But the Imperiall horsemen hauing passed the riuer with a great battalion of Germanes, our Italians turne their backs, our Lanquenets yeeld to their Country-men, the Earle and Annebault, with those few horsemen which remained, made the retreat, alwayes turning their faces to the enemy, vntill they were stayed by a brooke, which the Earle was not able to passe, through the weaknesse of his horse : whereas he and almost all that followed him, were put to the sword, or taken prisoners, except Annebault and some few Lances which leaped ouer the ditch : the footmen were all defeated, the artillery lost, and the baggage taken.

After all these stormes and confusions, after so many fatall sweats, caused by the waight of their armes, was it not now time to take breath ? The Alpes and high-pointed Pyrenees mountains, be they not sufficient barres to restrain vs within our bounds, and to be content to enioy and defend that which belongs vnto vs ? was not so much blood spilt sufficient to make all Italy drunke ? Such pittifull spectacles of Frenchmens bones, wherewith the

A the plaines of the Estates of Milan and Naples were made white, had they not force and vertue to take from vs all future desire to beare armes in such mortall conquests ? Without doubt they had reason to make this complaint with the ancient Church : all our enemies haue opened their mouthes vpon vs ; they haue bified, gnashed their teeth and said ; wee haue confounded them, this is the day which we expected : we haue found it, we haue sene it. And with the like repentance to cry, Remember O Lord what hath chaunced vnto vs, behold and see their reproches. Turne vs vnto thee O Lord, and we shall be turned. Behold now the pittifull reliques of our Frenchmen, harteall to strangers, scorned of all the world, bearen on all sides, returning home with their shirts tyed vpon their shoulders, who hauing scarce breathed some yeares, we shall see againe fall to armes.

This vnfortunate successe of our men, hauing caused armes to cease in a manner throughout all Italy, the Emperour and Pope both being bare of money, treated of some articles of peace. The Emperour had no inclination thereto : yet he could not grant it in a season more beneficiall for himselfe. The King sought it : two notable afflictions drew him thereto ; the Imprisonment of his children, and the ruine of so many armies, with the wasting of his treasure. But one speciall consideration did moue him. If the confederates had discovered his intent, they might haue preuented him, and by their agreement with the Emperour excluded him from a league with any of them : and by consequence haue brought him to that point as he should haue bene forced to accept farre lesse tolerable

C conditions of peace. Eluise the Kings mother, and Marguerite, Aunt vnto the Emperour by the fathers side, did treat it at Cambray, furnished with authority and counsell from both their Maesties ; where finally they concluded ; " That the King should pay two millions of crownes for the enlargement of his Children : that is, twelue hundred thousand crownes, whereas the said children should be in France and at liberty : He should deliuer the lands which Mary of Luxemburg, mother to the Duke of Vendome had in Flanders, Arthois, Brabant and Hainault, and those which the Duke of Montpensier, cousin-germane to the said Duke, did possesse in the said Countreys, for foure hundred thousand crownes to be redeemed within a certaine time ; and for the other foure hundred thousand remaining, he should acquire the Emperour of so much to the King of England, which

D he had lent vnto him, and fifty thousand more which the Emperour did owe vnto the English, for the indemnitie of the mariage betwixt the Emperour and Mary, daughter to the said King of England, whom he had left to marry with the daughter of Portugal. Moreover, he should vngage the Flower-de-luce of gold, enriched with precious stones, and a peece of the Crosse which Philip the Emperours father had ingaged to the King of England, father for fifty thousand crownes. That the King should renounce the souverainety of Flanders and Arthois. That he should marry with Elenor the Emperors sister : and if they had a sonne, he should haue the Duchy of Bourgogne. That he should restore whatsoever he possessed in the Duchy of Milan, and the Realme of Naples. That he should disanull the Duke of Bourbonns proccesse, restore him to his honor, and his children to their inheritance, and generally all others that had bene spoiled by reason of the warres. These articles thus concluded, were read and published in the great Church of Cambray the first day of August. But could the King renounce such pretensions, seeing they were inheritances purchased to the Infants of France by the succession of Claude their mother, daughter to Lewis the 12. Duke of Orlence, of whom depended the said succession of Milan ?

This treaty did greatly moue the confederates, for that they were not acquainted with it, especially the King of England : notwithstanding, his secret designes made him to temper his choller. He meant to put away Katherine his wife, Aunt to the Emperour, and daughter to Ferdinand King of Spaine, saying, as it was true, that shee had bene before married to his eldest brother, wherewith the Pope could not dispence, belonging to the Law of God : which conclusion he obtained by the meanes of the Lord of Langey, in the Vniuersities of Paris, Pavia, Padoua, Bologna, and others. The Emperour and his ministers crosse him in this desire. This quarrell had neede of a strong support. To make vse of the Kings fauour at need, he lent him the said sum of foure hundred thousand crownes, to be paid in five yeares : he forgave him the fiftie thousand crownes, & gaue the Flower-de-luce to his god-sonne Henry Duke of Orlence.

The tenth of May was come, when as the Deputies should meete at Bayonne, for the exchange of the Infants of France, with the payment of their ranfome. Montmorency

Lord Steward and Marshall of France, came for the King; for the Emperour came Relafques Constable of Castile: the Crowne is told and put to the proof: but being found somewhat altered by the aduice of the Chancelor du Prat, who thought to make it a benefit to the King, forty thousand Crownes more payed the interest of the whole summe. There were about foure moneths spent in the tryall of these Crownes: and in the beginning of Iuly, the Dauphin of France and the Duke of Orleans came to the tiuer which runnes by the walles of Fontarabie, and diuides France from Biscay. A great boate was fastened in the midst of the streame, with anchors and cables, that the sea which flows twice a day, raising the boate to the height of the water, might serue as a bridge: and onerthwart this great boate, they made a barre, to the end that the boate which carried the Infants of France, and that which brought the money for their ransom, being fastened on either side the great boate, the Frenchmen should passe into that where the Infants were, & the Spaniards where the ransom was. Thus it was performed, & they came accompanied with Queene Eleanor, to meete the King their father betwixt Roquehort of Marfan, and Caprieux, in a little Abbey of Nunnes, where the King and Queene were married an houre before day. Then taking their way by Bourdeaux, Cognac, Amboise and Blois, they came to Saint German in Lay, attending the preparatiues for the Queenes coronation at Saint Denis, and her entrie into Paris.

The Emperour being thus assured of the King, who about all others might crosse his desires, he is now refused to be Crowned. To this effect, he must winne the Pope (for he must receiue the Crowne from him:) and the Pope who desired some notable reuenge of the Florentines, for the injury they had done him during his captivity vnder the Imperials (they had spoiled all the goods belonging to the Medici, and chased them and their adherents out of the estate of Florence) was easily drawne to the Emperours will; yea with such extraordinary priuiledges, as the Emperour fitting himselfe to the Popes passions, settled the foundation of that admirable greatnesse, which his house doth at this present inioy in Italy. The Pope hauing granted the Crowne to the Emperour, which he could neuer obtaine of his predecessor Julius: vpon condition, that for recompence thereof, he should succour him with an army, to restore them of his name to their ancient authority within Florence, he imbarques at Barcellona, lands at Genoua, passeth to Placentia, and at the Popes request, restores Francis Sforza to the Duchie of Milan: but he reserves in his owne power the Castles of Milan and Cremona: hee marieth the said Sforza with his neece, daughter to the King of Denmarke, a prisoner, and dispossessed of his Realme: and on Saint Matthias day (so famous for his natiuitie, and the taking of the King before Pavia) he receiued the ornaments of the Imperiall dignitie from the Pope.

One scruple with-held the Emperour from resolving against the Florentines. The Turke besieged Vienna in Austria, with two hundred and five and twenty thousand fighting men: but the valour of Philip Count Palatine, the Earles of Solme & Rokendolf, and the succours brought by Ferdinand Arch-duke of Austria, and King of Hongarie, hauing forced the Infidels to take their way to Constantinople, with shame and losse, the Emperour gaue the charge of this warre to the Prince of Auranges, who ioyning with Dan Ferdinand of Gonzagua, and the Marquis of Guast, takes from the Florentines, Cortone, Arezzo, Lafric, Pistoia, Prato, Volterra, Empoli, camps before Florence, and reduceth the Citizen to extremity: but as he marched to encounter some forces that came to succour the besieged, meaning to winne the horse, or to lose the saddle: hee was slaine in the charge being in the head of his troopes, performing (saith the Original) rather the office of a man at armes, then of a General.

The succours notwithstanding defeated, the Florentines (after a long and painfull siege of eleuen moneths) fell in the end into the Popes power: who by many and sundry punishments of death and banishment, did so weaken the City, as in the end (the power of the Medici being more free) they haue settled the Soueraigntie in their family. The Duke of Ferrara had in time purchased fauour with the Emperour: and happy was he, for without it they would haue clippt his wings shorter. Wherewith the Pope was so greatly moued, as hee would not ratifie the sentence, by the which the Emperour had condemned the Ferrarise in an hundred thousand Crownes to the Pope: neither would he accept the money, nor the rent, which according to the ancient custome, the said Duke caused to be offered vnto him, at the feast of Saint Peter following: and even then

A then began to studie how hee might secretly oppress the Duke by ambulations, or find some matter on occasion to wrong him openly, with the ayde of great Princes. But hee did not fore-see, that death would soone cut off the thred of his life, and interre with him the issue of his desires. The present estate of things promised in shew a generall peace betwixt these two great Princes, but their minds had other impressions: That of our Francis, with a wonderfull desire to be reuenged for the rigorous conditions of the treatie of Cambray, being forced to renounce the Soueraignties of Flanders and Artois, ancient members of the Crowne of France, and to quier his rights to the estates of Milan and Naples, the which had wonderfully discontented him. That of Charles, who feared lest the King or his successors should draw those Prouinces within the bounds of the Realme, and by the recourie of the Duchie of Milan, molest him continually in the possession of Naples and Sicily. To exclude the King from all hope, the Emperour thought it best to restore Sforza to the Estate of Milan, that he might rule him at his will and pleasure: and for a time giue good contentment to the Potentates and Common-weales of Italy, to sequester them from the alliance of France, and make them enter into a defensie League for the said Sforza: the first motion or occasion, which within few yeares shall transport our armes beyond the mountaines. There were diuers others which toucht as neere, Sauoy lyes vpon the way or passage from France to Lombardie: therefore to lay a strong barre before the King, if he should reuise his ancient quarrels and pretensions, the Emperour sold to Charles Duke of Sauoy, the Countie of Ast with the appertinences, being the ancient patrimonie of the house of Orleans, to tie him to his command, and to draw him to this League, as hauing now a priuate interest in the warres of Lombardie. Moreover, hee employed the mediation of the said Duke, to withdraw the Swisses and Grisons from the Kings friendship to his. These were new motives of new troubles, and for enenemy, he had two: they all had priuie perswaders, who desirous of new boyles, anchored the hope of their priuate affaires, vpon the generall troubles of Christendome.

A scarce scratched too hard, breakes forth easily: a noble courage wronged, doth with like facility feele an outrage. Here we obserue a publike prejudice done to the Crowne, and a priuate contempt to the Kings person. A notable wrong, cutting off from the Soueraigntie two rich neighbour Prouinces. A contempt, for that we see Sforza issued from a mean stocke, and the sonne of a bastard, (oftentimes termed by the Emperours owne mouth, a traitor and periured) preferred before the King, brother-in-law to the said Emperour, and his Maiesties children, whom no iust title, but onely force of armes could exclude. Let vs adde hereunto a third sting, sufficient to animate any generous mind: vnder a colour pretended, that they sought to steale the Infants of France secretly out of prison, the Emperour had put most of their Officers into the Gallies: and although he had bene often summoned by the King, by vertue of the treatie of Cambray, yet would hee neuer enlarge them. Let the iudicious Reader iudge, which of these two did first inringe the Articles of the said Treatie.

But the vices of precedent warres, being not yet well cured, and the King calling to mind the calamities to come, they dissuaded him from taking armes. It was better to trie a friendly course, and seeke to recouer his owne by money, rather then by force. With this designe he sends Rabodenges to the Emperour. The Regent and Queene, assist and labour for an interview betwixt the Emperour and King. The Emperour aduertiseth the Pope, and doth assure him, that whatsoeuer he treats with the King, hee will conclude nothing with him to bring him into iealousie. The Pope dares not rely vpon this promise: hee complains of the King, that without his priuiey such practices are managed. The King excuseth himselfe, alledging, that they were not so farre forward, as it deserved to be lightly imparted to his holinesse: notwithstanding, hee surceaseth the said practices, and the death of Louise the Kings mother and Regent, chancing the 22 of September, did quite dissolve them. There are other matters which shall hereafter import. The Emperour sought to force the Princes and other estates of the Empire, to receiue Ferdinand his brother for King of Romans, making them to allow of the election made of him, to the prejudice of the golden Bull, and contrary to the ancient orders of the said Empire. A iurisdiction, which shall cause the ciuill warres, that hereafter shall assidit Germanie. Moreover, the Princes pretended, that the Emperour failed in the performance of many things promised

mised by him, touching the rights, priuiledges, and liberties of the Empire: So as John A Electour and Duke of Saxony, John Fredericke his sonne, William and Lewis Dukes of Bavaria, Philip Landgrau of Hessen, with many other Princes, make a generall league, for the forelaid causes. And now seeing the King discontented, that the Emperor had newly discovered vnto the Pope the treaty of their enteruiue, mediated by the Ladies; and that the King had many & lawfull occasions to giue care to the perswasions which were made often vnto him, that the Emperor did but seeke to lul him asleepe, while that he did forsize himselfe with men, money, and alliances: they intreat the King to enter into their association, by vertue of an ancient league obserued long before betwixt the Emperor and the Crown of France: they send him an authentick copie of their treaty, that hee might know their intencion was not to make any inuasion, but for the defence of the Empire; the which they did foresee, that Charles the fifth did seeke to subuert; and to make it heredita-rie to his House, to the great preiudice of the neighbour Princes; greatly troubled with the Emperours exceeding ambition and inuiolent outrages.

The King, to giue two strokes with one stone, imparts this matter to the King of England his perpetuall Allie: asketh his aduice and counsell, how they two together might enter into this league, without breach of the treaties they had with the Emperour:
and in the end, by Pommeray his Ambassador, he doth capitulate: "That the King of England being assailed by the Emperour, he should succor him with twelve ships well appointed and victualled, with six hundred men at armes, French, and three thousand foot. And C in like case, if the King were inuaded within his Realme, the King of England was bound to furnish him the like proportion of shipping, and with six thousand Englishmen, both the one and the other to be entertained at his charge that was assailed. That either of them being assailed, they should stay all Merchants that were subiect to him that did assaile, which should be found within the territories of their obedience, and deliuer them to him that was assailed, to redeeme such as had been seized on by the aggressor, in the beginning of the warre. That neither the one nor the other Prince, should hereafter treat or make alliance with any other Prince, Potentate, or Communitie without the consent and association of either of them.

Enteruiue of the two Kings.

And they treated likewise of the means how they might best vndertake to resist the Turk D
(if he did persist to inuade Christendome): whereupon their Maiesties concluded an interview at Bologne: the 23 of October they made a new treaty: That to giue a more perfect proofe of their zeale and desire to enlarge Christendome, and to summon other Princes by their example, considering that the Turke, notwithstanding his retreat, had left a good part of his forces in Hungary, they should assemble together by their ioynt forces, an army of fourescore thousand men, whereof there should be tenne thousand horse with artillery: requisite for the said Campe. And besides this treaty, these two Kings had many causes of discontent: Our King found himselfe grievously wronged, for that the Pope and the Emperour with their partisans, had newly made a league for the defence of Italy, whereof they had declared
Anthony de Leua to be Generall.

The King of England had no lesse cause to complaine of the wrong, hee said the Court of Rome did him, touching the matter of his diuorce, seeking to force him, either to goe in person to Rome, or to send, with expresse deputation, men of great account that should stand to the Popes iudgement.

As inuolent proceeding in like cases, chanced among foueraigne Princes: seeing that such a businesse of that importance, and touching the conscience so neere, did well deserue, that (according to the vsuall custome) they should send Iudges to the place: it being reasonable that the persons should speake personally, and not by their Attorneys: and very vnreasonable that a foueraigne Prince, leauing the rule and gouernment of his Estates, should goe and plead his cause at Rome. Moreouer, he did complaine vnto the King, of the exactions of the Romane Church vpon the Clergy and people of England, and did instantly require, that they two should fend their Ambassadors ioyntly together to the Pope, to summon him to appeare at the next Councell, to heare of the extorsions hee did vnto Princes and Christian people.

The King propounded all abuses. The Pope had dissembled with him touching certaine tithe which he had granted him to leaue vpon the Clergy: and the French Church complained of him, of the vnuie and new exactions, which vnder colour of piety they made

A made at Rome for the expedition of Bulls, by means whereof, all the treasure was daily caried out of his Realme, to the preiudice of the Clergie which grew poore: the Churches were not restored, nor the poore clothed nor fed: their yearly rents were excessive, no equality in them: many officers newly created, which were payed vpon the dispatch and expedition of Bulls, ouer and aboue the iust price which they were wont in former times to pay: the Offices which fell void, were sold to the great benefit and profit of Saint Pe- ter, entertaining many Groomes, Chamberlaines, Protonotaries, their seruants, Gardi-ners and others: and for the repairing of Saint Peters Church, a great summe of money was leauied, the which they did afterwards imploy to make warre against the King. Yet B the King would neither wholly allow nor disallow of the King of Englands complaints:
but for that the Pope had sent him a promise, by the Cardinal of Grandmont, of an en-terview at Nice, or Anignon, after the Emperours returne into Spaine, he requested the King of England to attend the issue of their parle. These griefes of the French Church had been presented vnto the King in the assembly of the Estates of the Countrey and Duchy of Britany, with many other things, farre from that charity which ought to be in the Church. In the said Estates it was concluded; That Francis the Kings eldest sonne, Dauphin of Viennois, should be acknowledged Duke of Britany: That the eldest sonne of France should hereafter cary the titles of Dauphin of Viennois, and Duke of Britany: and the said Duchie should for ever be incorporate to the Crown. So the treaty made by the marriage C betwixt King Charles the eight, and Anne Duchesse of Britany, and others following, were disannulled in regard of the said Duchie.

The Duchie of Britany incorporate to the Crown.

As these things passed in England, William of Bellay, Lord of Langey, promised the Germane Princes in the Kings name, That for the affection he bare to the preservation of the priuiledges, rights, and customes of the Empire: if the Emperour (with whom he desired to obserue inuolubly the alliances and treaties he had with him) would in that case employ his forces to their oppression, he would succour them with all his power: so as neither his men nor money should bee imployed to the offence of any of his confederates, namely, of the Emperour; but onely to defend the rights and priuiledges of the Empire. A great designe is alwaies shadowed with goodly shewes. Hereupon the Em-D perour came to Bologne, to conferre againe with the Pope. The Kings of France and England, well informed of the Emperours bad disposition, and especially the English, of the Popes to him, by reason of his pretended diuorce: they sent the Cardinals of Tournon and Grandmont, the Popes seruants, that vnder colour to accompany him at this enteruiue, they might employ their authorities, that nothing might be done to the preiudice of their Maiesties: or at the least, they should giue intelligence of their conclusions. And the said Cardinals had commission to lay open vnto the Pope, the griefes and complaints of the two Kings, and to summon him to make reparation: if not, they would take order for it. So as his Holinesse might well perceiue, that they two together were not to be contented: & to wish him to consider wisely, of the support and profit he E might draw from these two Kings; and what disgrace otherwise in discontenting them, especially the King of England, whose cause the King did no lesse affect then his owne.
For (said the two Princes) if wee come to demand a generall Councell, and his Holi-nesse doth not grant it, or delays it, wee shall take his delay for a denial; and calling it without him, we will easily iustifie the fact with other Princes, who producing the like, or greater complaints, would in the end forbid their Subiects to send or cary any money to Rome.

The Kings of France and England complaine of the Pope.

If his Holinesse (for so did our Francis protest) will proceed by censures against mee and my Realme; and that I be forced to goe to Rome for an absolution, I will passe the Alpes so well accompanied, as his Holinesse shall bee glad to grant it mee. The F scandals of Rome haue already withdrawne most part of Germany and the Cantons from the obedience of the Romane Church. It is to bee feared that if these two mightie Kings seuer themselves for want of Iustice, they shall finde many adherents; and these two together with their open and secret allies, may make such an attempt, as it will be hard to resist. That if his holinesse be disposed to moderate things (especially towards the King of England) there is hope, that at the first enteruiue, all may bee ordered by mildnesse, before they should proceede to greater bitterness, by a generall summons from both the Kings.

Thus

1533

Thus the King spake vnto those Cardinalls whom he sent to Rome. But we haue else where obserued, that men of the Church doe commonly preferre the Popes respect, before the seruice of such as employ them. These men see the Ecele by the tayle, and in stead of following their instructions from point to point, beginning with rigour, and ending with mildnesse, they take a contrary course. They feared (said they in their iustificacion) that his Holinesse holding the Wolfe by the eares, pressed on the one side, sometimes with promises, sometimes with threats by the Emperour: and on the other side, in a manner despairing euer to finde grace or fauour with the King, should in the end cast himselfe into the Emperours armes, and run the same fortune with him. To draw him therefore to the French partie, they offer the Pope in the Kings name, to make him Iudge and Arbitrator of such controuersies and quarrells, as hee had with the Genouois, the which his Maiesty pretended were not contained in his renunciation. And the better to draw him, they renewed (without any speciall Commission) the proposition first made by Pope Leo, and after reuiued by Clement, of the marriage of Henry Duke of Orleans, with Katherine daughter to the Duke of Vrbin. This did greatly please Clement, who then began to hold vp his head, and resolved to strike whilst the iron was hot. This match was wonderfull honourable and beneficiall for his Holinesse, and helped much for the ratifying and support of his house, the which he had in singular regard.

The Cardinalls meanes to win
the Pope.

The Emperour did presently discouer, that vpon the coming of these Cardinalls, the Popes affection to him was greatly altered. And vpon the first discouery of this treaty of marriage, he imploies the Lords of Cannes and Granuelle, to breake it, in fauour of Francis Sforza, with the said Duchesse of Vrbin, and to perswade the Pope, that this practice was artificially brought in by the King, to entertaine him onely, but not with any intent to conclude it, considering the great disparitie of their degrees and qualities: and seeing these two Cardinalls (said he) had no sufficient authority touching this alliance, it was an euident prooue of the fraud. But by means of this marriage, the King thought to strengthen his house, and to get new footing in Italy; and the Pope did thereby free himselfe from the feare of a Councell, wherewith he was threatened from France, Germany, and England. While the Cardinalls attend a Commission from his Maiesty to conclude this marriage, the Emperour continued his pursuit, for the assurance and declaration of his league, comprehending the estate of Genoua. And the better to write it, he required his confederates to make a tax among them, for the pay of such souldiers as should be fit to entertaine in Italy for the peace and quiet thereof: that the first payment should be presently consigned into the hands of a Banker of Genoua, and that the Emperour should not be tied to any contribution, in regard of his great charge to resist the Turkes inuasion, and to preuent the attempts of such as would trouble the common quiet of Italy, whereof there was now great likelihood. By the force of his perswasions, the matter was in a manner concluded. But through the liuely reasons of the French Cardinalls, and the Lord of Velly, Ambassador for the King, shewing, That the Emperour had no other designe, but to entertaine his army vpon the frontiers of Italy at other mens charges, being ready to assaile the King vpon all occasions without any charge to himselfe: and that without doubt the King (having reason to looke to his affaires) would encounter him with another army on the frontiers of Italy, in the Marquisate of Salusse, or in Dauphiné, which would breed no quiet, but troubles and combustions throughout all Italy (for two Armies being neare, they willingly fall to blows) they concluded, not to make any configuration, but that euerly one of the confederates should tax himselfe for his portion (any war chancing in Italy) and should giue a caution for his part, the which did amount to an hundred or six-score thousand crownes a moneth. So the Emperour sent three thousand men out of his army into Spaine, as many likewise to Naples, and the rest he dismissed.

Then came authority from the King to the Cardinalls and his Ambassadour, with an expresse clause for the confirmation of the Marriage. And the Emperour seeing himselfe frustrate of his intent (to make the Pope declare himselfe openly against the King) he embarked the 8 of Aprill at Genoua, and sayled towards Spaine: the Pope went towards Rome, whither the aboue-named Cardinalls did accompanie him, alwaies insisting by the Kings impotunity, that the troubles of England might be pacified, before the fall of that great storme which threatened the Church.

But the King of England wearied with the Popes dissembling and delays (whom he then

A then called but Bishop of Rome) vpon the matter of his diuorce, he caused it to be decided by the English Church. The Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of England, being President where, by sentence of the said Church, his marriage was declared void, and the dispensation void, as given in a case that was not dispensable, & which is not in the Popes power, nor in the Churches: according to this sentence, he left his first marriage, and took to wife Anne Bullen, and in her name did publish an ample treaty, against the authority and preeminences of the Church of Rome, resolute to sequester himselfe wholly, if the Court of Rome did him not iustice. These newes being published, the Emperour grows in chollier, threatens to raise all the world against England: takes his Aunts cause in hand, summons the Pope to administer the like iustice to her that was put away, as her cause required: if he doth it not, he protests with an oath to be reuenged. The Colledge of Cardinalls stormes, they enuiron the Pope, and all with one voyce demand iustice against the attempts of the King of England, and the Archbishops, having taken knowledge of a cause, the deciding whereof belonged to Iudges deputed by his Holinesse: his Holinesse desired to temporize, and to make a more quiet end. He did foresee, that proceeding to condemnation, and hauing no means to execute it really, were a fruitlesse enterprise, and would make his Apostolike Authoritie contemptible, hauing no means to put it in execution without the Emperours assistance: besides, they had a great lett, which was the strict alliance of the most Christian King with the English, who ioyning their mutual forces, offensive and defensive, might engage all Christendome in more mortall waies then euer. Notwithstanding in the end (as well to gratifie the Emperour, as his Cardinalls) hee pronounced his censures against the King of England, if within a certaine time he made not reparation of the said attempts. Then he prepared for his interuiew with the King, notwithstanding all the crosses which the Imperials gaue him, transforming themselves into as many shapes as Proteus, to draw him from this resolution: all which are to be read in the Originalls.

Nice had been appointed for this effect: the Duke of Sauoy had freely offered it at the Popes request; holding himselfe happie (said he) that so holy a worke should be treated of in his country. And in truth it was his best course. The Pope did affect this place, that he might by this meanes reconcile the Duke vnto the King, who for many respects (as we shall note hereafter) was discontented with him. But the Emperour forgetting nothing which he thought might serue to breake off this interuiew, gaue him such goodly reasons, as afterwards he let men vnderstand, that this assembly was nothing pleasing vnto him. Marseilles supplied the defect of Nice. Patience being moued (saith the Prouerbe) turns into fury. If the King to this time had many motives of discontent, now is hee prick to the quicke, which will soone draw him to reuenge. The vnusd death of the Seigneur of Mervilles, who was a Gentleman of Milan, bred up in Court, since King Lewis the 12, one of the Quirries, and now Ambassadour for the King with Sforza Duke of Milan, yet secretly, having besides his instructions and letters of credit, a private letter directed to the Duke, in recommendation of some business for the said Mervilles: to the end, that if the Emperour should grow ialous of the Duke, he might by means of the said letters, iustifie his being there, not in quality of an Ambassadour, but onely for his owne private affaires. It chanced the first of Iuly, that Mervilles, accompanying the Duke through the Citie, a Gentleman Milanois of the house of Castillon (having either by chance or by purpose pickt a quarrell) demanded of one of Mervilles servants, to whom hee belonged? He answered, I serue the Lord of Mervilles of France, who is here. Now trieplesd Castillon Mervilles of the gallows: which was a very ignominious word. Another following his Lord, takes hold of this speech, and inbitt and reproacheth the Milanois: as hauing spoken ill against such a personage; the Milanois denies it: the lyc is giuen on the forehead, and the French-man offers to maintaine it with his Sword. Castillon happily discerning a man of better quality then himselfe, retires, two of his seruants draw their swords, but they are parted. Afterwards Castillon gathers together ten or twelve Rusticks, with Haggebuzes and Pertuisans: hee passeth and repasseth often before Mervilles lodging: one evening he meets six or six of his seruants, offers them to his house, they retire: Mervilles complains to the Captain of the Justice, and intreats him to take order, being loth to seeke reuenge of their wrongs, or that they should continue to wrong them.

The worthy execution of Mornu.

The Capitaine makes no account thereof. Castillon continues his course, and sets againe vpon Mornu servants: but the first feare had made them wile, they defend themselves, kill him, and put his followers to flight. The next day being the fourth of July, the Capitaine goes in the morning, to take an Inuentorie of Mornu goods, puts him into prison, and all his servants he could finde: gives the strapado to one about foure score yeares old, being deafe for very age, to wrest some confession from him against his master: he suffers not any of his friends to speake with him, or to see him: teares in pices, disdain to reade the iustificacions (which according to the custome of Milan some of his friends had presented him in writing: ) and the Sunday following, after midnight, first informed of the Dukes pleasure, he cuts off his head in prison, and cauleth his body to be caft vpon the Merchants meeting place. A horrible and insolent proceeding against so notable a person, being publike, sacred, and inuioable! If it shall be lawfull so to violate the law of nations, what safety shall Ambassadors find with them to whom they are sent:

The King demands satisfaction of this wrong of the Duke: he writes to the Emperour and to all Princes and Potentates of Christendome; as hauing all a priuate interest in this publike iniurie. The Duke excuseth himselfe by Francis Tauerne his Chancellor, Nephew to the said Mornu, who alledgeth, that the Duke his master did neuer acknowledge Mornu to haue the place, nor to hold the ranke of an Ambassadour: but as a priuate man, his vassall and subiect, he had suffered iustice to be done, for the murder committed on the person of one of the ordinarie Gentlemen of his house. That Mornu was a man of a vicious conuersation, seditious, scandalous, a concealer of murderers and conspirators against the life of the Duke his Master, who for these causes had often let him vnderstand that his stay at Milan was not pleasing vnto him.

An unkinde Nephew (he was sonne to *Mornu*es Sister) and a bad Advocate in a bad cause. Had not Sforza belayed himselfe in a letter of his owne, dated the seventh of December 1533, whereof the King had the Originall, where he did giue him to vnderstand, that his coming from the most Christian King, (to whom he was, and desired to be a most humble seruant) was very pleasing vnto him, and that for many respects, hee should alwayes haue bene welcome to Milan? And could Tauerne be ignorant of *Mornu*es qualitie, seeing that he himselfe had procured this charge for his Vncle, being at Fontainebleau, and propounded this meanes of priuate recommendation to the Duke, to seruise a shadow against the Emperours ieaiousness? Moreouer, he knew his Vncle had letters of credit to the Duke, and his instructions signed with the Kings hand. But the hastie proceeding from Friday to Sunday following, the execution done by night and without the peoples priuitie (who perchance would tumultuously haue opposed, fearing to incur the reuenge, which without doubt the King would take) doe they not plainly discover, that the fact was not excusable, nor to be iustified?

The Emperour made answer to the Ambassadour de Velly that *Mornu*es had well deserved death, not being acknowledged for an Ambassadour, but for a priuate Gentleman, subiect to the Duke, and following his owne priuate affaires, being nothing moued, when de Velly presented him the Dukes letters vnto the King for his allowance: whereby it appeared what place *Mornu*es held with the Duke. Thus seeing himselfe more assured of Sforza, he sent into Flanders for his Niece, the yongest daughter of Christiane King of Denmark, according to the promise which had been made him at Placentia. About the same time the Pope made his entrie at Marsilles in great pompe, set vpon a yong Ass: he was carried in a high chaire vpon two mens shoulders, followed by his Cardinalls, and the Duchesse of Vrbain apart, accompanied with a great number of Ladies and Gentlemen. There was nothing ready for a Councell, which the Princes of Germanie did solicit with great vehemency: neither was there any intent of reformation: But expecting the opportunitie of this generall Conuocation, a Bull was sent forth to stay the course of religion, which passing from Germanie into Swisserland, and from thence into France, did greatly increase the marriage betwixt the Duke of Orleans, and Katherine de Medicis Duchesse of Vrbin, was so commended by Chenetz her Vncle: who in the end of their care, at the Kings request, created foure Cardinalls: the Cardinall of Ventour, Bishop of Lieux, and chiefe Almoner to the King; and one of those three Houses, Chamber, and Giury. This done, the Pope imbarked for Rome the twentieth of November,

A vember, and the King tooke his way to Auignon. Here the King resolved in his priue Councell vpon a petition made vnto him by Christopher, sonne to the Duke of Wirtemberg, both in his owne name, and his fathers, spoiled of their estates seuenteen yeares since, by the Emperour Charles, and Ferdinand his brother: as also by Lewis and William Dukes of Bauria his Vncles. The mother of Christopher, was daughter of a sister to Maximilian, Grandfather to the said Emperour, and King of Romanes, and the consummation of the marriage of Eleanor their sister with his Maiestie, gaue the father and the sonne hope, that the King in fauour of this alliance, interposing his autoritie for them that were spoiled, should either procure restitution of Ferdinand for these Dukes, or refusing Iustice, to purchase him the hatred of all Germanie, which in the end might by open force dispossesse him of the Duchie of Wirtemberg, and of the name of King of Romanes. The King did greatly desire to see these Dukes restored to their estates, and to that end would willingly haue opened his purse, to weaken the Emperours and his brothers forces, and by the same meanes, to confirme the amities which he had purchased in Germanie, and to procure new, requiting the Emperour, who fought by all meanes to take from the King his ancient alliances. But hee sought to colour the protection of these afflicted Princes in such sort, as no man might iustly challenge him to haue broken the treatie of Cambray. He therefore sent the Lord of Langey, with commission to doe for these Dukes whatsoeuer were in his power, nor directly contradicting the conventions: and to conclude, the confiscation of an hundred thousand Crownes, into the hands of the Dukes of Bauria, with a sufficient bond to his Maiestie: releruing notwithstanding this clause, That his money should not be employed to the invasion of any one, but only for the defence of the ancient customes and priuiledges of the Empire. The publike and priuate perswasions of Langey, were of such efficacie, as that ancient and great league of Suenue (which had continued threescore and ten yeares, to the benefit of the house of Austria) was disannulled. But for that the re-intigation of these Dukes, could not bee made but by armes, they covered it with this expedient: That the Duke of Wirtemberg should sell the Countie of Montbelliard (whereof he was Lord) vnto the King, for sixscore thousand Crownes, vpon condition that he might redeeme it: which money he might employ to his use, either in peace or warre, without any breach on the Kings part, to the Articles of Cambray. So the Langraue of Hessen, chiefe of this present league, and the dukes of Bauria and Wirtemberg, with their allies, went suddenly to field with an armie, before the Emperour or his brother could crosse their attempts, restoring them that were spoiled, to the possession of their Duchy: and soone after they repayed the Kings money, within thirty or fortie thousand crownes, for the which the dukes of Bauria were answerable: and the Countie of Montbelliard was restored vnto them. Let vs now see what Catastrophe the Popes rash censure, giuen against Henry King of England shall cause. Henry was wonderfully incensed against the Apostolick See, by reason of the iniustice (hee said) was done him; in that they had refused to send him Commissioners to take knowledge of his cause, and of the contempt done to his authority, in that they would disdainfully force him to abandon his Realme, and appeare personally at Rome. Notwithstanding, by the perswasions of Jehan de Belley Bishop of Paris, (whom the King had sent vnto him, presently after his interview with the Pope) he granted, that in case the Pope would surcease from the said sentence, untill he had sent Iudges to be heard, that he would likewise surcease from his intention, to withdraw himselfe wholly from the obedience of Rome. The Bishop offers himselfe to go to Rome to that end. Henry treats him, and assures him, that hauing obtained his demand, he will giue him authoritie presently, to confirme what hee had yielded vnto. The matter was not yet desperate, but the Consistorie of Rome gaue so short a time to haue an answer from the King of England, as the Pope came short two dayes at his returne. The terme expired, they proceeded hastily, to the confirmation of the curses and censures, notwithstanding the Bishops instance, to obtaine six dayes delay: seeing the King of England had waivered six yeares before he fell. Two dayes were scarce past, after the prescribed time, but the Pope agreed, with authoritie & declarations from England, the which did greatly appease those halty Cardinals, who afterwards could find no meanes to amend that which they had married. The matter (saith the originall) was finished, as that which could not be finished in three Consistories, was done in one. This indigence, done to the King of England, and the small respect they had to his Maiestie, caused both him and his Realme to shake off the yoaके of the Romane obedience, declaring himselfe immediately vnder God, supreme head of the Church of England.

In the meane time, the King not able to get by lustice, a reparation of the vnworthy death of his Ambassador at Milan, he studied to haue his reuenge by armes. To this end, following the example of the Romanes, he erected in euery Prouince of his Realme, a Legion of six thousand foot, vnder the command of six Gentlemen, who for euery thousand should haue two Lieutenants, and vnder euery ensigne five hundred men, who in time of peace, should once a yeare make a generall muster, and the capitaines should know their names and surnames, with the dwellings of euery one, to haue them ready at all commands. Then he sent William Earle of Furstemburg, into Germany, to make a leaue of twenty ensignes of Lansquenets, and demanded passage of the Duke of Sauoy, through his country, to be reuenged of the wrong done him by the Duke of Milan. The Sauoica refused it, which caused our Francis to demand the portion of Louise of Sauoy his mother, sister to the said Duke, children to Philip Duke of Sauoy. Philip had to his first wife a daughter of Bourbon, by whom he had Philibert duke of Sauoy, and Louise the Kings mother. Then he had to his second wife, a daughter of Pontbierre, by whom he had Charles, who is now in question, and the Earle of Geneva, afterwards duke of Nemours. Philibert was dead without children, and therefore the King challenged a good portion in the succession of Sauoy, his mother comming of the first marriage, and sole heire to the said Philibert. But the Kings deputies not able to draw any reason from Charles, vncle to his Ma. iestie, he must seeke that by force, which he could not get by a friendly and gentle compulsion.

The Kings first stratagem, was to bring a part of Renée de Ceres company into Geneva, to succour them against Charles, who besieged it. The second was to stirre vpon the Bernois, allies and neighbours to Geneva, who taking the towne into their protection, went to field with ten or twelue thousand men, made the Duke retire, spoiled him of a good part of the lands that were vnder his obedience, chased away the Bishop of Lansana, and ioyning it to their iurisdiction, they remaine still in possession thereof. The Emperor returned then from his victory of Tunis against Barbarossa, and seeming desirous to make a more stricte league with the King, hee offered him a pension of a hundred thousand crowns a yeare, out of the Duchie of Milan, for any one of his children, whom he should name: he treated the mariages of the Daulphin with the Infante of Portugall, daughter to Queene Elonor; and of the duke of Angoulême, with such a one as the King should will like of (it seemed that he meant the Infante of Spaine) to the end that by these new bonds of coniunction, cying their friendships more firmly, they might ioynly participate (said he) in the honour and profit of the mighty conquests, they should make vpon Greece.

All this was but cunning. The Emperor was tired, & his forces were wasted by the toiles of warre, and the great heat they had endured. And the King being ready with a fresh and mighty army, threatened the Duchies of Sauoy & Milan: he must therefore busie him with some bait, and at the least stay the exploits of his forces. The death of Francis Sforza, presents a new occasion. By this death the Emperor pretends to be freed of that bond, & that he might dispose of this Duchy at his pleasure. The capitaines promise to hold their places of the Emperor. The Emperor giues hope, not onely to dispose of the said Duchy to the Kings liking, but also to conclude of a generall warre against the Turke, in the which he offered to impart with the King, the good or euill that should grow thereby, & of the faith and reunion of the Church, namely for the reducing of Germany and England, to the generall belief of Christians, and of a generall peace in Christendome. In the meane time he prepared for warre, hee caused Cont Nassau to make a great leaue in Germany, and called backe Ferdinand Gonzaga into Italy, with his Spaniards which remained in Sicillia.

Thus all the negotiations and practices of these two great Princes, gave their new signes of open warre: there waited nothing but a full occasion for either of them to blame his companion, and to lay vpon him the causes of the first inuasion. The Emperor required moreover, that for the quiet of Italy, the King should denie him the action of Geneva. That excluding the Duke of Orleans, from the estate and Duchy of Milan, (the which the King demanded for his second sonne) according to the treaty made with the Pope at Marcellis, the duke of Angoulême, for that he was farthest from the crowne, should be inuected.

That

A That the King should send him the Duke of Orleans, to assist him at the conquest of Alger which hee pretended. The King desired greatly to maintaine true friendship with him, and to vnitie it by as strong alliances as the Emperour offered, that the greatest of the one might not breed any ialousie in the other. As for the action of Genoua, hee was content to surrende that controuersie, vntill it might be decided by good and lawfull means, to renounce for eyer his pretensions to Naples, and to cause the Duke of Orleans to yeeld vp his quarrell to Florence and Vrbin, with such securitie as the Emperour should require: so as his second sonne might be inuected in Milan. Hee promised the Pope (which was Alexander Farnese, vnder the name of Paul the third, successor of Clement the seuenth) summoning all Princes to that end, to imploy his forces, to make Germanie and England obey the sentence and decree of the Church, and to imploy himselfe in fauour of the said Emperour, to the States and Princes of the Empire, that they should ioynly receiue his brother Ferdinand, for the true and lawfull King of Romanes. Hee offered to succour the Emperour in his holy warre with a certaine number of gallies, and men entertained, promising to accompanie him the yeere following, in the voyage of Constantinople, with all his forces.

But to exclude the Duke of Orleans from the inheritance of his Ancestors, which his eldest brother did willingly yeeld vnto him, in fauour of his marriage, to inshall his youngest sonne, was it not to sow dissention, and cause warre, betwixt them whom he desired to breed vp in peace and brotherly loue? And to what end did the Emperour demand the Duke of Orleans, but rather to hold him in manner of an hostage, then to make any shew of loue or trust? On the other side, to giue hope, that hee would compound with the King touching Milan, and to vrge this clause vehemently, that all should be managed without the Popes priuie, who no doubt would seeke all means to crosse it (said the Emperour) if hee should vnderstand they had treated without imparting it vnto him, and notwithstanding to giue intelligence to the Court of Rome, by Andrew Doria, and to assure him, that although he gaue care to the Kings Ministers, yet would he not conclude any thing without the aduice and consent of his Holinesse: was not this a corrupt proceeding, seeking to breed a ialousie and distrust betwixt the Pope and his Maiestie?

D The King (wearied with these long dissimulations and delayes, without effect) sent the Lord of Beauuais vnto Venice, to make a new league with the Senate, and the King of England sent the Bishop of Winchester to the same effect. The Emperour had some intelligence thereof, and to crosse the Kings designs, hee lent Du Prat, a Gentleman of his house, to make a new leaue of Lansquenets, and Andrew Doria to Genoua, to prepare his armie by sea, but vnder colour of his enterprize of Alger. Who would not then iudge, but in stead of a confirmation of peace and loue, all things tended to open warre? Nothing could detame these inuincible warriors, but that the Emperour, after so great a disposition of his forces, could not so suddenly repaire his armie, and the King making a scruple to be the first assaillant, would not incur the blame, to haue broken the treatie of Cambray. But without breach thereof, many motiues of discontent, had long incensed him against the Duke of Sauoy. The Jewels which the Duke had engaged, to borrow money for the Duke of Bourbon, and to fauour his rebellion against the King, the Letters of congratulation he had written for his taking at Pavia, his pursuit to withdraw the Suisses from the alliance of France, the purchase of the county of Ast, his refusal to lend Nice for the enteruiew of Pope Clement and his Maiestie, and to giue him passage against Sforza, the detention of his Mothers inheritance, which the King could not by any gentle means draw his vncle to restore.

F This must be tryed by the sword. The King therefore sent Francis of Bourbon, Earle of Saint Paul, who before the Duke could appoyne his forces, conquered all Sauoy, except Montmelian, where Francis of Châtamont a Neapolitane commanded, who waiting victuals, and without hope of succours, in the end yeelded vp the place, to depart with baggage, and afterwards condemned by the Duke, hee followed the victors fortune, and in the end did good seruice to the Crowne. Then the Emperour granted (by the Lord of Cannes and Grasse) the Duchy of Milan to the Duke of Orleans. But when the securitie and conditions of his inshaltment came to be demanded, they made answer to the Ambassador of Felty, that it was sufficient for that time to haue granted the principall, the rest should be treated of with Philip Chabot Earle of Busançois, Admirall of France, who should presently arise (they supposed hee should first make a voyage without any forces) and that they must keepe this conclusion secret from the knowledge of his Holinesse, all this discovered plainly, that it was a trick of their ordinarie craft and dissembling, to lull the King asleepe in the beginning of his course.

hand.

At the same instant, the King hath newes, sufficient to giue him a certaine impression of the Emperours designs, that the Pope had beene duely aduertised by the Emperours ministers, of all these practices, which he would haue secretly managed: that the Venetians, at the vrgent request of the Emperour, were entered into a defensiu league for the Duchy of Milan, in fauour of any one he should inuest: that he offered great matters to the King of England, to draw him to his deuotion: that Du Prat passing by Milan, had deliuered speeches quite contrarie to the hopes and promises which the Emperour had giuen: and that in Flanders he had made great preparation for warre. That the Emperour tooke vpon him the protection of the Duke of Sauoy. And for the sixth point, the preparations made by Andrew Doria. It was therefore resolved, to proceed in Sauoy and farther, without breaking off (on his part) this negotiation with the Emperour.

To this end, the King sent (for his Lieutenant generally) the Earle of Busançois Admirall of France, with 300 Launces: whereof the severall Captaines were James Galias, Master of the horse, and master of the Ordnance of France: Robert Steward Marshall of France, Rene of Montican, Francis, Marquis of Salusses, Claude of Annebault, Anthony C Lord of Montpelier, John Estouteville Lord of Villebon, Prouost of Paris, Gabriel d'Allegre, Charles Tiercelin Lord of Roche du Maine, and John Paul de Cere. A thousand light-horse, vnder the command of the Lords of Esife, Terme Aulfin and Verets of Sauoy, Twelve thousand of his Legionary men, that is, 2000 Picards, commanded by Nichol of Brabant Lord of Cany, and Anthony of Mailly Lord of Auchy. Two thousand Normans, vnder the Caprains La Sale, and Saint Aubin the Hermit. Two thousand Champinois, lead by John d'Anglure, Lord of Join, and by the Lord of Quinoy. A thousand of Languedoc, vnder their Knight d'Ambrès. Four thousand out of Dauphiné, vnder the Lord of Bresteu, and others. And a thousand vnder the Lord of Forges, the Kings ordinarie Cup-bearer, of all which bands Rene of Montican was Colonel: six thousand Lanquenets, led by William Earle of Furstenberg: two thousand French, nor Legionaries led by their Caprains Lartigue, Dieu, Blanche, Anguer and Warris a Navarrois. Two thousand Italians, vnder the command of Marc Anthony of Cusan, a Gentleman Milanois, and a thousand vnder Captaine Christopher Guais, eight hundred Pioners, six hundred and fourescore horse for Artillery, and the charge thereof appointed to be vnder the government of Claude of Concis Lord of Bury.

Beginning of the warres
in Piedmont

Count Philip Torneil, & John Iagues of Medicis Marquis of Marignan, marched before, to stop the passage of Suze, but Annebault aduancing with the troopes of Dauphiné, prevented them with speed, chased them before him, from lodging to lodging, and at the first summons, puts into the Kings hands the townes of Turin and Chiua. Don Laurence T mannel, John Iagues de Medicis, and Tah Baptista Castaldo, camped vpon the River of Doaire. The French and Lanquenets, impatient to attend the making of a bridge, wade through the water euen vnto the breasts, repulse the Imperials, and make them retire towards Vercell. A gallant Legionary (to whom the Historie ought his name) swimming through the River, brought away a boat in despite of the enemies shot, for the building of a bridge. The Admirall, to encourage the rest, according to the Kings command, caused a gold-ring to be giuen him, in view of the whole armie.

The Emperour was vpon termes of his departure from Naples, to make his entry into Rome, when as these happy beginnings made him to rene the treaties of an accord: but with such flow proceeding, as a man might easily iudge, that his onely intent was, to lull the King in his course, labouring to entertaine him with doubts, hopes, and delays. In the meane time, he sollicites the Pope, to declare himselfe on his partie, he assured the Duke of Sauoy, to cause all he had lost to be soone restored to him againe, hee hastened the recovery of his Lanquenets, causeth his horsemen to aduance, drawes Artillery and Munition out of Imperiall townes, makes them to march towards Italy, protests againe to the Pope, that hee would neuer yeeld Milan to the King, nor suffer him to possesse one foot of land in Italy: he sollicites the Court of Rome, the Senate of Venice, and all other Potentates

A tates of Italy, to oppose against the inuesting of any stranger in the Duchy of Milan. These were vehement presumptions, to shew, that the Emperour meant not to cease, but armed, which caused the King to command his Admirall to proceed in his first course, (hee had temporized by his Maiesties commandement, attending the issue of this new parle) and to march against Vercell: and if hee encountered his enemies with equality, to fight with them. There were three thousand men to defend Vercell; and foure miles above, Anthony de Leua camped with about six hundred horse, and twelue thousand foot, not as Lieutenant to the Emperour, but as Captaine General for the league of Italy, cutting off the passage to Caguin, and Hanniball Ganfagua, Guy Earle of B Rangon, and some other pensioners to the King, who had brought for his seruice, five hundred light-horse, choise-men, bred vp in the former warres, and six thousand foot. The Admirall therefore, to be assured of Anthony de Leua, demands free passage for the fore-said pensioners. I will (answered Leua) giue them assurance, so as they come for the league of Italy. A sufficient answer to begin the warre, whereof the King would by no means be the first author.

During this time, the Emperour made his entrie into Rome. An entry, which by the ruine (amongst other buildings) of that ancient temple of peace, gaue the most curious, occasion to iudge that his entry was not with an intent to confirme a peace, as hee gaue hope by his speeches; but contrariwise, to deface all memorie thereof. His actions did afterwards confirme many in this opinion; for after Charles his first parle with the Pope, the Bishop of Maston and Velly, Ambassadors for France, the one to the Pope, the other to the Emperour, learned from the Popes owne mouth (who said hee would remaine a Neuter, as a common father to maintaine Iustice, and yet oppose against the obstinacie of him that would not yeeld to reason) that the Emperour would neuer condescend, to giue Milan to the Duke of Orleans. This was the chiefe point, and either partie growing obstinate vpon the effect of this clause, what accord could be expected? This holy father was little affected to the house of Medicis, and therefore would hardly haue beene pleased, to see a daughter of that house Duchesse of Milan. To conclude, the Emperour did submit his insalutal to the Popes liking: and the Pope did promise verbally, to yeeld vnto it, if the Emperour would consent, yet did hee freely shew, that the Emperour entertained this practice of purpose to abuse the King, whilst that he should fortifie himselfe with alliances, men, and money, and yet (as it were) giuing scope to both parties: I thinke (said the Pope) so the French Ambassadors, replying that this condition sayling, the King their Master would neuer come to any conclusion, that things cannot passe, without a breach, for that the Emperour neither will, nor can giue Milan, without the consent of some, who in my opinion will neuer yeeld.

Rome.

These were the Venetians, whom the Emperour did coldly intreat to like of this clause, but in effect to contradict it: and all in general, would haue no D. of Milan, who might at any time, write this goodly estate to the Crowne of France: for (said they) the duke of Angouleme being inuested in the Duchy of Milan, although he depends on the King his father: yet marrying one of the Emperours Nieces, (he offered him the widow of Sforza) his wife would be of the Emperours faction, and so matters should remaine in suspense, whereas the Duke of Orleans, besides many other obstacles, must bee onely at the King his fathers deuotion: and as husband to the Niece of Pope Leo, and of Clement, would not cease to pretend an interest in the estates of Florence and Vrbis, and consequently, by new pretended quarrels, trouble the quiet of Italy.

In the end, the Emperour in a speech made to the Pope, in the presence of all the Cardinals, and many Ambassadors, as well to shew (said he) his good meaning, and how much he desired the peace of Christendome, as to be cleared hereafter, before God and men, he offered againe three conditions to the King. The first to giue the Duchy of Milan to one of his children, so as thereby he might confirme a good and durable peace, maintaining notwithstanding that it could not be, so long as the King continued obstinate in fauour of the Duke of Orleans. The second was, to fight with the King, hand to hand, with like armes, and hostages, in an Island vpon a bridge or boate, or in any other place of safety, to avoid greater effusion of blood, being reasonable that they, by whom such great combusions did grow, should decide their quarrels in person.

But

bragge.

But vpon condition, that the victor should give his forces to the holy father, to maintain the celebration of a Councell, to reduce them that were rebelled and sequestred from the Church, and to the suppression of Infidels; and the vanquished should assist the King with all his power. Requiring moreover, that this combate being accepted, the King should pawning the Duchie of Bourgogne, and the Emperour that of Milan, both to be adjudged to the victor. The third was, a protestation neuer to take armes, but forced, foreseeing that the warre would be so cruell, as the victory would be of small profit to the victor, and should but open a passage to the common enemy of our faith. And to conclude, he added, that what he had propounded touching a Peace, proceeded not from any feare, hauing neuer fought peace in losse, but could well giue it to them that were vanquished. But contrariwise, three good and iust reasons gaue him an assured hope of victory. That he was not the beginner of this warre. That the King had begunne it in a season of great advantage for the Emperour. That he found his Subiects, Captaines, and Souldiers so well disposed, as if the Kings were like vnto them, hee would craue mercy with his hands and feet bound. The second article of the three, and the last, being but bragges, were by the Ambassadors (as shall bee noted hereafter) concealed from the King. The Pope requested them, that without prejudice to the King, they should suppress what might inconstie his Maiestie, adding thereunto the explication, which the Emperour himselfe did afterwards make of his words, at the request of the French Ambassadors (desirous to know if the Emperour had any meaning thereby, to charge the King to haue done any thing prejudiciall to his honour, or if his intention were to challenge him) he publicly declared: that what he had spoken, was but by way of aduice and proposition, as being more fit, and of lesse incommence, then to expose the liues of so many thousands, fighting for their quarrels, to the mercy of Armes, to decide it betwixt them two, with the perill of their owne bloods: not meaning in any sort to tax the King, whom hee knew to be a great Prince both in courage and person, much lesse to defie him, and in the presence of his holinesse, without whose permission hee would not attempt such an action: So as the King answering onely to those Articles whereof hee was aduertised, failed in this.

protestation.

The Emperour hauing thus published his protestation,ooke his leaue of the Pope, who displayed in shew of the neere breach of Peace, resolved to bee a Neuer, not assisting either party with counsell or fauour concerning the warre. In the meane time the Admirall (hauing expresse commandement from the King, and afterwards re-iterated by John Cardinal of Lorraine (sent by his Maiestie to the Emperour) not to attempt any thing whereby the Imperials might frame any iust complaint) had retired his armie towards Saint Germaine, with an intent to assure himselfe of the towne of Yurce, and of all the valley towards the Suisses, to receive men for the Kings seruice, if they should come to open warre, and to succour Turin when need should require.

But hauing intelligence of the Emperours care to increase his force, and that Anthony de Lens was resolved to passe into Aulian, to cut off his victuals behinde, he sent Montpelat with two hundred men at Armes, foure thousand French foot, and eight hundred Italians, to seize vpon Fossan, Vignon, Saulian, Cony, Mont-deuis and other townes thereabouts: And to provide for the fortification of Turin, he sent Stephen Gahane with a hundred men at armes, and foure thousand foot. From words in the end, they fall to blowes. The Emperour hitherto fed vs with good words, as he discouers himselfe, and to make an open declaration of warre, he makes three armies to assaile at one instant, the Provinces of Picardie, Prouence and Champagne. To proesse him, the King dispatcheth foureteen, or fifteene thousand of his best men which he had in Piedmont, to fortifie those places which he held beyond the Alpes, and calls backe his Admirall, to the end hee might lay all the blame of this invasion vpon the Emperour. Considering moreover, that the Admirall (hauing placed his garisons) had bene to make in field, hee sent Commissions, with great summes of money to Charles of Bourbons, Duke of Vendome; Gouernour of Picardie; Grandfather to the most Christian and victorious King last deceased, and to Claude of Lorraine, Duke of Guise, Gouernour of Champagne; Brother-in-law to the said Duke, to leauy sixteene thousand aduenturers, to diuide them into frontier townes, and to provide for the victualing and fortifications thereof. At Marills hee placed Anthony of Rochefaucault, Lord of Barbezient. In Dauphine, John Lord of Humieres. In Gonne,

A canne, Henry of Albret King of Nauarre, for his Lieutenants and Gouernours in the said Prouinces. And himselfe (resolute to oppose against the enemy some fortified places vpon the frontier, to make him to consume time, men, munition, victuals and money in the siege and battery thereof) assembled the rest of his forces neere to his owne person. The Admirall retiring out of Piedmont, left Claude Lord of Annebault to command within Turin, as the Kings Lieutenant, with an hundred men at armes, and three hundred light-horse, led by the Lords of Auffin, Termes and Effe foure thousand five hundred foot, vnder the Ensignes of the Lords of Auchy, Cony, Sile, Quincy, Lartigue-Dieu, Blanche & Anguar, and two thousand Italians, vnder the charge of Marke Anthony of Cufan, of all which footmen, Charles of Coucis, Lord of Bury was head and Colonell generall, and the rest of the Army Francis Marquis of Salusses commanded.

This was to giue the purse to keepe to the veriest thiefe, but his trechery was yet couered with a great shew of hypocritie. He had long determined to reuolt. Feare and hope moued him thereto, feare, to lose his estate; hope, to be fauoured by the Emperour, in the cause he pretended to the Marquisate of Montferrat. Moreover, he was a man curious to know what was to come, and did superstitiously beleue Soothsayers, who had foretold him, that the Emperour should this yeare dispossesse the King of his Realme. The first act of his treason appeared in this, that the enemy being neere, and strong, he said hee had neither order nor means to fortifie any place in time, or to make it tenable, but that of Turin, and that to put in more men then those that were, were to lose them wilfully. The second was, when as the Lords of Montpelat, Roche du Maine, Villebon, the Knight of Ambres, Saint Aubin, the Earle of Pontremie, and other Captaines, were resolved to attend the enemy in some place of importance, before hee came to Turin, and had concluded to put themselves into Fossan, after they had receiued commandement to hold Fossan, or Cony onely for fifteene dayes, to keepe the Imperials occupied; he discouered this designe to Anthony de Lens, aduising him to come thither with speed, promising to deliuer into his hands both the towne and men that were in it: and in stead of sending to Fossan the meale, a Culuerin, three Cannons, powder and bullets, which he had drawne out of Cony, he conveyed thither but one Cannon, a Culuerin, five barrels of powder, and some bullets, but of another size, he put all the rest into his house at Raul, and retired the night following.

Treacheries of the Marquis of Salusses.

A horrible treason: he had bene brought vp with the King from his infancy, well maintained during the life of the Marquis Michael Anthony his brother, and honoured with the Order of Saint Michael. And which is more, his Marquisate hauing bene adjudged vnto the King for the treason and rebellion of John Lewis, the eldest of the House after the decease of Michael, the King had not onely inuested him, but also giuen him freely out of the conquest of Sauoy, to the number of sixteene townes, the flower of Piedmont, amounting to more in reuennage then the Marquisate, amongst the which, Saulian, Cony, Fossan, Caualimont, Mont-Deuis, and others, which he pretended to be ancient appurtenances of the said Marquisate.

According to the aduice of Francis of Salusses, Anthony de Lens, leauing at Turin (which he had beleaguered) ten thousand men, to continue the siege, came and camped before Fossan the twelfth day of Iune: makes his approaches, begins his trenches, many of the assailants lose their liues, few of the besieged. The third day, the Cannon plays, but slowly. The Marquis assured them, that, shewing themselves before one gate, the besieged would goe forth at another: they goe forth indeed, but not like men that fled. The Baron of Castelles, Lieutenant to Montpelat, led the host, with the foot. The Imperial Lanquens were lodged somewhat farre from blowes, and therefore their guards were but weak. Warri doth charge them, and at the first gives them a great cheeke; Castelles issues, and re-enforceth the alarme. Anthony de Lens sends a good number of Spaniards to cut off outmen in their retreat, and they whom hee had appointed to guard the trenches, seeing every one runne to the alarme, would likewise haue their share in it. Saint Pierre Corse appointed with Villebon to guard the Bastion newly begun, within the towne, perceiving the trenches vnfortified, issue forth with some Champagnols, and Normans, his suite and twenty or thirty men, and put the rest to flight. Anthony de Lens sends the rest of his men which remained, to second them, and himselfe being eld and full of the gout, is carried forth of his lodging to see himselfe, they follow him, but those which carried caried him, set him in the corne, where the height of the cares couered him from such as A sought him.

It is a rashnesse, yea in the greatest Capitaines, to contemne an enemy. Anthony de Leua building vpon the hope which the Marquis had giuen them, left the besieged a gate free, thinking they would retire to Cony. But this was a refreshing vnto them, for of fewen Wels which they had in the towne, five were dried vp in two daies. Anthony therefore perswaded, that the besieged attended some more honest excuse and colour for their retreat, he plants foure Cannons in battery, and makes a breach for twenty men in front. Folsa had no ditches, so as the Imperials might more easily assaile, then the French could defend the wals. But Anthony would referre his Spaniards for some better enterprise: they were old Souldiers, and the whole hope of his army. The Italians would not march vntil they were paid: and the Germanes (who held themselves of no lesse reputation then the Spaniards) would not hazard themselves alone. So the breach continued twelue dayes in this sort, giuing them leisure to repaire it, and to make a trench within, and a rampier well flanked.

The time the King had appointed, was now expired: they had no wine nor meale, but some corne, and no mils, and the Marquis had maliciously sent away the workmen they had to make any. Moreouer, the King commanded them not to hold it so long, as very necessity should force them to accept a dishonorable composition. But it was a point of honor for the one to demand, and for the other to giue a composition. In the end, the griefe which Anthony de Leua conceiued, to spend the time before a paltry hens-tooth, which might haue bene better employed, and the great desire, those within the towne had to doe the King good seruice in affaires of better importance, made them to enter into capitulation: whereby at the end of the month they departed with their armes and Ensignes dispaied, leauing nothing in the towne but the artillery, munition, and their great horses, which were about fixtenc handfulls and foure fingers high, except twelue, at the choice of the Capitaines, and came to refresh and to horse themselves anew at Marcellis, honored by the King with three monthes pay, besides that which was due. But theemie had small profit by their horses, for they had filled them before with new corne, so as when they came to water them, most of them burst with drinking.

Let vs here obserue some other Spanish brags, but boldly encountered by a French liberty of speech. Eight dayes after the capitulation was signed, the Emperour came to visit Anthony de Leua's campe, accompanied with the Dukes of Sauoy, Alua, Bawaria and Brunsuicke, the Princes of Salerne and Bisignan, the Marquis of Guast, and many others: hee caused his army to be put in battell, and finds it goodly and pleasing to his mind: hee calls Roche du Maine, la Palisse (the onely sonne of the Marshall of Chabannes deceased) and Asier (the onely sonne of the master of the Kings horse) who remained for hostages of the composition: hee embraceth la Roche courteously, whom hee had heard reputed to be a gallant Gentleman, causeth him to couer his head, by reason of the heat of the Sunne: and sayes, That to doe him a pleasure, hee will shew him his army. My Lord (answered la Roche) to shew me your goodly army, as you esteeme it, were contrary to all content. I should be better pleased to see it poore, and ruined: vntil the King my master and you would agree together, and not bring two such goodly armies to fight, as yours, and that which the King will shortly oppose against you, to the prejudice of all Christendome. If you were both well advised, you would agree, and hold both the Turke and all others in subiection. But to thinke to ouerthrow one another, were a meere folly. And if the first army the King shall oppose against you, should chance to be vanquished (which God forbid) hee will within fixtenc dayes raise another, yea and as need, would shew you as many Gentlemen in foote, as you haue men here of all sorts. Whereupon the Emperour said, I am not ignorant of the Kings forces; so are mine well knowne vnto him. As for an accord, I will neuer stop mine eares against that motion, so as it might be made as it ought. This being spoken, hee commanded the Marquis of Guast to conduct them about the army, and to dine with the Princes of Germany: that after dinner hee would see them againe. After dinner the Emperour said, How thinke you of mine army? I finde it very faire (answered la Roche) it is to pay you employ it not in some other designe. The Emperour replied, Where thinke you I will employ it? la Roche answered, Into Prouence. The Emperour said, The Prouencals are my subiects: (he did commonly peruse the Mappe of Prouence, and had already deuoured this Prouince in imaginations; but hee shall finde the situation ation stronger then in his mappe, and men of firmer mettall then paper) la Roche answered: You shall find very rebellious and disobedient subiects. The Emperour replied, How many dayes iourney is it from hence to Paris. la Roche answered, If you meane battels, at the least a dozen, if the invader (meaning the Emperour) haue not his head broken at the first. The Emperour smiled, admiring his wit: and some one of the assistants (who knew Tercelion well) said, I told you before, my Liege, hee could speake well if hee list. Then the Emperour taking the word, gaue him assurance that he would giue eare to any proposition of peace, so as it might be worthily treated of.

And in truth hee doth reuiue it, but this was to haue speedier meanes to send newes to the Earle of Nassau, and to receiue intelligence from him, that both his army, and that which the Earle led vpon the marches of Picardy, might at one instant inuade the frontiers of the Realme. Moreouer, attending the yielding vp of Fossin, hee made at Saullian, Mont-Deuis, Cony and Tende, great provision of biscuit, and beasts of burthen to follow the Campe with this biscuit, and other victuals to supply the waste which hee did foresee. Some, and the greatest number, counselled him to pursue the recovery of the Country, which the King had wonne from the Duke of Sauoy, by means whereof he might plant a strong barre against the French forces, and first to fertile a sure peace beyond the Alpes, before hee came to make warre in France. Other men clawed him where it did itch, and by a more pleasing then wholsome counsell, perswaded him to take his way to Prouence.

The Earledome pleased him greatly, gaping wonderfully after it, for the commodity of his passage vpon the Mediterranean sea, hoping that as Italy should take breath and new courage after the ruines and desolations wherewith it hath bene continually shaken these thirty yeares, the spoiles and ruine which hee should draw after him, chasing, destroying, amazing and making desolate the people of France, Paris in the end, and the Crowne of France should be the prize and recompence of his victories. But he reckoned without his holts, Marcellis in stead of making his entry into the Realme, shall shamefully make him retire into Castile.

Many inticements drew him into France. We haue had (said hee) almost for these twenty yeares a continual victory against the enemy. The Duchy of Milan which we now possess, is a certain testimony of our triumphs: we haue reason to retaine the same resolution in this warre, and the same hope which Conquerors ought to haue: and leaue vnto the French, terror, and despaire, which commonly doth accompany the vanquished. We are superiors in number, men of better constitution, more practised in the art of Warre, and leauing some part of our forces on this side the mountaines, we haue sufficient remaining to encounter the enemies power. But that which will giue vs the victory, we march against one that hath broken his faith (the iudicious Reader may consider which of these two Princes had most right, whether the Emperour, taking vpon him the protection of the D. of Sauoy, or the King, seeking his right by force of armes, which hee could not obtaine by reason from his Vncle.) Doubt not but we haue God for vs, he is a iust Iudge, and a rigorous reuenger of the breach of faith. Moreouer, let vs not feare that the French King can fortifie himselfe on this side the Alpes: hee will prepare all his forces against this army, but I haue another ready to inuade Picardy: and besides, the Emperour prepares one in my Kingdomes of Spaine, which shall come by Languedoc to ioyne with me. I leaue another to assaile Champaigne and Bourgonie in the hottest of these warres, the which shall performe as much for my seruice as the rest. Having so great preparatiues, and in so many places, and the King so surpris'd as hee cannot in time assemble sufficient forces to encounter so many armies, it is impossible but on some one side, wee should make a passage by force, euen into the heart of his Realme. We haue good intelligences, and manage great practices. This spake the Emperour. But, Doest thou know the decrees of Heauen? (saith the Eternal, reprehending man) And wilt thou dispose of the government thereof vpon earth? What were these great practices and secret intelligences, which the Emperour wanted to haue in France? A politike Commander doth commonly vse this kind of speech, to giue courage to his men, and breed ielousie and distrust in his enemy against his subiects. Hee had some secret practices vpon the towne of Langres (but the inhabitants were too faithful to their King, and since in these latter dayes haue giuen sufficient testimony of their obedience to the Crowne) some held that the Marquis of Salusses had partakers of his treachery,

The death of Francis the Dauphin
poisoned.

chery, and William Duke of Bavaria said openly, that many in France, holding the same A party, would discover themselves at need.

But whatsoever it were, that which gave a more lively impression : Francis Dauphin of Viennois, the Kings eldest sonne, whom his Maiefty (going from Lions to see his army, which he meant to oppose against the Emperor) had left sick at Tournon, dies the fourth day of his sicknesse, being about twenty years old, bred up by his father in singular expectation of all the world, to prove in time a great and most excellent Prince. And Sebastian Earle of Monte-cucullo, found guilty of poyson, and for that cause was drawne in pieces with four horses within Lions, had by his confession declared, that the Emperor had once enquired, if he knew the order and manner of the Kings eating and drinking. An attempt so wicked, as it is scarce credible, that so wretched and damnable a treason should enter into the heart of so generous a Prince. Notwithstanding, when Don Ferdinand of Gonzagua presented the laid Sebastian to the Emperor, saying, that he was ready to execute that which he had promised vnto him, and to Anthony de Lena : if the designe extended vpon any places of the French obedience, why did hee informe himselfe of the Kings eating and drinking ? Besides, during these practices, why did Don Lopes of Sora, Ambassador for the Emperour at Venice, enquire who should reigne in France, and against whom the Emperour should pursue these warres, in case the King and his children should die : if hee had not beene acquainted with some fatal practice against the sayd Princes.

Thus the Emperor, resolute to passe against the opinion of the clearest sighted (as hee afterwards confessed vnto the King with his owne mouth : who hauing till then seemed to follow counsell, did now rashly follow his owne head) and now by diuers and many expeditions, of diuision of places, offices, Captainships, governments, gifts of townes and castles, decouring (by presumption) the goods of the Kings subiects and seruants, he leste ten thousand men to continue the siege of Turin, and for the affaires of Piedmont he diuided his army into three troops, for the greater commoditie of the passage, and appointed their rendezvous at Nice, and thereabouts. In the first, were the men at armes, with the Lanquenets of the Lord of Thamiis, conducting the artillery and the baggage, who tooke their way by the riuer of Genoua. In the second, Don Ferdinand of Gonzagua, D General of the light-horse, and with them some Neapolitane men at armes, the Lords of Iellstheim, Dietric, Spech, Wolfe, Dietric of Kuttringhem, Colonels of the Reistres : then the Marquis of Guast, with the Spaniards and Emperours household : and at their tayle Anthony de Lena, with the Lanquenets of Marc Ebenstheim : after whom marched the Emperor in the midst of a troop of Spaniards, followed by the Lanquenets of Gasser of Fronsberg, taking the direct way from Fossan to Nice. In the third, were the Italians, which tooke their way by Cony.

The Kings order
against the Emperour.

On the other side, the King made his necessary provisions at Lions, and providing for all parts where the enemy might enter, he sent Claude of Saouy Earle, of Tende, and the Lord of Bonneuil, his Lieutenants generall in that army, to ioyne with William Earle of E Furstemberg Colonell of his Lanquenets, and other Capitaines placed towards Cisteron, vpon the passages of Roque-paruier, Terreneue, and other approaches, to spoile the corne, either standing, or in the barnes : to draw all that might be into strong places : to beat downe all ouens and mills which might any way helpe the enemy, to burne the horsemen, to heat out the heads of their wine-vessels, if they did not speedily retire them, and to cast corne into their wells, to corrupt the waters. All the people, both great and small, were so wonderfully affected to the publike good, as euery man forgot the griefe of his priuate losse.

The Lords of Mus, Caldes, Carles, and many others, pricke them forward by their example, themselves setting fire on their corne, barnes, and mills, and causing good fellows to drinke their wine. And for that the King had not yett all his forces vntured, to present himselfe with honor and reason in person before the Imperials, his Maiefty appointed the Lord of Montmorency, at that time Lord Steward and Marshall of France, his Lieutenant Generall as well on this side as beyond the Alpes, to seize vpon Auignon. But for that the King would consult with him more at large of these great affaires, he sent Robert Steward Lord of Aubigny Marshall of France, to that end, with eight thousand Swisses, who kept the enemy from the sayd towne.

Mont-

Air abandoned

A Montmorency hauing in Auignon imparted to the Marshall D' Aubigny and other commanders, the means which seemed most conuenient for the managing of this warre, he came to Aix, viewed the situation of the place, and finding it hard to fortifie, by reason of certain little hills neere at hand, which looking into the towne, might serue as a Cauallier or Mount for the enemy to plant his Ordnance on, hee caused all that might be, to be transported, razed the portals, and such defence as it had, and abandoned it, leauing it empty and vnprofitable for the enemy.

The Emperor was now in the plaine of Cannes, and the next day Don Fernand Gonzagua, who led the fore-ward, should aduance with eightene hundred horse and six thousand Lanquenets (whereof the master of the campe marched sometimes three or foure leagues before the whole army) Montian, a hardy and aduenturous Knight, seeking opportunity in the beginning of this warre to doe the King some notable seruice, resolved to see if he could surpriseth this master of the Camp. Boisy no lesse couetous of glory, would be his companion in this enterprife, they part with about eight score horse, and three hundred foot, and encounter Don Ferdinand with his horse-men, who came to take lodging for the fore-ward in the towne of Luc, on this side the riuer of Argence, and gaue him an alarme : but vnable to fight with so great a troop, they found the retreat, and all tired come about the shutting of the euening to Brignoles.

Don Ferdinand, aduertised by them that went and came, of the small number of our men, takes a troop of choicest men, marcheth speedily after them, and causeth all the rest of his forces to follow : he passeth on the one side of Brignoles, and layes a great ambush where our men should passe the next day, and doth compasseth them in betwixt his troop and the ambush : at the breake of day hee chargeth into the village, and seekes to force some barricados which the Capitaines had made to stay them, whilst they arme and goe to horse-backe, they kill some at the first, and lose about forty. Montian and Boisy take the field, they place Capitaine Warris with his footmen on the wings of their horse-men, marching close couered with their shot to get to Aix; maintaining still the shocke of the enemy, they kill and hurt many in the narrow wayes, whereas the enemy could not stretch forth his troops. But thrust into the open champaign, assisted by their whole force, charged by the ambush vpon one of their flanks, the Lanquenets approaching, this present supply giues courage to the enemy, and the perill without hope of succour, makes the French to faint : they all giue way, all are ouerthrowne, and of all this troop but three men at armes escaped, but were slaine or taken. Montian, Boisy, the other Capitaines, and many Gentlemen which had followed them (desirous to make proofe of their persons) are taken prisoners. There were slaine of the enemies (besides the wounded) six score men, and two hundred horse : but the number prevailed about valour.

The defeat and taking of Montian and Boisy.

The Emperor hearing of this victory, did not forget to make a triumph, publishing it throughout all the world, as if he had defeated all the Kings fore-ward. Without doubt this lightness allowed by Montmorency, at the importunate request of the vnderaker, purchased to the enemy, those which were doubtfull and vncertaine, what party they should take, confirmed his adherents, and stucke fast into them that were contrary. This first encounter might giue courage to the Imperials to seeke the Constable in Auignon, yet he sees no reason to hazard a battell in open field, before he had sufficient forces to encounter so great a power. To put himselfe into Auignon, were to hazard himselfe in a Towne not defensible, and hardly to bee fortified so speedily as necessity required.

Marfeilles was the onely frontier towne, sufficiently furnished with all things necessary to endure an Imperiall siege : but to leave all the rest of the way open to the enemy, had bene to giue him means to fortifie on either side of the Riuer of Roine at his pleasure, and to draw vpon him (without resistance) a flourishing and glorious army. It was therefore better to let the Emperour know, that for an vnfortunate encounter they had neither lost courage nor hope : with this designe Montmorency lodgeth his men in field, and chooseth the place for his campe, betwixt the Riuer of Roine and Durance, the one did furnish his army with victuals and other commodities : the other serued a Rampier and barre against the enemies approach. And to cut off all means and liberty to runne to forage, to learne newes of the French Campe, and to found the passage of the Riuer at his pleasure, without contradiction, he placed garisons in all townes and places, to bee held on on the other side of the water. The King on the other side was at Valence, where like the Master of a ship commanding from the helme to the prow, he sent daily new forces to the Constable, fortified the towne, and assembled such a power, as if any mischance had ruined this first army, the Emperor had had the King presently ready to giue him a second battell.

Lets vs now change our climate, and make an escape into Picardy. Henry Earle of Nassau, and Adrian of Croy, Earle of Reux, Lord Steward of the Emperours house, being entered into Picardy, did at the same instant, spoile all places in their passage which were of weak resistance, but besides the taking of Bray vpon Somme, they did no great exploits, for being repulled from before Saint Riquier, they lost some of their Artillery, and a great number of their men for a sleight enterprise. Charles Duke of Vendosme, with three hundred men at armes, and six thousand foot, hauing forced them to re-passe the water, reuenged the wrong they had done vpon the frontier, hee tooke and spoiled some small townes, castles and villages vpon the marches. But seeing the enemy fortified with two thousand men, to which he hoped to surpris at Marolles, an open towne, hee re-passe the water, not to hazard his forces rashly, attending the coming of Claude D. of Guise his brother in law. Amongst other places vpon the frontier not defensible, he had appointed to abandon Guise.

The Earle of Nassau in Picardy.

The Earle aduertised by his spies, of the haste they made to cary away their moueables and victuals, to drine away their cattell, and that the garison of the castle, carefull to free the towne, and to beat downe the defences which might any way accomodate the enemy, did negligently guard the approaches, hee marcheth thither with speed, surpriseth them in disorder, and kills some before they could recouer any place of safety, hee summons the Castle: some preferring life before honor, cast themselves ouer the wals into the ditch: the rest amazed, yeeld the place at the enemies discretion. A basenesse vnworthy of Nobility, so as those which were found to bee Gentlemen, were degraded, and both they and their posterity declared Peasants, and subiect to taxes.

Guise being sackt, and all the Country about burnt, the Earle carying away a booty of men, cattell and goods, marched against Saint Quintin. But being aduertised of the good order the Duke had set for the guard and defence of the towne, he turned suddenly, and tooke the way of Peronne. It is strong by nature and situation, but at that time not well fortified, nor sufficiently manned to withstand so great a power. He therefore passeth the river of Somme about Aplincourt, abandoned as not defensible, and spoiling, burning, and making the whole Country desolate, hee comes before Peronne about the middell of August. The Lord of Serai, Colonel of the Legion of Picardy, puts himselfe into it with a thousand men, and the Marshall of La Marke with a hundred men at armes. Misfortune is good for something. The darkness of the smoake which the fire of the forges and villages burnt by the enemy, had caused, couered the passage of our men, in view of the Imperials. In the meane time the Dukes of Vendosme and Guise, leauing new bands in Picardy and Champagne, to ioyne with the Lanquenets which Nicholas of Rustich did bring. Lets vs leaue Count Nassau assailing, and the defendants valiantly encountering his attempts, vntill that the Emperor after his first disgrace received before Marcellis, shall bee blemished with a second at Peronne, in the persons of the Earles of Nassau and Reux, and let vs see what hapned in Piedmont after the yeelding of Fossan.

Warre in Piedmont.

The troops which Guy Earle of Rangon, Caesar Fregese his brother in law, Cagnin Gonzaga, and other Italian Captaines, Pensioners to the King, had leaued, were broken, by reason of the last hope and practice of peace, cunningly giuen out by the Emperor. Now they renew them by a new Commission from the King, so to crosse the Imperials in Italy, as he might thereby diuert the great forces they had in France. Rangon Lieutenant for the King in this army, leaued two thousand men, Cagnin as many, Caesar Fregese the like number, and two hundred light-horse: the Lords of Paluolin a Vicount of Milan, Peter Stroff a Florentine, Balisazar called the Cheuallier d'Azala a Ferrarois, either of them a thousand men. Beringer of Caldore, a Neapolitane, Earle of Monte de Rife, and John of Turin, a Florentine, euery one five hundred; Auerol of Bressan foure hundred; Bandin of Tuscan, foure hundred, and two hundred light-horse, and the Lord of Tais (a Frenchman borne, but sent into Italy, to recieue the Earle of Miranda into his Maisties service) two hundred light-horse. An armie of great hope, whose exploits wee shall soone see.

A Annebault and Bary, being straitly besieged in Turin, performed the parts of good and vigilant Capitaines, and well practised in matters of war, preventing both the enemy and the citizens newly reduced to the Kings obedience, from daring to attempt any thing against them; and by their daily sallies, bringing prisoners, and store of cattell, returned victors within the circuit of their wals. Maramas had gathered together within Curia all the vorne and virtuous hee could get thereabouts, Annebault aduertised thereof by his espials, sent Esle with seventy horse, and Anchy and Cay leading either of them five hundred foot: who passing towards the evening, came to the wals side before they were discouraged, they plant their ladders, surpris the town, put all to the sword that made resistance, load their beards of burthen with victuals and booty, and retire to Turin without any encounter. This happy victory brought vnto the besieged the conquests of Rinolles, Veilane and Saint Ambrois. The garison thus reueued, aspires to greater enterprises. The Emperor had left in Saullian fixtene pieces of artillery, with all their prouision of bullets, powder, and other necessaries, and a good supply of armes. The garison which hee had placed there, foraging without their feare in the villages about, gaue them hope to defeat them; and to surpris the towne. Marc Anthony of Cusan, Capitaine of two thousand Italians, commanded the execution of this stratagem, with his troops: they giue him for Companion Chambray Lieutenant of Annebaults company, with three score choice horse. But they lose an ox, to take an egge: vpon the way they are aduertised by their scouts, that certaine free-booters of the enemies, laden with a great spoile, were presently retired into a castle adioyning.

A braue and happy exploit.

Enterprise vpon Saullian.

They turne head, and take the castle by assault, and sack it, it may bee more greedily then wisely. For whilst they are busie at the spoile, the alarme is giuen in the country, and some troops enter speedily into Saullian, draw the bridges, rampier vp the gates, and man the wals and the defences. The towne being furnished, the suburbs remaine in spoile, they beat in pieces two great Cannons, they cary away all the armes, and make booty of all they find good. In the meane time James of Scalenghe approached with about foure thousand men, as well of his owne troops, as of peasants gathered together. Our men making a vertue of necessity, troop together, and goe closely to field, charge the enemy running hastily to surpris them, being dispersed in the streets, and buile at the spoile: they make them turne their backs, kill about three hundred, hurt many more: and of nine Ensignes winne seuen, the horsemen flying pulled away the other two from them that caried them, seeking to save them. In the end, Iohn Iagues of Medicis, Marquis of Marignan, came to succour them with two thousand Lanquenets, being called by Scalenghe, our men hauing their bodies tyred with trauell, and their armes with striking, resolute to retire, and send to Annebault for succours. Alegre, an aduenturous and wise Capitaine, brings them two hundred horse, who arising when as our men were in danger to be defeated, entering amongst the enemies, killing and chasing, gaue their companies (halfe tired) leisure to take breath: and through the fauour of twelve hundred foot, which followed Alegres troope, retire with their booty and baggage safely into Turin. A shot which Cusan receiued in the head, caused him to remaine at Pignerol, where soone after he died: leauing a happy memory of his valour, and a great griefe to his friends for the losse of his person.

The Imperials defeated.

The Emperor approached now to Aix, hauing receiued some losse by the way, not so great as troublefome, in regard of the quality of the persons. The peasants and mountaineers, lying in ambush in the straights and narrow passages along the Alpes, and issuing forth suddenly, sometimes vpon the scouts, sometimes vpon the reere-ward, stayed them euery two hundred paces, to defend themselves: hauing no meanes to offend this swarme of men, who being charged, vanished by crooked and unknowne wayes. Fiftie men of the Country, resolute for all euents, had shut themselves in a fort, called our Ladies Tower, with an intent to shoot at the Emperor in the passage, and all of them at one instant to discharge their harguebuzes. But they take Mariha for Mary: they kill a Nobleman with a rich coat of armes, and followed by a troop of men which did him great honour. The Emperour brings the Cannon, batters the Tower, and forceth them to yeeld at his pleasure: and to purge the offence they had made, sends them all to be hanged.

Moreover, being aduertised that a great number of peasants, women, children, and cattell, cartell, were hidden in a piece of ground enuironed with wood on the side of a mountain. A he caused the wood to be fired in many places, so as all were miserably burnt or flaine. A stratagem which did so incense the people against the Emperor, as neuer any one of his men fell into their hands, but he made trial of a most tragick and cruell death. These first fruits might induce the Emperor to draw a consequence from the lesse to the greater, in comparison of these people vnacquainted with armes, with those whom nature and exercise had instructed, and to make him know, that it was no small enterprife to assaile a King of France at his doore. But this troubled his mind: He thought in the beginning of this war to haue so disgraced the King with the Germans and Swissers, as he should draw no men from them. Notwithstanding, aduertised that besides the eight thousand Swissers leauied by Lewis of Anguerland, Lord of Boiffigault, Stephen d'Aigne Lord of Beaumais, and William Lord of Velay, Gentlemen of the Kings house, had made a leauy of the like number, all which had in a manner ioyned with the Marshall of Montmorancy, who had now about thirty thousand men in his campe: he is now much grieved in his heart, what hauing in the former warres wonne so many happy victories, vnder the command of his Captaines, how marching in person with so strong and mighty an army, after that hee had proclaimed his triumphs throughour the world, hee should performe no honourable exploit of warre. Therefore the fiftenth of August hee makes choice of three thousand Spaniards, foure thousand Italians, and fise thousand Lanquenets, and takes in his company the Duke of Alua a Spaniard, Alphonse d'Auolos, the Marquis of Guast, and Dn Fernand Gonsague Italians, and the Count Horne a Germane, followed with all the flower of his horsemen, and aduanceth neere to Marseilles: hee goes himselfe in person to view the towne, being covered with the ruines of a house lately beaten downe, and puts forth the Marquis to make a conuenient place for the planting of his Artillery against the weakest part of the towne. This resolution had bene good, when as the Kings forces were not yet vnited, and his subiects terrified by the sudden and vnexpected enuy off so mighty an enemy. The Centinell vpon the rampiers discovered the Marquis: they send forth men to compass him in behind, if there were no more then those which appeared with him. He retires towards the place from whence hee parted, and by his retreat they discover a greater number of men, behind that ruined house. They set vpon them that issued forth, and some Cannon shot scatter the stones, kill some and hurt others.

This first amazement carried the Emperor to his Campe, after that he had appointed the Duke of Alua and the Count Horne, to stay about Marseilles: and the Marquis of Guast with twelve hundred horse, and six Ensignes of foot to goe and view Arles: that if they found it not able to be taken by assault, he would come thither with all his forces. In the meane time, lest the first that sallied forth should fall into some ambush, they send other fresh men in fregats and boats armed, who going along the shore, get about the place where they had seene the glistering of their armes: who landing take a compasses among the myrtles and other bushes which grow in that Country. The Duke discovers them, and to busie them, sends certaine horses to draw the whole troop which followed vpon them. Our men had the like designe, and when as the enemies whole strength appears, they seeme amazed, retire without order, and draw them that pursued towards an open plaine, commanded by the Cannon, then turning their backs they saue them: selues among the bushes. The Cannon playes, and passing through the Imperials, makes heads, legges, and armes, to flye into the ayre so pitifully mangled, as the cries of them that died, the terror of them that fled, and the amazement of them that were found, turnes them all into a hasty flight, and the souldiers hidden in the bushes, make a furious fall vpon them that fled: the Duke gathereth againe his men farre from the shore into a valley covered with Rocks and Hills, and hauing viewed them, he found his number greatly diminished, amongst others, those of the Count Horne, and of another Germane Captaine his neere kinsman. The Marquis of Guast had already discovered, that they had taken downe a little hill which did ouer-look the towne of Arles, vpon the which a few pieces of artillery being planted, would haue held the towne in great subiection. Arles is seated vpon Rofne, at the point where it parts in two, and runnes with two mouthes into the sea: making an Iland, which they call Camarola. Iohn Carraciola a Neapolitane, Prince of Melphe commanded there, as the Kings Lieutenant with a thousand foot Gasccons, of the troops of Iohn de Foix, Batle of Carmaine: a thousand Champanois vnder Marseilles surprised by the Emperor in imagination.

A the command of Iohn de Foix Lord of Lour, two thousand others vnder the Ensignes of the Lords of Mailerof, Dauphiné, la Garde, a Bourbonnois, du Palais of the County of Foix, and the Baron of Rixou of Languedoc, to the very one hundred; and Bidenak about an hundred and thirty men at armes. As the Marquis lying in ambush behind certaine wind-mills, viewed the weakest parts of the towne, being discovered, Arles of Ancienaille Lord of Willers, Commisary of the artillery, plants two pieces of artillery directly against these mills, so as if the Marquis, seeing them give fire, had not slipped aside, he had there ended his dayes. So the Marquis (frustrate of his hope) either to surprize or to force the towne of Arles) took his way to Marseilles.

B Marseilles was besieged by the D. of Alua, more in shew then with any hope to force it, and onely with an expectation to draw the besieged to some rash fall, or to haue the Kings army to come and succour them, and then to fight with them with an aduantage. With this designe, the Emperor lay so neere, as at the first dislodging of the French campe he might easily preuent them, and ioine with his forces. But those within the towne had good and wise Commanders, who suffered not their men to flie forth, but to good purpose, and alwayes to the enemies losse. As for removing of the campe, the morning would not hazard the estate, nor the forces of the King his master. he hopes by the exit of his enemies armie to preserve his owne: and according to the aduertisements hee had of the Imperials designs, he restrained or gave liberty for the execution of his Countels and commandements. The surpris of Brignoles had made him more wary: yet not so daunt the courage of his men, he continually studied of reuenge, vexing the Imperials with daily alarms, incounters, and charges, and all without any losse or preiudice.

The King being aduertised of the approaches which the Emperor had made to Marseilles, Henry the new Dauphin and Duke of Britany desirous to make proofe of his person in so iust and honourable a warre, and against so worthy an enemy, obtains (by his instant sue, and the intercession of such as might preuaile much with his Maiesty) leave to goe to the Campe. Not so command presently (said the King) but to learne to command hereafter, and vnder the Lord Steward (as another Elanor vnder a Henrie) to passe his apprenticeship in the art of warre. His coming made the youth to cry for battell; whensoever they went to consult, whether it were more expedient to approach neere their enemy, or to prolong the warre by temporizing and delays: and many which till now had followed the last opinion, were caried away to the contrary. Many considerations moued them, the Kings forces able to encounter the Emperors, the presence of a young Prince, burning with desire to try himselfe in the warre, the dishonor (as they said) in suffering the towne of Marseilles to be besieged, the meanes they had to defeat their enemies, before the Emperor could bring all his forces to succour them, who for want of victuals were constrained to lye dispersed.

But the Lord Steward, and the wisest heads, found it fatter more safe to win the victory without striking stroke, cutting off the enemies victuals as they had done before. Marseilles was well fortified, furnished with all necessary munition, manned with valiant Captaines, and men of resolution. Contrariwise, famine and pestilence, which did much afflict and daily increase in the Emperors Campe, would soone ruine his forces. It was now neere at hand: The Peasants had lately cryed away, flaine and hurt all the beasts which carried the basket that was made at Toulon, and continuing to molest them by these affronts, they brought the Imperiall army into wonderfull wants and necessity. Moreover, the daily checkes which the French men at armes gaue vnto the enemy, made the Emperor thinke of his retreat. It was therefore a wise constancy and resolution of the Lord Steward, not to subiect the importance of this war to the discretion of a doubtfull hazard. There is no lesse honour to vanquish an enemy by counsell and gouernment, then by battell; and F to hazard himselfe to the chance of armes without necessity; it is an abusing of the blood and liues of men.

Hereupon newes comes to the King, that his army beyond the Alpes had brought most part of Piedmont vnder his obedience; and all the Marquisate of Salusses, except some castles. His Maiesty (vying his rights) might haue annexed this Marquisate vnto Dauphiné, whereon it depends as confiscate, by the rebellion and treachery of the Marquis Francis. But let vs heare an act of his natural clemency and bounty. Iohn Lewis, brother to the said Francis, was prisoner at Paris for the like rebellion. The King set him at liberty, he did

inuest him in the Marquise, receiues his oath of fealty to him, and against all other men: A he caused money to be given him, to furnish him and his train, and then sends him to take possession. Francis within few weekes after came to Carniagnole: John Lewis receiues him into the Castle, and suffer himselfe to bee so carried away with sweet words, as he sweares by nothing; but by the confidence he had in his brother. Francis: Francis was farre more malicious and cunning: John Lewis, against the aduise of Saint Julian (a Gentleman Gascon bred up in the house of Salustis, whom the King had sent with John Lewis to observe the actions, and the going and coming of his new Marquis: being a simple and dull man) he suffers himselfe to be drawne out of Carniagnole, and to be led to the Castle of Valfemiere, where Francis detained him prisoner, and then seeks to recover the places of the Marquise. Saint Julian foreseeing the issue of this subtil stratagem, practised Salvador d'Acuerres by his persuasions, and receiued of him in the Kings name the strong Castle of Vrezeul, a beame in Francis his eye, which kept him frō being absolute Marquis. Andrew Doria coming then from Spaine, brought victuals and money to the Emperour, vpon whose arrival he made a Proclamation throughout the campe: That all men bearing armes, should be ready to muster (without doubt the great decay of his armie; the which from fifty thousand men that he had parting from Nice, he found decreased to fiftie and twenty at the most, did touch him to the quick) to receiue money, and prepare to depart vpon the day assigned, euery man to be furnished with eight or ten dayes victuals. This proclamation made the King suspect, that hee meant to come and assault his Campe, or to march after the D. of Alua to the siege of Marseilles. And seeing the Emperour was there in person, the King did hope to haue means in the midst of these great armies, to effect the contents of the challenge he had before sent to the Emperour by an Herald, as we haue heard. But his Maiestie was not sooner come from Valence to his campe neere Anignon, as he was giving order to prepare to receiue or giue battell, newes comes vnto him, that the Emperour with all his Campe, is dislodged from Aix, leaving behinde him (besides the dead bodies which were infinite, the ayre being corrupted round about) a great multitude of sicke men, which could not follow the armie, neither on horsebacke nor on foot: and taking the rout of Spaine, hee left the towne of Aix spoiled with all the desolations which warre could bring forth, except fire, from which the Emperour did refuse it. Onely the Palace, and especially the Chamber of accompts, were abandoned to the fire, at the instance of the Duke of Sauoy, who would assist in person at the burning thereof, hoping (it may be) to abolish the memorie of the scildes, whereby it appeares, that Piedmont belongs to the Earledome of Prouence. But the Lord Steward had foreseeen this inconuenience, sending them to a strong place of his named Baux. The King gaue money to repaire the losses. Amongst his chiefe champions, the Emperour lost Anthony de Leua, Mark Buxheim, another Captaine of Lanquequiers his kinsman, the Count Horne, Baptista Castaldi, and many other men of accompt. But vs apply here that holy Oracle, speaking of Senacherib King of the Assyrians: Thy bragging hath come vnto mine cares; I will put my ring into thy nostrils, and my bit into thy mouth, and will make thee returne the way thou camst. And, Thus said the Eternal touching the King of the Assyrians: hee shall not enter into his Citie, neither shall hee shoot an arrow therein, hee shall not possess himselfe before it with a shield, nor cast, &c. Behold the Earle of Prouence in imagination, who had lately threatened the Prouinces of this Realme with fire and sword, and swallowed vpon the Crowne thereof by presumption, assurance and confounded in his retreat, hauing lost halfe of his troopes, turmoiled by the peasants, who turning the armes of his field men, and of those that were dead, seize vpon the passages and streights, beat downe the bridges vpon the riuers, which were then very violent, charge them in front, in flanke, and behinde, and the light-horse-men led by the Earle of Tende, Romuald, Langey, and John Paul de Cere follow them so close, as they had no meanes to forrage, leaving the waies from Aix to Freius, couered with dead carcases, and men languishing, harnesse, lances, pikes, harguebuzes, and all other armes pell-trel on a biheap.

The King refused to march after them; and wherefoerer hee should ouertake them to giue them battaille, and so passe into Italy; where at that instant he had a mighty enemy in field. But he is diuerted from his designe by Letters from the Marshall of La-marke. Hee had no more meanes to hold Peronne long, the wals were beaten downe in many places, famine pressed the besieged, they wanted harguebuzers and powder. So the King could

A some part of his men at armes to march speedily, and ten thousand French foot, recourse to follow after by great marches, to raise the siege, or to recover the towne before the enemy should fortifie; and furnish with victuals. God would preferre him from this toyle, and giue him leisure to take breath. The Imperials being alwayes repulled, with losse from many and sundry assaults, the myne wherein they had long laboured, prouing fruitlesse, (besides the death of Philip of Boulinuilliers, Earle of Dammartin, ouerwhelmed in the ruines thereof, in a countermyne he made to blow vpon the enemies myne, whose death was reuenged with the slaughter of three hundred Lanquequiers, and twenty of their men at armes, at the last assault giuen by the Tower that was vndermined) and the towne being relieved with five hundred foot, euery one carying tenne pounds of powder, entering by meanes of a generall alarme giuen by the Duke of Guise with two hundred horse, and all the Trumpets he could recouer, they dislodged in the night, about the middest of September, continuing their burning as they had begun.

France (by the grace of God) is now free from enemies. But nothing is perfectly happy. There are croffe newes which trouble the Court. The English Ambassadors that were neere the King, ill affected to his Maiestie and without doubt, no faithful seruants to their master, giue him intelligence, That the Emperour seeing that he could neither by spoile, or any other meanes, prouoke the King to battell, made shew of a retreat, to draw him to pursue him, and so to fight, or else retire to take a greater leape, and to invade Prouence. Suddenly, when as the French forces should be farthest off: That the Emperour himselfe (the better to colour his departure) gaue out that famine and mortality had diminished his forces of one third part, and the rest had runne the like danger, if he had not retired: yet notwithstanding he had no such want of victuals as was supposed, and since his coming out of Italy, had not lost about two thousand men: That since the taking of Montecian and Boisy, no man durst giue any alarme to the Emperours campe, nor yet follow it at their dislodging. These impostures & false impressions had wrought such effects with the King of England, as Phemary being sent from the King to three ends: To satisfie him of the truth touching the enterprise of Prouence: To procure his liking of the mariage of Magdalena a daughter of France, with the King of Scots: and to learne the King of Englands intention vpon the mission before made touching the mariage of the Duke of Orleans with Mary of England, daughter to the said King: he had much adoe to alter him in any thing from the opinion he had conceived. But the mariage of Scotland did so incense the King of England, as hauing laid open vnto Phemary his griefes and the causes of his discontent vpon this Article, he sent him backe without any conclusion, being loath to haue his neighbour so highly aliied. There comes another matter of great importance: the Country of Tarentaise in Sauoy had lately shaken off the French yoke. To reduce it to his obedience, the King sent the Earle of Saint Paul, Duke of Estouteville by his wife, with some French troops of horse and foot, and the Earle of Furstemberg with his companie of Lanquequiers, to whom, for the purging of their offence, the Country was abandoned to the spoile, with the Towne of Conflans. Being thus punished, they afterwards performed the dute of subjects, and the Duke returned into France with much honour. Le-venow discharge our promise, and conclude the yeare with the exploits of the Assembly made at Mirandole by the Italian Captaines, Pensioners to the King. Their first designe was vpon Geneva: and to that effect they came speedily and closely, hoping either to surpris it, or by the payment of a brake, to become masters of the towne: but the Duke of the troops of Count de Vintimille in the night, had discovered the enterprise to the Citizens. So the Earle turning his Campe halfe a league from Geneva, between two mountains, he suddenly caused many ladders to be made, which prouing too short, made the successe fruitlesse. These Capitaines had no Cannon to make any battell: moreouer, Turin being besieged required their presence.

They therefore turne head. The Imperials advertised of the Earles approach, abandon the siege, and leaue the field at the deuotion of this new army. The Lord of Annapolis seeing the Campe dislodged, sallies out after them, and in passing takes the tower vpon the bridge of Pau by composition (the taking whereof the Emperour had so highly commended) and the Lord of Bury took Gouillon the corne and wine that was found there, served to refresh Turin. The towne of Quers was taxed by the Imperials at five and twenty thousand crownes; but whilest the soldiers were busied to force the inhabitants to pay this summe, Annebaule sent certaine Capitaines, who surpris'd the towne from foure hundred souldiers, which kept it in the Emperors name. Montcalier sent presently to offer obedience: and the Cattle of Carignan yielding, did furnish Turin with about thre thousand sackes of meale, packt vpready to send to the Campe. Salusse, Quieraz, and many other places of the Marquise of Piedmont did homage vnto the victors. The King sent to refresh Annebaule and his troops both with horse and foot: he drew them out of Turin, sending two thousand French foot vnder the command of Capitaine René, and la Codiniere: and two thousand others vnder the Cheualier Biraque: and for Gouernor he sent Bury, to whom he gaue the company of men at armes, which Francis of Salusse being reuolted, did command. But behold an act as remarkable as it is rare, proceeding from a singular affection: and what will not a braue Knight doe for his mistresse? Vpon the first newes of the Emperors descent into Prouence, the King of Scotland did arme sixteen thousand men, to come and succour the King without his request or priuie, (sayes the Originall) and nothing stayed him from coming in time vpon the generall hope of a battell, but a contrary wind, which had put him backe twice. The King had assured himselfe of his new conquests, and hauing giuen order to the frontiers of his Realme, returned into France.

Unexpected succors from Scotland.

The King of Scotland came to meet him at la Chapelle, betwixt Tarare and S. Saphorin in Lionois: and there he demanded one of his daughters in marriage. The ancient alliance of the Realme of France & Scotland was considerable. The father of this King had bene slaine in battell against the English, for the party of King Lewis the twelfth, and should his kind affection be denied? So the marriage betwixt him and Magdalene of France was concluded in Blois, and solemnized the first day of the yeare followinge. Great prosperities are oftentimes accompanied with some crosses, else the vanity of our senses would easily transport vs: and we would attribute that to our owne valour, which belongs to the great Iudge and Moderator of battels: behold pitifull first spijrs, in the gouernment of the Lord of Bury at Turin. Oftentimes he is taken that thinks to take. The Emperour had adiudged Montferrat to the Marquis of Mantoua, against the Duke of Savoy, and Francis of Salusse who pretended it: and those of Castil would not accept of him. Bury during these garboilles, practiseth Damian Cariola Capitaine in the garison at Castil for the Emperour. Damian promisseth to deliuer him a gate. Bury leads thither Christopher Gough, with twelue hundred Italians, whereof he was Colonel, and some number of horse vnder the Lord of Tais: and at the first becomes master of the towne.

But the mattockes, shouels, and other instruments for Pyoners, which William Earle of Biendras should haue provided with the money, he had receiued to that end, to make a trench suddenly betwixt the towne and the Cattle, whilst that Count Guy should come to succour them, with the artillery to batter the Cattle, were yet to buy. Whilst they seeke for others to make trenches, the Marquis of Guast had leisure to assemble his forces with in a ft, and to enter into the castle by the field-gate, and so into the towne. Twelue hundred men were not able to withstand the fury of this unexpected storm. He maintains the shoocke, and enters fight: but in the end being forced by the enemy, hee is taken prisoner. Tau, Gust, and all the rest were slaine or taken. Biendras, Damian, and other Merchants save themselves. We find the fault when it is done. It is good to oblige it to make vs wile. Hee should haue imparted this enterprise to Count Guy, who should haue drawne his army neere vnto Ast. The Marquis failing to lose the one, and not to lose the other, had contained himselfe within his walles. Guy Gustrey Lord of Bouquiers was appointed Gouernor by the King in Burys place.

Pursuit against
in Italye.

The snowe, ice, and slipperiness of the winter stayed the course of the Gastons in Picardie. And whilst the season kept them from doing any memorable exploits, the King lay ing open in his Court of Parliament at Paris in the presence of the Peeres of France, and Princes of the blood, forty or fifty Bishops, many officers of the Crowne, and other great personages of all estates, the lawfull armes of a Lord against his vassall that hath committed a trespass: hee sent to summon the Emperour, vpon the frontiers by a Herald, to come and plead what he should thinke good, against the demands of his Maiesties Advocate and Proctor generall: concluding, that in regard of the rebellions and outracheries of the said Emperour against the King his naturall Prince and Soueraigne Lord by reason of the Earledomes of Flanders, Arthois, Charolois, and other places, hol.

A holding of the Crowne of France, they should be adiudged confiscate and vnto the Crowne. And no man appearing for the Emperour, the demand of the Kings Councell was registred according to the forme vsuall in those cases.

For the execution of this sentence, the Lords of Annebaule, Tais, Terries, Auflin, Frenchmen: Mare of Nouate, Francis Bernardin of Vimercat, Italians: George Capus, ment, and Thibault Alans, Albanois, either of them commanding two hundred light-horse: Bien Sanelhall, and Gouernour of Boullen, and Cregui Gouernour of Montfret, Captaines of fifty men at armes: hauing victualled Therouenne in view of the Earle of Rieux, who issued forth of Saint Omer with sixe hundred horse to prevent this stratagem, the King parting from Amiens, (whereas Charles Duke of Vendosme then dyed, much lamented of the King and Realme, a braue Prince, and well deserring of this Crowne, for his many and notable seruices) the King in the end of March, sends William Earle of Furtemberg to field with eight thousand Languenets, the Lords of Sercu and Auchi, (who were slaine at the first approaches at Hedin) Heilly, S. Seaul, Picards: Bacqueille, la Salle, and S. Aubin, Normands: Quincy a Champanois, Haracourt a Lorraine, either of them leading a thousand men: and many other bands of Germanes and French, amounting all to fixe and twenty thousand men, whereof Montmorency (Lord Steward) was Lieutenant General for his Maiesty.

Hedin is of consequence to the King, for the preservation of his other places in Picardy: and being in his power did wonderfully annoy the enemy. The towne abandoned by the Garillon, they retire into the Cattle, the which was taken without resistance, but the Earle of Rieux had well furnished the Cattle for the defence of a place of importance. Captain Samson an old Knight of Namurs, a great souldier, commanded there with 1500 men, vnder the Ensignes of Baubers and Vandeuille. They make their approaches, and many Captaines perswaded that the thickeesse of the wall, maintained with a great rampier, would neuer admit any breach, they come to vndermine. The Prince of Melphe, the Lords of Barbefieux, Bury, Villiers, Cornelies, vnderake the worke, and cast downe halfe a tower passing from the Towne to the Cattle, but that part which ioyned to the Cattle standing firme, the place was not much weakened. The King then resolves to attempt it by battery, and hee himselfe shewes the place where to plant the Cannon. At the approaches Lusarches and Pont-brian, well experienced Commisaries of the artillerie, with many Cannoniers and others lose their liues. The Cannon planted vpon the brinke of the trench, playes two dayes together, and the third they make a breach of thirty fadomes. The Kings presence being the rewarder of vertue, sets many yong Gentlemen on fire, being desirous of reputation, and before that order bee giuen for the assault, carries them to the top of the breach. But they finde the like valour in receiving them: some are slaine vpon the place, others returne fore wounded. Charles of Bueil among others, Earle of Sincerre, a yong Nobleman who followed the steps of his Ancestors vertue, Amigny Lieutenant to Sercu, and Damiete Ensigne-bearer of the said Company, testified by their deaths the hope of their youth, if the chance of armes had lent them a longer life. Haracourt a Lorraine, and his brother his Lieutenant, sonnes to the Lord of Paroy, Lieutenant to the Duke of Guise, in the gouernment of Champagne and of his company of men at Armes, Fleuernes sonne to Atardieque, and many others returned backe lame. Yet this attempt amazed the besieged, and helped the Generall.

For when as they see the order the King had giuen to assaile them in the morning, a great number of men at armes on foot, with fixe or fix hundred light-horsemen, all the rest on horsebacks, the whole armie ready to be put in battaile if the enemy approached, some appointed to march first, others to second them, and some to relieue them that went to the assault, the resolution and courage of the night past, made them enter into composition, whereby they departed with their baggage, leaving the artillerie, munition, and victuals. The King committed it to the guard of Sercu, giuing him a company of fifty men at armes, and a thousand foot. Saint Paul neere vnto Hedin might much annoy him, and reduced to the Kings obedience, crosse the garisons of Benne, Aras, Lillers, and other places thereabouts. Annebaule did this exploit, and Anthony of Castell, an Italian Engineer vnderooke the fortification of the towne and Cattle. Lillers abandoned by Licuin Capitaine of the towne, was by the Lord Steward and Duke of Guise, visiting the Country, added to the former Conquests, and left vnder the command of

of Martin du Bellay Capitaine of two hundred light-horse, joyning vnto him la Lande A with a thousand foot, to keepe them of Saint Paul and Marville, from annoying the foragers and victuallers of the French armie. The Bourguignons had fortified an Island, at Saint Paul, vpon the Riuer of Lis. The Lord Steward vnder takes to force it, and takes with him the Earle of Furstemberg, with eight thousand French and Germanes. At the first the besieged repulse the Lanquenets, kill some, and wound many. And now the day began to faile, when as Charles Maris Lord of Bacqueville, and La Lande discouering one part of the trench worse manned then the rest, they crosse it with their Normans and Picards, and come to handy-blowes; they lose some men, and kill many of the enemies, force the trench, the rampart and the bastion, they compell them to abandon B and leaue their defences, and make way for the rest of their companies and troopes to enter, who chasing the enemies, make a great slaughter of men, to reuenge the death of their companions. They presently let vpon the second fort, the bridge whereof was croft with great long pieces of wood, ioyned one to another, and betwixt, manned with good shot, defended with a mill of stone well pierced, and furnished with harguebules of Crock, and other shot. But nothing is difficult to a resolute minde, and the first flying to the second fort, stricke terror into them: they force them, and put them all to the sword: The number of the dead was esteemed twelue or fiftene hundred on both sides, the place spoiled, the bootie caried away, and the houses burnt.

There passed no day without an enterprize of one side or other, courses and recourses, C prizes, and reprises, of men, victuals, and places ill guarded, or not guardable. The King seeing the Emperor had no armie ready, able to crosse his new conquest, content for that year to haue taken Hedin, and fortified Saint Paul, he caused Lilliers to be burnt, (referring the Abbey of Nunnes and the Churches) and the walls to be beat downe, that the enemy lodging there, should not annoy Therouenne and S. Paul: he gaue the gouernment of Saint Paul to John d'Esfontenille Lord of Villebon, Prouost of Paris, with his company of men at armes: that of Moyencourt named de Hangest, to Martin du Bellay, with his two hundred light-horse, and two thousand foot, commanded by the Captaines la Sale and Saint Aubin Normans, Blerecourt and Taille Picards, euery one 500., and in the castle 1000. men, vnder the charge of René of Palliere. Hee left the Earle of Furstemberg D in garison at Doullans, with his Lanquenets, and an hundred men at armes, vnder the guidance of the Lords of Estreç, and la Roche du Maine. But these bands were so ill complete, as they made not halfe their numbers: Then hauing in like sort provided for other places, he brake vp his campe, and dismissed his troopes, to giue order for the affaires of Piedmont, where the enemy grew strong.

The King thus disarming, the Earle of Bures armes foure and twenty thousand Lanquenets, six thousand Wallons, and eight thousand horse, and resolves to charge the Lanquenets, lodged neere to Doullans, to make the siege of Saint Paul more easie, which he meant to attempt. By the surprize of some Letters, he learned that the fortifications of the place required yet twenty dayes time, to make it able to repulse the enemy. Hee chaunged E his opinion, and turning head to Saint Paul, makes his approaches the tenth of Iune, notwithstanding the many sallies and skirmishes of the besieged: he recouers (by means of a great hollow way, which the sodaine arriual of the Imperials would not suffer them to make) the point of a great Bulwarke vpon the way to Mouchie: they vndermine day and night, shoot fixtene or eightene hundred Cannon shot, make a breach of three or foure hundred paces, and by the fury of seuen or eight pieces of artillerie, force Martin du Bellay, Blerecourt and Taille to abandon the breach which looks towards Doullans, their chiefe and almost onely defence: he giues an assault with five or six hundred men, onely to view the breach: and by the thunder of their Cannons which battered all along the breach, and into the towne, they kill, or at the least hurt, about a third part of the defendants: those which were set to defend the breach, being forced to lye flat vpon their bellies. They discouer the breach, draw seuen or eight engines more into the ditch, which diuided the great bastion from the towne, they had no leisure but to make two Courtins of pipes full of earth, to defend the way which went from the bottom of the trench into the towne: they set fire to the props which supported the point of the bastion that was vndermined: it sinks downe, and presently ouerthrowes all them that defended this point into their trenches: they giue the assault by that place, and are valiantly

A valiantly received by la Sale, and Saint Aubin. But during the assault, those which the enemy thrust into the trench, winne the Courtin made of pipes, for cause and ventrie or thirte shot that kept it, and enter the towne pell-mell with them: they come behind them, (who performing as much as valor and sagacity could doe) defended the bastion and cut in pieces all they encounter.

Those which defended the breach, ignorant what passed on the other side, had already endured a furious assault, when as beheld, those which were entered by the port of the great bastion, come and charge them behind, and the greatest number surmounting the left, at the first charge they kill Moyencourt, and his brother d'Arc, they massacre in the B fury of the fight, seuen score of the company of du Bellay, and the most part of that of villebon: villebon and Taille were taken prisoners by Tonnaire a Spanish Capitaine, du Bel lay and Blerecourt were saued by Pose a Germane Capitaine: La Palliere forced in the Castle by the bulwarke which was not yet in defence remained prisoner: but the contention of some (euery one maintaining that he had giuen his faith vnto him) was the cause of his death. Finally, sparing neither men nor children, wives nor maids, religious men nor Nunnes, about foure thousand five hundred persons tryed the pitiless chance of a horrible and cruell victorie, whereunto they are commonly subiect, who against the lawes of armes vnder take the defence of a place not defensible, or that is not ready to withstand the violent attempts of a mighty armie.

C Saint Paul being burnt, the Castle and all the defences razed to the ground, the Imperials come before Montreuil. Montreuil was ill furnished: Canaples Gouernor of the towne, entered but three or foure dayes before, with a thousand foot, and some two hundred horse of the bands of Normandie: but the towne not being re-trenched, it required at the least six thousand foot, and three hundred men at armes. So the Earle of Bures lodgeth a part of his campe at the port of Hedin, one part at the Celestins vpon the way of Therouenne, and a part at the gate of the great market towards Abbeuille: hee plants his Artillerie in three places: makes a breach along a great Courtin from the gate towards Hedin to the Port of the great market; and then prepares for the assault. The breach was reasonable, but the trenches full of water made the access difficult. On the D other side, the defendants were troubled with many disadvantages: Two batteries of the enemies kept them from coming to the breach: and being at their defence, they lay open vpon both the flanks, and had no meanes to cover themselves: besides, their number was not sufficient to keepe the one halfe of the base towne, so as the enemy coming to the assault, had the rest of the towne at his discretion, the which is of a great circuit.

These considerations made Canaples demand Composition; and the Earle intending the conquest of Therouenne, to prevent the next victualling, which hee did foresee, hee graunts the men of warre to depart in armes with bagge and baggage, and to the inhabitants to carry what goods they could about them. This done, the want of men E and powder which hee knows to bee in Therouenne, inuies him to this enterprize. Francis of Montmorency Lord of Rochfort, then Lieutenant General for the King in Picardie, knowing the importance of Therouenne, and the enemies designe, besides three score men at armes, an hundred foot, and some hundred dead payes which kept it, hee sent the Lord of Cany, Lieutenant of the Company of the young Duke of Vendosme (whom we shall see King of Nauarre, and father to our most Christian King lately murdered): Foudras Lieutenant to Cany, the sonne of Dampierre guidon to the Dauphin, leading foure score men at armes, and Saint Brice foure hundred foot. Hee comes before it, makes his approaches, plants his Cannon in batterie, forceth our men to abandon the Castle which had but two towers (the English Talbot having taken the towne in F the year 1513) had razed the Castle and makes a breach in the towne wall, about two hundred paces long, but hardly to bee forced: our French men retreating, had made a trench behind them, and made the rampart in such sort, as the enemy winning it, should fall into a trench well flanked.

When as the Imperiall armie began to march against Saint Paul, the King sought to raise his armie, hoping (according to the promises of the fortificators) it would hold out vntill that succours should come. Now the Dauphin accompanied with Montmorency Lord Steward, Commander of the armie vnder the Dauphin, giues the tendezvous towards wards Abbeville, to the Earle of Furkemberg, and to Nicholas de Ruffice, newly arrived A with foure thousand Low Germanes, warlike men, and in good order.

Whilest the Dauphin attends the rest of his troopes, the besieged give him notice that they had great need of shot and powder: for the furnishing whereof, they choose Annebaul General of the light-horse. With this designe, Annebaul followed with an hundred men at armes, and fixtene hundred light-horse, made choice of foure hundred harquebuziers, vnder the charge of Bienbras, every one carrying a sacke of leather bound about him full of powder: many voluntarie Gentlemen desirous of honour, (a braue ambition if we could temper the heat of youth) augment this troope, resolute to bee either taken or defeated, rather then to faile of their enterprise. The Imperials hauing intelligence of this designe, goe to horse to prevent the execution: and the French light-horsemen, prickt forward by these yong Noblemen, desirous to trie their valour, give them an alarme. Mischance is good for something. It was night, and the darknes hindring their enemies fore-ward from knowing their battaile, which came from another side to ioyne with them, they charge, and kill one another, whilest that our shot enter into Therouenne without discouerie: being entred, they make a signe, whereby Annebaul should make his retreat, and might haue done it without danger. Nowwithstanding, aduertised that his light-horse were in skirmish, he sought to retire them. The enemy prevents him, and cuts off his way at the passage of a bridge. Here begins the combat, and so violent, as the greatest cheeke falls vpon the Imperials. But in the end of all the horsemen atchieue, C Annebaul is ouerthrowne, taken prisoner, and nere vnto him the Earle of Villars, the Lords of Piennes, d'O, and Sanfac, Captaine George Capusment, Francis Bernardin, and almost all, but some which had before passed the bridge. Those (amongst the which was Aussun) retire to Hedin, change their horses, post to the place of combat: finde the Imperials in disorder, dreame no more of any enemy: they charge them, defeat them, take a great number, and recouer many of their companions that were prisoners: and so cut off a great part of the glory which they did challenge for such a victory. In the meane time, the Dauphine and the Lord Steward had gathered together about fixtene hundred men at armes, two thousand light-horse, ten thousand Germanes, and twelue thousand French, with the which they proceeded to succour the besieged, or to force the D Imperials to fight with disadvantage: when as the treatie which Mary Queene of Hungary, sister to the Emperour, had made by the means of the Duke of Ascor, for the procuring of a Peace or truce, caused a suspension of armes for three moneths betwixt the King and the Emperours countries of the Netherlands, vntill that matters being pacified, there might bee a generall peace concluded betwixt these two great Princes and their allies: Let this truce now cary vs beyond the Alpes, to see the estate of the forces in Italy.

defeated.

A truce for three moneths.

The ordinarie jealousies, diuisions, and partialities of Capitaines, which thinke themselves equall in authoritie and reputation, and of like vse for seruice, is commonly of dangerous consequence. The composition which Caguin of Gonsagua made with the Imperials at Carignan, without the priuite of Gay Earle of Rangon, Lieutenant General for the King on that side the Alpes, had discontented the Earle, and on the other side, Caguin complained, that they had cashiered some of his footmen, and in case if Count Gay should die, or leaue the place, the King had substituted Cesar Fregefe his brother-in-law, without any respect of the ancient seruice of his house, and his breeding in the Kings seruice, from whom he had not false as the Earle had done, although he had bene fought vnto with many profitable conditions.

These quarrels did so increase, as after many complaints and reproaches vpon the point of Honour, Gay and Cesar banded ioyntly against Caguin, framed a challenge vpon some writings published to the disgrace of the said Cesar, vnder the name of Astin, whereof they held Caguin to be the chiefe author. William of Bellay, Lord of Langey, sent by the King to heare of the griefes of either partie, hauing giuen Count Gay, and Cesar Fregefe, to vnderstand what preiudice their quarrell with Caguin would be vnto his Majesties seruice; and that by the Articles of the Kings Order, the Knights may not without the leave of their superiour (which is the King) send nor accept of any challenge one against another, Caguin offered not to wrong the Kings seruice, and to deferre the challenge, vntill the seruice were ended, so as after the answer he had made vnto the challenge, E

A Cesar had not written or said any thing that should come vnto his knowledge; whereunto he should be bound in honour to answer: and vnder colour to goe to the bathe for his health, he obtained a passport to raise himselfe to his house, with promise that if it pleased the King to giue him an honorable charge, he would returne with a troope fit to doe him seruice: and that howsoeuer, he would neuer want a credit.

During these contentions the Imperiall armie increased dayly, and the Kings decreed, as the Lord of Humieres sent by the King for the affaires of Piedmont, could not be at the field, without a bodie of foure or five thousand Lanquenets or Suisses, and some supply of men at armes: To this end the King caused his light-horse-men to march into Piedmont, after the conquests of Hedin and Saint Paul, and sent to Christophor Duke of Wirtemberg, who brought ten thousand Lanquenets to passe the Alpes, and to ioyne with Hapieris. But vpon the coming of the Imperials before Saint Paul, the King being forced (as we haue scene) to countermand his light-horse, hee sent the Baron of Contra, La Fayette, Christie, and others, leading three or foure hundred men at armes, and one hundred light-horse, Lafagey, and Allegre, either of them commanding a thousand foot.

The Marquis of Guast had at that time deliuered into the Marquis Francis hands, all the Marquise of Saluses, except the Castles of Verculo and Carnagnole. Two hundred Italians held it for Count Gay: the Marquis of Guast doth summon it; and vpon their refusal approacheth the artillerie. Francis Marquis of Saluses (knowing the place) brings two Cannons on the right hand going from the Towne to the Castle, breakes downe two houses to couer himselfe in stead of Gabions: himselfe plays the gunner, and strikes two wayleys. A souldier of the Castle discouers him (but knowes him not) and shoots him through the bodie starke dead with a Musket. The Marquis of Guast cautieth him to be recovered with a cloake, and then againe sends to summon the besieged, promising them an honorable composition: they depart with baggage and baggage, and the Marquis seeing them passe, commended their good endeours. But when hee came to demand what hee was that had shot so well from one of the windowes of the Port, the souldier both ignorant of the Marquis intention, and of the effect of his shot, presents himselfe vnto the Marquis, who against the Capulation caused him to be hanged at the same window.

Francis Marquis
killed.

The King hauing afterwards reduced the Marquise to his obedience, did inuest Gabriel Bishop of Aire in Gasconie, who married the daughter of the Admirall Annebaul; but dying without heires, hee left the said Marquise to the Crowne. The coming of Humieres and the Lanquenets had first the Marquis of Guast with his troopes into Ast and Vercel, who by his retreat left Pignerol, Chiass, Montcallier, and other places abandoned to these new Conquerors. But at the first want of the chiefe sinewes of warre, makes the Italian bands to murine, whereby our men lost ten or twelue dayes, during the which the Marquis had leisure to hasten his Lanquenets, leauied by the elder brother William Duke of Furkemberg.

Humieres had no sooner pacified the Italians with a portion of their pay, but he frames an enterprise vpon Ast, where the Marquis had left his brother-in-law, Don Anthony of Atragon, Lieutenant for the Emperour, with two thousand foot, and two hundred horse. The Lanquenets require the charge to make the approaches, and take it from John Paul de Cere, who had a meaning to discharge it well. About midnight Humieres comes speedily to see their lodgings & finds nothing done. Some exclaiming first, would haue made their cause good; others storme (their pay being now out) and protest, that if it be not satisfied, they will wrap vp their ensignes, and found a retreat. They had reason, it is an ordinarie course, when as the chiefe force of an armie consists in a mercinarie Nation.

Humieres searcheth all the purses in the Campe, makes for every company five hundred Crownes, and with this bone did somewhat satisfie their greedinesse. But in the meane time the besieged, giuing the alarme to the Campe, they bring in seven companies of foot, & three hundred horse to their succours. Thus the small likelihood to force the towne, and lesse to famish it, seeing that for want of pay, the strangers were no men of resolution, Humieres leaues the towne of Ast, to surprize that of Alba. About eight hundred Spaniards, were parted from Alexandria to enter into it: John Paul de Cere meets them, chargeth and defeateth them, so as at the arrival of the French, the Citizens of Alba vnfurnished

Piedmontois at Montdeuis (he had surprized, and kept the place from the Imperials, A when they were the strongest in field) Lodowike of Bitague, at Vorlin, and Nicholas of Rusticis at Carmagnole: he dismissed his Swisses, and taking his way to France, he sent the Cardinall of Lorraine from Lions, with Montmorency the Lord Seward, to Locate, where the Emperours Deputies should meet, concerning a peace betwixt their Maesties. The confusions had beene great, and their spleene not easily to be pacified; which made them to prolong the truce for fixe moneths more. After all these toyles, and painefull endeauours, the loyall seruice of the most worthy, deserved reward; which made the King, being at Molins, to aduance Anne of Montmorency to be Comptable of France, the place being voyde by the reuolt of the Duke of Bourbon: hee gave this place B of Marshall of Montlun, and that of the Marshall la Marke deceased, to Claude of Annebault. It was now time to suppress the infernall furies, which had so long troubled the quiet of Christendome with such fatal combustions; and that the Pope (doing the office of a common father) should therein imploy his authority. Hee procures an C interuiew of these two great Princes at Nice, and himselfe assists, being about threecore and fifteene yeeres of age, in the beginning of Iune. Their mutuall hatreds had taken too deepe rooting in their hearts, and that fatal bloody checke, which his brother Ferdinand King of Hungary had lately received from the Turke, had nothing mollified the Emperour. Time doth pacifie discontents. Ten yeeres were sufficient, or neuer, to dispose both the one and the other to a generall peace. The Pope therefore seeing D that by the full deciding of their quarrels, hee could not confirme a final peace, hee propounded a truce for ten yeeres, the which they concluded betwixt their Countries, and subiects; and then every one returned home. But Charles was borne to be a perpetual scourge to this Realme; and many yeeres shall not passe before hee put vs in alarm with an vnworthy and base motiue of new confusions.

policy.

Leevs now see how he worketh like a Foxe, to produce effects for his owne benefit. The Gantois being oppressed with many extraordinary tributes, had spoiled the Emperours officers: who growing desperate, and seeking to fortifie themselves against the reuenging wrath of Charles, they secretly offer obedience to the King as to their Soueraigne Lord. The King performing the dutie of a good brother, and faithfull friend, gives the Emperour intelligence thereof. The Emperour deuised by some notable examples, to suppress the Gantois insolencies. But the passages thither were not very certaine. By Germany, the Protestants might some what hinder him. By sea, a storme might as well cast him vpon the coast of England; as vpon Flanders: the diuisions hee had with the King of England by reason of the diuorce of Queene Catherine his Aunty, would not suffer him to take any assurance from him: France was very commodious for him: to this end, he demands the Kings word for his safety; and among other soyes, hee promisseth, in case hee giues him an assured passage, to waite him, at one of his vnbaiten, in the Duchy of Milan. But (honorable policy) hee desires not to be prest to signeth these promises, To the end (saith he) it may not be spoken, that I haue done them by compulsion, in ordine a passage; and requires the King to give him his word for assured. This was to build a castle vpon a quick sand.

The Emperours
passage through France.

Notwithstanding the King iudgeth another mans heart and intentions by his owne, hee grants his brother in law such assurance as hee demands. Being like, he parts from Compelgne, to goe to meet with him; sending his two soomes to Bayonne: to receive him, and to accompany him to the place where the King and he might meet (which was at Chastelleraud) gives him authority to make enties, and to deliuer prisoners, in many towncs of the realme, as if he had been in his owne country: he casts him in all places, causeth him to be conducted by his children vnto Valentignies, the first place of his owne territories where he is moued to confesse that which he had promised before his departure from Spaine; but it was to no effect. The Emperour desires the conduct, will he had conferred with his Councell of the Lords and commons, whom hee would haue kept his promise, if hee had found the Gantois so desperately affected, as hee hath since discovered the aide of France, to force them to obedience. Perceiving themselves abandoned by the King, they sought and found refuge vpon certaine conditions which hee presented them. And the Comptable, who (saying vpon the word of such a Prince as the Emperour) had given the King assurance, was for this cause in disgrace with his Maistie, and

A and retired himselfe from Court to his house: from whence we shall see him called and restored to his dignities.

Let vs obserue the craft and subtiltie of the Spaniard, to bring the King into dislike with his friends and allies. The Venetians were ill satisfied of the league they had made with the Emperour against the great Turke: their treasure was wasted, and their estates (after that great and famous victorie in Hungary) were in danger. They were (for their owne safety) ready to enter into a treatie of peace, or of a long truce with the Turke. To breake this, the Emperour sollicitates the King to enter into this common league, and the King perswaded therunto, sends (by his instigation) the Marshall of B Annebault (Lieutenant General for his Maistie in Piedmont, by the death of Montcaison, lately deceased) to goe in company with the Marquis of Guast to Venice, and the Lord of Gié to the Pope, as solempne Ambassadors, and to giue them hope, that the King of France ioyning his forces to theirs, all ioyntly together, would make an armie both by sea and land, to extirpate the race of the Ottomans out of Europe. The Emperour strucke three stroakes with one stone, hee dissuaded the Venetians from all accord with the Turke. He bred a hatred and dislike betwixt the King and the Turke. And put the King of England in ialousie: who could not well like of this great alliance and fraternitie, which the Emperour did cunningly make shew to haue with the King. So as the English being perswaded, that the King had with-drawne his loue, he grew strange, C and began to assure himselfe of the Emperour. And which is more, all the Kings other confederates, seeing that honourable and respectiue entertainment giuen to the Emperour, and the Ambassadors of both their Maesties, ioyntly sent into Italy, they conceived many causes of distrust, blaming the King in leasing them at need to the Emperours mercie, from whom they could not expect (if he did vanquish them in warre) any better vantage then that of the Gantois.

This yeere William Budens Master of Requests, died at Paris, a man of singular learning and godlinesse, to whom all men that loue learning are much bound, hauing by his learned and laborious writings, eased them of much paine: whose credit with the King, and the Cardinall Du Bellay, caused honest pensions, according to that age, to be giuen to those D whom we call the Kings readers, and professors, a fountaine from whence are sprung so many great Riuer, that in the end they are spread ouer all Europe. The extreme heat, and great droughts, did likewise make this season the more memorable, by the name which it carries yet, of the yeare of Roasted Vines. The Emperour hauing by his dissembling disappointed the King of his hopes, it was now needfull to satisfie his friends and allies, touching the truth of things past: for (to incense all the Potentates of Christendome against our King) the Emperour had vnder-hand giuen them to vnderstand, that the King treated with him of matters to their prejudice. To this end he sent Caesar Fregosi to the Senate of Venice, and Anthony Rencana Gentleman of his chamber to the great Turke. The Marquis of Guast hath some notice thereof, and to surprize these Ambassadors with their instructions and Letters of credit (which notwithstanding were not found about them, the Lord of Langey, who could not disswade them from the passage of Po, had so preiuailed with them, as they sent their instructions vnto him, to convey them vnto Venice another way: ) he sets watches vpon all the passages, especially vpon the Po, knowing well that Rincon, a bigge fat man, would rather passe by water then by land, and causeth them to be murdered in their barke, passing at Cantalone, three miles about the mouth of Tefin, putting all the Watermen into the dungeon of the Castle of Paugia, as well those which carried the Spaniards, that were the murderers, as the French: they were souldiers of the garison of Milan, and of the said castle. An odious and reproachfull act. Some packets coming from Venice to the King, and from the King to Venice, were surprized, and the F Carriers wounded by men attired after the Marquisses deuiue.

The Kings Ambassadors surprised and murdered.

But see the notable policy of Langey, to discouer the truth of a fact which the Marquis thought to haue managed so secretly, as it should neuer haue come to light. Gifts (sayes an Ancient) pacifie both gods and men. Langey findes a meanes, by money, to fyle a sunder the grates of the prison towards the Castle ditch, with secret Files: draws forth the Mariners, winnes some of the faction to the Kings seruice; learns from them the number, the names, and the nation of the murderers, the order, the manner, and the houre of the murder, and all other auailable circumstances to encounter the dissembling of the Marquis,

The Emperour
goes to Alger without success.

Marquis, who making a good shew of a bad cause, seemed to enquire carefully of the crime, by the Captain of the Iustice at Milan. The Emperour was then at the Diet at Ratisbone, where he granted an interim to the Protestants, that is to say, until a Councell were held to determine all controversies of religion, every one should peaceably enjoy the beliefs and ceremonies whereof he then made profession: and in doing this, the restoring of the Duke of Savoy to all his estates, was granted at the Germans charge.

Soon after, William of Roquendolle, Lieutenant General for Ferdinand King of Hungary, was defeated before Buda, with the losse of twenty thousand Germans. It was a great shame for the Emperour, being neere to so mournfull and fatal a checke, if hee should not employ his forces in his brothers favour. He undertakes againe the voyage of Alger in Africke, with an intent that if passing through Italy, hee should finde the Kings affaires disordered, and his forces disperfed, to attempt something against him, making account that the King would not faile to be revenged of the violence and wrong done vnto him, in the persons of his Ambassadors. But the good prouision which the King had made in Prouence, and in Piedmont, by Langy his Lieutenant generall, caused him to passe on without any further attempt. Being at Luques, he had conference with the Pope, and the King sent his Ambassador vnto them, to demand satisfaction for the crime: but he was put off with shifts. The enterprise of Alger was vnfortunate, the violence of the winds, the continuall raine, the stormes and haile, with all the injuries of the ayre, had conspired against him: breaking some of his ships, he was beaten backe with great danger of his person, and losse of his men.

Hitherto the Marquis had as covertly as he could, disguised the matter: but finding now that all men had discovered his deuites, that notwithstanding the death of the Ambassadors, he could not decypher the Kings designe, that the King demanded as well from the Emperour, as from the Estates of the Empire, satisfaction for this foule fact: Now to make his cause seeme good, he writes to the Estates which were assembled againe at Ratisbone, for their common defence against the Turke, whereby hee maintaines, that hee committed no act that might touch him for breach of the truce, and in shew to iustifie himselfe of the crime wherewith he was charged: I there are (saith he neither denying nor aduowing the fact) two wayes of iustification, the one ciuill, the other knightly. I offer to D maintaine ciuilly, that there is no breach of truce graued by me, and to deliver into our holy fathers hands (the protector of the truce) both my selfe, and all those the King shall thinke culpable of this act, to the end the truth might be knowne: and if any Knight my equall will charge me with any such fact, and proue his saying by armes, I will maintaine that he hath spoken falsly, and as often as he shall charge me with the like, so often shall he speake falsely. We do often shadow a lie with such good words, as it giues it a colour of truth. But did hee thinke by this brauadoe, to proue his innocency? the retreat of those murderers to him, bringing them all prisoners that were left aliue within the boats, to the end there should bee no meanes to discouer this infamous murder: the detention hee made of the Warer-men, whom he afterwards transported into other prisons vnder his command: the penall E didd hee publish in places where the fact might bee knowne, against them that should be found discouraging of this action: the ill vilage of them that had spoken of it: the fauours, honours, and aduancements giuen to them that had bene the actors: the depositions of prisoners freed by Langy, were not all these sufficient witnessles, to cry vengeance against the Marquis? Langy answering to the pretended iustifications of the Marquis, was the Knight to make tryall thereof, by the one or the other way. But the Marquis had no such meaning.

We haue heard how the King demanded of the Emperour (being in conference with the Pope at Luques) satisfaction of the murder, audaciously and against all diuine, naturall, and humane lawes, committed vpon the persons of two of his especial seruants, men of estate, and of reputation by their births, hauing by their merits deserued, the one an honorable degree amongst his chiefe Gentlemen: the other an especial place amongst the greatest Noblemen. They would haue satisfied him with frivolous reasons and excuses, perswading him to leaue the abolition of their blood, to the forgetfulness of time, which might haue bene an imputation to his Maiestie, either of want of wit and iudgement, or of valour & courage. Profit vnto the King, honor prickt him forward, and necessity constrained him, to vfe those meanes which the law of Nations did allow

that moued the King to warre.

A to him which doth acknowledge no other superiour: and three chiefe reasons did vrg: him therunto. Vnder this colour of peace, the Emperour had a thousand practises vpon the frontiers of his Realme: and the King had no sooner cut off one of this Hydras heads, but presently there trise vp an other or many more. Moreover, this truce allowed the traffike and conference of eithers subiects, by meanes whereof for many treasons were practised. Neither could he draw his subiects from the commerce of the Low-countries, belonging to the Emperour, without expresse prohibitions, the which by consequence would argue hostilitie. But that which did most moue a noble and generous spirit: hee had good and certaine intelligence, that the Emperour (seeing warre proclaimed, in B case he did not within a certain time make satisfaction for the above-named murders) made his account, that vnder colour of zeale to the common-weale of Christendome (filling the eares of the whole world with a goodly and great enterprise, against the enemies of the faith) he would raise great forces, and prouide great preparation, at the cost and charge of his most credulous subiects, lying most open and neere vnto the Turkes inuasion, and consiure the most Christian King to assist him either with men or money.

If then the fumes of an African or Turkish voyage, had bene proclaimed through the world, before that warre were denounced betwixt these two Princes, those which were not acquainted with the deuices of the one, would haue imputed the flay of fo holy an enterprise to the other. Let vs adde, that howsoeuer, he must entertaine men, both in Italy, C and vpon the frontiers of Languedoc and Prouence, for that both a truce, and warre were of equal charge vnto him. There were two meanes to begin the warre: the one profitable and lesse honest. Many thrust him on, some with discontent, others with reuenge, some with couetousnesse, some with desire of inuouation, or some other priuate passions, offering to seize vpon diuers places for his Maiestie, the conquest whereof, might bee a worthy reward for a long and doubtfull warre. The other was more honest, but of lesse profit, iust, and not couetous. The Duchy of Luxembour, and the county of Roussillon were worthy motives in generall, besides the priuate interest of inuasion, which the King had against his enemy. The Emperour did possesse them both, without any lawful title. Luxembour, by the succession of Charles & Philip dukes of Bourgogne, his great grand- D father, and his father, who had by force dispossessed the true and lawful Lords of the said house, who had substituted our Francis, by a new grant into their rights and actions, besides the ancient rights, which the Kings of France haue euer pretended thereunto, and especially, since the purchase which Lewis Duke of Orleans, brother to King Charles the sixth made. Besides that the Lords of la Marke had of late transported their pretensions vnto him, of the said Duchy. Roussillon, by the too scrupulous restitution of Charles the eighth, being abused and deceived (saith the original) by Frier Oliuer Maillard, his confessor, a man in shew holy, but in effect an Hypocrite, and corrupted with money by the King of Arragon, to sell and deceiue his master. King Charles hauing no power to make this alienation, in preiudice of the Crowne, neither the King of Arragon, nor his successors, accomplishing E the conditions annexed to the contract, Charles now Emperour, was but an vsurper, and a violent possessor.

The situation of Luxembour was commodious to receive the Germanes that came vnto the King: but more, by this approach, to fauour the duke of Cleues, whom the Emperour did threaten to make the poorest man in Christendome. So the King sent Charles duke of Orleans, his yongest sonne, accompanied with six hundred men at armes, six thousand French, and ten thousand Lanquenets, and Claude duke of Guise commanding the army vnder him: Francis of Bourbon duke of Anguene, brother to Anthony D. of Vendosme, the Earle of Aumale, eldest sonne to the duke of Guise, the Lords of Sedan, Iametz, Rochefort, Maine, la Guiche and many others, men of resolution, valour, and experience. And F for the enterprise of Roussillon, Henry his eldest sonne Daulphin of Viennois, assisted by the Marshal Annebault, for the chiefe conduct of the warre: and for an assistant in those military toiles, the Lord of Montpesat, Lieutenant for his Maiestie in Languedoc. Paris is the chiefe citie of this countrey: the onely barre and bulwarke of Spaine towards the South, the conquest whereof drew after it not onely the losse of that which the Emperour possessed on this side the mountaines, but layed open all the Prouince beyond it: and the King conceiued, that assailing it (being vnurnished of many necessities, for the maintaining of a great siege) either honour, or feare of losse, would draw the Em-perour to fight, and with this hope, he prepared the rest of his forces to march in person. A But this was but a great shew without any effects.

The Duke of Orleans having assembled his troops betwixt Verdun and Dun-le-Chasteau, he besieged, battered, and took Danuiller, a place of Luxembourg: where there came to joyne with him the Baron of Hedeq sometimes Lieutenant to the Earle of Furberberg, the Earles of Mansfield and Piguelin, and the Colonel Reichere, with their regiments of Lanquenets, making about ten thousand men. Then came Count Ringerque to the Kings service, a young Nobleman and resolute, who promised in his person many good parts; as we shall hereafter see. Danuiller being burnt as not defensible, had opened the way to Luxembourg: but newes comes, that a part of the wall was false at Yury, the Duke turns the head of his armie thither, makes his approaches, plants three Canions and a halfe vpon the brinke of the ditch, but vnderfreely, without gabions, without trenches (this was to contemne the enemy too much) and without any couering for them that guarded the artillerie. The garison sallies forth in the open day, in view of the artie, and tie ropes vnto the Ordinance, but the weight of them was the let they could not draw them into the ditch, wherevpon they burnt their carriages and dismount them. They make trenches, and batter it towards Ardenes: they make a reasonable breach, but it was not assailed. In the midst of the breach the besieged had a Casemate in the bottome of their trench, the which could not be taken from them without great slaughter of them that should attempt it. They draw from Sedan, Mouzon and other neere townes a supply of artillerie and munition, and make a new batterie: the besieged (being amazed) demand a parle. The bastard of Sambret, the Lord of Noyelles, Hannuyer, captain Famas, Gyles de Leuant, and others, vnto the number of two thousand men, defended the place, the which could not be assaulted without hazard and losse of men. So it was concluded, they should depart with their baggage, and to cary with them six fauons with munition to discharge them six times a piece.

Then William Duke of Cleues fortified the Kings armie with ten thousand Lanquenets and sixteene hundred horse, led by Martin de Bessan Marshall of Gueldres, William had lately espoused (but without any consummation of marriage, by reason of the Infants base age) Joan daughter to Henry of Albrert, and of Marguerite the Kings sister, whom D hereafter we may see, by the nullitie of this contract, to marry with Anthony of Bourbon, Duke of Vendosme, and of their marriage was borne Henry the fourth, the French King and of Nauarre, lately mustered.

Ituy (which men held the strongest place in the country, and best furnished with men, artillerie, and munition) by their yeelding, caused Arles to open her gates at the first summons. Luxembourg seemed of a harder issue. It was kept by three thousand foot, and four hundred horse. But the trenches, the approaches, and a breach made, although not reasonable to giue an assault (considering the trench was very deepe cut off the Rocks) did so amaze the besieged, as they yeelded to depart with their baggage. The Earles of Mansfield and Piguelin promised to defend it against all men: but wee shall shortly see how they will discharge their duties.

Montmedy a small place situate vpon a Mountaine, so as they could not approach but on the one side, moued with this happy successe, yeelded at the first view of the Cannon. To conclude, such was the successe in this expedition, as onely Tionuille remained in the Emperours hands of all the Duchies of Luxembourg. But the great desire the Duke of Orleans had to beat the battell, which, in shew, was to be giuen before Pargignan, drew him to Montpelier, where the King remained attending the progresse of the said siege of Pargignan, to be ready to receiue the Emperour, if he came to succour it.

The Duke had no sooner dismissed his armie, and turned his backe to Luxembourg, leaving the Duke of Guise as Lieutenant General for the King, but the Imperials presented themselves before the towne, and receiued it very easily of the Earles of Mansfield and Piguelin: and by the recouerie of Montmedy did wonderfully endamage all the French troops at Senay, and along the Meuse, if the Duke (assembling what he could of those companies, he had dismissed) had not chased them from Montmedy, before they had any time to bethinke themselves. A stratagem which did pacifie the Kings wrath, for the dismissing of so gallant and brave an armie, in the heart of their most notable and happy successe. As is commonly said. That youth can doe what age can know but

A but cannot doe. What did this youthfull escape of the Duke of Orleans benefit, preferring a desire of vncertaine glory, before the fruits of an assured conquest? No escape of his reputations small assistance vnto the Kings troops, (the had beene vpon the point of battell, and a great prejudice to his Maiesties affaires: for this voyage of Rouillon, being wonderfull sumptuous, and of no profit, he might with great honor haue continued his victories the which he had so happily begunne.)

Let vs now obserue the successe of this enterprise. Amadeus having brought vnto the Dauphin, being at Auiignon, eight thousand Swisses, six thousand French foot, of the old bands, whereof Charles of Cossy Lord of Brillac was Colliell: six thousand Italians, four hundred men at armes, and sixteene hundred light horse, whereof the Lord of Tarnes was General: and Montpessier having ioyned with him at Narbonne, with his Legion of Languedoc, and part of that of Guienne, six thousand Lanquenets, and a great number of Swisses, newly leauied, who being ioyned with their country-men, made about foure-score thousand, so as the whole army was esteemed forty thousand men of all Nations, two thousand men at armes, and two thousand light horse. The rough enterainment the Imperials gaue them at the castle of Swisses, with their Cannon and Culuerins, made them to coniecture, that the intelligences which Montpessier (the first fire-brand of this attempt) pretended to haue, were vncertaine.

And what successe could Pargignan promise them, finding it very well fortified with C platformes, well manned, and well furnished with artillery and munition? what assurance could the assaillants haue in a plaine field, behind gabions which they could not fill but with sand? The long time which was spent in assembling so many sundry Nations, and the fruitlesse stay of Amadeus, six or seuen weekes in Piedmont, had giuen the defendants time to prepare their enemies designs. Moreover, winter approached, and the Emperour might well keep the place without hazarding of his person or trying the chance of battell, whereunto the King fought by all meanes to draw him. This was the meanes to take cold, and to consume himselfe in vaine. Vpon the first raine there had beene no question to retire this army, by reason of the floods which runne on all sides from the mountaines, the which the necessity of the sea makes to ouer-flow the champaign country that lies neere D in it, as being shut vp betwixt two seas, and the mountaine, the enemy would easily haue persuaded. The King foreseeing these dangers, retired the Dauphin and his armie, knowing but too late, that he had beene ill serued. These flourishing troops, fresh and resolute, might haue beene most profitably employed in the Estate of Milan. But the assurance they gaue the King, to take Pargignan at the first, of two parties made him chooseth the worst: Moreover, in an army there is alwayes some one of those that are of the Council (being ielous, and enuying that any other should doe better) loue rather to trouble and frustrate designs, then to advance them.

In the meane time, Anthony Duke of Vendosme, Gouvernor and Lieutenant for the King in Picardy, suffered not his armes to rust: the enemy lurk in diuers places, which did E greatly annoy Ardes, and the country about Bologne: namely Montoire and Tournie, the first being strong of situation, vpon a little hill, at the entry of the county of Oye, discovering all that come out of Ardes. The other vpon the edge of the county of Bologne, going from Ardes to Saint Omers, belonging to the Count of Bures, one of the strongest places of the country. The taking and razing of these two, was the destruction of many others which held for them, and yet the enemy being the stronger in men, made somewhat to try his forces.

But on the other side, the country of Piedmont, was left in prey to the enemy, by reason that Amadeus had carried away the troops for the enterprise of Pargignan. The Marquis embracing this occasion, assembled his forces at the bridge of Esture, a sixtie leue the riuers as a commandement, and wherefoeuer he pleased, on this or the other side of Po, to assaile Piedmont. Langes Lieutenant for the King in Piedmont, to cross the Marquis, draws a company of foot out of euery towne, makes an enterprize vpon Coblenz and Alba, being ill furnished with souldiers. The vnder-takers for Coblenz and Alba, wander in the night, and the day approaching, made their voyage fruitlesse. Just the Gouvernor of Savilian, and Cental of Riez, appointed for Quiers, planned their Leaders, nor withstanding the day breaking had giuen the alarme in the towne, they forced it and the Castle being but on one side, and two flocks of meale in it, yeelded after they had fasted six and thirty houres. Cental being made Gouverneur, manned it with two thousand A souldiers which he leaued, as well vpon his owne lands as elsewhere.

The Marquis posted to succour them, but the distance of the places required three daies journey. He tooke his reuenge vpon Villeneufue of Ast, Poiring and Cambian, small places not fortified, resolute to passe the Po, and to campe at Marignan, to take from the French all the plaine country, and to furnish Turin and Pignerol, with the other places which they held on this side, and to take from them all commodity of the Marquise of Salufes. Five thousand foot, with some few men at armes, and light-horsemen, which Langey might oppose against the Marquis, who led fiftene thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, were not sufficient to stop his passage. But the industry of a well aduised Commander, doth often that which force cannot effect.

He comes first to lodge at Carignan, fortifies himselfe speedily, and with continual skirmishes, keeps the Marquis from forcing of the passage. The waters were low (it was in the moneth of Iuly) they might easily wade through both aboue and beneath Carignan, these two armies had already camped fiftene dayes one against another, and the weakest in number was almost tired. Langey himselfe with his exceeding toile, was growne lame, yet hauing his tongue and his spirits free, hee winnes from the Imperiall army six thousand Italians: so as weakening his enemy, he fortifies himselfe. The Marquis amazed, and fearing lest these should suborne the rest of his troops, retires to Villedeslon and Quiers.

It was a goodly thing to pursue them, and the Swisses had accepted of this proposition: but in stead of passing the Po, being muiued by the perswasions of some, they turne their Ensignes directly to Pignerol, and Boutieres with them. Langey seeing himselfe abandoned, diuides his last come Italians into Cafelles and Siria, betwixt Turin and Vulpian; leaues about fifty souldiers in the Castle of Carignan, and causeth himselfe to be caried to Turin.

The Marquis hearing of this sudden departure, sends to summon the place, and threatens the souldiers with death, if they attend the Cannon. They yeeld at the summons: It was likely the Marquis would finish the fort which Langey had begunne. He therefore sends his brother Martin du Bellay, Gouverneur of Turin thither. Du Bellay sends before him Captaine Marville, and the Earle Maxime, Anthony de Sesse, his two Lieutenants, with about fifty horse, to obserue the enemies countenance. The Earle leaves his companion in guard, and by a Trumpet demands to speake with the Captaine of Carignan. This Captaine goes forth vnder his assurance (the Earle knew him well: he had sometimes serued him:) the Earle tels him they are sent to inuest him, attending the troops and the Artillery, and assures him, that if he makes any delay, it will not be in his power to saue his life. So the Captaine terrified by this stratagem, delivers the Castle to the Gouverneur of Turin, who tooke order the like inconuenience should not happen.

Then the Marquis, after two assaults, given in vaine to Chiusas, and repulled by Ierolim of Birague, he stayed at Casal, and Casir of Naples, to open the way from Vulpian to Turin, hoping to recouer againe the Italians, lately fallen from him, came to assaile Cazelles. Langey discouering this designe, appointed the Cheualier Villegagnon to command them, who sent backe his enemy with the losse of about foure-score men, leauing his ladders in the trenches, for a pawning of his vaine enterprife. Barges stoppe the passage from Pignerol to Rauel, and did then greatly annoy the places which obeyed the French, being in the midst of them. The Marquis retired from Casal could not succour it in many dayes. And therefore not to suffer the Swisses to grow dull for want of exercise, Boutieres by the commandement of Langey, parts from Pignerol with six Cannons, finds a Conuent fortified, ioyning to the Castle, without the taking whereof, the Castle might not be attempted: he makes a breach, takes it by assault in foure and twenty houes, and puts three hundred Spaniards which had the guard thereof, to the sword. Then hee approacheth the Castle, makes a breach, and compounds with the besieged, that if within six dayes the Marquis or some for him, came not strong enough to raise the siege, they should depart, with their liues.

The Marquis aduertised of this composition, postes to succour them, and Boutieres being too weak to attend so great a power, retires to Pignerol. In recompence whereof Langey takes from him the Castle of Montault and some other places in Monterrat, being

A hard to be recovered in winter. And to pull so troublefome a thorne out of his foot, hee causeth Vassé, Gouverneur of Pignerol, to practise Paul Menus Captaine of Barges: and then with some bands newly come from France, hee marcheth with speed to the said place, plants foure Cannons in battery, and by meanes of a hole which hee made in the Tower, although not reasonable for a breach, hee receiues both the place and Capeade into the Kings seruice. The time fitted well for the warre, and the King being loath to lose the opportunity, and to employ some part of the forces that were retired from Rapignan, sent the Lord of Annebaul, with the Regiment of Reishnes, into Piedmont, with the old Italian bands, and the French, all the light-horse, and foure hundred men at armes.

This new army, might in shew (whilest the Marquis of Goult was at Carmagnole, doubtfull whither they would make their first attempt) haue surprised Casal, and other places where Langey had intelligence. With this designe, he secretly kept boats vpon the River of Po: within foure and twenty houres they might goe downe by water, and the Marquis could not come to succour them in lesse then foure dayes march. Moreover, a friend, (whom he entertained neere vnto the Marquis) assured him that the French three thousand Langsquenets, and a thousand Spaniards, the which hee himselfe should leaue and cause them to be surprised at a passage neere to Villedeslon, where they had no meanes to escape: so as passing the Po by night, they had sent some foure hundred horse, betwixt Carmagnole and Villedeslon, and opposed the army betwixt Villedeslon and Quiers. Without doubt Langey being lame of his limbs, employed all his wits to discouer the Imperials purposes, and still to get from the enemy. But Enuy hath alwayes sworne the ruine of Vertue. Some enuious persons brake off these two designs and disswaded Annebaul from these great enterprises.

Langey seeing his proiect crost by his enemies, he parted from Turin with the Kings good leaue, to acquaint him with many things touching his Maiesties seruice, which hee could not commit to any mans report: but death preuented him at Saint Saphorin, vpon the Mountaine of Tarare. The Marquis dislodging from Carmagnole, had left so few men in Cony, as a sudden assault had caried it at the first. To this end Annebaul parts with foure Cannons, and caused Riuples to come with the Regiment of Reishnes. The bridges of Carignan and Montcallier were broken, so as the Langsquenets must passe at Turin. Du Bellay Gouverneur of the towne, and Lieutenant for the King on this side Po, prepares their lodging, to employ them as they passe. The Tower of Saint Bony, Chastillon, Saint Raphael, and other small places, vpon the Mountaine of Monterrat, did wonderfully annoy Turin: They could not goe to the places of Monterrat, whence the victuals (especially Wine) came in great abundance, without being disordered.

He mounts foure Cannons, departs with some troops of horse, three Ensignes of Frenchmen of his garison, and the said Germanes, plants his artillery before Saint Bony, makes a hole, the Langsquenets giue the assault, force it, and put all they find armed to the sword, except the Captaine, who was hanged by the Law of Armes, for that he had endured the Cannon in so weak a place. Chastillon could not be battered but from another mountaine opposite, and the horses could not draw vp the Artillery. The Langsquenets, fliest with the prey of Saint Bony, force it vp by maine strength, and the besieged, being foure hundred good men of warre, terrified with the visage of Saint Bony, yeeld to depart with their baggage. Those of Saint Raphael, and some other places, send to demand a composition and retreat. Onely Chastillon was defensible and commodious for the guard of the passage all the rest were razed.

The Langsquenets hauing ioyned with Annebaul, hee bessegeth Cony, overthrowes a piece of the wall, and giues an assault, but it was the place that was best fortified: a great rampier behind the breach staves our men, the which after an houres fight they are forced to abandon, with the losse of many men of seruice: and the night following, two hundred horse, and eight hundred foot being entred, made the Admirall to sound a retreat; eight Cannons diuided into two batteries, had so troubled the defendants, as not able to answer the diuers assaults, the towne in shew had become wonne. But errors are knowne after they are committed. Vpon the retreat, the Earle Maxime, Anthony Marville, and Theode Beuaine an Albanois, encounter two hundred Imperiall horses, neere to Bra: they charge them, defeat, and take the most part of them, and the enemy hauing abandoned many small places, the Admirall reduceth to the Kings obedience Villeneuve of Arr, Poring, A Cambian, and Riue de Quiers.

Winter did cut off all meanes of more happy successe. So dismissing his army, and sending the Laniquenets of Colonne Reichers into France, he took his way to Mont-Cenis. Mont-Cenis is subiect to tempests, as well as the sea. The way is straight, restrained by two mountaines: when any storme ariseth, the gulfs of wind doe gather together bales of snow, vpon the tops of the hills, which growing great as they roule downe, ouerthrow all they meet, and they to whom the straight is not knowne (for oftentimes the guides are lost), run many times into caues full of snow. Annebaull was in this danger, most part of them that did accompany him, found their graues vnder the snow: some lost their eyes, others die with cold, some returned benumbed of their feet, others of their armes and hands, and few of this whole troop enioyed his perfect health: himselfe was neere vnto a fatall end, if some men attending the end of the storme, in little caues, had not preferred him from the injury thereof.

At that time the King determined a reuenge against the inhabitants of Rochel, and the neighbouring Islands which were mutined against the Kings officers, for the custome of salt. Being arriued at Rochel, they assembled all in the garden where his Maiesty did lie, confessed their rebellion publicly, and most humbly craued pardon for their offence. The fury of a King (saith the Wiseman) is the messenger of death: but a wise man will pacifie it. And the cheerefull countenance of a King is life, his fauour is like vnto a cloud, bringing raine in due season. The King moued with the pitifull noyse of this people, crying for mercy with their hands lift vp, kneeling on the ground, and teares in their eyes: did graciously remit their offence, freed the prisoners, deliuered their armes, and the keys of the towne, commanded the Garisons both of foot and horse, to retire: receiued them into grace, and restored their liberties and priuiledges: without doubt, A King maintains his Throne by clemency. In the meane time, many practices and enterprises are made against Turin.

The Marquis of Guast did at sundry times send vnto the Iudge of Turin, being borne at Quiers, a number of carts laden with wine: and within the vessels which were as long as the carts, many armes, harguebuzes, pertusians and corselets, to arme fourescore men, the which he should receiue into his house, disguised like country-men, bringing viuals to the market: who at the first tumult they should heare at the towne-gate, should issue forth armed, and seize vpon the Court of guard in the market place, whilst that other souldiers armed with lackes and shirts of Maile, morians, swords, daggers, and targets, brought in five carts of hay, six in euery one (the hay being so cunningly layd, as cutting a cord within, the bundels would fall downe) should fight with the Guard at the Pon, and fauour the entry of eight hundred horse, and five thousand foot, which should be ready at the alarme. But the enterprife being discovered, made the Iudge to lose his head.

The enemy notwithstanding, lets not to proceed to the execution of his carts of hay, in the absence of Bellay, whom his priuate affaires had called into France, after the death of his brother: and the twelfth of February, Bontiers Lieutenant for the King at Turin, was well aduertised of some carts which were preparing at Ligni (an Imperiall towne neere vnto Vulpian) but not of the manner of the former enterprife. They hazard their hay. Raymonet commanding at the gate, causeth Perrichon his Lieutenant to thrust a pike through the first cart, he drawes it out all bloody, the souldiers leape forth, and the first thrusts Raymonet through the body with his sword. Raymonet takes him by the throat, and stabs him, his companions likewise come forth, force the Guard, seize vpon the armes that hang vp, and become masters of the port. Valiantly without doubt, but somewhat too soone for them, their succours were a mile or more from the first bridge.

Captaine Saluadeur de Aguerre, (who deserves to be regretted, having a great share in the preferation of the towne) heauing then the guard of the place, hearing the alarme at the gate, and crying Sauoy, turnes head with his troop, repulseth the five that were slip out of the first cart, & goes directly to the gate. A well aduised Smith, who dwelt neere the gate, goes vp, and with a great hammer breakes the chaine, and lets downe the Portcullis, so as the Imperials could not enter. Bontiers and Montains arise, they shut the gates, kill some of the souldiers that were betwixt the gate and the Portcullis, the rest creepe vnder the Portcullis, being too stout, and Casir of Naples (who not many dayes before, had left

A three of his souldiers hanged at Turin, being executed for another conspiracy against the towne) seeing his enterprife made frustrate, retired without the losse of any, but of his Lieutenant, who was slaine with the Cannon.

On the other side, the Duke of Clenes made warre in Brabant, and had wonne some places from the Emperour. So as the Bourguignons turning all their forces against him, giveth the Duke of Vendosme leane to victuall Therouenne, to take Lilliers by composition, being a strong place, betwixt Aire and Beuue, at the entry of the Marish: to burne the towne, beat downe the gates, and to take it and many other places about Therouenne, Saint Omer, Aire, Betune, altogether vnprofitable for the enemy. And to the Earle of Aumale eldest sonne to the Duke of Guise, accompanied with the Lords of Laual, Saint Andre, Escars, Dampiere, Chastaigneray, Eguilly, and a great number of other young Gentlemen, occasion to quicken the enemy with continuall skirmishes and assaults, most commonly carrying away the aduantage.

The happy successe, and the favourable season, invited the King, in the beginning of Iune, to goe to field with all his forces, with an intent to assaile Auennes, being vnfirmly held of them: To this end he sends the Admirall of Breton, newly aduanced to that office, by the death of the Admirall of Breton, that attending his comming, he should inuest the towne, and sent to the Duke of Vendosme to come to him to Chalieu-Cambresis, which was the rendezvous for all the Army. So the King had the Admirals army, as a foreward on his right hand; that of the Duke on his left, and his Maiesty in the midst.

Longueval and Languey, with their companies of men at armes, and la Lande with a thousand foot, goe before, by the Admirals commandements, they take the Fort by assault, which the enemies had built vpon the bridge of the Riuer of Estruel: and before the towne had any knowledge thereof, they put to the sword three hundred men that had the guard thereof. In this amazement, if they had suddenly assailed the towne, in few it had bene forceable. Nor without long Landrecy, the Castle of Emery, and some other places taken and fortified, gave entry into the country of Hainault. Landrecy is situate vpon Semibre, a small river, but deepe and strong vpon the banks, which issuing out of Oise, in the Duchy of Guise, runnes by Chastillon, Landrecy, Marolles, Emery, and Malbeuge: then it runnes into the Meuse neere Namur. Beyond Sambre, is the Forest of Mornaur.

Languey foreseeing that the garison might vs the same stratagem they had done in the yeere 1524, had placed an hundred horse betwixt the forest and the towne, that being forced by the Admirals comming, they might cut off the retreat to them that were assailed. But as we haue said elsewhere, Envy doth alwayes crosse braue designs. The Admirall in stead of fauouring the enterprife, calls them backe that were on the other side of the river, being ready to performe a worthy exploit. And the enemy seeing the way open, retires into the forest, and at their dislodging consumes the towne to ashes: and not able to saue any thing but the Church, they burne their victuals and munition, which was sufficient to feed the garison of the towne a whole yeare. To repaire and make it defensible, the King gaue the gouernment thereof to La Lande, who by a counter trench, couered it from a mountain on the forest side, which looks into the towne, hee made three great bulwarks, and filled the Castle with earth to make a platforme, seruing as a flank to the bulwarks.

Let vs make another fault no lesse remarkable. The Duke of Vendosme marching by the high country of Artois to the Rendezvous, had suddenly reduced Bapaume to his obedience. Antoine, with the souldiers and citizens of all sexes, being retired into the Castle, had by one Well, which being drawne in two dayes would haue brought them to the Dukes mercy, when hee receiues a second charge from the King, that vpon paine of disobedience, and to incur his disgrace, he should continue the same day to him.

The Duke of Clenes left the besieged at liberty, and returned with his army. The King inuading his forces vnited, he found the number to be about eighteen hundred men at armes; whereof the Commanders were, the Duke of Guise, the Duke of Orleans, Vendosme and Guise, the Earles of Saint Paul, Aumale and Brienne, the Marquis of Brie, the Admirall Dampiere, Languey, Longueval, Bontiers, and many others; the number whereof should be about eight hundred light horse vnder Brissac, their Colonells being about a Legionaries, Picards, Normans, and Champenois, and twelue thousand footmen. The Castle of Emery might be fortified, and sent to Landrecy.

Landrecy. To that end the King sent the Dauphin with part of the army, and some artillery. The Lord of the place was at the warres in Gueldres, and they which kept it, yielded vpon the first approaches. Langcy with his company of men at armes, and an Ensigne of the Legion of Picardy was left for the defence & fortification of the place. The taking of Barlemont, another Caste vpon the same river, opened the passage vnto Bains, and to the gates of Monts in Hainault. Maubeuge was the enemies store-house, when as hee made any attempt against this Realme, and the towne being vnfortified with men, able to attend the Cannon, the inhabitants yielded to the Dauphin, who (leaving Heyley Capitaine of a thousand men of the legion of Picardy, and Saint Tne with five hundred) he retired to the army.

The army camped tenne leagues from Bains, and Bains was the ordinary retreat of the Imperials returning from the warre in Guelderland, who for the distance of the French campe, did lodge securely in the suburbs and villages about: considering that there were no horsemen at Maubeuge, Langcy gives intelligence to Maugeron, that they had means to doe a braue exploit with honor and profit. Hee comes with his company of men at armes, and fourescore of the Admirals, and parting by night, they take (in their passage) Capitaine Saint Tne, with fifty Harguebuziers on horsebacke, of the garison of Maubeuge, they lay an ambush halfe a league on this side Bains, within a wood, and send La Mot Gondrin Lieutenant to Maugeron, who remained sicke at Maubeuge, to enter the suburbs of Mons, and by the firing of some houfes, to take from them of the towne the knowledge of the enterprize of Bains: and then to retire themselves into the ambush, in case they were charged: and they send Marville, Lieutenant to Langcy, (who commanded the ambush) the Vidame of Chartres, la Rochequien, and the Harguebuziers on horsebacke, to surpris the Imperials in their suburbs, at the breake of day. Every thing was executed accordingly. About sixscore horse, ariving the night before, slept at their ease: they awake them somewhat rudely, and carry them away prisoners, spoile the villages about, returne to divide their rich booty at Maubeuge. At the same time the Earle of Aumale, tormented the garisons of Auenness with continuall skirmishes: but still with the decrease of their men, and no losse of his.

The Imperials surprised at Bains.

The prisoners of Bains had assured the King, that the towne was vnfortified with men of defence. He therefore sends the Dauphin and the Admirall to subdue it to his obedience. But at the first approach they found themselves abused. The Imperials had the next day after the alarme put fifteen hundred Lanquenets into the towne. Moreover, for want of well viewing the fort, they had indiscreetly planted the Cannon against the strongest part: the battery did small harme, many died there, and many returned wounded. Alere amongst others, a young man, who for his age had made good proofe of his person, lost his life. Capar of Coligny Lord of Chastillon (he shall hereafter play many parts vpon the Theater of this History) for one of the first exploits of Alsaines, had a shot in the throat. So the great number of Germanes which entred into Bains, the want of munition and victuals (the Dauphin having brought but for two dayes) the enemies which assailed at Monts, and at Quefnoy le Comte, the danger the King did foresee in keeping his troops divided, the feare that going in person to ioyne with his sonne (with whom were his chiefe forces, he should be constrained to leave the fortifications of Landrecy imperfect: his Malthe draws the Dauphin vnto him, he causeth him to beat downe the defences of Maubeuge in his passage: and (for that the Emperours was wont to assemble his forces there that came out of Germany and the Low Countries) to fire the towne. Trelon and Glayon, places betwixt Auenness and Simay, did greatly annoy the frontiers of Tiersse and Champagne. Bonnenal, and Stenay, Lieutenants to the Duke of Anguien (who was in Pronounce, as we shall shortly see) had commission to prevent it. Being come to Trelon with two thousand French, and four thousand Lanquenets, there within at the first sight of the Cannon yielded to have their liues saved. Glayon afterwards submitted with the like facility. Both being burnt, but their fortifications not ruined, shall serve againe to lodge the Imperials.

Emery remained still whole, but it might not be made fit to endure the attempts of a mighty army in twelve dayes. Moreover, it must be furnished with victuals of two rivers not to be waded through, betwixt Landrecy and Emery, made the victualling difficult. Auenness did cut it off, and the Commissaries of the victuals reported, that to put victuals into

A into Emery, were insurmountable to the army, and to take away the means to victual Landrecy for the want of carriage, which was greatly hindered by a continuall raining three weekes together. And that which did most importune, comes to the King, that the Emperours armies, and approached neere the countries of the Duke of Cleues, whom he might not abandon to the pawes of a roaring Lion, who had long time vowed his ruine, he the towers of the dungeon of Emery, and the portall of the wals flying into the ayre, by mines, and other means, serued to fill vp the trenches.

Hitherto we haue made warre with small resistance, hereafter we shall haue a stronger party, and by consequence more glory to crosse the Emperours attempts, whilst that mine and the winter drives him from before Landrecy. In the end of Iuly, Landrecy was in such estate, as without any support of an army, the fortifications might well be continued, leaving some troops at Guise, and the Duke of Cleues (against whom the Emperour banded all his power) appealed to the King for succours. The King therefore, to aduert the Emperours forces, to draw him to battell, and to try if he were accompanied with the like happinesse, leading his forces in person, as he had bene by his Deputies, or at the least by the taking of Luxemburg, to make the way easie to succour his allies, he sent the Duke of Vendosme to encounter the enemies attempts vpon the frontiers of his Picardie, and to fauour the necessary victualling of Landrecy: and for the execution of his enterprise, he appointed the Duke of Orleans, vader the conduct of the Admirall of Ansbault. The Prince of Melphes, whom the King had left in Guise with three hundred men at armes, and Brissac, Colonell of fifteen hundred light horse, to goe and ioyne with him about Rheims: And the Earles of Reux and Roquendols, with the forces of the Low countries, came from a skirmish at Landrecy, which they did hope to surpris, being vnfortified with victuals.

As they trooped together with a designe to attempt the Caste of Bohain, newes comes that La Hunauday and Theaude Bedaigne an Albanois, (either of them being Capitaine of two hundred horse) were lodged neere vnto the Caste of Bouhourie, making account to dislodge so easely, as they might come in time to part with the Generall. To surpris them the Lord of Liques, Lieutenant to the Duke of Alencors company, draws eight hundred choice Bourguignon horses out of the Imperiall troops, two hundred Englishmen, (the King of England being then fauoured by the Emperour, pretended to intade vs, as we shall hereafter see) and foure ensignes of foot-men. But lest he should come too late, hee leaves them behind him, and marcheth before with his horsemen.

At the first they charge Bedaigne lodging, who whilst the enemy was breaking open the gate, had leisure to put on his Cuirasse: he goes to horse-backe with his lance in his hand, forceth furiously through them, ouerthrowes them: he meets, and ioynes his troop with La Hunauday, who was likewise on horse-back. Aché and Bertrand of Foissy, Lord of Crené, Capitaine of 200 harguebuziers on horse-back, being lodged at the same Abbey, poste to their succours: they force the bridge which the Imperials kept, and ioyntly with the light-horsemen repulse the enemy. The alarme is giuen at Guise. Theaude Manes arives with his 200 light-horse to second his companions: and Brissac borrowing about threescore horse of the Prince of Melphes (his troops had already taken the way to Marle) goes to their aid: he is aduertified by Bedaigne, that the enemy (fearing to haue the whole army vpon them) beganne to wauer: all the troops ioyne and charge them suddenly: they ouerthrow their horsemen vpon their foot, which advanced and put them to rout: they pursue them speedily, leave three hundred dead vpon the place, carry away six hundred prisoners, and win foure ensignes and two Cornets. The rest of the Imperiall army going to assaile Bohain, hearing of this defeat, and doubting they should be forced to fight with the whole army, great amazed, and retired to Quefnoy le Comte. The Duke of Orleans having already by the taking of Saint Mary (for Montmedy and Yvooy were vnder the Kings obedience, since the first conquest made by the said Duke) Danuilliers, Vireton, Arlon, and other places made his approaches to Luxemburg: he prest it with two batteries at a corner of the high towne towards France, the one crossing the other: the one was committed to the Duke of Aumale, the other to Peter Storff, a Florentine, kinsman to Pope Clement deceased, who, (being lately come out of Italy) had brought three hundred Tuscan Soldiers, all men of note and commandement: two parts armed with Pikes, the third with Harguebuzers all with gilt corselets. The towne was defended by four hundred horse well appointed, pointed, and three thousand five hundred foot well armed, under the command of Gilles of Lannoy, a man well esteemed by the Imperials, and Jehan de Heu one of the Lords of Metz: yet at the fifth or sixth volley of the Cannon, having demanded composition, they departed with their baggage.

Zwingli entered as Gouverneur with his company of men at armes, Anglure with a thousand of the Legion of Champagne: Hardouin a Lorraine, and the Vicount of Riuier, commanding either of them five hundred men: and Thom Marin a Boulenois, six score Polians. The King having passed the Feast of Saint Michael there, and performed the ceremonies of the Order, he disposed of the fortifications of the towne: then he prepared himselfe to succour Landrecy, which the Imperials besieged, leaving the Legionaries of B Champagne and Normandy vnder the Count Burienne, to favour the victualling of his new conquest, the which he had committed to the Prince of Melphe, being assisted with the companies of men at armes of the Lords of Sedan, Iametz, Brienne, Langcy, Estauges, La Maille, and two thousand Lanquenets led by Fresnay, and ten thousand Legionaries.

The munition was prepared at Stenay and Mouzon: and for want of carriages which they had purposely stayed on all sides, the campe was so oppressed with famine, as the Capitaines themselves had no bread to eat. So the souldiers being impatient and ill affected: disdaining moreover to see themselves disappointed of the sacke and spoile of Luxembourg, whereof they were in hope, they mutine and returned home to their houses: so as of vntwelve thousand, about three hundred remained vnder their ensignes: and Capitaine Thierrier (whom the Duke of Orleans had left in Arlon) having spoiled the towne, took the same way with his company. Without doubt these poore townsmen newly conquered, shewed themselves more faithfull then this wretch, who was appointed to defend them. They giue notice, that they had shut their gates against the Imperials that were come to seize on their towne: and that having taken their oath of fidelity vnto the King, they were resolute to keepe their faith, so as they might be releued. Ten or twelue thousand Lanquenets were assembled vpon Moezel to hinder this victualling. Notwithstanding, through the helpe of the men at armes, and the Lanquenets of Fresnay, Luxembourg was victualled for three moneths, in despite of the enemy, and Arlon supplied with six hundred men, and such a quantity of munition as the time would permit. The taking of D Luxembourg had giuen the King means to send the Admirall with foure hundred men at armes, and ten thousand foot, to succour the Duke of Cleues, in whose fauour this war was chiefly attempted. But the Duke after the taking of the towne of Dure, having no means to auoid the storme which threatened him with apparant ruine, nor long to withstand to great a power, made his peace with the Emperor, yeelded vnto him the Duchy of Gueldres, the County of Zutphen, and the forts of Heusberg and Sittart, to dispose thereof at his pleasure. At the same time Don Fernand of Gonsagua, Lieutenant general for the Emperor, besieged Guise: but being aduertised of the Kings arriuall at Couchy, who marched with great speed to encounter the Emperor, he resolved to make his retreat to Landrecy, Brissac with a number of men at armes, and harguebuziers on horse backe, lies in ambush in a wood to surprize them in their dislodging, and sends Theau de Bedaigne his band to enter skirmish with the Imperiall light-horse men, and to draw them (if it were possible) into the ambush. But Bedaigne not able by skirmish to make them abandon the body of their army which marched towards Landrecy, Brissac puts forth five hundred horse, to giue a furious charge, and he follows with his whole troop to second them. Ovt men making a gallant charge, ouerthrow all they encounter: they kill and take prisoners, amongst others, Don Francis of Este, brother to the Duke of Ferrara, Capitaine general of all the Imperiall horsemen: and they presse the rest so hotly, as Gonsagua gathering together all his battalions, is forced to turne head to save the rest. So Brissac suffered him to goe on his pretended way, to ioyne with the Earle of Reux, who had long time before possessed the fort of Landrecy.

Now are all the Imperiall forces before Landrecy, eightene thousand Germanes, ten thousand Spaniards of the old band, six thousand Wallons, ten thousand English, thirteen thousand horse, of the ordinary band of the Low-countries, Cleues and high Germanes. The Campe being lodged, and the Artillery planted, the Emperour makes three batteries of five and forty peeces against the bulwarke of Orleans, against the Caste, and against the bulwarke of Vendosme: and to keepe the defendants from making of any rampier,

A pier, or coming to the defences, the bulwarke and curtaines being not yet halfe finished, they plant a long Culuerin vpon a little hill towards the Forest of Mormail. This peece did wonderfully annoy them, and they had no means to charge, the Lanquenets which did guard it but on the one side. The river that passed by the trench of the bafe towne, which they had abandoned, ranne betwixt them. Ricarnille with forty horse, and Saint Simon with thirty foot, and some pioneers, undertake to seize vpon this peece. They passe the water, surprize the Lanquenets, put them to rout, draw the Culuerin by maine strength to the bulwarke of Orleans, turne the mouth of it against the enemy, and from the rampier kill many Bourguignons with their small fort, being come to the trench to rescue it. The King advanced, but the Emperour (to doe some notable exploit before his arriuall) ouerthrow a great part of the wall, making it very easie to assaile: and to take from the besieged all means to defend this breach, he put them into a portall of the bafe towne which was abandoned: and about it he plants certaine field-peece, which commanded the breach. The souldiers were now brought to halfe a loafe of prouant-bread aday, and to drinke faire water. So whilst they were well affected, and had some courage (for men ill fed and tired with continuall labour faint soone) they must take this lodging from the Imperials. Three hundred men appointed by La Lande and Esse, assaile them one morning at the breake of day, and before they could come from the campe to succour them, they dislodge them. The breach inuities them to the assault: but the Emperour considering the valour of the defendants, foreseeing that he should hardly take it by force, without the losse of many of his men, he makes his accompt that famine, and the continuall toils of warre would in the end vanquish them.

The want of victuals, the weaknesse of the place, and the insupportable trauell which they must necessarily endure day and night, made the besieged to hazard Tuelle a Norman Capitaine of five hundred men in Landrecy, to aduertise the King, that extreme necessity would soone constrain them to yeeld, but no force, whilst they had a man liuing. The King assembles his Campe at La Fere vpon Oise: and knowing the resolution of these braue men, he went to lodge at Chateau-Cambrésis, holding it more honourable to turn head to the enemy, then by delays to make them think he would not fight: he gave charge to Langcy to gather together all the fat cattell, all the meale, and all the horses of labour he could, that whilst the King should feed the Emperour with the hope of a battell, they might refresh the besieged.

On the 25 of October he had drawne into Capelle twelue hundred sheepe, nine-score cattell, six hundred sackes of meale, with so many horses and men, euery one carrying a sacke vpon his horse. The enemy scoured the country with a thousand or twelue hundred horse. Notwithstanding, Langcy having ioynd with Sansfaict troope, being resolute to passe on, or to sell their liues dearly, he causeth his peasants to march in battell like to men of warre, to the end the enemy discovering them as farre off, should hold them to be men of another quality. Thus they brought their victuals safely to Landrecy, and then retiring E a contrary way to that where the Imperials attend them, they returned safely to la Capelle. Our men are now victualled for fifteene dayes, but they haue need of rest, and the place to be refreshed with men.

The Emperour finding the King to approach, retired on this side the water, gathering together all his forces, which were before diuided: and his Maiesty embracing this occasion, sends the Earle of Saint Paul and the Admirall of Annebault, to retire them out of Landrecy, who had suffered much for his seruice, and to supply the place with fresh souldiers. They left the Lord of Veruain for the Kings Lieutenant, commanding a thousand men of the Legion of Picardy, and Rochbatain five hundred. La Lande, and La Chapelle Rainsouin, in recompence of their good seruises, were made Stewards of the Kings house, and Esse a Gentleman of his Chamber. The Dukes of Neuers and Aumale, and two brothers of Rochfoucault, the Lords of Andelot, Brezé, Cizeaux, Bonnieres his brother, Saint Lawrence of Britany, Atenay, Saint Phille, and many other young Gentlemen, who (to winne honour by some worthy exploits) had voluntarily entred into it) were rewarded according to their qualities. The souldiers were made Gentlemen during their liues, and such as had offended the law, pardoned. The King had now put in execution one of his chiefe designs, in view of a great Emperour. Winter was coming, the continuall raine had made frustrate all their attempts of warre: and the long abode of the two armies, had broken the wayes six leagues about. The Emperour camped high with advantage, having a valley and a small brooke not easie to be passed, betwixt both the armies. There was no reason to passe the water, and mounting to fight with the enemy. The Emperour likewise would not passe to give the first charge. So his Majesty giving the enemy hope by fires and great noise, that he would fight, made his retreat towards Guife. The Emperour advertised in the morning that the army was dislodged, hee commanded Fernand of Gonfagua to follow, who (the better to discover them) intended to put some men into a wood where they must passe, but it was too late: the wood was full of French Hargue buizers, who received these adventurers so gallantly, as few escaped to carry news unto their companions of the manner of their retreat.

The Emperour followed with the rest of his forces, whilst the skirmish was maintained in the wood. Gonfagua seeing himselfe seconded by his chiefe commander, drew forth a thousand or twelue hundred horse, with a good number of shot, and English light-horsemen, on the right hand towards Bohain. But all in vaine, the Cannon and baggage (having passed the wood) followed the King in safety who marched before, and the Dauphin holding the middle, with eight hundred men at armes, and fourtene thousand Suiffes, having left Brissac with his light horse-men, and foure hundred men at armes to second him: moreover, the Suiffes were behind in the battell, and himselfe on the wing to support them, with an intent to fight with the Emperour if he passed the wood: but he forced the enemy to retire, not daring any more to appeare: many of his men were slaine, many taken, and few of ours.

The season was not fit to campe: so the King, to refresh his army, sent the Marshall of Biez to Saint Quentin with foure hundred men at armes, and foure thousand foot, to oppose against the Emperours designs upon that frontier: the Languenets to Crecy vnder Cere, the Suiffes to Ailly, and he lodged the rest of his army along the river of Oise. And the Emperour seeing that he had lost his labour before Landrecy: and that hee had with losse and dishonour followed the French army, retired to Cambray, winning much more with the Foxes skinne, then he had done with the Lions: for by means of their Bishop, who was of the House of Croy, perswading the light-beleaving Citizens, that the King meant to seize upon their towne, so spoile them of that ancient right of neutrality, and to incorporate them to the crowne, he made them yeeld to the building of a citadell, by the which of free-men they are now become slaves, and this citadell shall hereafter serve as a buckler against Landrecy. We have here omitted to describe the exploits of the Duke of Anguien in Prouence. The King had sent him to receive the army by sea, which Barberousse brought to his succour. Being at Marfeilles, Grignan Gouvernor of the towne, did acquaint him with an intelligence which he had with three souldiers of the garisons of the castle of Nice, who promised to deliver him the said castle. The Duke well informed of the Kings pleasure, being loth to commit himselfe rashly to the discretion of traytors, who might as well sell the stranger as their owne Country, armed foure Gallies, and sent them before vnder the command of Captaine Magdelen, brother to the Baron of S. Blaise, himselfe with eleven other Gallies, tooke the sea, and the advantage of the wind, either to second his men, or to retire at need. When as Magdelen approached to Nice, six Gallies issue forth to inuest him, and fifteene more led by Iacotin Doris, chase him vnto the port of Antibo. Magdelen hurt with a Cannon shot, died soone after: the Gallies being abandoned were a prey for Iacotin, and the Duke discovering by Moore light, that Iacotin came to surprize him, retired speedily to Toulon without any losse.

Hereupon Barberousse arises at Marfeilles with an hundred and ten Gallies. The King pretends Nice to be his, and heretofore engaged by the Earles of Prouence, to the Duke of Sauoy for a summe of money. They assaile it, and within few dayes bring it to composition. But without the castle, this victory was fruitlesse: the castle seated upon a high and steepe rock is hard to batter, and more vnesie to undermine. So Barberousse seeing the time spent in vaine, and winter approaching, retired his Gallies to Toulon: and the Duke upon hope of a battell, came to the King to Cambresie.

The taking of Nice drew the Marquis of Gust to succour the Castle: but advertised of their liberty, he employed his forces elsewhere. Montdeus was the first place of the kings obedience in Piedmont, which made head in his return: and Boutieres having few French foot to man in, he was forced to put it Suiffes. The Suiffes are more fit for the field, yet are they

A they commended to have done their duties. But after, many assaults and toiles, want of victuals, and despair of succours, made them enter into capitulation: the which was ill observed by the Spaniards: for they were stript, and many put to the sword. A wound which shall prove bloody to the Spaniards at the battell of Serifolles. This victory caused the Marquis to passe the Po, and to take from our men the commoditie of all the plaine of Piedmont on this side the water (for that which they held on the other side, as Saullan, Beine, Roque de Bau, and Cental, were without hope of succour) he turned head towards Carignan, whither the Lord of Austun, and Francis Barnardin of Vimarcat (having no forces to make head against eightene thousand men, and to take from the enemy all B means to make vse thereof) they razed the fortifications which were made the yeere before by Languey. But they had no means to finish their enterprize, nor leisure to recover Montcallier, for the enemy meeting them at the passe of a river, slue many, and tooke the greatest part of them prisoners.

This losse was ready to be seconded by that of Luxemburg which the Earle of Furstemberg (a man variable in his parties) besieged in the Emperours name, with twelue thousand Languenets, & a good number of horse. The besieged wanted victuals, and the winter had not bene so violent in twenty yeares. They did the prouant-wine with hatches, and it was sold by weight, and then the souldiers caried it away in baskets. The King being loth to lose any part of his conquests, sent the Prince of Melpe, with about foure hundred men at armes, Brissac Colonell of the light-horse, and some foot. The Earle seeing that the extreme frosts did kindle the courage of the commanders and souldiers, who marched with an intent to fight with him, raised his campe, and tooke his way to Germanica. The Prince retired Longueval and his troops, having bene long kept in, to enjoy the liberty of the fields, leaving the Vicount of Eustauges, surnamed Anglore, with his companie of men at armes, and fifteene hundred foot: then he dispersed his army into Garisons in Champagne and Picardy, to make head against the enemy the rest of the winter, and to preferre the last conquests.

On the other side, his Majesty knowing that the Imperials was master of the field, hee supplied Boutieres his Lieutenant in Piedmont, with foure thousand French foot leauied by the Lord of Tais in Prouence, Dauphine, and thereabouts, and five thousand Gruyers or Grisons (to ioyne with the five thousand Suiffes, entertained in Piedmont) with some three hundred men at armes. With this supply he recovered the field which he had long before lost, tooke many small places betwixt Vercell and Yurée, forced Saint Germane, (a towne vpon the way from Chiusas to Vercell, where the counter-scarpe of the trenches is as high as the wall, so as the Cannon cannot beat at the foot thereof) to plant the *Es*signes of France, and then he marched before Yurée, and besieged it on all parts. But hee had small credit with the souldiers: and the King was discontent with him, for that he had so lightly suffered the Marquis to fortifie Carignan, and to victual it without any resistance. He therefore sends Francis of Bourbon, Duke of Anguien in Boutieres place, to be E Lieutenant General in Piedmont.

The Duke having taken charge of the army, he marched downe the Po, and at the first subdued Palazol, Cressentin, Defanne, and other places thereabouts, to make the way easie to Carignan, the which kept all the plaine of Piedmont in subiection, which the King desired infinitely to haue in his power. But the meanes to force it? It is a place in a plaine country, it was fortified with five goodly bastions of earth, curtains, and a great trench, defended by foure thousand the best souldiers of all the Imperiall army, so as their onely hope to recover it was to famish them. To this end he burnt the bridge they had vpon the Po, whereby they might daily haue refreshing from Quiers, Ailly and other places vnder their command, and to cut off the victuals they had on this side the Po, he wrote to camp F at Vimeux, some miles beneath Carignan. They received also many commodities from Montcallier vnto the river: for he built vpon the said way a quarter of a mile from Carignan, cuts off all, and to enjoy the title of Po freely, he builds a bridge of boats two miles beneath Carignan, with a foot at either end, manned with 4 ensignes of Italians. Then passing the water, he went to camp at Villedeslon betwixt Carignan and Quiers. The Marquis made haste to assemble his army to succour the besieged and came to lodge at Cambridge. Holding this lodging, he fought the first battle, and suffering on men to die for hunger in a country already wasted on that side the Po, he found the Marquis of Saules full of all commodities, wherewith he might without danger refresh Catignan. The Duke A prevents him, and lodging at Carmagnole, drives the besieged to that extremity, as within few weekes they were drawne to the Kings obedience. Carignan was the chiefe trophoe of the Marquis victories: he was loth to lose it without some blowes, and the Duke as loth to lose a prey which was ready to fall into his hands.

So the Court filled with the hope of an approaching battell, that gallant Nobility which had alwayes so willingly gone to horsebacke at the first bruce of a battell, would now have beene loth to have lost the sport. All post thither, some with leave, others without. Gaspard Lord of Chabillon, Francis of Vendome Vidame of Chartres: the Lords of Saint Andre, Dampierre of the House of Clermont in Dauphiné, Jarnac, the three brothers of Bonnivet, Bourdillon, Esclars, the two brethren of Genly, Asnier Master of the Ordinance, L'Hunandey the onely sonne of the Admirall Annebauld, Rocheport, Lusarche, Warin, Lafigny: to conclude, the Court was left in a manner naked: namely of those, which as the Sunne-rising, followed the Dauphin, and he was not held an honest man that would not have a share in it.

A happy aviall: they were all men of account, they had by this voyage emptied their owne or their fathers coffers, and the Dukes treasure was so wasted, as both he, his Treasurers, and all the rest of the campe had emptied their purses, and for want of money the souldiers would have beene lesse couragious in this occasion that was offered. But what would not these braue Noblemen doe for the Kings service, and the authority of so gallant a Prince that commanded? With their voluntary lendings, the Duke contents his troops, attending forty thousand crownes which Langey brought. This was the fourth part of that which was owing to the strangers: but they must seeke it elsewhere. The Emperour leaued a mighty army in Germany to invade the frontiers: moreover, a great storme threatened vs from beyond the Seas, which soone after fell vpon Boulon and Montreuil.

They had no meanes to content the souldiers, if they had not presently found out the want of their numbers: they therefore resolve on Easter Eue the seventh of April, to make a private muster of euery company apart, and giue them hope to receive money the next day. But they did foresee, that Easter day would not passe (the Armies being so neere) D without some blowes, & by consequence the enemies presence, and the necessity of fighting would easily make them defer the souldiers pay. And so it proved. The Marquis set forward with an intent to passe on this side the river of Po, to keepe our men on that side the water, without victuals and without money, and to recover the Marquisate of Salufes: being assured to find corne and meale there to victuall his campe, and the towne besieged, forcing the French army in the end to seeke their retreat. Without doubt this had beene their ruine, for the souldiers being vnpaid, what meanes was there to keepe the field? and retiring into towns, the Marquis would have spoiled Piedmont, burnt the country, driuen away their cattell, and ruined the country-man. This was his designe, and to receive ten thousand men at Yurec, which the Earle of Challan brought, and with this supply to passe by the valley of Aoult, into Saouy and Bresse, whilst the Emperour should make some great attempt vpon the frontiers of Champagne.

But he reckoned without his host. The Duke takes counsell, and resolves to fight with him on the way, before he should recover a country of strength; and to that end giues the foreward to Boutieres, (who vpon the newes of this battell was returned from his house) takes the battell to himselfe, and commits the reereward to Dampierre.

On Easter day euery man is vnder his Ensigne, they discouer the Imperials marching from Serifolles to Sommeuue: and the Duke to diuert them, sends forth Ausson with his troop and some shot, vnto a high ground of aduantage, who placing his Harguebuziers in a little groue, seeks to draw the enemy by skirmishes into the ambuscade. But the Marquis F dares not charge home, he fears some disorder before hee had discovered his adversary. The Duke marcheth with about 300 horse, and the rest of his shot, and going to the hill, puts all his horse in battell vpon the side, and in the midst plants three mynions, which shooting against a battalion of the enemies standing in the valley, kills some men, and giues a shew of battell. So the Marquis fearing to be fought withall as hee lodged, retired to Serifolles from whence he parted. Night approached, and the Duke seeing the Marquis returne to Serifolles, retired to Carmagnole, leauing two hundred horse to observe the

A the enemies countenance in the night, then an houre after midnight he goes to field.

The Marquis seeing this retreat, perfwaded himselfe, the French would passe on the other side of Po, and leave him the passage: so as changing his designe, he parts an houre before day, to ouertake him before he should passe the River. To returne to the fort which they had left, had beene (by some signe of flight) to daunt our men, and to giue courage to the enemy, necessitie therefore presteth both the one and the other to fight. The Imperials had ten thousand men more, and the aduantage of the place: they had recovered that high ground from whence our men were parted the night before: they should have kept it, seeing their meaning was to returne. On the right hand of our men marched the

The forme of two armies.

B Prince of Salerne with ten thousand Italians, seconded by eight hundred horse sent by the Duke of Ferrara, to succour the Imperials. In the middlest Ailspand of Madruce with many other German Colonels and Captaines, who commanded ten thousand Lansquenets all in white armour: and on the left, (right against our Gruyens) Don Raimond of Cardone with a battalion of six thousand men old souldiers, halfe Spaniards, the rest Germanes: betwixt these two nations the Marquis of Guast with the like number of horse: on the other side of the Spaniards the Prince of Sulmona, sonne to the deceased Don Charles de Launoy Viceroy of Naples, Colonell of all the horse, with the like number of horse: ten pieces of Cannon by the Germanes, and as many by the Spaniards, placed with such aduantage, as our French could not march against them, but they shot into the

C midst of their battalions. Thus they marched in forme of three great battalions of foot, either hauing a wing of horsemen. Their order being viewed, the Duke brings his armie into the like forme: on the right hand a battalion of the old French bands, being about 3000 besides the shot, led by the Lord Tais their Generall, hauing on the right hand the light horse-men vnder the Lord of Termes: on the left hand Boutieres with fourescore men at armes: then on his left hand a battalion of Suisses, of about three thousand men, supported on their left hand by the Duke of Anguene with a great troope of horse: and on the Dukes left hand 2000 Italians, and Gruyens, hauing on their left Dampierre, with all the Guidons and archers of the men at armes. The troopes thus disposed and ordered, he sent forth before the battalies about 200 shot, for a shew of hope, led by Captaine D Montlac: eight pieces of artillerie before the battalion of the Suisses, and the like number before the Gruyens.

At the Sun-rising the two armies stand one against another: the skirmish begins, and whilst that either army seeks to get the flanke of the enemy, they continue vntill eleuen of the clocke. In the end, the enemy finding himselfe too strong by a third part, he comes to the charge. Tais aduanceth to fight with the Prince of Salerne, but he was commanded by the Marquis, not to stirre before he gaue him charge. So Tais seeing the Prince make no shew to march, and that our Suisses being weake in number could not withstand the shoocke of the Imperiall Lansquenets, which came to charge them: he turnes the head of his battalions, and comes neere to the Suisses, Boutieres being betwixt both. The Imperials E likewise change their designe, and of their great squadron make two: one against the Suisses, the other against the French.

The battell of Serifolles.

At the same instant the horsemen of Ferrara approached to charge the French battalions in flanke when as the armies should ioyne. Termes with his light horse-men being loth to attend this hazard, chargeth them furiously, breaks and ouerthrowes them vpon the Prince of Salerne: and thinking to be well followed, chargeth into the midst of the Princes battalions: but his horse was slain, and himselfe taken. A happy charge, for without it, it was likely the Prince of Salerne had marched vpon the flanks of the French battalions, and whilst that he was couerred with the Ferrarois that were driuen vpon him, the French and Suisses had leisure to deale with their Lansquenets: Who falling vpon the F Suisses and French, fought long with the like armes and a doubtfull euent, till that by the aide of the French-men at armes led by Boutieres, all the Imperiall Germanes were broken. The Marquis seeing his Germanes in rout, vpon whom hee had anchored his chiefe hope, retires apart without striking stroke, and by this meanes makes the victory eadie for Dampierre vpon the enemies horse-men, who supported the Spaniards. But this old battalion of Spaniards and Germanes incounter our Italians and Gruyens with great aduantage at the first charge they are surprisid with feare, and all but the Captaines, which fought in the foremost ranks, &c.

With-

Without doubt it was wisely advised of the Duke to leave the Suisses whom he promised to assist, to second their poore amazed souldiers, for without him not one had escaped. He suddenly chargeth the old souldiers, and taking one corner of their battalion, forth through them, and leaves not any ensigne of the whole battalion standing: yet not without great slaughter of his men. The Lord of Affier, the Baron of Oyn, Lieutenant to the Earle of Monttrauel, Montfaisais Ensigne to the Baron of Cursoll, de Glaine Gouverneur of Cahors, Cornille and the Dukes two Squieres ended their dayes there. S. Amand (otherwise called Rochechouart) and Fernaques were found among the dead carcases languishing of their wounds, yet they were afterwards cured: many others were slain or hurt, whereof fourteene or fifteene were Captaines or men of account; but he that feared his leaues, must not goe into the wood.

But this is not all, for the front of the Spaniards (who by the voluntary rout of our men that ranne away, had no foot-men to encounter them) come furiously and charge the Duke, who having no foot-men to second him, loseth more at this second charge than at the first: and to increase the danger (which had been sufficient to daunt a minde inclining to feare) he had no newes of his Frenchmen nor Suisses: a little hill kept them from the knowledge one of another: but hee had rather die then retire. Hee chargeth and rechargeth, and still a number of the enemies shot pel-mel at him, and a battalion of their pikes follow him without breaking their ranks, and his troope being greatly wasted, was not now about an hundred horse: a vnequall force to fight with foure thousand men. We may truly say, he is well kept whom God keeps. The Duke was ready to bee swallowed vp, when as retiring on the right hand, to free himselfe from the Imperials host, which compassed him in on all sides: the Spaniards had newes of the defeat of the rest of their men. They see at the same instant some troopes rally themselves vnder the Cornet of their enemies Generall. So their first heat grew some what cold, and they begin their retreat, but they had no time to finish it. The Duke appoints Aussun, with about fifty horse to charge them vpon the flanke, and himselfe with those that came vnto him, followed them in the rayle. All this way, all this, every man seeks to free himselfe, some in the wood, some in cottages: they beat downe and kill, all are taken or slaine; few escape.

He wins the battaile.

The French pursuing the victorie a mile, and especially the Suisses, incensed with the foule warre the Imperials had made at Montdeuis; and crying in reuenge of that day, Montdeuis, Montdeuis, put all they encountered to the sword without mercie. In the meane time the Prince of Salerne, seeing the whole defeat of the Germans, and of their horsemen, made his retreat without any great losse. And the Marquis of Guast posted away to Aft: but at his departure he had said vnto the Citizens: That if he returned, not a Conqueror, they should shut their gates against him. They take him now at his word. Without the cowardize of the Gruyens, the battalion of Spaniards had in them been defeated at the first charge: the Duke of Anguien had not received so small a checke in his troopes, the retreat of the Prince of Salerne had not bene so ealie; and pursuing the Marquis, they might haue overtaken him, before hee had recovered Milan or any place of safety. But the necessitie this braue Duke had to be succoured at need, made this happy victorie vnperfect in that respect. There were slaine of the enemies about fifteene thousand of all nations, in less then a quarter of a league.

Number of the dead &amp; prisoners.

Of Germane prisoners there were two thousand, five hundred and twenty. Alibrand of Madrice their Colonell, was found among the dead bodies many wayes in many parts of his bodie; of Spaniards six hundred and thirtie, amongst them Don Raymond of Cardone and Alenda, with seven, or eight, other Spanish Captaines, Don Charles Gonzales and many other Italians. The spoyle was great and rich, an hundred thousand Crowns in money, and plate, fifteene pieces of artilerie, all the bridges they had brought to passe the Po, much munition, meale, and other victuals: wherewith they pursued to raise Carignan about eight thousand Crowles of Milan, and neweables of diuers sorts of great value. Of the French two hundred slaine, and men of name, besides the above mentioned, the Ensigne-bearer to Aussun and his nephew Charles of Dicos, Gouverneur of Montdeuis, Difere of the Countie of Nice, Colonell of six Ensignes of Italiane, the Colonell of the Gruyens a Dauphinois, in the absence of their Earle; de Valera Dauphinois, Captain Palsin a Dauphinois: Barberan and Montale Galeons, and few others.

A of the Suisses, the Baron of Saxe was hurt in the throat with a pike, and none else of account.

If the Duke of Anguens ariall had bene pleasing to the armie, farre greater was the reputation which he got by his famous victorie with all the nations of Europe, and the credit he purchased with men of warre, commending his wisdom in so young yeares, admiring his valour, and louing his courtie and bounty, vertues worthy of a great Prince and Generall of an armie. This bloody victorie had terrified the whole country, and amazed Milan. The Marquis of Guast strucke vp the drumme, and twenty dayes were spent before that any man came to his colours. Moreover, the King had made a new leauy of six thousand Grisons: the Duke of Somme, the Earles of Petillane, Mirandola, Mantengue, Peter Straffy, Valerio Prin, Robert Malatesta, and many others leauied an armie to ioyne with the Duke of Anguien.

There was some likelihood after so furious a battaile, to deprive the Emperor of the estate of Milan. But he armed vpon the Rhine, his troopes were ready to invade the frontier. The English were at sea, and the King had rather need to draw forces out of Italy, then to supply them.

The Duke therefore to draw them speedily to the Kings deuotion, sends the Lords of Tais with the French bands, two hundred men at armes, six great Cannons, with some other pieces, to force some places vnder the Emperors obedience. Saint Damian a place of Montferrat, had not planted the French but the Spanish Ensignes: notwithstanding being without hope of succours, they yielded to the yoke, vpon condition that they should haue none but a French garison. Montcallier followed, being a strong place: Vigon, Pont d'Esture, S. Salvador, Fresnet of Pau: to conclude, all Montferrat, except Casal, Trin and Alba yielded their necks to the French obedience. And the Duke going to campe at Carignan, did by many sorts so restrain the sallies of the besieged, and the entry of victuals, as extreme necessitie hauing forced them to demand composition, they departed with their armes onely, without ensignes or drums, taking an oath not to carie armes for six months against the King nor his allies. This done, the duke sent vnto the King, six thousand French souldiers of the old bands, and six thousand Italians to oppole against the Emperors inuasions.

Effects following the victory.

On the other side the Duke of Somme, with the other of the French faction, hauing leauied ten thousand foot, but few or no horse, came to ioyne with the Duke of Anguien: and the Princes of Salerne and Sulmona attended with a number of horse and foote, to fight with them at the passage of a riuier. They send to the Lord of Tais to demand a convoy of horse. Hee promisseth, but performs nothing. And they (notable to retire without shame) charge the foot which were farr from their horsemen, and put them to rout: but they consider not, that leauing a place of strength, they giue the enemy the advantage they had of them. The horsemen come and charge them in flanke, as they had broken their ranks, thinking to haue gotten the victory and put them to flight, they take many prisoners of qualitie, kill few, and no man of marke except Valerio Prin, the rest saved themselves at Quierras and Carignan. We commonly say, that a small ayde doth a great good: The foot-men being overcome, an hundred men at armes had made the victory absolute.

This checke doth not daunt them. The Duke of Somme being newly distressed from prison, (the Prince of Salerne his kinsman had freed him, fearing lest the Emperor should doe him some disgrace) and Peter Straffy gathering together six thousand men of this shipwreake at Marandole, meaning to ioyne with the Duke of Anguien at what price soeuer, he being vnfurnished of forces; for besides the twelue thousand men he had sent vnto the King, all his Suisses (except two thousand) had bene for want of pay dismissed; F They giue over the plaine, and passe out of Parmelian with much toyle; by the mountains of Genoa.

The Marquis aduertised of this new leauy, gathers together what forces hee could of horse and foot, draves forth his garrisons, and to stop their passage, attends them at the foot of the mountains. They aduertise the Duke: who hauing no men, but for the guard of his places, resolves notwithstanding to effect two things at once; and both to surprise Alba where they had left no men but for the guards of the gates, and to succour Straffy, and sending attunes to aduertise him, that he should march towards Alba, where

of the enemy was left in doubt. The Duke comes thither on the one side, and Strassy on the other: he makes a hole in the gate towards the mountain, on the other side of the water, about ten foot long: prepares to give an assault, and Strassy the scaldado, which the besieged seeing, they grow so amazed, as they yield the place, and depart without carrying away of any thing.

Truce in Piedmont.

The Marquis makes haft to succour them, but knowing the towne to be lost, frustrate of his hope, hee retired, and the Duke having taken many places thereabout, returned to Carmagnole. Within few dayes after the Marquis procured a suspension of armes, which being confirmed by their two Maiesties, there followed a truce for three moneths. Let vs now see the enemies attempt invading the Realme. The Emperor had no sooner found the King of England discontent, (whereof the marriage of the King of Scotland had been the chief motive) but forgetting, or rather dissembling the injuries he had received, hee wins him to his devotion, although hee had assured the Pope neuer to treat any alliance with him, vntill he had repaired the offence done vnto the Sea of Rome, intiding himselfe supreme head, vnder God, of the Church of England, and punishing them which maintained the authoritie of the Pope and Church of Rome.

Warre in Picardy.

Thus two grey-hounds tearing one another in pieces, lay aside their choller to runne after the Wolfe their common enemy. And for that, during the warre of the Dukes of Wirtemberg, by the bond of the Princes of Germany with the King, the Emperours designs had become greatly croft, now perswading them (and aboute all the Protestants) that he hath done more then his duty to the French King, for the calling of a Councell, to call backe them that were strayed from the vnion of the Church, and to reforme the Pope and his Ministers (but the King onely had hindred this assembly) to giue him prouision of men and money, and ioynly to bandy with him to the destruction of this Realme. So he sends the Earle of Fursberg with an army before Luxemburg, which having maintained the siege to the extremitie for want of victuals, the Vicont of Estanges was forced to capitulate, and to depart with baggage. Commerce was the second triumph of his victories, Ligny in Barrois the third, being the way for victuals which came to him from Metz and Lorraine. The castle is commanded by two or three mountaines: and the besieged notable to stand to their defences, came to parle, when as the Imperials entred behinde, compassed them in that were come to the breach, attending the assault: and take them prisoners with small slaughter. Without doubt the place was not to withstand the force of an Emperor, being in person: neither was it so contemptible, but it deserved an honest composition. But the Earle of Brienne Lord of the place, and Rouffy his brother, Eschenais and Gonzoller, who commanded about an hundred men at armes, and fiftene hundred foot, won small reputation. Doubtlesse the Earle of Sancerre will win farre more honour in the defence of Saint Disier, a place ill flanked, ill rampared, and vnworthy to oppose against an Imperiall armie.

Saint Disier besieged.

Whilest the King assembled his forces, being ten thousand Suisses, six thousand Grisons, six thousand Lanquents (whereof the D. of Nevers was Generall) and the twelve thousand men which came out of Piedmont: he sent the Earle of Sancerre, to Saint Disier (whither the Emperor turned the head of his victorious armie without contradiction) with the Duke of Orleans company, of an hundred men at armes, whereof hee was Lieutenant, and some other troopes of horse: La Lande and the Vicont of Riuere either of them with a thousand foot. The Emperor being come before the towne, hastens his approaches and trenches, makes two batteries, and plants six great Culverins towards the castle, to beat into the towne, and to hinder their ordinary sallies. He turned the water out of the ditch, and brought them to the vie of three Wells onely, which hardly could furnish the soldiers: and by a continuall batterie makes them careful to repaire it. La Lande was tyred with this toyle, and retiring at night to his lodging to refresh himselfe, a Cannon shot passing by the breach through the towne, takes off his head, whose losse was much lamented being a valiant Gentleman, and a good souldier. In exchange, about the same time the Prince of Orange going to visit the Emperor in the trenches, a Culverin shot into a heape of stones, hurt him in such sort as he died, to the great griefe of the Emperor and his whole armie.

The death of the Prince of Orange.

The breach was reasonable, and they came to the assault. Eightene enignes of Spaniards got to it: and fight hand to hand with them which were besieged, for an houres space.

A space. The Emperor causeth nine or ten thousand Germans, to aduance speedily to succour them: but if the assault was fierce, the defence was no lesse valiant. Our men ouerthrew the Spaniards from the breach into the ditch by maine force. The Emperor sends aboute eight hundred men with Veluer castlocks, and bouguinets on their heads, they turne them likewise downe. Eight enignes of Germans renew the assault with many small barrels of powder and wild-fire. They are likewise repulsed with such flame and losse, as all their engines and deuices remaine in the ditches at the defendants disposal (and very happily, for they wanted powder) and seuen or eight hundred flaine in three assaults, gaue a certaine testimonie of the valour of the besieged. A Cannon shot did miraculously take away the Earles sword which hee held in his hand without hurting him, but lightly in the face.

This braue defence made the Emperor thinke, that the besieged would accept of an honorable composition. He sends a Trumpet to trie their minds, but he had no audience. So the Emperor ceaseth his batteries to come to the myne. The besieged discover it, and in the night send forth Lisieres a Norman Captaine, who forced the Spaniards to abandon the trenches, which they had brought to the bulwark of victory: they bring some prisoners into the towne to tell newes, and cuts the rest in pieces. Moreover, the Duke of Anjou male being at Senay vpon Meuze, did greatly annoy the Imperials campe, and cut off their victuals from Bar-le-Duke. They must therefore seek to winne by policy, what they could not get by force. The Lord of Granuelle had surpris'd a packet, wherein hee found the Alphabet of the Cypher, whereby the duke of Guise did communicate with the Earle of Sancerre. By this meanes he counterfeits a Letter in the Dukes name, and makes an vnknownie man to giue it secretly to a French drum, returning from the enemies armie for some prisoners, that he should deliuer it to the Earle. The contents were, that the King knowing in what want of victuals and powder they were ready to fall, commanded them to make so favourable a composition, as their men might be saved, having yet no meanes to succour them. They had endured six weekes siege, their victuals and munition grew short, & their powder was not sufficient to endure another assault. So they obtayne twelue dayes truce, during the which, they should understand from the King, if he had meanes to succour them: or if he would be pleased, that for want of succours within the time, the horse-men should depart with their armes and horses, their Cornes displayed, and castles on their heads: their foot-men with their armes marching in battaile, enignes displayed, and drums sounding, carrying with them all their jewels, and foure pieces of artillerie furnished, at the choice of the besieged. This treaty pleased the King, and they departed according to the capitulation. As honorable a composition as euer was read of, for men besieged by so great an Emperor, with all the forces of the western Empire, in a bad place which had no better esteeme then a Country towne.

But what was the motive of this easie accord? The Emperor was not ignorant of the small hope they had of succours, and that within few dayes famine would bring them to his subiection. But hee would take from the King of England, (who camped before Boullen and Montreuil) all colour of excuse, and let him know that the fault was not in him, if the treatie were not fulfilled, according to the which, without any stay, where they should ioyn their forces neere vnto Paris, (the which vnited together would haue made threescore and ten, or foure-score thousand foot, and eightene or twenty thousand horse) and to force the King to fight with disadvantage, or to suffer his Country and Subjects to be ruined before his face. Moreover, hee did foresee, that the Dauphin camping vpon the riuier of Marne, with the bands come out of Piedmont in good order, and well armed, would make him consume his armie, whilest the King made a bodie of forty thousand men, the which confronting him being fresh, lustie, and resolute, might cause him more losse and dishonour then he had received in Prouence.

And therefore the Emperor, to proceed in his conquests, and designs, which hee had with Henry King of England, came to lodge at Virry in Parthois. Here he learns that the King of England is not resolu'd to passe on, before hee had reduced Boullen and Montreuil to his obedience: the first dislike which shall soone draw the Emperor to Bruxelles. He considers, that the travels past at Saint Disier, and want, had greatly wasted his soldiers: that to proceed, were to engage both his men and his person in a Labyrinth, from whence whence he should not easily free himself with honour: that having in front a mightie armie, still prospering, hunger (besides the Kings power) would be sufficient to force him to make a shamefull retreat: that if the English take Boullen and Montrueil, he will impart nothing to him of his conquests: that being strong on this side the sea, hee will be more obstinate when there shall be any question to treat with him. So as he begins to talke of some proposition of peace, moved before Saint Disier by the Lord of Grauelle, and his Confessor a Spanish Monke, of the Order of Saint Dominick, and of the house of Guis.

A treatie of
peace.

A day is appointed for the meeting of the Deputies at La Chaussee, betwixt Challons and Vitry. For the King there came the Admirall of Annebault, and Chemans, Keeper of the Seale of France: for the Emperour, Fernand of Gonzaga: and to know if the King of England would enter into it, they sent the Cardinall of Bellay, Raymond chiefe President of Rouan, and Ambrosine Secretary of the State and Treasurer.

As the Emperour camped towards the river of Marne, a league beneath Challons, and within two leagues of the French armie, a river being betwixt both, William Earle of Furstenberg, parted about mid-night with a guide onely, to view a foard which hee had in former times passed, when as hee came into France for the Kings service. Being come to the foard, hee leaves his guide vpon a banke: sounds it, finds it easie and passeth the River. But hee discovered not some Gentlemen of the Kings House, and part of the Admirals companie, who had the guard that night, who without giuing any alarme, put themselves betwixt the River and him, take him without resistance, led him to the Campe, know him, and send him to the Bastille at Paris: from whence hee shall not depart, untill he hath paid thirty thousand Crownes for his ranfome. In the meane time the Emperour sees his armie ready to breake for hunger: they cut off his victuals behinde and on either side. And if that goodly Captaine whom the Dauphin had sent to draw into Elpernay the victuals thereabouts, to breake the bridge vpon the river, and to spoile the corne, wine, and other provisions, which could not bee saved, had carefully executed his commission, the Emperour (disappointed of the munition and victuals which he found in Elpernay, and having no means to passe the river) had not in the end enjoyed those commodities, which hee found in Chastell Thierry, another storehouse of the French campe, whereby his troopes languishing for hunger, recovered some strength.

In the end, the Dauphin being come to the Campe at La Ferté vpon Iouarre, and having sent a good number of mento Meaux, to hinder the Emperours passage, who desiring to make his retreat by Soissons, he takes his way by Villiers-coffe-Retz, and vnder-hand requires the proposition of Peace with the King. The King knowing that a battaile could not be given in the heart of his Realme, so neere vnto his capitall Citie, without a very doubtfull and dangerous consequence, and the losse of men, and in case he should vanquish, the King of England, and the Earle of Bures would encounter him with as mightie an armie as his owne: that by the losse of one, and (perchance) two battalies, his Realme were in danger: that winning them he should get little, especially vpon England being an Iland. Moreover, the Marshall of Biez was almost forced to yield vpon Montrueil to the English, for want of victuals and succours: the sufficiency of the Lord of Veruein Gouverneur of Boullen, as we shall shortly see, was not without cause suspected: and without a conclusion with the Emperour, hardly could these two important townes be relieved.

The King therefore sent the Admirall of Annebault againe to the Emperour, being in the Abbey of Saint Iohn des Vignes in the suburbs of Soissons, where in the end was concluded: That Charles Duke of Orleans should within two yeares after, marry with the Emperours daughter or his neece, daughter to Ferdinand King of Romans, and at the consummation of the said marriage, the Emperour should inueit the said Duke of Orleans in the Duchy of Milan, or in the Earldome of Flanders, and the Low-countries, at the choice of the said Emperour. And in exchange, this done, the King promised to renounce all his rights pretended to the said Duchy, and the Kingdome of Naples, and to restore the Duke of Sauoy to the possession of his Countries, when as the Duke his sonne should enjoy the said Duchy of Milan, or the Earldome of Flanders: and all things during the tennure of two yeares, as well on this, as on the other side of the Alpes should remaine in the

A the same estate, as they were at the truce made at Nice. So the Emperour delivered vnto the King on this side the Mountaines, S. Disier, Ligny, Commercy, and the King, Yuo, Montmedy and Landre. Senay was delivered into the duke of Lorraines hands, and the fortifications razed. On the other side the Alpes, the Emperour had nothing to yield but Montreuil: and the King, Alba, Chierras, Andignan, S. Dami, Palazol, Crescentin, Veruein, Montcal, Barges, Pont d'Esture, Lans, Vigou, S. Saluador, S. Germain, and many other places which he possessed.

These treaties thus concluded and proclaimed beyond the Alpes, the Duke of Angier returned into France, with as great glory and honour, as a wise and valiant Prince could desire: and the Emperour retired his armie (which the Earles of Reux and Bures led ioyntly with that of England:) he dismissed his owne, and parting from Soissons, tooke his way to Bruxelles, accompanied beyond the frontiers by the duke of Orleans, the Cardinall of Lorraine and Meudon, the Earle of Laul, le Humanday, and others. The Emperour is now out of the Realme: let vs also seeke to send the King of England beyond the seas. Henry the 8 King of England, according to the league he had with the Emperour, landing at Calais, with an armie of thirtie thousand men, fortified with ten thousand Lansquenets, and three thousand Reistres, which the Earle of Bures led, and the troopes of the Earle of Reux, chiefe of the armie of the Low-countries for the Emperour, hee found Picardy very much vnsupplied of men: the King had with-drawne his forces towards Champagne, to oppose them against the Emperour: and the duke of Vendosme being weak in men, had faine places of importancie to furnish, Ardre, Boullen, Therouenne, Montrueil, Hedin, all equally exposed to the inuasion of the English.

Henry therefore seeing no armie to withstand him, making his account to carry a legge or an arme of the body of this Realme, sent the Duke of Norfolk and the Earles of Reux and Bures to besiege Montrueil, and himselfe went and camped before Boullen. The Marshall of Biez was Gouverneur, but when he saw the enemy turne the point of his armie towards Montrueil, hee left the Lord of Veruein his sonne in law, to command in Boullen: (from which he was dissuaded by some, to whom his insufficiency was well knowne) assisted by Philip Corse a Captaine very well experienced in armes, the Lords of Lignon, and Aix, otherwise called Renty, young and without experience, with their regiments, and halfe the company of a hundred men at armes, of the said Marshall: and hee put himselfe into Montrueil, with the Constables company of a hundred men at armes, ledde by la Guiche his Lieutenant (a man of great experience in the Art of warre): Genly, Captaine of foure ensignes of French foot, the Earle of Buringe and Francis of Chiaramont, Neapolitans, either commanding a thousand men.

At the beginning of the siege of Montrueil, the duke of Vendosme aduerted of a convey of victuals, which came from Aire and Saint Omer to the enemies campe, guarded by eight hundred horse, and twelue hundred Lansquenets, with foure meane Culierins, to fortifie themselves, if they were charged: he sent the Lords of Villebon, Etfree and Eguilly, with their companies of men at armes, to busie the enemy, untill that he might come with his company of a hundred men at armes, Chastaigneray, with fifty of the Dauphins, and Senerpont with the like charge: who arriuing in troope, charge the enemy, breake them, put them in rout, and besides the dead, carie eight hundred prisoners to Therouenne, win two Culierins (the other two remaining, for that their carriages were broken) and foure ensignes of Lansquenets.

On the other side, the Kings presence before Boullen, kindled the courage of the besiegers, and daunted Veruein, the head of the defendants, a man of no worth. The first approach of the Cannon killed his heart: and amazed with the furious battery of the enemy, after hee had endured a cannon of an assault (but whilst that Philip Corse stood by him, who being slaine with a Cannon shot) he sends presently to found the intent of the King of England, and yields him the towne by composition: that the men of warre, and citizens, should depart with their baggage: and thus hee deliuered him the place, with all the artillery, munition, and victuals, whereof there was great store. The inhabitants refuse this bad composition: the Maior offers, with the towne-men, and those that were well affected, to keepe the towne. A shew of loue very commendable in this people, but in such an action hee should haue proceeded farther, and haue lodged the Captaine, where he might he yielded a good account to the King, and by the effect, haue performed what signe of the batraille, he sees the enemy retire from the chase, and returns to their hold. In this conflict, they lose some slaues, few souldiers, and no men of account.

They must now prepare another bait. The King of England was at Portsmouth, and the Admirall (burning his country, and killing his men in his sight) imagined that the indignation of this wrong, the compassion of his subjects blood spilt, the sacke and burning of his country, would force him to send forth his ships, to succour them (being not above two Cannon shot off,) or else the subjects wrongs, being no way relieved by the presence of their Prince, would breed some sedition, and mutiny in the country. Hetherfore makes three fundry landings, to diuide the enemies forces. The one by Strissy, vpon a little fort, furnished with artillerie, which did beat our galleys in flanke, and manned by the countrymen, who seeing the resolution of our men, abandon their fort, and fly to a wood neere by, some behinde were slaine, and the howles about it burnt. The Lord of Tais, and the Baron of la Garde, both Generals, the first of the foot, the other of the Gallies, land in another place, they encounter some Squadrons of foot, who by couert wayes in the woods, were gathered together, to fight at their aduantage: they make head against our men, and hurt some, but the rest of the troopes marching in batraille, make them abandon the place, and flie to recouer their straights, where they could not follow but in disorder.

Marly and Pierrebou Captaines of Gallies, were hurt in their landing, at an encounter of the English, but to draw them in grosse to fight, it was not possible, and lesse meanes to charge them on their own ground. Neither Captaines nor Souldiers wanted will, but the danger was too apparant. They must slip downe a narrow channell, where but four ships could goe in front, and the like number of the enemies ships might easily defend it. They could not enter, but with the tyde and winde, and the foure first ships repulsed, did false backe vpon the rest of the fleet, and disordered them. They must of necessity fight neere vnto their land: and fauoured by their forts and Cannon, had they not meanes to hinder the approach, to the great preiudice of our fleet: and our ships boarding and grappling, the force of the current had driuen them on ground one vpon another. There was as little reason to fight at anchor, the cables might be cut, and this inconuenience avoided, the danger was not lesse, for the nature of the current is to turne the prow, so as our ships in stead of the prow or the broad-side, must haue presented their poope to the enemy. Moreover, their anchors not able to stay the ships suddenly, by reason of the violent turning of the streame, either the anchor or cable might breake, and by consequence cast the ships on ground.

The French
could not take the life of Wight and to seruise it.

They therefore propound two things in councell, either to saile into Picardy, to fortifie the Kings armie, and to cut off all succours from Boullen, or to fortifie the life of Wight. Many reasons perswaded the most part to the last opinion: for hauing the life at their deuotion, they might easily become Lords of Portsmouth, one of the goodliest ports of England: and forcing the enemy to maintaine a continuall armie both by land and sea, to crosse the Conquerors designs, it would consume them in exceeding expences. Moreover, they kept the passage of Spaine and Flanders: and might in time til the Island, and make it yield victuals sufficient to maintaine men for the guard thereof.

Without doubt this was an opportunite which hath not since happened, to oppose a strong battel betwixt both the Realmes. But let vs say, that he which holds both land and sea, within the palme of his hand, would leaue this Island in the power of her ancient and lawfull Lord: But howe soeuer, the Admirall might easily haue left foure thousand men, and foure thousand Pioners, for the defence of the Island, as hee did to fortifie the Kings army before Boullen, after the ouerthrow of the Cheualier d'Aux, a Prouchall and Captaine of the gallies of Normandy, leaving his fleet well manned. As the Admirall lay at anchor before Boullen a Westerne winde arised, and makes him to seek harbour vpon the coast of England: Being at the Perrais, and there kept by force of winde, and a calme sea, the English fleet thinking to haue the aduantage, imbarke speedily being a hundred good ships, and come with full sailes against our men, hauing the winde in poope. The violence of the windes, and the greatnesse of the seas, which might haue taken from our men the vie and seruice of their gallies, gaue them hope of victory: On the other side, the Admirall feared that the tempest would driue him to shoote, or force him to weigh anchor in disorder (for that the bad weather would not suffer them to keepe together) and

A and with great danger to passe the strait at Calais, or else to take his doubt towards Flanders, and so they might stop his passage in his returne: moreover, foule weather might stay him so long, as he should want victuals, and in the meane time, the enemy (who to attend him at the passage, would come to Boullen) would disturbe the Kings forts that hee pretended to make, the which he desired by all meanes to preuent.

And therefore following the aduice of his Captaines, hee attends at anchor the change of the tyde. The next day the winde and tyde fauours him, so as he desires to encounter the enemy. The night passeth, and at the breake of day, the English armie appeares. Hee follows them, but was so becalmed, as he could not aduance but with the tyde. Either seeke the winde, and coasting neere, salute one another with the Cannon. Some ships are sunke, and some men perish in the sea. In the end, the enemy seeing our men to haue gotten the winde, set saile, and take their course to the Isle of Wight, hauing both winde and tyde, which caried them without disorder to their Port, and the night approaching ended the combat. The enemy hauing recovered a safe Port, the Admirall took his course towards New-hauen, to refresh his armie, and to land many sicke men languishing in the ships. This was about the midst of August.

In the midst of August, the King meant to execute his enterprize vpon Guines, where of wee haue spoken. His armie was of twelue thousand French, twelue thousand Lanqueniers, six thousand Italians, and foure thousand Legionaries, a thousand or twelue hundred men at armes, and seuen or eight hundred light-horfe. But the fort before Boullen was no more defensible then eight dayes after it was begun: First not built vpon the point, as it was appointed, right against the Tower of Ordre, but against base Boullen, so as it could no way stop the entry of the ships into the haven. The Marshall of Biez excused himselfe, that they had giuen him to vnderstand he should finde no water there, and that the souldiers could not lodge, for the violence of the winds. Secondly, he relied vpon this Enginior, Anthony Mellon an Italian Captaine, who was held to be a man of experience, and a good souldier, who being ignorant of his treasures, made the worke fruitlesse for two moneths.

The Marshall nor withstanding assures the King, that within eight dayes, the fort would be defensible, but it was no more forward, then at the first day. And to couer this defect, he lets the Captaines vnderstand, that he is aduertised, how the enemy assembled at Calais, to come and succour Boullen by land, holding it in danger to be famished: hee was therefore resolu'd to passe the riuier, and to abandon the fort. And without imparting of any thing to the Lord of Eltreé, Marshall of the campe, who contradicted this designe, he leaues three or foure thousand men in the fort, and goes to lodge at Mont Lambert, within Cannon shot of the towne, to make head against the enemy, and to fight with him, if he came to succour the towne. But what likelyhood was there, that the English being weaker in force and numbers, would hazard a battell: and by land (seeing that one ship would carry more victuals then a thousand carts) come and diuall a towne, which daily he might refresh by sea, without danger, in sight of the enemy. But in effect, it was a great honour for the Marshall of Biez, to see so many yong Princes subiect to his command: and if Boullen had bene recovered, hee had lost the authority to command so goodly and mighty an armie. The hope of a battell made all the youth in Court post to Mont Lambert, the dukes of Angulen, Neuers, Aumale, Thours, Lord of Tremouille, the Earle of Laual, and others, who by continuall skirmishes, sometimes with gaile, sometimes with losse, did trie their valours with the besieged: and the King relying vpon the assurance hee had of the Marshall of Biez, advanced, hoping that the Bulwarke, and the Courtins of the fort, had bene in such defence, as he might haue employed his armie else where. But there are two reasons which diuert him. The one private, which was the death of the duke of Orleans his yongest sonne, who surriued with a Quetidian Fever, which they held to be pefidentiall, died the eight dayes of September in the Abbey of Forcist Moustier, betwixt Abbeville and Montuail, being three and twenty yeeres old, leaving a second grilde to the father, to haue lost two sonnes in such times as they grew capable to ease his decaying age: and without doubt the way with lesse which made this Prince melancholike and difficult, will hasten the course of his life to bring him to his grave. The other was publicke, the Prince of Melphe being killed ylar the fort, hauing considered the time of the foundation, and the terme it required to come to the perfection, reported, that winter would be well passed, before it should bee. A made fit for service, without the assistance of an armie.

So the King seeing his hopes lost, and the season spent, for the effecting of his designs, he retired towards Amiens, to the Abbey of Saint Fulcien. In the meane time, the greatness of the Kings campe at Mont Lambert, did inuite both nations, daily to make great skirmishes. One day amongst the rest, the duke of Aumale, seeing our men withstand a charge of the enemies but faintly, and were ready to be overthrowne: making account he should be seconded by his troope, hee fals vpon a company of English, which went to charge our French vpon the flanke, and at the first approach stayes them: but being struck with a lance, betwixt the nose and the eye; it breakes in pieces, and left the tunchion halfe a foot within his head: without doubt, we may admire the generosities of this young Nobleman, who for so rough a charge, lost neither stirrups, nor vnderstanding, to free himselfe from those which had compassed him in, and his admirable patience in enduring the paine, when they came to draw forth the three square head, as constantly, as if they had pulled but a haire from his head. Winter approached, and the King considering that his enterprise vpon Guines was frustrate: aduertised moreover, that the English made a new leaue in Germanie of ten thousand Lanquequets, and foure thousand horse, to come with this supply and raise the Gege at Bouillon, he fortified all the approaches in the coun-trie of Tierache, and about Aubenton, Veruein and Guise, to stop their passage. Hee sent the Marshall of Biez to invade, ruine and burne the land of Oye (for that Calais, Guines, C and Hames, which the English held vpon the maine land, had no other reliefe but out of that country) and to dispose of the affaires as occasion should serue, he marched towards la Beye vpon Oize.

Description and face of the land of Oye.

The land of Oye contains about foure leagues in length, and three in breadth: a marsh very fertill in pasture, hauing on the one side the sea, and at the one end towards the sea Calais: at the other end Grauelin, of the county of Flanders: towards the land, and along the banks of the Marish, is the towne of Guines, and the castle of Hames, and at the end towards Arthois stands Andres. For the safety of this Countie, the English had made great trenches towards the firme land, the which were commonly full of water, and fortified with Ramparts: and to flanke them, forts and bastions well manned to defend the D entry into the country.

The affection which euery one bare vnto the Kings seruice, made them to passe the channels which flowed into the country, directly against the forts. They assaile them, force them, and put all to the sword they finde. Two thousand English come to their succours, the French men at arms charge and defeat them, and kill the most part: the rest cast themselves into the trenches, where the horse men could not follow: foure score or a hundred of our horse, with many men at armes, testified by their deaths or wounds, the fury of this encounter. The English were strong, both in high and base Bouillon, and in the Tower of Breda (this Tower was built by Julius Caesar, the second time he passed into England, so haue a Lampe vpon the top of it, to direct his ships, if they should be diuided by any storm at sea, as in his first voyage) and the retiring of our troopes, made them to enterprise vpon our forts, which was made on the other side of the water, right against base Bouillon. Seven or eight thousand choise men, come an houre before day, and mount suddenly to the top of the rampart, where they might easily enter in many places without any ladders. The French Renegate Lord of Riou, Lieutenant for the King within the fort, finding his factors surrounded (says the originally) watched in the night, and rested in the day. If the enemy charged furiously, he repels him with no lesse assurance, kills all them that mounted, overthrowes them, and puts them in rout, so as by this gallant repulse, hee was afterwards freed from the tempest of the English.

A letter of the English made French.

We must now plant strong barres against the Lanquequets, which come to succour the F
King of England. They were lodged at Fleurines, a great Village, in the country of Liege, ten leagues from Mezieres. Mezieres was of great importance; if the enemy had surprised it. And the Emperor fearing that this great swarme of men, finding his countries vnuderfied of souldiers, would doe some harme, had hindered their passage through his terri-toires. This refusal might haue made the Germans to haue sought a passage by force through the Realme. So the King to crosse them, sent Langry into Mezieres with a thousand foot, and the horsemen of Bourgongne, and part of Champagne: he sent Langry with his

A his Lieutenant into Champaigne, to muster the legion of the Country, and married the passages where he thought the enemy would attempt. He sent the Duke of Anguien into Guise with three hundred men at armes, and a number of foot. In the end the Lanquequets hauing stayed three weekes at Fleurines, doubtfull where they should make their passage: the day of their pay being come, and the money yet in England, they turne their ensignes, and returne home the same way, leading with them the King of Englands Treasurers for assurance of their entertainment. Our Francis is now freed of a great care. By the death of the Duke of Orleans, the chief conditions of peace made with the Emperour were voyd: so his Maiesty sent from Bolambay neere to Cously, the Admirall Anne-Bault, and the Chancellor Olier to enter into a new treaty. The Emperour was at Bruges, and determined to send an army against the Protestants and Communalities of Germany, who yielded him no such obedience as he required of his subjects, and with this designe he went to Antwerp, to receiue money by imposition and loane.

This voyage is a cloake to delay our Ambassadors. But in effect he meant to know the minds of them of Antwerp, that according to the course of affaires, he might bee more milde or fower in his answer. And the sayd Ambassadors discouering his ordinary delays and dissimulations, in the end tooke their leaue, returning with no other assurance, but if the King beganne no warre against him, he was not resolu'd to make any. A word serues to a man of iudgement. What might the King conceiue of this cold entertainment?
C but that the Emperour sought an opportunity to beginne a new warre with advantage; and if he had forced them to obedience whom he threatened in Germany, hee would bring all his forces both Catholiques and Protestants, ioyntly against the frontiers of this Realme.
To auoid a sudden surpris, he giues the gouernment of Languedoc to the Duke of An-guien: that of Piedmont to the Prince of Melphe, lately created Marshall of France, hee sent to fortifie the weak places of Picardy, he made a fort about Maubert, Fontaine, seven leagues from Veruein, and fure from Mezieres, at the going out of the wood: and for that the frontier of Champaigne lay most open to the Germans, he fortified Mezieres and Mouzon, built a fort vpon the Meuze on this side riner within the Realme, betwixt Streway and Dun-le-Chateau, which he called Villefranche, he fortified the Castle of Saint D Menchoult, Saint Desier, Chaumont in Bassigny, Coilly and Ligny: and made Bourg in Bresse able to make head against a mighty army. Thus the King provided for his frontiers, and places subiect to the enemies inuasions. But the plague had so diminished the number of souldiers that were in the fort right against Bouillon, as of twenty Ensignes, not about eight or nine hundred men escaped this mortality. The souldiers notwithstanding are commended for their fidelity, constancy, and patience in the regard thereof. The raime, snow, and other iniuries of the ayre, the moistnesse of their lodgings (being but holes in the ground, couered with a pentise of straw, and when a whole household was dead, the ruines serued to bury their carcases) had bred these diseases. But the Spring time hauing tempered the season, and stayed the plague, the Lords of Elbe and Riou, being refreshed and supplied with men, returned to their ordinary skirmishes, to the enemies losse. The fort wanted victuals. Senepont Lieutenant to the Marshall of Biez, was appointed for this execution. Three hundred English horse come to hinder this vidual-
ing. He meets them the day after Easter day neere to the bridge of bricke, beneath mount Saint Stephen: the skirmish begins on either side: the Lord of Tais, and the Conte Reinegrane arise either of them with six or seven score gentlemen, the alarme comes to Bouillon, and the English supply their men with seven hundred horse, and foure hundred Hargre buizers. Senepont chargeth the horsemen before they had ioyned with their shot:
the Reinegrane is hurt at the first charge, and overthrowne; and on the other side the Marshall of Calais, being chiefe of the enterprise, is slaine, with a hundred or six score English, about two hundred horse on either side, and three score and fiftene English prisoners, all in cassacks of velvet garnished with gold and silver.

A great plague in the fort before Bouillon.

A while after the Marshall of Biez parted from his campe, for the same chiefe accompanied with fifty men at armes, the Reinegrane with his Regiment of foure thousand Lanquequets, and two hundred French shot, he encountered the Earle of Barry followed by six thousand Englishmen, with an intent to take from our men the meane to refresh the fort with victuals, and necessary munition. Here the combat was long and furious: in the end the English being overthrowne, retire to a little Fort, where they force them. Seven or eight hundred of their men are slain. Survey saues himself by flight, and leaues seuen or eight-score prisoners. Boulle was but a Church-yard for the English, and a waiting for their treasure. The King of England considering how obnoxious the King was in the recovery of his towne, that moreover the Emperour (what league soeuer they had together) had his private designs, and regarded nothing but his owne interest, he lets the King understand, that he is resolved to haue him for his friend, and to end all controuersies. So the Deputies for their Maiesties meet betwix Ardres and Guines. For the King, came the Admirall Annebault, and Raymond the first President of Rouen: for the English, Dudley Admirall of England, (and afterwards Duke of Northumberland) and finally after many consultations, a peace was made, with these conditions: That the King within eight dayes should pay 800000 Crownes to the King of England; as well for the arreages of his pension, as for many other expences made by the said King in the fortification of Boulle, and of the Countrey: and in regard of the said Summe, the King of England should deliuer vnto the King, Boulle, and all the Countrey belonging vnto it, with the ancient places or newly edified by him, Mont-Lambert, the Tower of Ordre, Amblemet, Blasquency, and others, with all the artillery, victuals, and munition in the said places.

The death of the Duke of Anguien.

This year is famous by the death of Anguien. In the month of February, the snow was very great, and the Court being at Roch-Guion, some young Noblemen attending the Dauphin, made a challenge, some to defend a house, others to assaile it with snow-balls: but this pastime ended soone with a pitifull and fatal spectacle. As the Duke came out of this house, a coffer full of sinners, cast out of the window, fals vpon his head, and within few houres sends him to rest in the grave with his ancestors, leauing a suspicion of some great men, being enuious and jealous of his vertue, reputation, and fauour, which he had gotten with the King, the people, and men of warre, of whom he was more then any other of his age, esteemed, beloued, and respected.

The death of the King of England.

The beginning of this year is likewise remarkable by the decease of Henry the 8, King of England, leauing for his successor his son Edward, eight yeares of age. This death bred a great alteration and change in the health of Francis: they were almost of one age, conformable in complexions. And our King taking this for a preface or foretelling, that his turne should soone follow after, grew then more melancholly and silent then before. He fals sicke of a feuer, for auoiding whereof, hauing passed many places fit for the pleasure of hunting, la Muette, Saint Germain in Lay, Villepreux, Dampierre neere vnto Cheneuse, Limours, and Rochefort, he came to lodge at Rambouillet, and as the pleasure hee tooke both in hunting and hawking, stayed him there some time, his Feuer increased, and grew to a Quotidian.

The death of
first.

So finding his houre come, he disposed of his conscience and of his house: he greatly recommended his subiects and seruants to the Dauphin his successor: and the last day of March, in the year 1547, being fifty and three yeares old, hee changed the painfull and continuall toiles of this mortall life, with the eternall rest which the happy enioy for euer. A Prince wonderfully lamented both of his subiects and strangers, whose vertues deserue to be placed among the most famous. He was valiant, courteous, bountifull, iudicious, of a great spirit, and an excellent memory. A lover of learning, and men of merit, to whom Arts and Sciences owe the perfections they haue gotten at this day, hauing by his bringing vp of youth, founded Colledges in Paris, in the Hebrew, Greek, and Latine tongues, assembled from all parts of the world, learned men, and of good life, and by this means cleared the darkness of ignorance, wherewith the world had bene so obscured, by the malice of time and negligence of former ages. A Prince fauoured with many good, yet croft with as many bad and sinister fortunes. Happy notwithstanding, that no aduersity could euer make him degenerate from a noble and royall mind, nor from the true beleefe of a good and faithfull Christian. Happy and blessed in his end, to haue pacified all so- raine confusions, which had so long troubled his States and his subiects quiet. But without doubt, he had bene farre more happy, if hee could haue left his Realme free from those fatal diuisions, which euen in his reigne had so miserably diuided his subiects, and shall cause hereafter strange combustions: the first consideration wherof makes my haire to stand vpright, and my heart to tremble at that which is to come.

HENRY the SECOND:

The 59 French King.

Sage, nature, and the good education he had receiued vnder his Father in the government of the Estate, did countenance him in this succession: he which he receiued on the same day that hee was borne, and he confirmed it in Saint Germain in Lay, by the restitution of the Constable of Montmorency: by the publication of many goodly ordinances, for the reformation of apparell, ordering of the treasure, providing for the poore, suppression of new erected offices, government of the Rivers and Forests, maintenance of Iustice, and relieuing of his subiects: but above all, that necessary law against blasphemers, as we may see in the Originall. Doubtlesse this was a commendable beginning, and worthy the homage hee did owe to the Soueraigne Lord, as an acknowledgement of the fee, whereof he tooke possession, if hee had not polluted it with the mournfull spectacle of that bloody and fatal combat betwix Jarnac and Chastaignery, Gentlemen of Noble Families, hauing taxed one another with iniurious words, and the Lye past, to the preiudice of one of their honours, the King in stead of reconciling them by the aduice of his Councell, and to haue forced the culpable to do right to the interested, he granted them the combat, and on the sixteenth day of Iuly they came to the place appointed at Saint Germain in Lay, where in the presence of the King, Princes, Noblemen and all the Court, they entered the Lists. Jarnac, who was held the weaker being newly recovered from sicknesse, contemned and disgraced, ouerthrew the other (who before the combat was held a Conqueror) and wounded him in such sort, as within few dayes after he died; whereto the King was much grieved, and hereupon did forbid all combats. He beganne his reigne by a bloody tragedy, and ended in like manner, whereby we may see, that God doth punish him that thirsteth after another mans blood, with the losse of his owne.

The restoring of the Constable, disappointed the Cardinal of Tournon, and the Admirall of Annebault, touching the chiefe government of the State: and the Lords of Longueuall, Escars, Boncour, Frametzels, Antibo, Grignan, the Baron of la Garde, the General Bayard, and many others, accused some for theft, some for other disorders in their charges, did somewhat trouble the Court. It was an old saying: that hee which eates the Kings Goose, will cast vp the feathers a hundred yeares after: but since, they haue turned this saying into a proverbe; He that steales a hundred thousand Crownes from the King is quit if he restore ten thousand. So some prevailed by this expedient, others escaped rigorous punishments through fauour.

restored.

In the meane time, the ceremonies of the Kings Coronation were prepared at Rheims, and hauing receiued in the seuen and twentieth day of Iuly, by the hands of Charles of Lorraine, Archbishop of Rheims, he made a voyage into Picardy, and did visit the forts which were made about Boulle: then did he prepare an army to succour Scotland, against whom the English made war, for that the Lords of the Countrey had refused to give that Princesse Mary Stewart in marriage to goe to young King Edward, hoping by this bond to vnit the two Realms of England and Scotland, to the preiudice of the French: and of the common alliance betwix France and Scotland. The Lord of Eff was chiefe of the army: Peter of the Griff, General of the Light Bands, and Andres Colonel of the French foot, the Ribbles chiefe of the Langue, marching by land against the English forces: & Leon Schiff Prior of Capua, by sea, with the English of the greatest part of their conquests: but the confirmation of the peace lately concluded betwix the deceased Kings of France and England ended this warre, and brought back our aduersaries into France.

France at the end of his dayes, had well foretold the issue, which should soone breed new combustions with the Emperour: Henry must be heire to his quartell, as well as to his crown, and knowing that the Pope had written and iust cause of indignation for the murder of Peter Lewis, Duke of Parma and Placentia, his sonne; and for the inuasion of A Placentia, by Ferdinand Gonsagwa, Lieutenant for the Emperour in Italy: he sent Charles of Lorraine, lately honored with a Cardinals Hat (this is hee that shall minister so much matter to take of him, vnder the successors of Henry) to draw the Pope from the Emperours party, to the Kings alliance: but death shall frustrate the Pope of his intended reuenge. Commonly men fill best in a troubled streame: and many knowing this new King to be of a mild spirit, addicted to the delights of Court, and little practised in affaires, they kindled a desire in his mind to reuenge the wrongs the Emperour had done to France, where of they vrged for a testimony the death of Pegeberg beheaded in Ausbourg, at his returne from the Scottish warres for the Kings seruice.

On the other side, the Emperour grew not a little ialous of the progresse the King made into Bourgongne, Bresse, Sauoy and Piedmont, as if he had caried with him an alarme bell to stirre vp the people to the following warre. And it may be it had then been kindled, but an home-bred mutiny stayed it for a time. During the Kings voyage into Sauoy and Piedmont, the extorsions of the toll-gatherers and farmers of salt, caused the Commons of Guienne, Xaintonge, and Angoumois, to rebell. In few weekes forty thousand men goe to field armed with all kind of weapons, the Islanders ioyne with them, and with a common consent fall vpon the toll gatherers. The people of Gascony doe presently follow this pernicious example. The commons of Bourdeaux rise, & finding la Vergne, Esmonac, Marquanan, and others (Tribunes fit for their humors) they expell the custumers, sacke many good houses, vnder colour to seeke for these exactors: the commons search throughout the towne, whence followed many massacres in diuers places, and many of the Kings officers were slaine, who abusing their charges had bene the cause of this mutiny. The Mayor, Jurats, and other Magistrates of the City of Bourdeaux, and the Court of Parliament, with the Seigneur of Moncins, who commanded there as the Kings Lieutenant, in stead of remedying these tumults in the beginning, temporized too much, namely Moncins, who for that he did not suppress the insolency of la Vergne, one of the heads of these mutines, hee made him dare to raise vp the people by the sound of a bell.

Another error of his was, that he sent forth a number of thor out of the Castle of Ha, D thinking to terrifie this iraged multitude. But this encreased their popular fury. They forced the Councillors of the Parliament to lay aside their gownes, to put on Mariners caps, to carry pikes, and to follow their Ensignes, and the masters of Saulx brethren, the one Captaine of the towne, the other of Castle Trompeté, to bee their Leaders, to assist at the sacking of many houses, and to see their friends and fellow Citizens massacred before their eyes. They spoile the Towne-house, a goodly store-house for armes: and to encrease their villanies, they murder Moncins most cruelly, being come amongst them, thinking with courteous words to pacifie the fury of these mutines. Hauiug wrought their wills, and being laden with booty, they disband, some one way, some another: the Parliament fortified with men of honour, and resumung their authority, punish by exemplary justice la Vergne, one of the chiefe Tribunes of this rebellion, and some other of the most apparant. The King was no lesse ready to reuenge this outrageous and rash rebellion, then the commons were active in the execution. The Constable had the commission for Guienne. Francis of Lorraine, Duke of Aumale (whom we shall afterwards see Duke of Guise, so famous vnder Francis the second, and Charles the ninth): that of Xaintonge with foure thousand Lanquenes and many French hostes. This man seeking to winne the reputation of a mild and mercifull Prince, pacified the Country without punishment of what had passed. The other marched after another manner, for ioyning both armies together, he entered into Bourdeaux, disarmed the people, rooke and burnt all the records, Registers, rights, and priuileges of the Citizens, and of all the country of Bourdelois: he caused the Court of Parliament to seate downe their bels: forced feuer score of the chiefe to goe vnto the Carraes (who had three dayes after the mutiny, in the night taken vp his poore dismembred carcase with a Gentleman of his called Montelieu) to fetch the body of Moncins, and to conduct it in mournfull fort vnto Saint Andreus Church, and by the punishment of the two Saulx, Esmonac, (another Tribune, who had seized vpon Castle Trompeté) and many others, hee purged their offence. Talemagne and Galeffie, Colonels of the commons, were afterwards broken vpon the wheele, ei-

The end of this year was more comicall. Anthony of Bourbon Duke of Vendosme married Isabe of Albret, daughter to Henry of Albret King of Nauarre, and of Marguerite sister to King Francis the first, and the Duke of Aumale, the daughter of Hercules of Este Duke of Ferrara, and of Renée of France daughter to King Lewis the twelfth. And during these sports in Court; that extraordinary chamber, against them who they call Lutherians, was erected, who persifling constantly in the profession of their faith, suffered their bodies to be consumed to ashes. The birth of Lewis the Kings younger sonne, the third of February, at Saint Germaine in Lay, his baptisme the nineteenth of May, the Coronation of Queene Katherine at Saint Denis, the tenth of Iune; the stately entry of their Majesties at Paris the sixth of the same moneth; and the great journey at the Tournels made in fauour of the Ladies, continued the sports in Court: which finished, the King sitting in his seat of Iustice the second of Iuly, would giue sentence in his Court of Parliament at Paris, according to the ancient custome of his Predecessors. The presence of the Prince giues authority to the Magistrate, and the eye of the King (saith the Wiseman) scatters ill counsels.

At that time the Nobility of England were at iarre with the commons. During the which, the King sent Paul Lord of Termes, to continue the warre in Scotland begun by C Esse, who hauing lately defeated the English before Hedington, and taken the life of Hofes, resigned his charge to his successor. After much sport at the Queenes Coronation, the King caused a general procession to be made in Iuly, where he assisted, with the Queen, the Princes of the blood, Cardinals, and all the Orders and Estates of Paris; and at his returne from the Bishops lodging, where he had dined, hee would see certaine Christians burnt detecting the errors and abuses maintained by the Church of Rome. Among the which there was a Taylor, who some few dayes before had made answer of his beliefe before the King and many Courtiers, and spoken boldly to the Duchesse of Valentinois, telling her that she should rest fastid to haue infected France, and not seeketo pollute to holy and sacred a thing as the true Religion, and the truth of the Sonne of God with her filthinesse; and that it was to be feared that God for this cause would send some great plague both vpon the King and Realme. But the King being incensed and not amended (being caried away by the allurements of her that did betwix him) hauing commanded that his processe should be dispatcht, he would be a spectator of this Taylors execution, standing in the Lord of Rochports lodging in Saint Anthonies street right against the scaffold, whereas the Taylor shewed a wonderfull constancy and patience.

Hauing discouered the King, he began to behold him so constantly, as nothing could diuert him, yea the fire being kindled, he had always his eyes so fixt vpon that object, as the King was forced to retire himselfe, yea he was so troubled, as he confest that he thought this mans shadow did still follow him, and that for many nights this spectacle did present E it selfe vnto him, whereupon he protested that hee would neuer see nor heare any such people: but forgetting his protestation, ten years after he heard things which hee should haue giuen attentive care vnto, and pretending to see a great personage burnt, whose words did merit credit, he lost both sight and life.

In the moneth of Iune past, James of Coucy Lord of Veruein was beheaded at Paris, and Ondard of Biez Marshall of France degraded, after a long imprisonment: the one for that he had inconsiderately committed the guard of Bouillon to his son-in-law, the other for that hee had so lightly yeelded vpon a strong and well fortified place vnto the enemy. There were witnesses and Commissioners found out for the purpose by them that were in credit: so as soone after it appeared that the innocency of these Noblemen had bene F suspectt by the enuy of Courtiers, which possit the King, who acknowledged the error he had committed, but he could not helpe it; but this processe lay dead with Versins, vntill the year of our Lord 1575, that his sonne and heyre by an expresse declaration of King Henry the third, caused the memory of his Father and Grand-father by the mothers side to be restored to their former honor and fame, one of the Heralds being commanded to assist at the Funerals of these two Noblemen, the which were solemnly made at Bo-loigne in the year 1577.

This year was preaded in the Parliament at Paris the cause of Merindol; since the year year 1540, the Parliament of Prouence, had for matter of religion condemned seuentene persons of Merindol to be burnt, the village to be razed, and the trees to bee cut downe within two hundred paces. The Clergy pursued it: but some gentlemen and others lesse bloody, stayed the execution of this decree, and King Francis six months after sent a pardon to these Vaudois of Merindol, and other places, vpon condition that within three months they should abjure their errors. They appeare in Court, and protest that they haue not maintained nor published any erroneous thing, offering to yeeld, if by the word of God they can shew them any fonder doctrine: they giue a confession of their faith in writing, with an answer to the reproaches wherewith they were taxed, and require to be allowed, or iudicially heard in their defences.

Four years passe away, during the which, being onely threatened with words, they subsist. But the President Chassané being dead, Iohn Menier his successor, a violent man, became a mortall enemy to those of Cabrières and Merindol, amongst whom there dwelt certain subjects of his of Oppede, whose lands he possessed to ioyne them to his owne. Through the perswasions of Menier, the Cardinall of Tournon, obtaines Letters Patents from King Francis, to the Court of Parliament, for the execution of the first sentence, according to the which, Menier terming himselfe Lieutenant of the Lord of Grignan, Gouvernor of Prouence, accompanied with the Baron of la Garde, and a great troop of others, in the moneth of April 1545, fired many villages neere vnto Merindol, put many of the Countenmen into the gallies, spoiled, razed, and burnt Merindol being vnpeopled, took Cabrières by composition, and against his faith, in cold blood, hee cut in peeces fife and twenty or thirty men, chosen at his pleasure, rauished wiues, and young virgins, burnt about forty in a barne, whereof the most part were with child: put about eight hundred to the sword, and caried away many prisoners to Marfeilles, Aix and Auignon.

This did too farre exceed a decree giuen against seuentene persons, abusing the Kings authority, with too great violence: who in his latter age, toucht with a remorse of conscience, by reason of this horrible proceeding against his subjects, whom he had too lightly abandoned to these butchers, grieved that he could not before his death punish the authors of these murders exemplarily: lying in the bed of death, he commanded Henry his sonne expressly, not to make his memory hateful vnto strangers, nor subiect to the wrath of God, in not punishing of this guilt. Euen so, that great King David, amongst other dispositions of his last will: Thou knowest (said he to him that should sit on the throne after him) what Iobab the sonne of Tserua hath done vnto mee, and what he hath done to the two Commanders of the armies of Israel, Abner the sonne of Ner, and Amasa the sonne of Iether, whom he hath slaine, hauing shed blood in time of peace: Thou shalt not suffer his white hayres to descend with peace into his grave. But Salomon performed his fathers will more religiously. The King granted an euocation of the cause to the Court of Parliament at Paris, where it was solemnly pleaded about fifty times in the great Chamber. There was great expectation of seuerer punishments for those horrible murders: but these great mountaines proued mole-hills, and in the end it did euaporate into smoake. Yet one at the least must suffer for many: the chancefell vpon one that was least guilty, named Guerin, an Adjuocate by profession, who was hanged at Paris. The Cardinall of Tournon, Grignan, and la Garde, were in some trouble, but more feared then hurt. Menier escaped, but hee died after, being tragically possessed with a fury, & a secret fire which consumed his bowels. The year ended with the death of two famous personages: Pope Paul, the ninth of November, to whom succeeded Cardinall Iohn Maria Bishop of Mantoua: and the vertuous Princeesse Marguerite of Valois, sister to King Francis deceased, and wife to Henry of Albret King of Nauarre, the fourteenth of December. They say commonly, that for offences there needs but one satisfaction. Seeing then, that by the punishment of the chiefe authors of the sedition in Guienne, the King had pardoned the commons, hee was not so inexorable, but for a small satisfaction they were easily admitted to fauour: so as in October past, they of Bourdeaux had obtained a remission, binding themselves perpetually to his Majesty: To entertaine as sea for euer (as well they as their descendants) two ships furnished for the warre: so victuall the Castle Trompet and du Ha, and to renew the victuall every year. By this meanes their Parliament was restored in January, and all things setled in their former estate. By their example the three estates of Poitou, Xaintonge, Angoulmois, Perigot, Lymouin, and la Marche, in the beginning of this year, obtained abolition of the

A the custome vpon salt in Guienne, paying foure hundred and fifty thousand frankes, and fife and twenty thousand for the satisfaction of the Kings officers of the said custome, Then sprung there many and sundry fire-brands of warre.

At the same time three Presidents of Paris, not pleasing to the House of Guise (who were then in credit) were dismist from their charges. Soone after S. André and Minard hauing promised to be good seruants, were restored: Lisier was made Abbot of Saint Victor to giue place to one that was not so cunning as himselfe. In this solitary kind of life, hee would be dealing with Diuinity, wherein he was no apt Scholler: for of a good practitioner he became an ignorant Sophister, and was scorned, so as he died for griefe. Hee had shewed himselfe a sworne enemy to them of the Religion, thinking to advance himselfe by his cruell inuentions: but hee was ouerthrowne in his course, to serue as an example for them that are more sufficient then he, not to attempt against him who surpriseth the most cunning in their deuices, and against whose wisdom humane force is but foolery and vanity. And this year, for that the coynes were found for the most part clipt, the King commanded by his Edict, that all clipt money should be new minted, whereupon many Masters of this art, and counterfeite coyners were punished with death.

But before we quarrell with the Emperor, the English must yeeld vs Boullen. The fort which the Lord of Chastillon had built in the year 1548, annoyed them much, and the recovery of the forts of Selaque, Blacconet, and Bonlamberg, and so many men defeated by the surpris of them, gaue the Duke of Somerset and the Earle of Warwick to vnderstand that there was nothing but blowes to be gotten in maintaining the warres of Boullen: moreover, the diuisions of England, and the warre of Scotland, called home their troops, So as for the summe before specified, payable at two termes, a peace was againe concluded with the English, and Boullen restored to the King, into the which his Majesty made his entry the fifth of May, and did his homage, whereunto the Kings of France are bound by the institution of Lewis the eleuenth, as we haue elsewhere obserued. Hereafter those small sparkles, which began to appeare, after the murder of Peter Lewis, sonne to Pope Paul Farnese deceased, slaine by his household seruants, by the perswasion of Andreu Doria, and Ferdinand Gonzaga, with the priuity and consent of the Emperor, to seize vpon the City of Placentia, with the more facility, haue kindled to great fires, as wee shall see

D France, Germany, and Italy in combustion. Paul had giuen Parma to Ottauio Farnese son to the said Peter Lewis, whereof he had institution of Isidore his successor. This Peter Lewis was inclined much to the French party. He had giuen aid to Peter Sterffy, when as he came into the country of Placentia, with some forces for the seruice of the most Christian King, and that which more incensed the Imperials, he was suspected to haue assisted the Count of Fiesque in an enterprise made vpon Genoua for the Kings seruice, the year 1547, in the which Iacquin Doria was slaine, and Andreu Doria expelled. This caused the death of Peter Lewis Farnese. Ottauio his sonne had married the Emperors bastard daughter. But they say that charity begins by it selfe. The Emperor did labour him much: hee would

E gladly ioyne Parma to Placentia, and that by lawfull meanes, letting the Pope vnderstand, that Parma being of the patrimony of the Church, the which was in his protection, hee ought to be preferred before Farnese, seeing that Farnese could not keepe it but with the men and money of his Holinesse. The Pope being of a base mettall, and fearing the touch, tempted with the Emperors practices, sends to Duke Ottauio, that he could no more furnish the extraordinary charges, wherewith he had promised to assist him: and Farnese finding that the Emperor laid this plot to dispossesse him of his inheritance, hee seeks a strong support in France against his father-in-lawes practices. The King who had renouneed the ancient pretensions of the House of Orleans to the Duchy of Milan, declares himselfe (but with the Popes good liking) Protector of the patrimony of the Church

F and of the Farneses. The Emperor is in a rage, who with his violent exclamations foreshadowes the Pope, as he abandons his vassall Ottauio. The Pope on the other side (nothing well affected to the French) grew bitter against the King: he commanded him to renounce this protection, and for not obeying, threatened to curse both him and his realme. Thus Iulius the second was able to satisfie his greedy desire with the keyes of Saint Peter: he vniuersally the sword of Saint Paul, striking by his madnesse these deadly diuisions throughout all Christendome, as if the Bishop were the spirituall sword in his hand to draw it for vnlawfull things at the first impression of his fantasie. To crosse the Pope, the King forbids expressly to cary or send any gold or silver to Rome for any dispatches, Bulls, Annars, Dispensations, or any other thing, commanding the Metropolitans of the Realme to provide according to the ancient priviledges and liberties of the French Church. And for that Gonzaga besieged Parma (to give both the Emperour and the Court of Rome a blow) he commanded Charles of Cossé, Lord of Brissac, and Marshall of France, his Lieutenant General in Piedmont by the death of the Prince of Melphé, to fortifie and furnish Mirandola. Brissac sends some souldiers : Gonzaga surpriseth them, and puts them secretly to death, and suddenly doth beleaguer Mirandola. Warre is now begunne on all sides, and for light occasions, he that seeks a quarrell, wants no apparant shewes to colour it. Both these Princes expected some worthy occasion : but let vs raise up our thoughts, and say, That GOD had now poured out all his iudgements against Christendome, being full of excess, and worthy of sharpe punishment.

The King sends new forces into Piedmont, and commands the Marshall to succour Parma and Mirandola. He effects it, and by the taking of Quicrs, Saint Damian, and other places, he forceth Gonzaga to abandon the Countrey of Parmesan, to succour Montferat, and to defend the estate of Milan. On the other side, Mary Queene of Hungary, and Gouvernesse of the Low-Countries for the Emperour, armed in favour of her brother, both by sea and land. And understanding that for a greater confirmation of love, the Marshall Saint Andre, carried in the Kings name the Order of France to young Edward King of England : the caused certaine ships to lye betwixt Calais and Dover, to seize on him in his passage. But to prevent her policy, the Marshall caused some Flemish ships to stayd, which lay at anchor in the roade of Deepe, untill they were assured of his arrival in England. And Mary likewise arrested all the French ships that were within her government. Thus heart-burning grew on all sides, which burst out into open warre : every one calls home his Ambassadors, and assures the places nearest to the enemy : the King, especially Lorraine, having some jealousy of Christienne the Dowager, and neere allied to the Emperour : who to free her selfe from that imputation, did put her selfe with her sonne Charles into the Kings protection : who caused him to be brought up with the Dauphin François, and afterwards he married one of his Maiesties daughters.

Before we proceed to open acts of hostility, the King excused himselfe vnto the Pope by the Lord of Termes, for that which he did in favour of Ottavian Farnese, and by the Abbot of Bellafame, he protested against the decrees of the Assembly which was held at Trent : the which (considering the Popes and the Emperors spleene against France) hee could not hold to be a lawfull and holy generall Councell : Not that I pretend (said he) to withdraw my selfe from the obedience of the Church : but onely to avoid the surpris of such, as under colour of reformation, seek to disgrace both my person and Realme.

After this protestation, the King published an Edict made the yeare before, touching Benefices, and against the frauds and abuses of the Court of Rome : and also vpon the ancient Edicts and Decrees against Annars, and the abuse of Refutations and exactions invented by Popes : forbidding all his subjects to goe any more to Rome for Annars, nor for any other occasion concerning Benefices : commanding the Ordinaries to dispose thereof, publishing to all men the wrong which Julio did to him and to Ottavio Duke of Parma, who was deprived of that whereof he had bene solemnly inuested. The Cardinals and other the Popes creatures in France, fearing that this Edict (vpon the which Charles of Moulins, a famous Lawyer, did write a learned Commentary, wherein he discovered many terrible practices of Rome) should shake the Popes authority. They did very carefully procure the King to publish very fewe Edicts against them of the Religion, to the end that Julio and the Cardinals at Rome should assure themselves of his friendship, whensoever they would adhere vnto him. These Edicts were followed by cruell executions in diuers parts of the Realme against many of the Religion, who were burnt alive, for that they had constantly maintained the truth of the Gospell, and rejected the Traditions of men established in the place of Gods divine service. Those that were at Trent did write vnto the King to induce him to receive the decrees of their Councell, and to the first the Bishops of his Realme thither : moreover, to entreat him to be a witness that the Spaniards should send thither : but the warre being now begunne in all places, and the Emperour having called the Spaniards which were in Germany, to come into

A into Italy to the warre of Parma, the pursuit of them of Trent was suspended.

The warre being kindled, the King refused to assure himselfe towards Lorraine, having some distrust of the Duchesse Dowager, whereupon he caused some troops to march towards the frontiers, and the Emperour did also man all his places, the one looking vpon the other with diuers designs whereof the effects did soone after appeare. While that the King persecuted them of the Religion in France, he treated secretly with the Protestant Princes of Germany, and generally with all the Electors and free Cities of the Empire, who saw their liberties and freedoms in a manner ruined, if they did not oppose some mighty adversary against the Emperour who by maine force might stay the course of his vaine glorious covetousnesse. The Emperour (contrary to his oath) detained John Duke of Saxony, and Philip Landgrave of Hesse in miserable captivity. He had vanquished most of the other Princes in war, and fearing lest the French should in the end demand the right vsurped in old time by the Saxons vpon the heyres of Charlemagne, when the Empire was hereditary : he pretended to transport the Imperial Crowne into his House for ever, and now he thought to have a fit opportunity. He had suppressed his enemies in Germany : he had a Pope at his devotion, and he was armed. The most part of the Cardinals who assisted at the Councell, were either naturall Spaniards, or of the Spanish faction : and by consequence, might easily by a decree of this Councell, give authority to what he intended. With this designe he had caused his sonne Prince Philip to come out of Spaine, (who died King of Spaine in the yeare 1598) to have him declared his successors, or at least his associate in the Empire : oppressing the people of Germany by insolent and tyrannical exactions. The Electors not accustomed to servitude, and lesse to the slavery of Spaine, not able with their owne forces to shake off the yoke which they saw ready to be laid vpon them : they repaire vnto the King, and shew him the wrongs and outrages done vnto them : that they pretended the overthrow of the whole Empire, and the abolishment of the rights and priviledges of the Electors, Commonalties, and Lords of the same : they beseech him that in regard of the ancient league betwixt the Empire and the Crowne of France, he would take their iust cause in hand, and maintain the common liberty of Germany. The King resolves to enter into league with them, according

D to the which in the beginning of the yeare he sent the Bishop of Baione for his Ambassador vnto the Princes Electors, with Letters full of protestations and offers of friendship, and an ample declaration of the wrongs done by the Emperour vnto the Princes and Cities of Germany : adding, that he was resolved to employ both his person and forces for the defence of the rights and liberties of all Germany, without respecting any other recompence then the honor to have done his duty, and to have bound so mighty a Nation vnto him : Giving moreover assurance by oath of this his affection and intention, taking God vnto witness, and swearing by the faith of a Prince, that his designe was to free all the Estates of Germany from the oppression of the Emperour and his Ministers. The which he also pretended to do particularly in favour of his most deare and well-beloved Cousins John Duke of Saxony, and Philip Landgrave of Hesse, detained in miserable captivity by the Emperour, notwithstanding he had promised and sworn the contrary. In the end of his Letter he added these words : we promise you also by the Almighty God, before a the Kings, Princes, and Potentates of Christendome, that we will not suffer with our priuaty any wrong or injury to be done to you all in general, nor to any one in particular, of what estate or condition soever he bee : and much lesse will we (who carry the Title of most Christian) endure that any harme should be done vnto the goods or persons of your most Reuerend Prelates, Abbots, and other Clergy-men, as hath bene wrongfully giuen out by our adversaries : Nay rather we are resolved to take you into our protection, so as you may declare your selves for vs and our allies, and give vs sufficient assurance of your wils : hoping the re-viue of the Church, the which is respected by the recovery of the publike liberty : for the which (with the helpe of GOD) we will employ all our forces. The which wee have thought good (most Reuerend Prelates, most famous Princes, and other the Estates of the sacred Empire) to let you understand, to the end you may not be ignorant of the true cause of this warre, by the which wee pretend to pursue the Emperour with all violence, and (to our griefe) cut him off as a putrified member from the body of the Common-wealth : or at the least force and constrain him to cease from oppressing you, and to give you such satisfaction as you shall require.

The King

The Kings
army.

Hereupon they give him this honourable title, Defender of the Germanes, protector of the Nation, and of the holy Empire. He armes thirty thousand men, and desirous to countenance his forces with his owne presence, he appoints Queene Katherine his wife Regent in France: he makes many goodly Edicts for the government of the State, for the ordering of his men at armes, and for the obseruation of military discipline: hee reformes the abuses of Commanders, suppresseth the insolency of souldiers (a commendable institution in comparison of that which hath beene scene in the reignes of his children) and gives the rendezvous for his army at Vitry. He was accompanied with Anthony Duke of Vendosme, (whom we shall shortly see King of Navarre, by the decaise of Henry of Albret his father-in-law) Iohn Duke of Anguien, Lewis Prince of Conde, all brethren: Lewis D. B of Montpensier, Charles Prince of Roch-sur-yon, all of the Royall Family of Bourbon: the Dukes of Nevers, Nemours, Guise, Aumale, Elbeuf: the Lords of Rohan, Rochefoucault, Chastillon, d'Andelot, and others in great numbers, in very good order.

The Constable of Montmorency was made General of the army (a House which shall hereafter be made a Duchy, and a Peere of France) Claude of Lorraine Duke of Aumale, a younger brother of the House of Guise, was General of the horse, consisting of fifteen hundred men at armes, every one having two archers: two thousand light-horse, as many Arquebustiers, besides an infinit number of voluntary French Nobility, marching vnder the fauour of their Prince, and desirous to make their valour apparent by good and faithfull seruices. Gaspard Lord of Chastillon, afterwards Admirall, was Colonel of the foot, consisting (besides the new and the ordinary companies, which were twenty Ensignes of the old bands of Piedmont, and five and thirty ensignes of Gascons and Prouencals (they note the two companies of the Lord of Duras to be compounded for the most part of Gentlemen and old souldiers, worthy of command) of ten thousand Lanquenets in two Regiments, commanded by the Reingraue and Reichsue. To these bands the Protestant Princes ioyned a battalion of horse, vnder the command of Colonel Charrel. But lets now see their exploits.

The City of Thoul at the first abord, puts it selfe into the Kings protection, but this was not the chiefe point of his designe. The Emperor passing into France, had the passage of Metz at his deuotion, and had victuals and other necessaries out of that Country. The King now requires the like from them: they offer victuals for money, and consent to admit his Maiesty into their City, with the Constable, followed with some Princes and Noblemen: but as for any passage of the army, they excuse themselves, and pretend neutrality. The Constable departs, and protests that he will haue free passage, free entry, and free issue at his discretion, without any limitation, & partly by promises, partly by threats, he wins the inhabitants. The Citizens had not foreseene this storme, and lesse provided any remedy to auoid it. This being forced to bid their liberty adieu, they agree with the Lord of Bourdillon, afterwards Marshall of France: That the Constable accompanied with some Princes and Noblemen should enter with two companies of foot: the companies were six hundred men strong: they increased them with halfe as many more, all chosen men of account, the which being entered, repelled the people, become masters, and draw after them so long a traine, as the Metzins had no means to resist.

This was the tenth of April on Palm-Sunday: nine dayes after, the King made his entry in armes, being followed with all his forces put in battell: he received the oath of the Citizens, and sware solemnly to them in the porch of Saint Stephens Church, as hee had done to them of Thoul: which was to defend them against all men, and to maintain them in their freedoms, rights, priuiledges, and liberties: moreover, to provide for the fortification of the place, which he pretended to make one of the bulwarkes of France. He left Gunner brother to the Marshall of Brisac for Gouverneur, and with him the company of the Earle of Nantueil, two hundred light-horse, two hundred Harguebuziers on horsebacke, and twelue Ensignes of foot. Thus the famous City of Metz was brought vnder the obedience of this Crown: a portion of the ancient patrimony of the Kings of France, and in former times vsurped by the Emperors.

The Constable would gladly haue vied the like stratagem to Strassbourg: but he found more assurance and resolution then at Metz. They put a strong garison into their Citie, and prepared for defence against any that should seek to make them subiect: so as seeing that neither reproaches, threats, nor bitter words, could draw any thing from the inhabitants,

Deputies from the Princes of Germany to the King.

A bitants, but victuals and necessaries for the campe, the army tooke the way of Haguenau and Wisbourg. Thither came deputies from the Count Palatine, the Archbishops of Mentz and Treues, and from the Dukes of Cleues and Wirtemberg, who were then assembled at Wormes for the good of the Common-wealth. They make petition vnto the King that he would not spoile the Champion Country, but take pittie of the poore Commons: and seeing that hee had protested to make this warre for the liberty of Germany, that he would stay his army: for if he advanced, it would be very preiudiciall to the Empire. They also besought him that hee would hearken vnto a peace, whereof they had spoken vnto the Emperor, and were in good hope thereof. As touching any particular B alliance, they desired him not to presse them, but to haue regard vnto their honors, and to the faith which they ought vnto the Empire. At the same time, being the eleventh of May, Duke Maurice Elektor of Saxony, sent Letters vnto the King, containing all that had bin done at Lintz, where the confederate Princes of Germany had treated of a peace with King Ferdinand, who negotiated the same for the Emperor, in whose name he promised a speedy resolution to the good and quiet of Germany. He also desired the King (in case he would be comprehended in the Treatie) to declare with what conditions he meant to compound with the Emperor. Having receiued the Letters contrary to his expectation, and hearing that the Queene of Hungary had taken Strenay vpon Meuse, and spoiled the Country being without defence, he resolved vpon his returne: but before his departure he made answer to the Princes Deputies: That he was well satisfied that the captive Princes should soone be deliuered, and that Germany should be in quiet: That if at any time it should haue need of his assistance, he would employ all his means to succour it.

As touching a peace with the Emperor, he referred himselfe vnto them, hauing by his trauell, charge, and valour, freed Germany from those miseries which did oppresse it, whereof they must now be careful, and not basely lose that libertie, which he so honorably had recovered for them. Notwithstanding, to entertaine his Confederates, and to haue one wayes in Germany, which might aduertise him truly how matters passed betwixt the Confederates and the Imperials, and the better to be informed of the Emperors D designs, he left Du Fresno Bishop of Baionne his Ambassador with Duke Maurice, who in an Assembly held at Passau, to aduise what was to be done for the restoring of Germanie to her beaury and ancient liberty, in the presence of the Emperors Ambassador, and of the Elektors and many Princes of the Empire, he made a long and eloquent speech the third of Iune, propounding the ancient coniunction of Germany and France. The great affection which the King bare vnto the Empire, being very ill gouerned by Spaniards and their adherents: he also held it fit that the Protestant Princes should make an accord with the Emperor, so as the prisoners might be releas'd, & the ancient alliances of France with the Empire, and the last league made with the Princes ratified for euer: That the Emperor should doe him right for his pretensions: That hee desired to satisfie them all, and especially Duke Maurice. The Princes answer consisted chiefly of thanks and declarations, so deliuered, as neither the Emperor nor the King could pretend any cause of dislike. As touching the renewing of the ancient alliances, they sayd that a matter of so great weight required a greater Assembly. In the meane time they desired, that the amity so long continued betwixt these two Nations, might remaine firme, and that the differences which the King had against the Emperor, might be pacified, promising therein to employ all their means: In the meane time they intreated the King to declare what wrongs hee pretended to haue beene done him by the Emperor, to whom they would write, to aduance the businesse to some good peace.

In the meane time, the King leauing Germany, brought backe his army into France: as he advanced, the Marshall of Cleues, who led the Queene of Hungaries forces retired, and his troops disbanded: which made the Kings Councill resolve to vndertake the conquest of the Duchy of Luxemburg. They first attempted a strong Castle called Reck-de-Mars, the which was presently taken and spoiled: the like was done to Mount Saint-Iohn, Soliere and other places, the which were ruined whilst the Kings and Emperours forces skirmished before Thionuille. The army hauing passed nere it, they approached to Danuilliers, the which being battered, yielded to the Kings discretion, the Captiues were detained prisoners, and the souldiers sent away with white wands. Yuoy being battered, yielded in like manner, and the Gouvernor was sent to Paris. All the goods were given to the Constable, who distributed the greatest part vnto his company, and to that of his eldest sonne, whereto the old bands did murine, and beganne to disband: Mommedy followed Yuoy. During these prizes, the Marshall of La Marke obtained some troops of the King, with the which he recovered the towne and castle of Bouillon, with all the other places depending vpon that Duchy. After which, the Castles of Treton, Glaiou and others were ruined. To content the old bands, they gaue them the facke of Cinay, a towne and castle belonging to the Duke of Arloot. The besieged retiring into the castle, and offering to parlee, they were forced by the portall and other places, by the fury of the assailants, being greedy of spoile. They ranne thither with such violence, as a match falling into certaine powder, there were about 120 of the forwardest burnt and flaine. The fury of the warre consumed Townes and Castles to ashes. But for as much as the armie beganne to decrease, some disbanding being laden with spoiles, but the most part sick and diseased, in the end of Iuly they put the rest into garisons, to see what the Emperour would doe, who hauing to doe with the Protestant Princes and the King, he resolved to make an accord with the Princes, that he might be assisted with their means against the King. The last of Iuly he granted a peace to Germany, that he might make violent warres in France. The King was much discontented with this accord: notwithstanding, he sent backe the hostages to Duke Maurice, who also released his, which were the Earles of Nantueil and of Lamers.

Metz.

Metz besieged by the Empe-

The Duke of Au-male defeated.

After this accord with the Germanes, the Emperour preuailed so, as the Princes and townes granted by little and little to furnish him with men, money, and artillery, to chase the King out of Metz, Thoul, and Verdun, Imperiall townes. Thereupon hee leaues an army of 50000 foot, and 20000 horse, with much artillery. Whilest he prepares, Albert Marquis of Brandenburg, who had in the Kings name made cruell warres against some Townes and Bishops of Germany, now seeks vnder-hand to bee reconciled vnto the Emperour as well as the rest, but he will insinuate himselfe by some notable seruice: being followed by 2000 horse, and 8000 foot, and drawing after him some artillery, he approached the frontiers of Luxembourg and Lorrain, where for a long time he entertained the King with hope to cary arms for him, during the which he did wonderfully spoile the champion Country. In the end, the Marquis retired himselfe from the French army, and hauing cut off the victuals from them of Metz, he went and caried armes for the Emperour. Winter approaching, many thought the Emperour would not hazard so mighty an army, to encounter (without any profit) the cold, frosts, and discommodities of the season. But the hope he had to take Metz, in the which there were many Princes, Noblemen and Gentlemen, made him reiect all other apprehensions, so as his forces began to aduance towards Lorraine, and comes to Sarbruechen leues leagues, from whence he sends the Duke of Alua his Lieutenant General, and the Marquis of Marignan with fourteene thousand foot, foure thousand horse, and six field pieces, to view the City, and to chooseth a convenient place to lodge his army, attending his coming with the rest of his forces. The Duke of Guise, Lieutenant general for the King, sends forth some troops to skirmish, where hee losest Marigni a Gentleman of Picardy, two Captaines, and five souldiers; and the enemy about an hundred and fifty men. But the Marquis of Brandenburg reuengeth this disgrace vpon the Duke of Aunale, and by a second stratagem, hee giues the King an assured testimony of his defection; and to the Emperour, the effects of the seruice which hee had vowed vnto him. The Duke costed the Marquis his retreat, and cuts the heauiest of his troops of pieces, when as the Marquis (turning head) overthrowes a great troop of seruants mustred together to make a shew: and chargeth a squadron of light-horse: who making but a weak resistance, leaue the place. So all fall vpon the men at armes, who were ill furnished to withstand the shooke of the Reistres pistols. The Duke seeing his men at armes broken, and seeking to saue themselves, rallies a small troop, and returns to the charge. The multitude inuirones him, and doth oppress his best men: some are wounded, and others taken: two hundred Gentlemen, by their death, and the taking of many others, made the Marquis valour famous. The Duke being overthrowne, remained as a pawne of an assured victory, and shall not bee deliuered vntill the King hath payed fifty thousand Crownes for him. This chanced in the end of October. But we shall see this losse recompenced with a happy successe against the Emperours attempts.

The Earle of Reux entred Picardy at the same time, with the desolation thereof, and the burning of Noyon, Nelfe, Chauny, Roys, Folembray, and about eight hundred villages: a testimonie of the Emperours spleene. Then hauing besieged Heildin, and filled vp the trench with the ruines of a wall which they had vnder-mined: the towne was very lightly yielded by the Lord of Rasse, who was in danger to haue bene made a publicke spectacle vpon a scaffold, if the Constables fauour had not protected him. The reason was, for that he had not endured any force, nor made any resistance, and had a little before sent the King word, that there was no feare of the Castle.

The second losse made them to apprehend a third. The Emperour incamped before Metz: and the King desirous to vnderstand in what estate the besieged were, as the Duke of Guise, John and Lewis of Bourbon (the one was Duke of Anguien, the last was Prince of Conde) brethren to the Duke of Vendosme, Charles of Bourbon, Prince of Roch-sur-yon, Francis and René of Lorraine, (the first Grand Prior of France, the last Marquis of Elbeuf) brethren to the Duke of Guise: the Lords of Rochefoucault, and Randan brethren: Peter Stroff, la Brosse, Brion, Gonnor, Parroy, with an infinit number of others, who had voluntarily thrust themselves within the wals, to eternize the memory of so generous a preferuation of their new conquest against the Imperiall forces: they all with one consent and resolution, free the King of this suspence, and the effects second their promises. They toyle the enemy with continuall sallies both of horse and foot: they come vp to the Cannon, overthrow their tents, force their quarters, put the whole campe in alarme, and performe more then hath bene heard of in any former siege. The place did well deserue it, and their vertue was the more admirable, for that the time was so vnseasonable both for the one and the other, being in the cold of winter: But the constancy of the besieged, and the obstinacie of the besiegers, encountered the rigour of raine, snow, cold, and ice.

The 26 of Nouember they batter the wall with forty Cannons, without any intermission, but to coole them: and the besieged both Princes, Noblemen, and souldiers, carie earth indifferently to rampar vp the breach, making the Imperials admire their diligence and valour. The King resting assured, leaues the Duke of Neuers to command his armie in Lorraine, and gaue commission to the Lord of Chastillon, then Admiral of France (Annebauld being lately dead at la Fere) to goe into Picardy, as Lieutenant to the duke of Vendosme.

The Duke of Neuers employes all his cares to cut off the Emperours victuals: and the Admirals approach chafeth the Earle of Reux from Hedin, leauing his sonne with a strong garison in the Castle. Hauing spent foure thousand and threecore Cannon shot, he makes a breach the 16 of December, but yet not reasonable: notwithstanding the besieged being amazed, yeeld it; to haue their liues and goods saued: And the Duke of Neuers did still molest the Emperours army, and at one time cut off a great conuoy of all sorts of victuals and munition by Mon: de Many, without the losse of any one Frenchman wherein he got great honour, hauing aduanced himselfe farr and retired discretely from among many of the enemies troops, leauing not any one engaged behind him. This blow troubled the Emperour: the injuries of the ayre molested his men before Metz: extreme hunger made them weak, the continuall sallies of the besieged diminished them, his treasure grew short, his reputation decayed, his mynes were blowne vp, and all his attempts were made fruitlesse: to conclude, all went against the haire. So the Emperour giuing charge to the Duke of Alua, to order the retreat, he left the Empire deprived of the Country of Metz, and the Crowne of France assured of this new conquest, by the Constables industry, and happily preferred by the valour of the besieged.

But there followed rough encounters. Hedin and Therouenne had till now bene the instruments of warre. It is better (saith the Proverbe) to stumble once, then to stagger alwayes. The Emperour to be reuenged for some part of his losses, sends the Lord of Binecourt with a mighty army to besiege Therouenne. The Lord of Esse, and Francis of Montmorency defended it. The place is furiously battered, the besieged sustaine a most violent assault of three charges, and many die on either side. The chiefe among the French, were the Lords of Esse, of Vienna, of Beaudine, of Roch-poly, of Blandy, Captain Ferrières, with many Gentlemen and souldiers. They vndermine, they mine, and with the ruines of the wall fill vp the trenches, which caused the besieged to demand a composition. But

whilest they are busie in parle, (an error which often chancing, should make a Commander wise) the Germanes and Bourguignons enter at diuers places, and kill all they encounter. The Spaniards louing money at that time more then blood, saved many. The Seigneur of Ouart, to save the life of Montmorency his Generall, was sore wounded, whereof hee dyed soon after. And the Emperor causing the towne to be razed and spoiled, shall save many foules which should be lost in the defence and winning thereof.

Hedin assailed, battered, and vndermined more then a Foxes burrow, had like successe vnder Emanuel Philibert, sonne to the Duke of Sauoy, and Lieutenant General for the Emperor, his vnkle by the mothers side. The Duke of Bouillon and Horatio Farnes newly married to Diana the Emperours bastard-daughter, had taken the guard thereof, and had prepared great store of wild-fire at the breach to defend the assault. A Priest, either through malice or negligence sets it on fire, and consumes many souldiers ready for the defence. The Imperials on the other side, blow vp their mynes, and bury a great number of men in the ruines thereof: they enter pell-mell, and so become masters of the place. Farnes, the Vicount of Martigues, the Seneshall of Castres, with many other Gentlemen, were slain there. The Duke of Bouillon with many others, had a long and hard imprisonment.

Ariscot taken.

Let vs take our reuenge. The French armie assembled about Amiens and Piquigny: the Prince of Conde led the light-horse, who in the midst of August incountred with some troopes, led by the duke of Ariscot: he charged them, defeated them, and followed them about a league: he slue seven or eight hundred men, tooke about 560 prisoners, and amongst the rest, the Duke himselfe with seven Ensignes. The Kings armie consisted of about seven thousand horsemen, fise and twenty thousand foot, with an hundred pieces of artillery, great and small, desiring nothing more, then to make his valour admirable, by the issue of some happy battaile. Being and abiding in the enemies Country, the Constable went to Bapaume two leagues from Mary-mont, a place well fortified, and also strong by nature, with fise thousand French horse, and as many foot: In the which Haulismont (a Knight much esteemed among the Burgonians) was Gouverneur, having twelue companies of foot, and three or four hundred horse, who at their first approach spared not his Cannon, and entertained them with a hote skirmish, the which continued foure houres: during the which, the Admirall with a small troope viewed the towne, and found it pregnable, the Rampar being made of a crumbling sand, but the difficulty was to haue water, whereof they could find no lasting springs, which made them change their resolution for the siege. At their departure they burnt all Villages and places belonging to the enemy euen to the gates of Bapaume. The Imperiall armie coasted them in their retreat, keeping still a riuer betwixt them. The King finding that the enemy sought nothing but to temporize, vntill that winter came on, whereby his army might be weakened by cold and diseases, and then to fight with him vpon aduantage.

The King resolved with his Councell to draw him to battaile, if it were possible, or to take the first place he should attempt, and so ruine the whole country in view of the Emperour, and so to returne in triumph, as hauing braued him in his owne dominions. Hee therefore meanes to great Cambray, both for that the taking thereof would be an example to other great townes, as also thinking the Imperiall armie would rather hazard a battell then lose such a place, where the inhabitants would willingly shake off the yoke, which not long before had been laid vpon them, yet being a neutrall towne.

summoned by the French
King.

The French were incamped two little leagues from Cambray: by the breake of day the King caused his armie to be put in battaile, and sent an Herald to summon the towne, letting them vnderstand, that he was not come to oppress them, but to restore them to their ancient Liberties, whereof they were deprived by the Emperour: if they were desirous to shake off their bondage, they could haue no better meanes then by his comming, being there in person ready to fight for their Liberties: but if they did otherwise, they would be the cause of their own ruines, in losing the priuiledge of Neuter-townes, which affect neithers quarrell, and whereby they had libertie to traffike in both their countries. Besides, their country should be freed from the miseries of warre, and from all manner of exactions and spoiles. But they demanded eight and forty houres respite of the King, to aduise thereon, and to yeeld him an answer: whereupon the King caused his armie to retire a league backe, making a Proclamation, vpon corporall punishment, that no man should take

A take any thing within the territory of Cambray without paying for the same. In the meane time the Emperor is aduertised of this summons, being then at Brussels, who sent them diuers instructions. Among others, that they depended of the Empire, and that hee was Emperour to protect them, not the French King, who sought nothing but their ruine: so hauing first before their eyes the example of Metz, he promised if they were besieged, to succour them by all means whatsoever: and then he gaue order to the Prince of Piedmont (who was gone with his armie towards Valenciennes) to yeeld them what succours they should demand, appointing the Earles of Bessu and Brabant for gouernours. The time limited being expired, the King sent to know their resolution: who answered, that if it pleased his Maiestie they would remaine his humble neighbours and friends, offering to furnish the armie with victuals, but it was not in their power to dispose any further of themselves, the Emperor hauing put a great garison into their towne.

Answer of them
of Cambray.

Vpon this answer the towne was adiuaged for enemy, and the same day being the 8 of September, the Constable with two Regiments of men at Armes, and three or foure hundred light-horse, being followed by the Admirall with ten ensignes on foot, went to view the towne, where the Cannon played on them from all parts, and the souldiers sallied forth gallantly to skirmish, the which the French continued six dayes together, making a shew as if they would besiege the town: but the weather growing very rainy, they dislodged to the Castle of Cambresy, from whence they marcht within two leagues of Valenciennes, whereas the Imperiall armie was lodged in a fort which they had made about a Culuerin shot from Valenciennes vpon the riuer of Elcau.

And on the 17 of September, the French hauing left their baggage in their lodging with a good guard, the rest of the armie advanced to seeke out the Imperials, and to present them battell. The Auant-curses going before, found many of their horsemen in battell, vpon a little hill, ready to fight: and hard by they tooke one on horsebacke, in habit of a merchant, as a spy, who gaue intelligence, that the Imperiall fore-ward had passed the riuer to come to fight with them, so being brought vnto the Constable, and sent by him vnto the King, he was the cause that the armie advanced with all speed that might be, and was put in battaile: in the meane time the skirmish grew hote, many of the Imperiall armie fell forth, which did greatly annoy the forlorne hopes.

French seeke the Imperiall army.

During this skirmish the Imperiall armie was put in battaile within their fort. The Kings armie being likewise in battaile, and the skirmish growing still hote on either side, the Imperiall horsemen stood still vpon a little hill about three houres, as it seemed, expecting some aduantage: which the Constable fore-seeing, hee commanded the light-horse-men to charge them, which they did with such resolution, as they forced them to retire vnto their trenches; which done, the French armie seeing they could not draw the Imperials out of their fort, retired backe againe vnto their lodging from whence they came, and from thence it marched within two leagues of Saint Quentin, where it was dissolved the 20 of September: which done, the King sent the Marshall of S. Andrew to E spoile the County of S. Pol: then in the end of October, hee puts part of his forces into garison, the rest hee dissimuleth and sendeth away. Now our armes are laid aside vntill the next spring.

At the Spring the King diuided his forces into three armies. The first was commanded by the Prince of La Roche-sur-yon in Vermandois, being compounded of ten thousand foot, three hundred men at armes, and fise or six hundred Argoletiers. The Constable had the charge of the second towards Crecy, containing fise and twenty Ensignes of French, as many Swisses, two Regiments of Lanquenets, two thousand horse, some of the light-horse, and some Argoletiers, with some English and Scottish horsemen. The third led by the Duke of Neuers had twenty Ensignes of English and Scots, two Regiments of Lanquenets, three hundred men at armes, eight hundred light-horse, and fise or six hundred Reisters, Pistollers: and all three breathed nothing but reuenge, and desire to receive those confusions in Picardy.

The Prince enters into Arthois: he spoiles, burnes, and defeats two Cornets of horse, hee kills two hundred vpon the place, and sends their colours to the King. The Constable takes Marimbou, fortifies Rerocoy, ruines the forts of Trelon, Glauin, Sinsy, and others built within two years. The Duke battens and takes the Castles of Orcimoor and Beaunin by composition, ruines and burnes a great number of villages: then hauing the taking of some strong places seated vpon the Meuz) opened the passage of the riuer, he A enters Liege and takes Agimont and Bouvines by assault, putting almost all the inhabitants to death, either by the sword, or by the hand of iustice, for that they presumed to stand against an armie Royall, and for their outrageous speeches: and to increase their punishment he burnt the towne: he assured himselfe of Caletthierry and Valuin being abandoned, he rooke and spoiled Dinan, but hee preferred the female sexe from the violence of the Germanes, being fled into a Church. Emanuel Philibert Duke of Sauoy, by the death of his father Charles lately deceased, assembled his army with an intent (said hee) to fight with the French, if they advanced. We must try this braue resolution.

The King passeth the riuer of Sambre the 25 of Iuly, being followed by the D. of Ne- B uers: he enters the country of Hainalt, spoiling, burning, and making all desolate, seeking to draw the enemy to fight. Some troopes charge euen vnto the suburbs of Niuelle, the first towne of Brabant: and for a note of their passage, they fire the said suburbs and villages thereabouts, so as many pleasant dwellings were consumed vnto ashes. The Duke of Sauoy flies the lists: and the armie marching towards Bains, (one of the chiefe townes of Hainalt) left nothing behinde it but teares, sighs, desolation, fire, smoake, and ashes: and to conclude, a mournfull scaffold whereon two great Princes played a horrible Tragedy, being cruelly incensed one against another. The castles and pleasant dwellings of the Gentlemen of the country, yea Bains it selfe, and Mary-mont that stately house, and others belonging to Mary Queene of Hungary, sister to the Emperor, Tragny that goodly and proud castle, Reux, Bauets, with an infinit number of others, were (in reuenge of that goodly place of Folembray) reduced to that estate, as they might well say, Here was Bains, here was Mary-Mont, here was Tragny, Reux, and Bauets.

In the end the French (having spoiled the whole country) drew the Prince of Pied- mont to fight: the two armies incounter about the midst of August neere vnto Renty, where there was a sharpe incounter: the Imperiall foreward chargeth the D. of Guise his troopes, but to their confusion: he defeats them with the helpe of those succours that came speedily vnto him, he kills eight or nine hundred men, and strikes such a terror into the rest of the Imperiall armie, as they retire hastily into their campe, as hauing no more desire to fight. So the winter approaching, and want of forrage troubling the men at armes, the King dismissed the Swisses and his Nobility: then leauing the D. of Vendosme General of the rest of the armie, he rooke from the enemy all meanes to endamage the Realme, but by sacking and burning of the country about Hesdin. The thirteenth day of March Pope Iulius the third died, Marcel Cersin borne in Tuscanie succeeded him: but soone after his election, death buried both his name and memory. John Peter Caraffe a Neapolitan, called Cardinall Theatin, the chiefe author of the Iesuits sect, held the Romanes see, and called himselfe Paul the fourth. We shall this yeare quench the fires of the yeare past, but it shall kindle new combustions, both on this side, and beyond the Alpes. So as no affection to the publike good, but the onely indisposition of the ayre, hath made vs till now surcease our armes.

Philip sonne to the Emperor Charles had the yeare past married with Mary Queene of England by the decease of Edward the sixth, and whilst that England did flame on all sides, by reason of the burning fires against such as had shaken off the yoke of the Romish obedience, they did solicit our two warriors to pacifie their mutual hatred by some firme and durable peace. Cardinall Paule an Englishman was employed therein, but without effect: for the fore was not yet ripe. The courtiers of the Imperials made the French to attempt vpon cattle Cambreis, the which was taken by scalado, and faire warres made vnto the Spaniards, and to victuall Mariembourg at diuers times, by Bourdillon Lieutenant to the Duke of Neuers, while on the other side Francois de Cleues Duke of Neuers, with the Admirall of Chastillon, Gouverneur in the absence of the D. of Vendosme (who was gone to take possession of his new estates, false to him in right of his wife, by the death of Henry of Albrer, and shall hereafter bee King of Navarre, and Soueraigne of Bearne) gaue order for the defence of the frontier.

But behold one of the trickes of our ordinarie confidence. Fifteene hundred of the Arrierrban, and foure hundred foot with some garisons of Picardy, returned home laden with spoile, without order, (saith the Originall) without order, without fauor of the enemy, and without courage. Blansimens Gouverneur of Bapaume, being more vigilant, incou-

A ters them betwix a wood, a village, and a riuer: chargeth them, and in a moment takes from them both their bootie and their liues at his discretion. The Hannuyers and Artesians made a ielt, that they had taken the Nobles of France without weight. The Imperials seeing Mariembourg victuall'd, opposed a Fort called Giuers, whence foraging all the neighbour country, they did starue Mariembourg. Twenty thousand foot, some enignes of the old Spanish bands, and five or six thousand Reistres, vnder the command of Count Barlemont, camped about this fort, to hinder another victualling, conducted by the duke of Neuers, the Admirall, Sanfasc, Bourdillon, and others, with eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light-horse, and some eight thousand foot.

B The 26 of Iuly, the French horse charge the Reistres, and driue them into their fort: then seeing the Imperials loth to make any farther aduenture, the time being very rainie and vnseasonable, want of forrage, cold, hunger, and many other discommodities caused them to found a retreat, and to leaue the third victualling of Mariembourg, to Sanfasc and Bourdillon: after the which the rigour of the season, and the iniuries of the aire, forced both parties to liue in rest. The King hauing then gotten from Iohn of Brosse Duke of E. stampes the rights which hee pretended to the Duchy of Britanie in the right of the house of Blois, he gaue him in exchange the Earledome of Ponthieure. Whilst they remaine quiet vpon the frontier, let vs visit them beyond the mountaines. The Marshall of Brissac had the winter past, seized vpon Yurec and Bielle: the Spring hee had fortified S. War beyond the Alpes

C laco, taken Crepacuore, surprized (by the industry of Capitaine Saluafon Gouverneur of Veruue) Cazal, the store-house of victuall and munition, prepared by the Imperials for the recouerie of Piedmont, ruined Poman, Saint Saluador, and other small places not to be held, and vnseasonably fortified in any short time. About the end of Iuly, the Duke of Alua, succesor to Gonzagua in the government of Lombardie, went to field with twenty thousand foot, foure thousand horse, and forty Cannons, who at the first beseged Saint Iaco: but he found good resistance, Birague and Vimercat commanding in the place, forced him to retire, and to fortifie at the bridge of Sure, hoping to vanquish those by famine, who had repulsed his attempts by force. The Marshall being fortified from the King, with foure thousand horse, and fourteene thousand foot, led by the duke of Anguien, Prince of Conde, the Dukes of Aumale and Nemours, the Vidame of Chartres, Aubigni, Gonnor, Yantador, & Vrfe, la Chastrie and Lude, with a great number of voluntarie Gentlemen, beseged Vulpian, defeated the succours which the Duke of Alua sent, took the high and the low towne by force, and the castle by composition. Montcaluo both town and castle (after the dismantling of Vulpian) followed the Conquerors fortune: the French made these conquests in September and October: some dayes after, the Dukes troopes had by meanes of an Ambush layed neere vnto Incise (where some French were slaine and others taken) a small reuenge for their losses at Vulpian and Montcaluo: the remainder of the yeare was more quiet. But before wee proceed, let vs speake something of the warres of Siena, which beginning long before, were ended this

E yeare. The insupportable behaviour of Don Diego of Mendosa, Gouverneur of Siena for the Emperor, had driuen the Citizens to put themselves into the Kings protection, and to bring into their citie foure thousand men, vnder the command of the Earle of Pettillano, who being entered, forced the Spaniards, kill some, and expell the rest by composition. These men chased from Siena, seized vpon Orbitello and fortified it. After the siege of Metz, the Emperor sent Don Garfio of Toledo Viceroy of Naples, with fifteene hundred horse, and twelue thousand foot, to spoile the Country of Siena: and the King to crosse him, sends the Lord of Termes with twelue thousand foot, besides the Inhabitants of the country, all hauing vowed to forer the government of the Spaniards. Termes being F entered, he provided for the fortification of the citie, and assured himselfe of Montelice, Montelle, and Montakin against the threats of the Viceroy, and of Ascanius de la Colone, attending the arrival of Proper Strozzy who came with the title of Lieutenant General for the King, with a good troope of men at armes.

Strozzy being arrived, he makes new leauies in Italy: Ossimo Duke of Florence gives intelligence to the Pope and Emperor, and all ioyne together to send home the French, giving the charge of their common army to James de Medici Marquis of Marignan. The Marquis besegeth Siena, and at his first approach had almost surpris'd it by night, the fortifications being not yet finished. The Sienois withstand him, give him the repulse, and kill many of his men. He then incamps before the towne, spoiles the country, and had already reduced them to want, while that Stroffy was busied to provide for the other places within the estate of Siena. Stroffy comes into the towne, and goes presently to field againe with six hundred men; he surpriseth Salp Bailon and Ascanius de la Corne, who had an enterprife vpon Chituffi: he defeats their troopes, kills Bailon, and sends Ascanius prisoner to the King.

The King relieved him with new supplies in Tuscane, and likewise in the Ile of Corsica, where the Lord of Termes had taken from the Genouois (partisans to the Emperor) the Townes of Saint Florent, and Saint Beniface a port of the sea. These last succours consisted of five thousand Swisses and Gascons, with some light horse. And whilest they take breath in Siena, Stroffy makes a second sallie, with five hundred good horse, and a thousand choice foot, takes Montcalin and Montcarlo from the Duke of Florence, and by this stratagem hee forceth the Marquis to leave Siena for to succour the Florentin: then seeing the Marquis fortified with new troopes, hee returns with his men to Siena. Moreover, Leo brother to Peter Stroffy ranne along the coast of Tuscane, and spoiled the ports belonging to the duke of Florence. But as he approached too neere to Scarlin, to discover the place, he was slaine with a shot. Stroffy to reuenge his death, comes to continue the siege, attending the succours which the Lord of Montluc brought. Montluc being ariued, Stroffy makes an armie compounded of six hundred Italians, two thousand Gascons, two thousand Swisses, two thousand five hundred Lanqueneters, and about a thousand horse, with which troopes he resolved to fight with the enemy, if he presented himselfe: having left the guard of Siena to Montluc, hee went to batter Ciuitelle in the territorie of Florence.

The Marquis goes to succour it, and at his arriual chargeth Stroffy, who makes head against him, and both the one and the other bathe the field with a great effusion of blood. Stroffy leaves Ciuitelle, to set vpon Foian, a strong and rich place: hee batters it, and the first day takes it by assault, cutting Charlot Vrsin in pieces with all those that kept it, spoiles it, and abandons all to fire and sword. But see a troublesome Catastrophe. The Marquis approacheth better furnished with artillery, and Stroffy marcheth towards Montpucian, fauouring the retreat of his men, with many and rough skirmishes: then the Italians, being the chiefe strength of his army, slip from him, and leaue him much inferiour to the Marquis: who following with speed, overtook him betwixt Martian, Lucignan and Foyan, and giues him battail. Stroffy entertaines it, and with a bloody fight giues testimony of his valour. But Bighet an Italian, being ensigne Colonell of the army, turns his backe cowardly: and the French sauing their liues after him by the nimbleness of their legges, leaue the horse, the Gascons and the Swisses to endure the charge, who had rather dye with their armes in their hands, then turne their backs. Bighet and the Earle of Alte were afterwards beheaded, the first as being the principall cause of this defeat: the other for that he had cowardly yielded Lufignan, a place impregnable. They reckon two thousand five hundred slaine (some say foure thousand) besides a great number wounded to the death, and five or six hundred prisoners. Stroffy saued himselfe in Montcalin, and the Marquis reouerred Foyan, Martian, Lucignan, and some other places, which euen then began to force the Sienois to obey the Conquerors command, who camped before their towne with all his forces. Montluc comforts them, and confirms their resolutions: but the coming of Stroffy with two ensignes of foot, and two companies of men at armes, saued in this shipwracke, reuiued them more: the which hee did hazard in fauour of the besieged vpon a report of the death of Montluc. Montluc foreseeing, that bread would sooner faile the besieged, then courage, had already set an order for euery mans diet. The Marquis repulld by the losse of six hundred men, at a scalado giuen in the night to the Citadell, and the fort of Camollia: and finding that by skirmishes, batteries, assaults, intelligences, or other stratagems, hee should neuer be master of Siena: hee resolves vpon the longer, but the more easie expedient: so as the watches, the toyles, the disceases, and worst of all, famine and despaire of succour, forced Montluc the twenty one of April this yeare, to saue the rest of his men by an honorable composition, which is read at large, in the history of the warres of Italy. Siena fell afterwards into the hands of the Duke of Florence, and the Marquis, for that hee had prolonged the warre of Siena,

A Siena, contrary to the Emperors liking, and wasted a mighty armie before it, dyed in disgrace, in the end of the same yeare.

Now the Emperour (whose humour we haue sufficiently learned by the discourse of the History) shanking vnder the burthen of the affaires of this world, wearied with the toyles of warre, rought with some remorse for the blood spilt in those long and mournfull warres of Christendome, being perswaded, that his discord with our King, had made the Turke to preuaile much in diuers parts of Europe, his coming of late in fauour of the French, to the Ile of Corfe, to assist them at the siege of Caluis, and Saint Beniface: to aide them to conquer the Islands; then in their retreat to spoile the coast of Tuscane, to besiege Plombin, and the Ile of Elbe, of the territorie of Florence: to afflict the estates of Naples, Sicilia and Calabria, with infinit miseries, and being laden with great spoiles, to cary away with controll, and to sell infinit numbers of Christian soules at Constantinople and other places.

These considerations caused him to call Philip his sonne from England to Bruxelles, where by autentike letters, of the five and twentieth day of October, hee resigned all his Realmes vnto him: commanding all his estates and subiects, to acknowledge him as their true and lawfull King, he aduised him particularly, amongst other exhortations, to make a peace, and entertaine loue with the French King, vnting their common forces, rather for the defence, then oppression of Christendome. King Philip following his fathers aduice, and being solicited by Mary Queene of England his wife, was inclined to a Peace: for the effecting whereof, after many voyages, a truce was concluded for five yeares. The Earle of Lalaine came to Blois to see the King sweare the truce, and the Admirall of Chastillon went to Bruxelles to the Emperour and King Philip, but this truce was as soone broken as made.

During the continuance of this truce, one called Villegagnon a Knight of Malta armed certaine ships, and made a voyage to America, promising to doe wonders for the King in this new world. But his vnstedfast spirit, and his vnstedfast dealing expelled him, so as hee performed nothing of worth. If this enterprife had incountered a discreet Commander, there had bene a port open for the execution of great matters, but the gouernour of the world had otherwise disposed.

Paul the fourth was enemy to the Spaniards: and the Colonnes suspecting him to be of the French faction (as in truth the house of Caraffe had of old time fauoured the title of our Kings, to the realme of Naples) sought to assure their estates and persons. To this end they held some secret assemblies within Rome, in the houses of Marie Anthony Colonne, and the Cardinal of Saint Fiore, enemies to the house of France. The Pope to crosse them, imprisons this Cardinal in the Castle of S. Angelo, with Camillo Colonne, Iulian Cesarin, and the Abbot of Breguec: he summons Marc Anthony, and plants guards and Sentinels throughout all the Citie. The Colonnes and their adherents, fly to the Castilian. He commands the D. of Alua to succour them. The Duke marcheth with that designe, and takes E from the Pope about Rome Anagnio, Pilaftine, Segne, Tiouli, and by the siege and taking of Ostia, cuts off the viuals from Rome, and the Colonnes fortifying themselves about Rome, kept the Pope mewed vp within compasse of his walls.

The Pope appeales to the King for aide, and sends him by his Nephew the Cardinal Caraffe, a triumphant hat with a stately fowr. Our two Kings did not greatly loue: their ancient hatred and discontents were yet fresh, and their household flatterers (to whom common confusions did serue as a ladder to aduance their estates and to enrich their houses, whereas peace sends the most of them home to liue privately) were glad that Rome kindled the coales of new quartels betwixt their masters. So the French (meaning to crosse the Castilian, in fauour of the Pope) sent Stroffy (Marshall of France in the place of the Lord of Sedan, lately deceased after his returne from prison out of the Low Countries) to oppose against the Spaniards, attending the succours led by the Duke of Guise. The Duke of Guise ariued at Turin, with about fiftene thousand foot, eight hundred men at armes, and twelue hundred light horse, being assured of supplies as soon as the warres should begin: hauing ioyned his forces with those of the Marshall of Brisac, he marcheth directly to Valencia, making this his colour, that the garison had shot at the French going to succour the Pope: and for that it was secretly giuen out that the French had taken Paulia, he apazeth Spoluerin, who kept the towne with two thousand men: summons him to yeeld, threatening him to put all to fire and sword, if hee enter by force. Thus Spolnerin being terrified, departs with baggage and baggage, and leafeth his head at Papia for a reward of his bafe cowardise.

The duke of Guise being come to Thurin in January 1557, the chiefe towne in Piedmont, the Spaniards fortified Milan, and refreshed the garisons of all places of importance in Italy: The duke of Florence armed, and lodged troopes vpon the frontiers of Ferrara, manning Florence and other townes of his obedience, especially towards Bologna. The D. of Alua fortified the townes in the Realme of Naples, and along the sea coast in Calabria. So as all Italy was in alarm, and stood vpon their guards. On the other side, Stroffo, Montmar and others which were in Rome, issue forth with 600 horse, and five thousand foot, recover Ostia by composition, and expell the Spaniards from Velitres, Tusculum, Marini, Grotteferate, Palestrin, Saint Angela, Saint Paul, Vico, Valerio, and other small places in the territories of Rome. The duke of Aluaes retreat had opened the way to Rome for the duke of Guise, presuming vpon the conuention lately made betwixt the King, the Pope, and the duke of Ferrara: whereby the Pope should furnish twenty thousand foot, a thousand horse, and the charge of the army: the King the like number of foot, and 2000 horse: the Duke six thousand foot, two hundred men at armes, five hundred light-horse, and twenty pieces of battery. But Popes haue commonly advanced their affaires at their costs that haue beleueed them, and then haue abandoned them very lightly that haue assisted them at their need. The duke of Guise comming to Bologna, findes no men in field, neither were the Popes coffers open, and it may be, if they had not toucht this string, the expedition had been more successfull.

In the meane time the French armie decreased for want of pay, the Spaniards inter-sed, and the Ferrarois in stead of assisting, craued aide of the duke of Guise his sonne-in-law. What could our men doe, but study of their returne into France? but the Pope had not yet firmly settled his affaires: and if he had long remained alone betwixt two stooles, without doubt the Spaniard would haue ouer-ruled him. And therefore, to stay the duke of Guise, he swears, Not to treat any accord without the Kings consent, and that for assurance thereof he would send his sonne the Duke of Palluigne for hostage into France. But it was rather to attend the successe of the affaires of Picardy, where they prepared a Theater to play a bloody Tragedie, then with any intent to discharge his oath. The Admirall hauing, by the taking and spoile of Lens in Artois: where the waite in Picardie, the Prince of Piedmont accompanied with Ernest and Henry, Dukes of Brunswicke, the Duke of Arscot (newly come out of prison): the Earles of Mansfield, Aiguemont, Meigie and Bulement, leading fortie thousand foote, and fiftene thousand horse: ten thousand English foot and fiftene hundred horse, came soone after that to his succour.
The Prince of Piedmont, hauing newly proclaimed warre against the King, came and threatened Guise, but in effect it was to besiege Saint Quentin being vnfortified of men.

The Admirall refused to enter it, and parted from Pierrepont the second of August, with four companies of men at armes and three of light-horse. Being at Han, he was forced (by reason of the halt of his voyage) to content himselfe with two companies of foormen: the third part whereof entred with him into Saint Quentin, the rest remained behinde, and were forced to retire, for that the towne was in a manner all intucked.
The Constable being aduertised what past within the towne, he sent the Prince of Conde generall of the light-horse, the Marshall of Saint Andrew with four hundred men at armes, and the Lord of Andelot with ten companies on foot, to put themselves into Han, as well to annoy the enemy, as to refresh Saint Quentin if they could: Andelot offered to enter with two hundred men, whilest that a generall alarm should be giuen vnto the enemy, but the enterprise being discouered by some prisoners, he could not effect it, but with a small number.

In the meane time the Spanish army was fortified with ten thousand English foot, and about fiftene hundred horse. The Constable desirous to save them that were within Saint Quentin, caused his armie to passe the riuier beneath La Fere, and on the tenth day of August being Saint Lawrence day, marched towards Saint Quentin, where they arrived about nine of the clocke in the morning, and put themselves in battaille: at the suburbs of P'f'le, which the Spaniards had won, whom they chased away. In the meane time the artillerie played vpon the Prince of Piedmonts campe, and caused great disorder, during
the

A the which the Constable put what succours he could into the towne. The Spanish army refused suddenly to ioyne with the Constable, and to force him to fight: whereupon the prince of Piedmont and the Earle of Egmont ioyned.

The Constable making his retreat, without any intent to fight, hee ioyned with the Prince of Conde, who made a stand with the light-horse-men nere vnto a Wind-mill, and they two together without losse, ioyned with the body of the army. The enemy followed them close with eight great battalions of horse: the Earle of Egmont (who that day did great seruice vnto his master) was the first which charged the French on the one side with 2000 horse: Ernest, and Henry, dukes of Brunswic, seconded by the Earle of Borne, with 2000 Reistres and one thousand men at armes, fell vpon the other side: The Earle of Mansfield with other Commanders, forced the midst with such violence, as the French were ouerthrowne: for though the party were very vnequall, yet they did fight, whereas the Constable was wounded and taken prisoner, with the Dukes of Montpensier, and Longueville, the Prince of Mantoua, the Marshall of S. Andrew, with many other Noblemen, and Gentlemen of marke. The chiefe of them that were slaine, were Iohn of Bourbon duke of Anguieu, the Vicount of Turenne (the Constables sonne-in-law) the elder brother of Roche du Maine, the Lords of Chandenier, Pontdormy, with very many others, and in a manner all the foot Capitaines, who seeing the horsemen put themselves into a square battalion, but they were presently broken: part of them were cut in pieces, and the rest taken prisoners. This bloody battaille lasted foure or five houres, the victors purified them within a league of La Fere, and it hath been since held strange how so great a number escaped, seeing their amazement. The Prince of Conde, the duke of Nevers, the Earle of Sancerre, and the Lords of Bourdillon, Grammont, Creuaceur, Piennes, Def-cars and others escaped. Montmarancy the Constables eldest sonne tooke another way.
There was a great amazement at Paris by reason of this defeat, where they had lost a number of men, whereof writers speake diuersly, some say five thousand, others report eight thousand, slaine vpon the place. The King retired from Compiegne to Paris, affirmed his capital city, and drew from them a Subside of 30000 pounds sterling to supply his vrgent affaires: whilest that King Philip receiving the engines taken from the French, and seeing the prisoners led before his lodging as it were in triumph, he contented himselfe with his victory, not entering any farther into France, the which many townes did apprehend.

As for the besieged in Saint Quentin, King Philip comming to the campe, the battery was furious, and the besieged could not be relieved, but with three hundred men, whereof two third parts were slaine seeking to enter. Their towers and defences were beaten downe with the Cannon, and the Spaniards were become masters of the ditch, on the seventh day of August, the besieged (who were not above eight hundred men (distributed into eleuen breaches) endured a generall assault, and could not be forced:
But the towne was taken by a Tower which no man guarded. The French soldiers were E in a manner all slaine. The Admirall, his brother (who escaped soone after) Larnac, Saint Remy, Humes with many other Gentlemen of marke were taken prisoners: The sonne of the Lord of Fayette, with the Capitaines Saluerr, Ogier, Viquez, La Barre, Elsang and Gourdes were slaine.

After the taking of Saint Quentin, the Earle of Aremberg with twelve hundred horse, and three Regiments of Lanqueniers, besieged Castelle and made a furious battery. The Baron of Solignac commanding there, seeing himselfe destitute of succours that were promised, that the place was not to be defended against an assault, hauing not three hundred men, and those not very resolute, he yielded vpon the place without fighting, for the which he was caried captiue to Paris, and had lost his life if he had not escaped out of prison, for that hee had promised (as they said) not to leaue the place without an assault.
After which the Spaniards taking Han, Chauny, and all other places that might annoy them in Picardy, made their victory absolute. Thus the Spanish forces had a happy season, and the Pope refused to leane to the stronger. These losses make him easily forget the speedy succours he had found in France: so as at the first approach of the Duke of Alua, he sends him a blank, by the Cardinall Caraffe, and renouncing in September following the truce, was farre more expedient, then this light and painfull enterprife in fauour of a Pope, who was content to haue imbarcked vs in a new Labyrinth of confusions, whereof we shall not be freed, without a mournfull and exemplary spectacle. To teach Princes: that an accord confirmed by a reciprocall oath; ought to be holy and ineluable. So this reconciliation was made famous by a strange wonder. The same day, and the day after this peace was concluded, almost a third part of the buildings of Rome, and a great number of Christians perished, by a sudden and violent inundation of Tiber.

The King being at Paris during these tempests, as he went to heare masse, a yong man named Caboche, borne at Meaux, who had long followed the Court and seruiced the Secretaries of State, by reason of his faire writing, whether that he were distract of his wits, or thrust on for some other consideration; came and presented himselfe before the King, with a naked sword in his hand, and cried out aloud, Stay King, God hath commanded me to kill thee. Whereupon the Suisses of the Kings guard apprehended him presently, whom the King caused to be deliuered into the hands of iustice to determine of his offence: whereupon the Court of Parliament caused Caboche to be hanged for this attempt.

There was some likelihood, that Philip after his victory at Saint Quentin would haue entered further into the realme with his armie: but vnderstanding that the King expected a supply of fourteene thousand Suisses, and prepared his campe at Laon, he was content to fortifie his last conquests: and so gaue the King meanes to stay the troopes, which the dukes of Guise and Aumale brought out of Italy to chase the Baron of Poisseuille from Bourg in Bresse, the which he besieged in the duke of Savoie name, with twelue hundred horse, and twelue thousand foot. The duke of Guise being come with his army out of Italy to the King being at Saint Germaine in Lay, he was by reason of the Constables imprisonment declared his Lieutenant generall. Should the King then suffer the courage of these forces newly arrived to quail, with idleness, when as he might profitably employ them? The English had held Calais from vs two hundred and ten years: the Constables imprisonment had hindered the execution of a designe which he and the Admiral his Nephew had vpon this towne, by the meanes of Senarport Governour of Bouillon. But now they winne that by force, which they could neuer get by policy or industry. His Maiesty declares the duke of Guise his Lieutenant General, in all his countries: he issues two armies, the one he giues to the Duke of Guise: the other, to the Duke of Neiers. The first advanceth vnder colour to hinder the victualing of Saint Quentin. The other turning towards Luxembourg, drawes the Spaniards and Wallons to the defence thereof: then so daingly he sends his forces to the duke of Guise, who marcheth with all speed against Calais. In this armie, among many others, were the Princes of Conde and Roche-sur-yon, the duke of Aumale, and Marquis of Elbeuf breithren, the Marshall Stroffs, Montmorency, eldest sonne to the Constable, the Lords of Andelot, Termes, Grandmont, Creueccœur, Piennes, Randan, Allegre, Sanlac, Taunais, Senarport, Esfree master of the Ordnance, and Gourdan, who lost a legge in this action.

Calais taken

The French army appeared the first day of January, and at the first arrival takes the fort of Niculay: and the next day, that of Risban. Thus the way to the towne being opened, and the besieged suddenly surprized, without hope of speedy succours, first the castle, and then the towne returned to the obedience of this crowne, as gladly, as wee haue seene her ancient Burgesse bid their poore and desolate country mournfully farewell, in the year 1547. The country of Oye, and all the forts the English held there, returned likewise to the subiection of their first and lawfull Lord. Guines, and other places dismantled, spare the cost which should be consumed in the defence thereof. The same moneth the King called a generall Parliament at Paris, where he had a grant of three millions of gold for the warre, and then he went to visit Calais, and gaue the gouernment to M. de Termes. On the other side the duke of Neuers did take for the King, the castle of Herbemont: the Forts of Iarnioigne, Chigny, Rosignol and Villeneufue. Thus their sorrow was turned into ioy, their hearts panting yet with that bloody battaile of Saint Laurence. The Court was partaker of this ioy, celebrating the 25 day of April, in the midst of these prosperities, the marriage of Francis Dauphin of Viennois, with Mary Steward Queene of Scotland, daughter to James the 5. and Mary of Lorraine, daughter of Claude D. of Guise, and widow before to the duke of Longueuille.

During these happy victories, and continuations of alliances: the Duchesse Dowager of

The Dauphin married to Mary Queen of Scotland

A of Lorraine, laboured to increase these solempne and publike ioyes, by the conclusion of a peace betwixt the two Kings. The Cardinal brother to the Duke of Guise, met with her at Peronne to that intent: but this parle without effect; hastened the execution of an enterprife vpon Theouille, the which being battered from the fifth, to the 21 day of Iune with five and thirty Cannons, and the mynes ready to play, receiued an honourable composition. The price of this prize is giuen to the Duke of Neuers, the glory of the execution, to the duke of Guise: and the duke of Nemours, the Marshall of Stroffs (who was laine there, with a shot vnder his left pap, the duke of Guise leaning on his shoulder, as they caused a plat-forme to be vndermined) the Lords of Montluc, Vielueille, and Bourdillon, had the honour to haue giuen good testimonies of their valours in this prize. Chigny taken afterwards from the Wallons, was fortified: Arlon, Villemont, and Rosignol, burnt and made vnprofitable for the warre.

The English in the meane time, spoiled the coasts of Normandie and Picardy: and the King to stop their courses, prepares two small armies, one at la Fere, vnder the Duke of Aumale: the other at Calais, vnder the Marshall of Termes, who succeeded Stroffs. The Marshall attempts Berghes (they feared not the French there, and the townes which the Spaniards held vpon that coast were ill furnished) he takes it, sacks it, and by that meanes opens the way to Dunkerke. Dunkerke being taken and spoiled in four dayes, enriched both the fouldiers, and boyes of the armie.

But the Flemmings force them to make restitution: the Marshall camped before Graue-line: and the Cont Aiguemont Lieutenant for the King of Spaine in the Low-countries, hauing speedily assembled out of the neighbour garisons, and of other forces, about sixteen thousand foot, a thousand and twelue hundred Reistres and two thousand horse, cuts off his way vpon the Riuier of A, which comes from Saint Omer, and forceth him to fight.

At the first charge, the French armie ouerthrowes some squadrons of horse: but at the second shocke, the Marshall is hurt and taken, with Villobon, Senarport, Montuilliers and Charny, a great number of captaines and souldiers are laine vpon the place, and all the troops lo discomfited, as of all the companies of men at armes, of three coronets of light horse Scottishmen, fourteene ensignes of French foot, and eightene of Lanquenets, few escaped death or imprisonment: a wound which retained the scarre of Saint Laurence, and did frustrate the Duke of Guise his enterprife vpon Luxembourg: but it was partly recompenced by the Lord of Kerfimon, vpon six or seven thousand English and Flemmings which landed at the haven of Conquer, spoiling, and burning the weakest parts of the coast of Britany. This was in the end of Iuly. The duke of Guise sayling of Luxembourg, came to lodge at Pierrepont in Tirasche, and there fortified with seven corners of Reistres, brought by William, yonger sonne to Iohn Fredericke Elektor of Saxony, and a new regiment of Lanquenets, led by Isaac of Ausbourg, made the French armie as strong, as the year before: About all others, were most apparant the companies of the Duke of Guise, Lieutenant General, of the Dukes of Montpensier, Neuers, Aumale, Bouillon, Nemours, Saxony, Lunembourg, of the Prince of Roche-sur-yon, of the Prince of Salerne, of the Cont Charny, the Marshall S. Andre, the Marquis of Elbeuf, and of the Lords of Roche-foucault, Randan, Curtan, Montmorency (the Constables eldest sonne) Eschenetz, Roche-du-Maine, Jenlis, La Vaugnon, Bourdillon, Tauanais and Beauuais. The light horse of the Earles of Eu and Roissy, of the Lords of Valette, Bueil, Laigny, Rotigorty, Lombay and others, whereof the duke of Nemours was General, and so great a number of Germanes, Suisses, and Frenchmen, as this flourishing armie (lodging neere to A-miens, along the riuier of Somme) preuailed much for the treaty of peace, which followed soone after.

Philip had his armie likewise vpon the riuier of Anthy, both intrenched and fortified with artillery, as if they meant to continue there, and in time to tire one another. Some moneths passe without any other exploit then in roads and light skirmishes. In the end, the eternal God of armes, who from his heavenly throne beheld the seat of these two mighty armies, changed the bitterness of former warre into a pleasing peace, confirmed by alliances the year following. The Abbey of Cercamp vpon the confines of Arthois and Picardy, gaue the first entry. Aubespine

Aubespine Secretarie of State, assembled for the King, treated with the Duke of Alva, the A Prince of Orange, Regimes de Silves, Cup-bearer to King Philip, Grandvill Bishop of Arras, and Frige of Zuichem, President of the Councell of State for the Low-countries: behold the death of Charles the fifth Emperour, chancing in September, and that of Mary Queene of England, in the midst of November, changed both the place, and the time of this conclusion.

Castle-Cambresis had the honour to finish it at the second conference, the which was confirmed by the marriages of Philip with Elizabeth, eldest daughter to King Henry: of Philibert Emanuel duke of Sauoy, with Marguerite the Kings onely sister: and of Charles duke of Lorraine, with Claude a younger daughter of France. The King yielded to the Castilian all that he had taken from him, as well on this side, as beyond the mountains. To the Sauoyard, he restored Bresse, Sauoy and Piedmont: to the Genouois, the Isle of Corse, and about four hundred places more conquered, during these fatall and pernicious warres, which had made so many Prouinces desolate, ruined so many castles, villages and townes, dranke so much Christian blood, and flaine so many millions of men of all qualities, retaining nothing but the territories of Boulton and Calais. Thus the wind doth suddenly drink up, all the toyle, all the travels, all the sweat of many ages. And the Lord saith vnto man: Thou fool, this night will I take thy soule from thee, and who shall haue the things which thou hast prepared? And, All men are vaine, doubtlesse man labours for a shadow, bee troubleth himselfe for nothing.

The King being at peace with his foraine enemies, with whom every man thought there should be eternal alliances, he was counselled to continue his seuerer proceedings against his subiects of the religion, the which had increased much during the troubles, for the redressing whereof there needed no violent, but spirituall remedies: many ill aduised Councillors to this Prince (who of himselfe was of a milde and temperate disposition) made him conceiue a wonderfull hatred against them of the said religion, filling his eares with vnworthy reports. The Lord of Andelot was the first that smarted, being sent prisoner to Melun for his religion. This caused many discontents and ielousies amongst great houses, which was the cause of great mischief after the death of Henry.

The prisons were full of such as they called Lutherans, and even then many noble families were toucht with that cause. Moreover, many officers of the Parliament, under a milder proceeding against those prisoners. This diuersitie caused an assembly, which they called Mercuriale, to heare the opinion of presidents and counsellors vpon this controuerfie, the which the King was required to countenance with his presence. Anne du Bourg vsed a great libertie of speech: some others did second his opinion. This freedome transported the King into choller: hee commands the Constable to put them in prison, and vowes to see them burnt within few dayes, if they persist. But oh Prince: The yeares of thy account are come, and thou entrést into a path from which thou shalt no more returne. The Constable deliueis them to the Count Montgomery, captaine of his Maiesties guards, who leades Bourg to the Bastile, and the rest to diuers other prisons. Let vs not iudge here by, but admire howsoever, the iudgements of God: in that we shall see these three personages, every one in his ranke, die an extraordinarie and tragicall death.

In the meane time the Courtiers made all the inuentions that might bee for sports and delights, to solemnize the marriage of the Kings daughters and sister, the which in outward appearance seemed to bring a great happinesse to France: But the sighs of prisoners for matter of religion, the horrible punishments and executions of others, the earnest prayers of infinit families threatned, who found by experience that this peace was concluded betwixt the French and the Spamiard, to make an irreconciliable warre against them, were the windes which drew from aboue these wonderfull alterations, which the wise prouidence of God did let them see soone after. Elizabeth of France, hauing bene conducted by the King her father, to our Ladies Church at Paris, was there married with great state and triumph, by the Duke of Alua, who had procuracion from the King of Spaine his master, the ceremony was done by the Cardinall of Bourbon, where there assisted many Princes, Noblemen, Cardinals, and Prelates, from all the parts of the realme, with an infinite number of the Kings officers and household seruants: there also assisted the Duke of Sauoy, the Prince of Orange, the Earle of Egmont, and a great number of other Noblemen of the Low-countries: after all their sumptuous banquets, sports, masks

the Parliament imprisoned.

A masks and dauncing, followed the last act which changed all these pleasing Comedies and sports, into a bloodie and mournfull Tragedy, whereof the King was the lamentable prologue, for hauing published a solemne running at the Tilt, the King (contrary to the aduice of many who besought him to leaue that exercise to others who would giue him content) would needs be one of the challengers, being seconded by the Dukes of Guise and Ferrara: but the second day of this Tourniey, after that he had runne well, being intreated by the Queene to retire, wherein the Duke of Sauoy laboyred also, hee sent her word by the Marshall of Montmorency, that he would runne but once, and that for her sake, he sent a Lance to the Earle of Montgomery. The Earle excuseth himselfe to runne against his Maiestie: the day before hee could not hit any one, and it may bee now he feared a second shame. But hauing a second charge from the King to enter the Listes, hee runnes, and breaks his lance vpon the Kings Quiraffe, and with a splinter thereof (his Beauer being somewhat open) strikes him so deepe into the eye, as the reach of Iuly his soule left his body, in the house of Tournelles, the foure and fortieth yeare of his age.

The death of King Henry.

The day before his death he would haue the marriage of the Duke of Sauoy and of the Lady Marguerite his sister celebrated in his chamber, and that whatsoeuer had bene accorded vnto the Duke by the Treaty of peace, should be fully performed. His heart was interred in the Celestines Church in the Dukes of Orleance Chappell. His royall Obsequy was celebrated on the thirteenth day of August, and his body was layd at Saint Denis in the common tombe of the French Kings: during this Princes reigne, there were two great finnes crept into France, Atheisme and Magicke, whereunto was ioyned the corruption of all good learning: for the knowledge thereof, being brought in by King Francis the first, was in many curious and malicious spirits an occasion of all wickednesse, especially in that multitude of French Poets, who by their impure rimes, full of blasphemies querterd a number of soules.

He had by Katherine de Medicis his wife, sixe sonnes and sixe daughters. Francis his successor, of the age of fixteene or seuentee yeares, Zenis Duke of Orleance, who liued few moneths: Charles Maximilian, Edward Alexander, afterwards named Henry the third, and Hercules, afterwards called Francis. Elizabeth married to Philip King of Spaine, Claude to Charles Duke of Lorraine, Marguerite to Henry of Bourbon, then King of Navarre, Jane and Vidua twinnes, who died soone after their birth. Hee was a religious Prince, goodly, of a mild disposition, peaceable, affable, not greatly subject to passions, generous, loving his seruants and men of merit: but voluptuous, and not able to discouer in due time the ambition and couetousnesse of such as possessing him, made sale of lawes, iustices, offices, and spirituall liuings, emptied the subiects purses, and nourished the warres which wee haue before obserued, namely, since the breach of the truce: finding such sweetnesse, profit, and honour, in the managing of the treasure, and commanding of the Kings armies in the voyage of Italy, and especially in this last Lieutenantcy in Picardy, as hereafter we shall see a young Prince reigne like a shadow, and they being seized of the government of his person and of his Realme, shall dispossesse the chiefe Officers of the Crowne, keepe backe the Princes of the blood, the true and lawfull Governors of the State, the King being in his minority: and plot the meanes to raise their Race to the Royall Throne.

FRANCIS the SECOND,

The 60 French King.

HIS Reigne is short, but very memorable. We see a Theater, whereon is acted a horrible Tragedy, a King young of years, and of iudgement, governed by his mother and his wives vices, and a new forme of Court. The Princes of the blood haue now no more credit: and seeme to neglect both the publike and private interest. The Countiers stand at a gaze, and for the most part sloop to the stronger. The Clergy shield themselves vnder those that kindle these fires in France. The Nobility wearied with former toyles, doe not yet wipe off the dust and sweat from their armes.

Two factions
in Court.

Alterations
in Court.

The Duchesse of Valentinois is disgraced.

The people diuided for matter of Religion, and oppressed with the burthen of former warres, desires to breathe. The Constable holds his place: yet is he not so surely seated, but they will displace him. There are two factions in Court: the Constable holdeth the one, those of Guise the other. The first was firme and sincere; the last, cunning and pliable. The Queene Mother ioynes with the last. The King of Nauarre might crosse them, and therefore to be the better informed of his designs, shee entertaines seruants and pensioners about him. The Princes of the blood, the Constable, the Marshalls, the Admirall, and many other Noblemen, prepared for the funerals of the deceased King, when as the Duke of Guise and the Cardinal of Lorraine, leading the King, his brethren, and the Queenes to the Louvre, begin a strange alteration, a true partietie of the inconfinancie, of this world. The Duchesse of Valentinois had quietly governed the deceased King, and by her practices had caused Francis Oliver, a man of a singular reputation, and Chancellor of France, to be dismissed. At the fifth entry, shee is spoiled of her precious Jewels, which witnessed the Kings loue vnto her, to adorne the Queene that reigned: and by her disgrace, leaves the place to Katherine, to rule hereafter without companion.

The Queene Mother (who hated her extremely) was glad to see her thus disgraced, for that she would not lose the fauour of the House of Guise, who although they had been aduanced by the Duchesse, yet seeing her to be a weak support, they abandoned her, and ioynd with the other, who assisted them no lesse then the first. They took the scales from Cardinal Bertrand, and sent him to Rome: and from Auanson the Superintendence of the Treasurie, yet he remained still in Court, for that it was not yet necessary to force him to seeke a new party.

The Marshall of Saint Andrew aduanced by the fauours of the deceased King, and made fat by the confiscations of them of the Religion, and by borrowing, which he neuer payd againe, hauing made offer of all that he had vnto them of Guise, he is receiued into their band, and Oliver restored to his Chancellorship.

The Constable seeing the King had made a declaration, that his meaning was they should address themselves for all matters concerning the estate of the Crowne and of his House, vnto his two Vncles, the Duke of Guise, and the Cardinall of Lorraine: and by consequence, his mortall enemy seated in his place, and executing that which belonged to his office of Constable and Lord Steward of France, yea in the presence of Spaniards and strangers who before had so much respected him: within few dayes after the death of Henry, he goes to the new King, and deliueres vp the Signet (which his deceased master had committed vnto him) who told him that the charge of the Treasurie and of the affaires of State was giuen vnto the Cardinall, and the commandement of all that concerned the warre vnto the Duke: telling him withall, that he would retaine him still of his Council, and that he should be welcome when he came to Court. He thanked the King for giuing him leaue to retire himselfe, beseeching him to excuse him for not coming to Council, for two reasons: The one, for that he could not serue them whom he had alwayes commanded: The other, that being held an old dotard, his council was not necessary. Then offering his life and goods vnto the King, he went to visit the Queene mother, who entreated him roughly, reproaching him that he had told the deceased King

sent home to his house.

The 60 French King.

A leading wife, that he had not any child like him but his base daughter, who was married to the Marshall of Montmorency. She added withall, that for the loss of the deceased King, she would forget her private injury: and that without this respect she had means to excuse his head. In the end she persuaded him not wholly to abandon the Court, but to come sometime. He maintained that he was falsely accused with that speech of the Kings children, intreating her to remember the seruices which he had done to her, and the Realme, and not beleue the reports of his enemies, who should not doe him so much harme as they pretended. So hauing taken his leaue, and concluded his matter to his going, he retired to his house.

B The two brethren to play their parts absolutely without controule, send the Prince of Conde into Flanders, vnder colour to confirme the peace, and him of Rothe to carry the Order of France to the King of Spaine: then at his returne they depose him with the Cardinall of Bourbon, to conduct Elizabeth to Philip her husband.

In the meane time, the Guisians call the Cardinall of Tournon from Rome: a man for their humours, an inextinguishable enemy to the Constable and to them of the Religion. They displace part of the ancient officers of the Kings house, and place new at their deuotion: they furnish Provinces and frontiertownes with Gouernors of their owne choice: they obtaine a Declaration from the King, sitting in Parliament, whereby hee made it knowne, that touching all affaires which concerned the estate of his Crowne and house, his pleasure was, they should hereafter repaire to his two Vncles.

The first Edicts were against the carrying of Pistols and Harquebuzes, and then against long cloakes, and great hobs. It was a common saying, that the Cardinall (as fearful a man as euer was) hauing vnderstood from a Magician at Rome, that through enuy, and when he was in his greatest dignity, his enemies should cause him to beaine with a peece, had procured these defences, being wonderfully disquieted, even then when as all yielded vnto him: they doe and vndoe, place and displace, in Parliament and Priuy Council, like to a King of absolute power. And the Queene Mother challengeth the gift of money growing out of the confirmation of offices and priuiledges of townes and commonalties, the which by right cannot be excited, but when the Realme falls into a collateral line.

D Now they are settled in this vsurped government: they haue officers at their pleasure, but there is yet a moat in their eye. Those of the Religion, who were then called reformed, (let vs hereafter call them Protestants) for their common cause (with the Protestants of Germany) multiplied infinitely. Some Princes, and many Noblemen did countenance them, and were ready to take their protection. To weaken them, nay rather to ruine them quite, the Kings Letters Patents are granted the 14 of Iuly, with a Commission, to certain Iudges, for the trial of Anne du Bourg, and foure of his companions prisoners. It was to be feared, that their proceeding against these fine Councillors, would prejudice the whole party. They beseech the Queen by their Letters (who had made shew to encline to their doctrine, when as she was barren) to vfe her authority in the restraint of their rigorous pursuits. She passeth her word to the Prince of Conde and Admirall, so as they will lue secretly and without any scandall.

E She had beene importuned by Letters from one named Villemadon, who knew much of her secrets, and put her in mind of her affection to Pietie, at such times as she was barren, exhorted her not to reiect the Princes of the blood from the managing of the affaires of State, to aduance them of Guise, and to make them petty Kings. These Letters were written the 26 of August, and wrought this effect, that the Queene seemed to be inclined for some dayes to ease them of the Religion.

F In the meane time they of Guise, to make their Government more pleasing vnto the people, and not to lose any thing, published in the Kings name Letters of renouation of all alienations made, as well for life as for yeares in recompence of any ferocities, except titles, whereof the money had bene employed for the Kings great and vrgent affaires, the portions of the daughters of France, and the dowry of the deceased Queene Eleanor, which the Infants of Portugall did enioy the rest to be re-united to the Kings demesnes and ordinary receipts. This renouation was a foreblow to some Princes and great personages, who were disappointed of the fruits of their seruice and of the deceased Kings bounty. On the other side, the fauorites of the House of Guise obtained other Letters of exemption, and so they strip some, whilst that others remained in possession, or got some

made by the deceased Kings reunited.

1552

some new purchase. The Constable seeing Henries death approach, had staid to solicit the King of Nauarre, to come with all speed to Court, and to seize vpon the Governement before any other. This Prince was not desirous to manage the affaires, and was somewhat jealous of the Constable, which made him to sit still, giving them of Guise time to seize vpon his place.

Some Princes and Noblemen hauing prest him, he gaue care, and imparted this businesse to his four chief Councillors, which were Larnac, the Bishop of Maude President of his Council, Desfars, his Chamberlaine, and Burghart his Councillor, who were of opinion that he should goe presently to Court.

They of Guise are aduertised hereof, who promise wonders to Maude and Desfars, if they can frustrate this resolution, who did worse: for suffering their Master to goe to Paris, being far aduanced, they begin to put water in his wine, and to forge inevitable dangers if he stood too directly vpon his ranke: that he must proceed mildly in this businesse, and entertaine all men pollicly.

Being come to Poitiers, whereas many Princes and Noblemen met him, hee shewed much resolution, and gaue good hope to the Ministers of the Churches assembled, especially at Paris, Orlean and Tours, entreating them to beare a little in that which concerns the open profession of Religion. Being come to Court, which was at Saint Germaine in Lay, what entertainment doe they giue, this first Prince of the blood of France? His Harbingers find no lodging for him within the castle. It shall cost me my life, and tenne shoules more with me (saide the Duke of Guise to his Harbinger) before hee take from mee the place and lodging which the King hath giuen me vnto his person. No man goes to meet him: those of Guise looke that he should goe to salute them: and which is worse, the next day he hath no place in Council.

After some dayes, the King sayes vnto him, that his Vncles hauing the charge of affaires, he desired them that would haue his fauour, to obey them in all things. So hauing obtained confirmation of his offices and pensions, he approved by his silence, the usurpation of the House of Guise, who lead the King to Rheims, where hee was triumphantly anointed the eighteenth of September, by the Cardinal of Lorraine, Archbishop of that place.

Some after the Coronation, the Queen mother gets a resignation from the Constable, of the office of Lord Steward, in fauour of the Duke of Guise, and in recompence made him sonne Marshall of France. The Admirall foreseeing that they would dispossesse him of the government of Picardy: he first gaue the King to vnderstand that it belonged to the Prince of Conde, for that his predecessors had long enjoyed it. His resignation was willingly accepted, but not the condition. It was better to purchase a good seruant and partisan, which was the Marshall of Brissac. Thus the Princes and chief Officers of the Crowne were disgraced, but those that were least passionate amongst the people, were not mured. They had a good share in the priuate discontent of these great personages, foreseeing the disorders that might ensue, and require a Parliament, as the foueraigne cure for such diseases, whereby the Queene mother might be excluded from the Regency, and those of Guise put from the Kings person.

To please the King, they perswade him, that they sought to bridle him, and to make him a ward: that he should hold them enemies to his authority, and guilty of high treason that talke of a Parliament. The King of Spaine crosseth them, and by letters written to the King his brother-in-law (the which were read in Councell in the presence of the King of Nauarre) he declares himselfe (saith he for the good affection he did beare) Protector of him, his Realme and his affaires, against those that would change the government of the Estate, as if the King were not capable of the government. Pleasant people, which reiect so much the word of lawfull ruelage, and yet they vsurpe it against the lawes and orders of the Realme, holding it onely by tyranny. This other affront sent the King of Nauarre home into Beauge whence he came.

They continued their pursuits against the Councillor du Bourg, which moued them of the Religion at Paris to send a supplication to the Queene Mother, exhorting her to her duty, and denouncing the vengeance of God, and the danger of future troubles, by reason of these great rigours: But she gaue them no pleasant answer: besides du Bourg, towards the end of this yeare, there were many imprisoned at Paris for Religion, and their

A their houses sackt, as in a towne taken by assault: there were witnesses suborned to depose that in a certaine Assembly made on Thursday before Easter day, in an Advocates house, at the place Mailbert, a great number of Lutherans, Men, Women, and Maydens, after the Preaching, hauing receiued the Communion, and eaten a Pigge, in stead of the Paschall Lamb, the candles being put out, they went and lay together: The Cardinal modelled the whole Court with these informations: but the Queene Mother hauing vpon this occasion spoken against some of her maids that were of the Religion, they wrought so as the two chief witnesses were heard in her presence, being two young boyes, who had maintained that then and at many other times, they had carnally knowne the daughters of this Advocate, they then began to wauer, and couetly to deny it. Notwithstanding the accusation and soot continued: and for that in the apprehension of prisoners there was some resistance made in the suburbs of Saint Germaine, they sent vnto all their houses to take away their armes, yet their knives, the which was brought vnto the Hostel of Guise, The Advocate thus slanderously charged, did constitute himselfe prisoner, with his wife and daughters, where the maidens were found virgins, and yet the false witnesses nor their suborners were not punished, notwithstanding their complaints, they by vertue of an Edict, which set all prisoners at liberty for matter of Religion, were in a manner forced to goe out of prison.

All this did but increase the hatred both of great and small against the Guisians. Many Treaties are published, written, and printed, and all tend to proue, that it belongs to the Estates, to prouide Governours for Kings in their minorities: that these two brethren are incapable of the gouernment, being both strangers: the one a Priest, the other presuming to stay in the life of the dejected King, that the Realme belonged to the House of Lorraine, as issued from Charlemagne, from whom Hugh Capet had vsurped it. A proposition which they haue presumed to publish in these latter times: but so often confuted, as it needs no further discourse. They had made open pretensions to some members of the Crowne, as to the Countie of Prouence and the Duchy of Anjou: they propounded the lamentable effects of their ambition, in the breach of the truce, and the last voyage into Italy, the cause of the losse of the battell of Saint Laurence, and the danger of the whole Realme; to prevent the which they were forced to yeeld vp all the conquests which Francis the first, and Henry had made.

They did not forget their exactions, the managing of the treasure, and the Kings great debts: The King began to grow, and euen now hee complained, that they kept him from hearing of his subjects complaints, hee was so sickly as there was no hope of long life. To get sure footing in the government of Estate, they resolute to purchase many seruants in the Courts of Parliament, to winne the affections of Courtiers and men of warre, and by a burning zeale, to the rooting out of Protestants, to purchase the loue of the Clergy and people.

They publish sundry Edicts against them, they promise great recompences to them that discover their Assemblies: many townes fill their prisons: they employ aye, fire and water to ruine them, and yet it seemes that the more they kill, the more they increase. The eight and twentieth of December, Anthony Minard President of the Parliament at Paris, was slaine with a Pistoll in the evening coming from the Palace to his house, and yet it could neuer be knowne whence it came, no more then the death of Italian Ferme, agent for the House of Guise, slaine neere vnto Chambourg, where the King was, and stript of certaine instructions of importance, against the life of some great personage. Some were imprisoned and in great danger for Minard: amongst others, Steward a Scottish man (who although hee were allied to the Queene reigning) was cruelly tormented, yet could they draw nothing from him that might prejudice himselfe or any other. About this time the Elector Palatine, hauing sent his Ambassadors to the King, to demand du Bourg whose seruice he would vse at Heidelberg, the Cardinal, being incensed for the death of Minard, wrote vnto the Parliament, that they should execute the sentence given against Anne du Bourg, who (persisting in the confession of his faith vpon the points of Religion in controuersie) was on the twentieth of December hanged at the Greue, and his body then burnt to ashes. The Councillors: La Porte, Foix, Faux, and Fumel imprisoned for the same cause, escaped with some sharpe admonitions.

Many could not beare this oppression. The Princes were kept backe: the greatest of the Realme Realme out of credit, threatened, and secretly pursued to the death: the conuocation of the Estates refused: the Parliaments corrupted, the Iudges for the most part at the Guis, ans deuotion: and the publike Trésure, Offices, and Benefices giuen to whom they pleased.

Virgations of the House of Guise intent
the French.

Their violent government, and against the lawes and orders of the Realme, purchased wonderfull hatred against the Duke of Guise, and the Cardinall of Lorraine, and caused many which could no longer endure these oppressions, to consult vpon some iust defence, to the end they might restore the ancient and lawfull government of the Realme. They demanded aduice, touching law and conscience, of many learned Lawyers and Diuines, who resolved that they might lawfully oppose themselves against the government which the House of Guise had virpured, and at need take armes to repulse their violence, so as the Princes who in that case are borne Magistrates, or some one of them would undertake it, being required thereunto by the Estates of the Realme, or by the sounder part of them. They which first thought of this act of consequence, had seuerall considerations. Some moued with a true zeale to serue God, the King and Realme, thought they could not doe a worke of greater piety, then to abolish Tyranny, and to restore the State; and withall to find some meanes to ease them of the Religion.

There were others desirous of change: and some were thrust on with hatred, for the wrongs which the House of Guise had done them, their kinsmen and friends: to conclude, all had one designe to suppress this vlawfull government. But for that in this generall, lawfull, and commendable designe, there were priuate considerations which were wonderfull defectiue, it is no wonder if there were confusion in the pursuit, and that the euent was to fall vnto the vnder-takers: namely, for those which did mixe their priuate passions with the consideration of the publicke. As for the rest, who had no other end but to free France from the yoke of strangers, although that most of them be dead, in the pursuit, as well then as since vnder the reines of the two succeeding Kings: yet are they departed this world with this singular content, to haue courageously sacrificed their liues for their countries liberty.

In these consultations it was held necessary to seize vpon the Duke of Guise, and the Cardinall his brother, being aduowed by some one of the chiefe members of the State, and then to require an Assembly of the three Estates, to the end they might yeeld an account of their government, and to provide for the King and Realme. Some haue rashly thought and written, that all this proceeding (which afterward was called The tumult of Amboise) was an enterprize of rash seditious men, enemies to God and the State, thrust on by despair and fury: in like manner there were others which ill affected to the House and memory of the Prince of Conde, (who was prest to undertake this charge) haue presumed to charge him, that he was thrust on by priuate passions in these intelligences, and that he sought to end a quarrell against the House of Guise by this meanes, and afterwards to cause greater troubles. But the truth of his intent is well knowne to some yet liuing, and future ages will rectifie their testimonies and writings, as full of passion, and repugnant to truth: and will aduow that the Prince did herein shew himselfe a true Frenchman, and well affected to the King and Realme. The Prince of Conde then being instantly required to accept of this charge, he examines the consequence of the fact, and hauing imparted it to some persons louing the good of the Realme, hee giues commission to informe secretly of the crimes where with the House of Guise was charged, to provide for the same, as conscience and the common good should require. They find by informations, and certaine personages well qualified, being priuy to their secret designs, did witness that their intention was (the King being vnable, by the iudgement of the Physicians, to liue long, nor to haue any issue) first to root out all Lutherans in France, then to murder all the Princes of the blood, and to seize vpon the Realme. Moreover, they were charged with many thefts, robberies, and extortions, and by consequence were in many things found guilty of high treason.

The difficultie was how to seize vpon these two persons. Godfrey of Barri, Lord of Renaudie, a Baron of Perigort, accepts the managing of this action, and the Prince promiseth to assist him with his authority, So as nothing be said or done against God, the King, his brethren, the Princes, nor the Estate: protesting to oppose himselfe first against any one that should attempt the contrary. All that were in the action, bind themselves to the same oath,

A oath, yea to aduertise the King, if any thing were pretended against his Maiesty: they appoint the tenth of March, hoping to find the Court still at Blois. Five hundred French Gentlemen with other troops vnder the command of the Baron of Castellan, should accompany Renaudie, followed by a thousand others, besides their troops on foot. But it is almost impossible to keepe secret an enterprize imparted to so many diuers humours, but some one will discouer it. Renaudie lodged at Paris in the Suburbs of Saint Germaine, in an Advoquates house called Auxelles, a Protestant by profession, who hauing discovered somewhat of this enterprize, vnder colour to employ himselfe for the aduantage thereof, hee kept all that passed. But hoping of some notable recompence, he suddenly went and discovered it to Alamand, Master of Requests, a fauourite to the Cardinall, and to Miller Secretary to the Duke of Guise. And Lignieres one of the Captaines of the enterprize, did afterwards bewray the names of the Commanders, the Rendezvous for their troops, with other circumstances, to the Queene Mother, to saue (said he) the honour and life of the Prince of Conde, whom they accused of high treason.

To assure their persons, they transport the King to Amboise, they send letters from the King and his Mother, to call the Admirall and his brethren to Court, they dispatch many Letters Patents to Bayliffes and Seneschall, against all such as should be found carrying of armes vpon the way to Amboise. The Admirall being arriued, makes great complaints to the Queene Mother, in presence of the Chancelor, of the extreme violence and persequits made against the Protestants: and the Chancelor hauing freely propounded the Admiralls aduice in Councell, there followed an Edict for the abolishing of that was past for matters of Religion. But this pardon excluded all Ministers, and such as should be found to haue conspired against the King, his mother, his wife, or the Princeesse, his chiefe Officers, or the Estate; and all other culpable of the crimes.

Notwithstanding this Edict, Renaudie proceeds, and the Prince goes to Court to present these informations to the King against the House of Guise, when as they should be seized on. The execution was put off to the sixteenth, by reason of the change of the place. In the meane time the Guisens had assembled men from all parts, so as the troops arising one after one to the appointed places, were presently surprised. The Baron of Castellan, and the chiefe of the faction, were at the Caste of Noisy: the Guisens aduertised thereof, perswade the King that there are rebels assembled to further him. The King sends the Duke of Nemours with a troop, who at the first surpriseth Capitaine Maerens and Rannay, walking without the Caste, and then hauing set strong guards about it, he carried those two to Amboise, returning after dinner with five or six hundred horse. The Baron had sent to Renaudie that he would come speedily to engage him, being loth to abandon the place, where there was armes, powder and munition: but seeing himselfe intercepted, and the Duke returned, he entred into parlee, vpon the instance that was made vnto him: and hauing related at large the causes of this enterprize, the Duke entreated him often to lay downe armes, and to goe and speake with the King, binding himselfe by the faith of a Prince, that not any harme should be done vnto him, nor to any of his companions, but should all be set at liberty. The Baron relying vpon the word of a Prince, obeyed; with the rest that were with him: but being come to Amboise, they spake not with any man but with Commissioners that were sent for their trial by them of Guise.

Renaudie caused his troops to aduance covertly through the woods: but they had walked vpon the gate, by the which they should enter, and the horsemen sent by the Guisens compassing them in, many were led away and presently hanged, and afterwards drawne to the ruer. And as he laboured to rally his dispersed troop, the Lord of Pardillan encounters him in the forest of Chasteau-Regnard, and passing by, discharged his pistoll, the which not taking fire, Renaudie had his sword first drawn, as he was about to kill him. One of Pardillans seruants overthrew him with a Harguebuz shot: being slaine, his bodie was straight-way caried and hanged on the bridge at Amboise, with this inscription: Renaudie, called la Forest, chiefe of the Rebels. Among other prisoners, was La Bièvre, who had serued Renaudie as a Secretary and was found seized of a paper in cypher: to saue his life he decyphers this paper, which contained nothing else but what had been concluded by all the associates, and their expresse protestation not to attempt any thing against the Kings Maiesty: nor against the Princes of his blood, or the estate of the Realme: And the Articles tended to no other end, but to take the government of the Realme from them of Guise, and to cause the ancient orders of France to be observed by a lawfull Assembly of the Estates. He was also found seized of an admonition vnto the King from them of the Religion, whereas the Cardinals must proceedings against the Parliament of Paris, and against the Bourgs, among other things, were discovered. At this first they of Guise would not have had one prisoner escaped; but afterwards, considering that the multitude would make them more odious, they let the Souldiers goe, to euery of which they gave sighte, peace to beate their charges.

Captaine La Motte, Gacquetille, and some others did not yett stirre, but gaue a hot alarme to the Conuersers at Amboise, and without some expectation of intelligence, which caused them to retire without loss of any one horseman, the enterprise (yes after the death of Renauldie) had bene executed. But this did but incense the fury of them of Guise, who caused all the foot-men they could get at this time, to bee hanged. It was then very dangerous for any man whatsoeuer, to be found alone about Amboise, the least harme that could happen vnto him, was to be stripped into his shirt, and then did the Souldiers of the Kings guard commit strange thefts and exortions. Those of Guise being assured of their enemies, and their troop dispersed, they gave commandment to the Prince of Conde, in the Kings name, not to depart without leave. They beganne to cut off heads, to hang and to drowne their prisoners, tyed to long poles, six, eight, tenne, twelue, and fifteene in a company: and although there were herein more question of Estate then Religion, yet they gave out, that the Lutherans would maintain themselves by the sword, and as such men they would many to be executed, who by their examinations and pertinent answers touching matters of conscience, did witness that they were yett far from any other doctrine, then that of their fathers.

This alarme had put the young King in feare: but more the impression of his vncles perswading him that they sought his person. And what haue I done? (said he often) what haue I done, that my subjects should attempt thus against me? I will heare their complaints, and doe them right. And sometimes to those of Guise: I know not what it is that troubles them, it is only that they feare: I would gladly you would absent your selves for a time, so that if they would attempt against you or me, amongst all the prisoners, foure are especially noted, Castellan, Pilemongie, Champagnie, and Le Picard, for that with an admirable constancy and resolution, they had blamed the Chancellor, who against his conscience, had signed the sentence of their deaths: which he terrified him, as he suddenly fell sicke of griefe, and melancholy, and soone after left this world, murmuring, sighing, and sorrowing for the Councillor du Bourg, and crying out some houres before his death, the Cardinal of Lorraine comming to visit him, O Cardinal! thou hast damned us all. Michael, Hospitall, then Chancellor to the Duchesse of Saupoy, was called from Nice, and substituted in his place.

The Prince of Conde was at Amboise during these horrible combustions, who carried himselfe like a man without feare, that had an innocent soule. They of Guise incensed the King against him, and suborned men to obserue his words and actions, whereof the Cardinal held a Register, especially of some words which the Prince vied, being much grieved to see some prisoners, (looking out at a window of the Castle) executed: which were that the King was ill counselled; to put Noblemen and Gentlemen to death, which were honest men, and so well borne, considering the great seruice they had done vnto the deceased King and Realme. That being thus deprived of them, it was to be feared that strangers during these great troubles would make some enterprise: and that if they were supported by any Prince, they would easily make a prey of the Realme. Soone after they called de laux, Gentleman of his horsey, to be apprehended; and the King sent for the Prince into his chamber, to tell him that he had vnderstood by informations that he was charged to be the chiefe of the conspiracy, adding withall some threats. The Prince in his answer beforesent the King to assemble all the Princes, Knights of the Order, and priuie Councill which were then at Amboise, to the end that he might heare his answer in that honorable Assembly. The company was presently called into the Kings presence, whereas the Prince recited the Kings speech, and what had followed: adding, that the Kings person accepted, with his brethren and the Queenes, they which had reported vnto the King that he was the head and conductor of certaine seditious men, who (they said) had conspired against the King and State, had falsely and trayterously lied: That to proue his innocency, he would (for this regard only) quite abandon his ranke and dignity of Prince

A of the blood, and make them confesse with his sword or lance, that they were villaines, and that they themselves sought the ruine of the State, name, and blood Royall: for the preservation whereof, he would employ both life and goods, as he had alwayes giuen good prooffe, and also for his owne interest to the Crowne and House of France, the maintenance whereof he should procure with a better title then his accusers: pressing the company, that if there were any one that had made this report, or that would maintaine it, he should presently declare himselfe. But no man presenting himselfe, he besought the King to hold him for an honest man, and not to giue care to such slanderers and abusers, but rectified them as enemies to his person, and to the publicke quiet. Hauing spoken this, he went out of the Councill, to leaue them to their consultation. But the Cardinal making a certaine signe, the King brake off the Assembly, without demanding their aduice, whereas there might haue bene somewhat concluded to the preiudice of the House of Guise.

The Queene Mother was much troubled during these broiles, yet leaning still to the stronger (according to the world) shee sent the Admirall into Normandy, to learne the cause of these troubles, intreating him earnestly to aduertise her without dissembling, promising to requite him, and to hold his aduertisements secret. He performed his commission speedily and exactly, and soone after, without feare of any, sent a Gentleman vnto the Queene, signifying that they of Guise were the true cause of the troubles happened within the Realme, by reason of their violent and vnlawfull government. He gaue prooffes thereof, adding, that the faithfull seruants of the Crowne held it for certaine, that these calamities would not cease so long as strangers gouerned the King and State. Whereupon he exhorted her to take the affaires in hand, and to giue some rest to them of the Religion, causing the Edicts made to that end to be obserued.

These aduertisements produced Letters to all the Parliaments and other Iudges, to release all prisoners detained for matter of Religion, the execution whereof notwithstanding was somewhat long and difficult. There was another thing which helpe it forward: some prisoners of Blois and Tours, for the enterprise of Amboise, hauing found meanes to escape out of prison, wrote a pleasing Letter vnto the Cardinal, full of threats, that they would come and see him with the rest that he held not, and that they were resolved

D to spoile him. This man being timorous, grew more calme, whereof followed the enlargement of many prisoners throughout the Realme. Finally, they of Guise seeing themselves assailed from diuers parts by writings (which were the forerunners of a new charge) the last of March they caused the Kings Letters to be dispatched to all Parliaments, and other inferior Iudges, and to all forraigne Princes, intimating, that all they of the enterprise of Amboise, especially the heads, were accused of high treason, wherein they of the Religion and the Ministers were disgraced with all manner of reproaches: and withall they promised to make goodly reformatiions both of the State and Church. An ample answer was made vnto these Letters, and directed to the Parliaments, the which painted out them of Guise in all their colours, & required that in a lawfull Assembly of the Estates they should yeeld an account of their government. The Parliament of Paris sent this answer vnto the Cardinal by a Vicer, But that of Roane thinking to do more, the Deputies which were sent to the King, were forced to retire with all speed, and did not any thing.

The ninth of April there were Letters written in the Kings name, of the same tenour: moreover, he was entreated to seize vpon certaine men which were about him, being accused to be of the enterprise of Amboise. There was also a relation of the charge imposed vpon the Prince of Conde, and how he had iustified himselfe. The Prince on the other side sent a Secretary of his vnto his brother, to aduertise what had past, to aske his aduice, and to vnderstand his mind. This was discovered to them of Guise, who wrote a Letter to the Prince, full of exults, to the end they might kill him asleepe, the which he sent also vnto his brother, who made any er in general termes, for that he would not be discouraged. The Protestants during these combustions, which concerned both the State & Religion, entered in multitude, and in many places they could not containe nor content themselves with secret Assemblies. An yndiscreet zeale transported them of Valence, Montauban, and Rouen, to extirpate their Religion in ordinary Churches at noon day. The Lord of Clairmont, Lieutenant for the Duke of Guise in Dauphine, was of no small an humour: and more violent. The Duke gives him commission to suppreffeth them; and to vie his authority in the Parliament of Grenoble. Maugiron enters Valence with sixteen Companies of the old bands of Piedmont, and some other troops of men at armes: he makes the freets flow with blood, sackes the houses, and entreates the inhabitants as in a towne which is taken by assault. Montlaur also followed the like fortune.

Moreover, the President Truchon, and some Councillors of Grenoble, imprison three score of the chiefe of Romance: they hang two, whip one, and then send them to the galleies: and at Valence they beheaded two Ministers, and hang three of the chiefe men in the towne, the rest escaped, some by abjuring, some by whipping, some by banishment, and some by a fine. At the same time Paulon of Richiend Lord of Meuvans, one of the chiefe of the enterprise of Amboise, having failed to surprize Aix, over-ranne Provence with two thousand men armed at their owne charge, and a great number of Gentlemen, and other voluntaries. But their armes were no otherwise employed, but to convert the images, reliques, and ornaments of the Church into gold and silver, the which with some respect to warlike discipline, and more commendably then in the following age, they left in the Magistrats hands of the place. This was to summon the neighbour Prouinces to the like reuolts: but the Earle of Tande having stayed the fury of this flying army, they sheathe their Swords, and withheate their pennies, only by supplications to the Kings Maiesty and to his Mother, protesting of their sincerity, they discovered the ground of their griefes against the Guisens, and propounded remedies to auoid ciuill warres. Their admonitions contained three chiefe heads: That order might be taken for the government of the Realme, offering the King a Councell, according to the ancient constitutions of France. That to pacifie controversies touching Religion, a free and holy Councell should be held. That those of the Religion in the meane time might quietly, and with liberty of their consciences line in their houses, following that which is contained in the confession of their Churches. The two brethren seeing themselves directly charged by the Protestants, thunder out against them: they write to the King of Spaine, and to the Catholicke Princes: that the Lutherans and Calvinists are the onely authors of the troubles of France, and of the tumult of Amboise. And to the Protestants; that such as were executed in diuers parts of the Realme, are onely certain Sacramentaries, enemies to the confession of Ausbourg. A bare shift and weake remedy to quenche the fire which beganne to consume a part of the world. Hereupon Philip aduiseeth them, to bring the Inquisition of Spaine into France. The priuy Councell yeelds to it; and the Parliaments allow thereof: but the Chancellor Hospital was too wise a politician: he would not see France disguised after the Spanish manner. Katherine was much troubled, not knowing how to saile amidst so many stormes: The Conuocation of the Estates might eclipse her authority; the restoring of the Princes of France, incompatible with a Florentin humour: the restitution of the Constable, whom she hated to the death, accusing him to haue said to King Henry, That no one of his children did resemble him; but his bastard, whom his saine Montmorency had married. These things did wonderfully afflict her. Yet would the gouerne and rule, foreseeing that she could not better maintaine her greatnesse, then by the discord of the two Houses of Bourbon and Lorraine. She relies vpon the last, and turning them with her authority, she puts the King her sonne, and her selfe, into the protection of the Duke of Guise, and the Cardinal of Lorraine. This makes them swell both in heart and speech: but there must be a meanes found to pacifie this quarrell which concerned the Estate, that vnder the cloake of Religion, (a goodly and ordinary pretext for great personages) the people might forget the vnlawfull usurpation wherewith they were charged: They protest therefore to employ all their medicines and their friends to suppress those that sought any alteration in Religion: hoping that wherthey had cut this stem from the Princes of the blood, they should be more easily yeelded both of them and of the Constables faction. As for them of the Religion, some gentlemen which made open profession, although they had no part in the enterprise of Amboise, were accused & sent for, to come and iustifie themselves before the King. They fearing that their ruine was intended, assemblable together, and comfide some to go to the Prince to encourage him. Others throughout all the Churches, to let them vnderstand that their ruine approached, if they did not provide for their safetye within propounded in Councell, to seize vpon the Prince of Conde, and so draw him in question for his life: the Cardinal was wholly of this opinion, but the Duke of Guise

Resolution of some of the Nobility.

A Guise did oppose, and by a long speech shew that it was not fit, and that it should bee against his consent. Some at the first were amazed to see these two heads in one hood thus disfigure: but finding afterwards that they omitted no meanes to take the Prince, they saw that this contrariety was but counterfeit, to draw a consent from the whole Councell, to the end they might fortifie themselves against all euents. This resolution was available to the Prince, who with great dexterity escaped their snares, and got into Bearne to the King of Nauarre his brother. They who were accustomed (as they say) to make bread of bones, and to turne all things to their owne aduantage, began to assure the King and Queene, that without doubt the Princes retreat did argue that he was guilty: wherupon new Commissions were giuen forth to leauy men, to make warre in Gascony, whither the Marshall of Saint Andrew (vnder colour to goe visit his brethren) was sent to discover, which made these two Princes to stand vpon their guard.

They had yet another taske in hand, to see if the Constable were engaged in the Princes Councels, whom they thought they had already entrap. To this end they procured the Queene Mother to send secretly for Lewis Regnier, Seigneur of La Planch, one of the Marshall of Montmorencies Councell, who being brought into her cabinet, (the Cardinal being hidden behind the hangings) she prest him to declare what he thought of the causes and remedies of the present troubles, wherof he made an ample discourse, shewing that they of Guise being strangers, should not haue the government of the State, vlesse they gaue them naturall French-men, for a counterpeaze and bridle. He also answered at large to the accusation made against the Prince of Conde, shewing, that it was a meere abuse, to thinke that the enterprise of Amboise was attempted against the Kings person, or to trouble the State. He then decyphered the beginning of the House of Guise, and caried himselfe so politickly in all his answers, as he escaped from the Court, and there was no hold to be taken of the Constable nor of his house.

They of the Religion apprehending by the aduice of many of the Nobility, that their ruine approached, if they did not provide speedily for their affaires, after they had recommended themselves humbly vnto God, they resolved to cast themselves into the armes of the Princes of the blood, as fathers, tutors, and defenders of the innocency of the poore afflicted, being called by the lawes of the Country to those charges, during the minority of Kings. For this effect certaine speciall men were deputed, to goe to the King of Nauarre, and Prince of Conde being at Nérac, to whom they represented (with all their meanes) an ample declaration of all the wrongs done by the House of Guise to the King and Realme, beseeching the said Princes, to take some lawfull course to deliuer the King, and to maintaine the State. Being hereby much confirmed in their resolution, to acquit themselves of their duties for the reliefe of France, they began to set hand to worke. Among other agents, the Prince of Conde sent a Basque called Sagne, to many Noblemen, to entreat them not to faile him at need. He receiued answer from the Constable and the Vidame of Chartres, and came to Court, where he deliuered some Letters. Attending his dispatch, he betrayed his charge vnto one Capitaine Bonual, who hauing discovered him to them of Guise, pursued him, and brought him backe prisoner to Fontainebleau, where the Vidames letters being read, whereby he promised the Prince to maintaine his iust quarrell against all men, except the King, his brethren and the Queenes, whom they sent to apprehend at Paris, and committed him to the Bastile, where he continued with great rigours vntill his death. They found no great matter against the Constable, or at the least they made no shew of it, fearing to haue too many irons in the fire at once. Sagne payed for his prating, and they drew from him all that he knew, and more too. His confession vpon the racke made them of Guise to hasten their designs: who provided for the frontiers of Lorraine, and caused the old bands to come out of Piedmont and Dauphiné, to march downe the riuer of Loire, writing to all them of their faction.

The Queene Mother who feared much to be supplanted in her authority: by the aduice of the Chancellor and Admirall (whom she seemed to heare willingly) refused to propound vnto the Councell, that it was necessary the King should call an Assembly of all the Princes, Noblemen, Knights of the Order and men of authority of his Realme, to provide some meanes to pacifie the troubles which they did hold to grow: especially by reason of the persecution for Religion. They of Guise were well pleased with this resolution, thinking they had found a snare to entrap the King of Nauarre and his brother: and hoping also (for that most of them which should be of this Assembly were of their faction) there should be nothing concluded to their prejudice : and finally, that this expedient should breake off the Convocation of the Estates, and settle their affaires. They begun to write Letters in the Kings name, entreating them all to make their appearance at Fontainebleau the fifteenth of August, to that effect. They of Guise did also write their Letters full of good hopes and promises. The King did write particularly to the King of Navarre, entreating him to assist, with his brother, and those Noblemen that were about him. But under hand they of Guise by the means of some secret servants, stayed the King of Navarres journey, contrary to the advice of the Constable, and many Noblemen, who said, that there was then good means offered to expell them of Guise, and to restore the lawfull government of the Realme.

The Constable better resolved, thinking the Princes would assist, arises with eight hundred horse, and by this troop makes the Lorraines to shew him a good countenance. At the opening of the Assembly, the Admirall presents a petition to the King for the Protestants, who required to have Temples granted them, and free exercise of Religion throughout the whole Realme. Thereupon Charles of Marillac, Archbishop of Vienna, stayed with so great liberty of speech, the necessity to assemble a nationall Councell to remedy these controuersies growne for Religion : and a Parliament to order the government of France, as he furnished but few dayes after his Oration. The Admirall touched the cause of Religion and State more vehemently, taxing by inuectiues such, as giuing the King guards vpon guards, entertained him in distrust of his subiects, and his subiects in hatred of their King.

As they had made shew to like of this Assembly, so they seemed to allow of a Parliament. They appoint it first at Meaux, and afterward at Orleans the tenth of December, and the Synod for the Clergy at Paris the twentieth of Ianuary following, to determine of what should be expedient to be treated of in a generall Councell, whereof they gaue them hope. But as they had vnder hand with-drawne the Princes from comming to this Assembly, so must they make them vawilling to be present at the Parliament. To this intent those of Guise in the Kings name, command the companies of ordinary souldiers, to be ready the twentieth of September : they lodge them in such sort as those whom they suspected, had them in front, in flank, and behind them, and spies likewise to discouer them : and they giue charge to the Commanders to cut all them in pieces they should find marching to ioyne with the Princes. If their forces were not sufficient to diuert the Prince of Conde, whom they knew to be more active, and to endure lesse : they doe also procure Letters from the King to the King of Navarre, whereby hee doth charge the Prince to haue attempted against the Estate of France, and to haue sought to seize vpon some of the good townes of the Realme. Hee desires him therefore to send him his brother with a good and sure guard : if not, he himselfe will fetch him well accompanied.

The answer made by the King of Navarre and his brother, encountering the Lorraines with their owne armes, holding them guilty of the same crimes wherewith they charged them, made them to change their note. They send a second commandement, whereby the King giues his word to the Princes to come in safely, he promisseth to heare all mens admonitions and iustifications willingly : to receive them according to their Estates and dignities : not to disturbe any Prince in his Religion, whereof he now made open profession : and that they should returne when they pleased, free from injury or violence.

In the beginning, the King of Navarre shewed much courage : but hearing that the affaires of Liconois and Daulphiné, had not succeeded so well as they expected, he beganne to grow cold, and yet the Deputies of the Prouinces did offer to send their troops for his preferment, before the men at armes of France should seize vpon the passages : or if that were not held expedient, they promised to rise in all parts to forsifie him, at the Assembly of the Estates. He had about him a Chancellor called Amaury Bocherat, who was Master of Requests to the King. This man in the beginning had solicited him much to giue care to the admonitions and complaints which were made vnto him from diuers parts of the Realme; but hearing that the enterprise made vpon Lyons, by young Montgoy had not bene successfull, hee wrote secretly vnto the King, beseeching him to call the Prince of Conde away from the King of Navarre his brother, for that hee did idly importune him to attempt many things against his Maiesties Ministers, & to trouble the

A the Realme at the instigation of Turbetans, and Preachers came from Geneva, who vnto he added, that as yet his master had not given answer, and then a helmes to be feared that by long importunite he might be worse swayed, which he would not be able to aduise the King, being his natural, subiect, and a humble, quiet, and one of his ministers of Iustice. Hee did also write vnto the Cardinal, promising to tell him one day many things of great consequence, which might not be written. Finally, hee promised to giue him means to arraigne the Princes, and the greatest Noblemen of the Realme. Some thought that Iarnac who had quite forsaken the Princes, with his little for his brother, before Lieutenant of the Prince of Condes company of men at armes, had practised Bocherat to write thus much.

B And to draw the King of Navarre his brother on the Cardinall of Bourbon, a Prince not well able to discouer the cunning practices of the enemies of his house, is expressly sent vnto them. They march, and are no sooner come to Limoges, but eight or eight hundred Gentlemen well appointed, doe visit them : The Deputies of Prouinces offer them six thousand foot, Gascons and Poiteuins : four thousand horse and four out of Languedoc : as many or more out of Normandy, and the other Prouinces promise to rise on all sides, to forsifie them at his assembly of States, so as it will please the King of Navarre to declare himselfe Protector of the King and Realme, against them of Guise. But the Cardinall of Armagnac, Elcars, Iarnac, and some other Councellers of the same mold, had servants to their master, propounded so many dangers, so many inconveniences vpon their comming to Court with force, (and why should they not resist their enemies force) as he sent backe all his company, and countermanded such as came, promising notwithstanding to employ himselfe courageously in the Parliament for the good of all France.

C Having thereupon made them great Declarations, and intreated him that at least the Prince of Conde might remaine behinde, to hold their enemies in suspense, but they answered their innocencie should suffice, and that it was no easie matter to put Princes of the blood to death : which if they did they would take it in good part : that God had many other means to deliuer France, and not to make them the occasion of the ruine of so many good men, which desired to ioyne with them. The Noblemen and Gentlemen which did accompany the Princes, being ready to retire, protested that being thus abandoned of their heads, they hoped that God would raise them vp others, to free them from the oppression of tyrants : these words were spoken in the presence of some secret servants, who aduertised them of Guise. In the meane time, hearing that the Princes were vpon the way, they sent the Lord of Monpelat, one of their confident servants, to forbid the Princes in the Kings name, that comming to the Court, they should not enter into any walled towne belonging to the King, vpon paine of rebellious, and to be held guilty of high treason. They were now compass in by their enemies forces, led vnder the command of the Marshall of Termes, The Cardinall of Armagnac, Deputies, and such other bad servants, made the King of Navarre beleeeue, that this verball defence of Monpelat, was but a brauado of them of Guise, the which the King and his mother would disauow.

The Princes having past Chastelleraut, they were more certaine of the future danger, and perswaded to keepe the high wayes for feare of ambushes which were laid to kill them. They had all means offered them to recouer Angiers, and then Normandy, where they should want nothing : yet they continued constant in their self resolution, marching by small iourneys, and it seemed that one of the brethren was a Prouost to lead the other prisoner.

F They aduertise the King, that the Lutherans of Orleans practised to subuert his estate, as they had of late attempted at Lyons. To assure themselves of the towne, and to punish some which were noted in the booke of death, whose confiscation was good, the Guisens first send Sipiere, Lieutenant to the Prince of Rochefort, vpon governor of Orleans, to disarme the people, and to fill the houses suspected, with men of warre, they call together the Nobilitie and men at armes of France : then they comend the King thither, to make his entry with the Queene, the 17 of October. The Princes armed by their innocencie arise on All-Saints Eve, and passe from the Parterre to the Kings lodging vpon the Estappe, betwixt two ranks of armed men. The Cardinall of Bourbon and the Prince of Roch-sur-yon receive them. Not a Courtier nor a Bourgeois meets them : and for their first affront, when as they sought to enter on horse-backe, according to the vsuall custome, they were answered with a brauado : The great gates doe not open. The King attended them: hauing done their duties to his Maieslie, and no man aduancing to bid them welcome, I am (said he to the Prince of Conde) aduersified from diuers places, that you haue made many enterprises against me, and the Estate of my Realme, and therefore I haue sent for you, to know the truth from your owne mouth.

Lewis iustifies himselfe so plainly, and doth charge his enemies so directly, as the King himselfe could not impute these accusations, but to the wilfulness of his Vnclen against his owne bloud. But he was possessed by them, and suffered himselfe to bee easily abused. So he commands Chaigny, Capitaine of his Guard (sent by them of Guise) to seize vpon the Prince. Chaigny shuts him vp in a house hard by, before the which they make a fort of Bricke, flanked with canons, and furnished with field-pieces to defend the approaches. The King of Nauarre desired to haue the keeping of his brother, and that he would answer for him life for life, the which was refused, and withall they tooke his Guard from him, and set watches ouer him continually. The Lady of Roy his mother-in-law, was likewise caried from Anici, a house of hers in Picardy, prisoner to Saint Germaine in Lay, by Renouart and Carrauges. Iersme Grest Bayliffe of Orleans, (vnder colour that his father had bene Chancellor to the deceased King of Nauarre, and hee an affectionate seruant to the Princes, accused also to bee the protector of the Lutherans in Orleans) was likewise imprisoned two dayes after the Princes arrivall. La Haye Councillor in the Court of Parliament at Paris, who did solicit the Princes affaires, was also in trouble. Amaury Banchart, Master of Requests vnto the King, and Chancellor to the Nauarrois, was sent prisoner to Melun, with others brought from Lions, to haue proofes against the Prince, whose tryall they did hasten with all speed. But they meant no harme to Banchart, he had already retired himselfe, and blabbed by his Letters to the Cardinal of Lorraine, to the preiudice of his master.

Neither the informations taken at Lions by the Marshall Saint Andre, nor the prisoners at Melun, were sufficient to make the Prince a spectacle vpon a scaffold. They send for the President of Thou, Barthelemy Fay, and James Viole, Councillors of the Parliament at Paris, to examine the Prince vpon the point of high Treason : and if this piece of battery were not of force, then to touch him vpon the point of religion, and to condemne him for heresie : the Prince propounds diuers causes of recufation, and appeales from them to the King. The priuy Councill reiects his appeale, and decrees, that vpon paine of high treason, the Prince should answer before these Commissioners: he answers, purgeth himselfe clearly of all crime, and aduowes his religion freely.

By this confession, iudgement was given against him, and he condemned to die : a day appointed the tenth of December, to countenance the beginning of the Parliament. They onely note the Earle of Sancerre, the Chancellor, and the Councillor Martier, which did not pollute their soules with the approbation of this vnjust sentence. This sentence should in the end cause the ruine of all that were accused or suspected, as well for matter of State, as Religion. And for the execution of this designe, the forces of the Realme diuided into foure, marched already into diuers Prouinces vnder the command of the Duke of Aumale, and the Marshals of Saint Andre, of Brissac, and of Termes. And with the same fury the King of Nauarre should bee confined into the Castle of Loches : the Constable and his children to the great tower at Bourges : the Admirall and some principals, into one at Orleans, the which was afterwards called the Admirale, neare to that of Saint Aignan.

But behold, there are two more violent and more brutish Councillors, Brissac and Saint Andre, they hold opinion, that to auoid all trouble in giuing the King of Nauarre any guards, they should put him to death. They seeke to poison him at a banquet : then they resolute to kill him coming from the King : but neither succeeding, they perfwade the King to stab him, and to spill his owne blood, the which God would not permit : for the King hauing a dagger vnder his gowne, and growing into bitter tearmes against the King of Nauarre, he answered so discreetly in the presence of them of Guise, as hee escaped. There was another designe to kill him going a hunting. The Constable had not yete falne into their snares, yet they had sent out Commissioners to seize vpon the Lord of Danuille

A Danuille his second sonne. As for the Admirall and his two brethren, their Declaration to be of the Religion, was sufficient to condemne them : for the effectuall accomplishing whereof, the King commanded a general assembly of his order, to be held (all excused for apart) vpon Christmas day following. During the which, there was a confession of the faith set downe by the Doctors of Sorbonne, which no man that had any feeling of religion would haue signed.

The day being come, this confession should be presented by the King himselfe, who should signe it first, requiring euery one to doe the like, with an oath to obserue all the Articles inuolubly, and to oppose themselves against all them that should contradict them without any exception. And whosoever should refuse, hee should be presently degraded from his Order, and from all his estates, dignities, and honors, and should be burnt the next day.

The like should be done among the Cardinals by a general assembly the same day, to entrap the Cardinal of Chastillon. After which all the Princes and Noblemen of the Realme should signe this confession, and then all the Gentlemen and Officers of the Kings house. The Chancellor had commandement to doe the like to all the Masters of Requests, Secretaries, and other Officers following the Court. The Queene-mother vnderooke to cause all her Ladies and Waiting-women to signe it. After which they should send to all the Parliaments, and other iurisdiccions to require the like confession of faith, and if any one did refuse, to be burnt without any other proceeding. The 10 of December approached, and the Deputies for the Estates came by degrees. They presently forbid them in the Kings name, vpon paine of death, not to moue any thing concerning Religion, his Maieslie hauing referred his controversie to the Councill : which the Pope (being then Pius the 4. successor to T heatin lately deceased) appointed to begin at Trent, at Easter following. Those of Languedoc amongst the rest, came furnished with ample instructions both for the State and Religion : but they found means to stop their mouths, seizing both on their persons and instructions.

The ninth day of the month, they gae commandement to the King of Nauarre, to be ready to goe to horse-backe : their meaning was to carie him to Loches, whilst they should present the Prince his brother vpon a mountaine full of scaffold, to the people of Orleans. But O God ! we haue heard with our eares, and our Fathers haue declared, the works which then haue done in their time, and in the old time before them. Behold the King is taken during Euen-song with a great fainting, continued with a paine in his head at the left ear, accompanied with a Fever. The Councill notwithstanding, sent forth many commissions to leauiy men, and commaund the Marshall of Termes to ioyne with the Spaniard, who took the way of Bayonne to spoile the country of Beame, and then to assaile all those whom he should finde to haue fauoured the King of Nauarre, and the enterprize of Amboise.

It may be they would haue sold their liues dearely. Seven or eight hundred Gentle-men goe speedily to horse, followed with five or six thousand foot, resolute, when the Marshall should passe Linoges, to hem him in betwixt two riuers: He hath some intelligence thereof, and retires to Doniers. This designe being made frustrate, the Kings illness increasing, those of Guise meane to proceed with violence, and to murder the King of Nauarre. God raised vp the Cardinal of Tournon, who (thinking to doe a greater work) preaches it. Hee is called to attend the Constables coming, with his children and Nephewes to the end (said he) the killing one we haue left the rest, who afterwards may doe more harme then the Princes. The discourse of the Kings death, made them of Guise to set a good countenance on a bad cause. And the Queene-mother Katherine sold her authority by supporting them of Guise, and the King of Nauarre into her closet : as he was entering, a Lady of the Court said to him in his eare : My Lord, deny the King, and what nothing, that he shall demand, if you will. So hee signed what they desired. A signe of the night which hee might extend to the government of the King and regency of the Realme, and his reconciliation with them of Guise. Vpon this signum, they promise to make him the Kings Lieutenant in France, both for peace of warre, and nothing should passe but by his advice, and if the other Princes, who should be respected according to the degrees they held in France, in such things, should not be equalled with him, and so on.

In the same time death preieth the King, and those of the House of Guise stand vpon in their their lodging, and having possession of three or fourescore thousand franks which remained yet of the treasure, came not forth in two dayes, untill they were assured of the King of Nauarre, who having embraced one another, all quarrels seemed to be laid vnder foot. In the end this Catarre with a Feuer brought the King to his graue, the 14. of December, having given no time, by reason of his yong age, & the shortnesse of his raigne, to discouer any thing in him, but only some shewes of courtesie, continency and modestie: vertues which his Vncles had easily corrupted by the taste of cruelty, which began to take an impresion in his soule, as they did in his successors: little lamented for his person, but of such as possessing him in his noage, grounded the greauesse of their vlsurped estates vpon his life, to ouerthrow the fundamentall lawes of the Realme, whatsoever some wretched Writers doe babble, whose soules haue bene as vendible, as the Guisens armies were then new in our France.

This death gaue life to the Prince of Conde, opened the prisons for such as had bene committed for this cause, reuiued an infinite number, whom the Princes condemnation had drawne into danger, countermanded the troopes of Spaine, which advanced towards Bearne, disappointed Montluc of the Earldome of Armagnac: the which he had deuoured in hope, by the promises of the house of Guise, and brought many of their most secret seruants to the King of Nauarres deuotion.

CHARLES the NINTH,

The 61 French King.

NOw we fall from a Feuer into a Frenchie. Wee shall see vnder another pupill King, of eleven yeates of age, reigning in the wrath of God, the heavens to powre vpon this Realme, all the curses sedicinely promised against a Nation, whose iniquities he will punish in his displeasure. A raigne cursed in the clergy, and cursed in the field, cursed in the beginning, and cursed in the ending. Mortalitie, sword and famine haue followed it euen vnto the end. The heavens about are of brasse, and the earth vnder it of iron: the carcases are a prey to the birds of the aire, and to the beasts of the field, and no man troubles them. They suffer nothing but wronges and robberies, and no man relieves them. Men marry wiues but others sleepe with them. They fow and plant, but the nations whom they haue not knowne deuoure the fruit. To conclude, there is nothing but cursing, terror, and desolation.

A Parliament
held at Orlés.

The 23 of December the Parliament began, and that which the Queene-mother most desired, the confirmation of her Regency, allowed by the Chancellor, and afterward by those that were the speakers. Iohn Quintin of Auzon a Doctor of the Canon-law at Paris, for the Clergie; the Lord of Rochefort, Vicomte de Commercy, for the Nobility: Angelo then Advocate of the Parliament at Bourdeaux, and afterwards Councillor there, for the people. The Chancellor propounded many Articles touching the means to pacifie the troubles, and the remedies for that which concerned the estate and Religion, and to discharge the Kings debts.

Quintin would haue the Ministers of the Church enforced to discharge their duties, not altering any thing in the reformation thereof, the which cannot erre: nor to suffer any other then the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish Religion. Against such as demanded Temples, and against the deliuerer of their Religion (meaning the Admirall) (said here) they should declare him an Hereticke, and proceed according to the Canon and ciuill constitutions, for the prohibiting of such bookes: were not allowed by the Doctors of Sorbonne, and for the rooting out of Luthereans and Calvinists. Quintin did speake against the iurisdiccions vsurped by the Clergie, against the disorders growne among the Nobles, against the wrong done to the true Nobilitie, against the confusion growne by con-

A confiscations for matter of Religion, against seditions, of the means to order the Clergy, and to containe them in their vocation: for the reliefe of the people, especially in matters of Iustice, the which should be reduced to a certaine number of Officers. Angelo insisted much vpon the ignorance, counselllesse, and dissolution of the Clergy, whence proceeded the greatest part of these present scandals.

The next day, vpon the Admiralls complaint to the Queene-mother, Quintin excused himselfe vpon the interuallations which were giuen him in writing, and in his second speech he did moderate his plea to the Admiralls content. The Estates continued their conferences, and made the beginning of this yere famous, by some prouision for matters of religion, which by it was forbidden vpon paine of death, not to reproach religion one to another, and a commandement giuen to all Iudges and Officers, to set at liberty all such as had bene imprisoned for the said religion. Many other good and necessary lawes were published, but with more consultation then profit. And in truth, a number of lawes ill obserued, peruerse iudges, and giues the people occasion not to regard them. But when they come seriously to handle the discharge of the Kings debts, and that the Nauarrois submits himselfe to restitution, if it be found that he hath receiued any extraordinary gifts: those of Guise and others, which could not make the like offer, found means to frustrate this proposition, by the referring of the Estates to Pontoise, hoping hereafter to finde some device to prevent their yielding vp of any account. And in truth at these assemblies vanished away like smoke, without any other resolution, then to lay the paiement of the Kings debts vpon the Clergy. The King of Nauarre, the other Princes of the blood, and the Constable, seeing themselves held to no end in Court, and that for matters of State, they had but the leauings of them of Guise, it made them truste vp their baggage to retire, with an intent to crosse the regency of the Queene-mother, and the Guisens authority. To frustrate this designe, she makes a new accord with the Nauarrois, she doth associate him in the government of the Realme, and concludes with him, that leauing the title of Regent, he should be called Lieutenant generally to his Maiestie, in all his Countries and Dominions. But this was but a government in paper: these strong factions of two parties, shall briefly slay one another, causing great wounds within this Realme, from whence we haue seene the blood flow euen to these latter dayes.

Soone after, the Prince of Conde being called to Court, he came from La Fere in Picardie to Fontainebleau, and the day after his arrival, being the 13 of March, he came into the Councell, where the King in the presence of them all declared, that he had done him right for his innocency, suffering him to pursue a second declaration to the same effect, in the Court of Parliament at Paris, whither the Prince went within few dayes.

This treaty did preiudice them of Guise, and in the end, peace must needs send them from Court, to lue at home like private men. They had in their conceits, the argument of a new Tragedy, the which we shall shortly see played vpon this Theater. The Protestants multiplied, and the King of Nauarre supported them openly. The Prince of Conde (who pursued the sentence of his iustification in the Parliament and the Admirall) had preaching in their chambers. This string is strained too high. They publish generally, that these preachings will be the ouerthrow of the ancient Religion within this realme: and particularly among the duke of Guises partisans. That vnder colour of rendring accounts, and of extraordinary gifts, they would displace them, hauing managed the most important affaires of the realme, for the space of forty yeares. The Constable holding for a Maxime, That the change of Religion brings an alteration in the State, begins to applaud them: the Duke of Montpensier, and the Prince of Rochefort-yon, Princes of the blood of Bourbon, vpon this nice point of new religion, ioyne willingly with them. The people conforme themselves commonly after the patterne of great men. Great personages frowne one at another, so doe the people: one beares the name of Huguenot impatiently: another cannot endure that of Papist: in truth, turbulent and factious names. From hence spring diuers murinies, at Beauvais, Amiens, Pontoise, and else where, where the weaker were forced to yield to the stronger.

These new broyles caused an Edict to be made at Fontainebleau (where the Court remained, attending the reniuing of the Estates intermitted) prohibiting these mutual reproches of Papist and Huguenot: to search no man in his house, nor to detain any one in prison for his religion. From thence the King made his voyage to Reims, and was solemnly and in the suburbs of Saint Marceau: they ring the alarm bell at S. Medard, they wound, A kill, take and hang many. Gabaston amongst others, Knight of the watch, to appease the people, lost his head. To make some Edict for the pacifying of these broiles, the Queene-mother assembles the chiefe of the Parliament, with the Princes of the blood, Noblemen, Councillors of the Priuy Councell, Masters of Requests, and other men of authority, and to giue some contentment to those that with vehemency required places and Temples for their assemblies with liberty.

The chiefe Catholikes, especially those of Guise, disallow of this course, they accuse the Queenes facilitie, and murmure openly against the King of Nauarre, the Prince of Conde, the Admirall and his brethren. These crosse them with an enterprife, made to carie B the duke of Orleans (the Kings yonger brother) into Lorraine, so as they retire from Court: the duke of Nemours, who had played the principall part in this tragedy, saues himselfe, and returns not before the ciuill warres haue fired all France. This new change seemes to draw the Regent to the Protestants party, she desires to know their forces, and their meanes. They giue her a List of two thousand an hundred & fifty Protestant Churches, the Deputies whereof offered their goods and persons to the King to withstand the forces of them of Guise, who called the Spaniard into France.

Edict of January.

The Guisens absence made easie the grant of that famous Edict, which beares vnto this day the name of January: the which disannulling that of Iuly, gaue liberty to the Protestants the seuenteenth of the said moneth, to assemble without the townes, and provided C that all men might liue in peace one with another. But alas in stead of peace it shall breed horrible confusions. The difficultie was in the execution. The Parliaments publish it as slowly as may be, and that of Dijon, neuer. Those of Guise and the Constable ioyned with them, and diuerted them by their authority. But they had another string to their bow, which preuailed according to their desires. They employ the Ambassador of Spaine, the Cardinal of Tournon, Escars, and some other household flatterers to the King of Nauarre, to perswade him, that carrying himselfe a Neuter, and causing the Prince his sonne to goe once to the Masse, the King of Spaine would giue him the Realme of Sardenia, in recompence of that of Nauarre. The Pope likewise confirms him in his hope. This was properly to conceiue a mountaine, and bring forth a Mouffe, and to take from him all D meanes to recover his Realme of Nauarre, when he should attempt it. So as being drawne by those Spanish and Lorraine practices, hee estrangeth himselfe by little and little from the Protestants, solicits the Queene his wife to returne into the bosome of the Romish Church, and so to instruct her children. Vpon her refusal, there growes a breach betwixt them, and he falls in loue with one of the Queene-mothers maids. In the meane time, shee entertained the Prince of Conde and the Admirall, whom shee knew to be yet strong within the Realme, maintained the Protestants for their peaceable exercise, and for that end commanded euery gouernour to retire to his gouernment. Shee would haue sent the Prince of Conde into Guienne (whose presence without doubt had stayed that horrible and cruell shedding of blood) whereby Monluc vpon his refusal opened the veins of E a body wonderfully afflicted. But so passeth the world, euery one would gouerne the King in his turne, and the Regent by little and little did vndermine the foundation of the Edict, to ouerthrow the whole body. Moreover, those of Guise were desirous to returne to their places, neither had they retired but to get better footing. They are now strong enough, hauing drawne the King of Nauarre from the Protestant part. They march towards Paris, and passing from Iainville to Vassy, they dispersed about twelve hundred persons, which were assembled for their exercise: murder two and forty, wound many to the death, lead away prisoners, and sacke the towne.

The massacre at Vassy.

This was the first fire-brand of the ciuill warres which were now abreding. This act puts the protestants in alarm, and makes them to leaue the trowell and the hammer, F which they employed in many places, to build their Temples, euery one scowres his harnesse, euery one provides him armes and horses. Their Churches and Nobility complain, and demand iustice of the King. The Regent giues them good words: and the King of Nauarre rebukes them, and chargeth them to be the first moouies of this trouble. They haue (saith hee) cast stones against my brother the D. of Guise, hee could not retaine the fury of his followers. And whosoever shall touch the end of my brothers finger, shall touch my whole body. The arrivall of the Duke of Guise, the Constable, the Marshall of Brisac, Mont-

They were too weak to encounter the counsels which were held daily at the Constables house. To vnderstand what forces the Prince had within the city, they make a proclamation: That all men of what quality so euer, should depart within foure and twenty houres. So the Prince retires to Meaux, and eals together such as might by their armes force his enemies to some agreement. The Queene-mother (seeing the Guisens fortified within Paris, and seized vpon the Kings person, whom they caused to come from Fontainebleau to Paris, writes vnto the Prince, and recommends vnto him, both the mother and the children.

Orleanse taken by the Protestants.

B The Princes intention was to come to Court, when as newes is brought him, that they possesse the King, and bring him to Paris. He therefore leaues Meaux to goe & seize vpon Orleans: and at the same instant, either faction assures it selfe by diuers surpris of places, exposed to their wils: the Constable causeth the houses of Ierusalem vpon Saint Iames his ditch, and of Pepincourt without S. Anthonies gate, to bee beaten downe, where the Protestants did assemble for their exercise, and in all other places, the people transported with the like humour, vfe extreme violence. The Protestants grow bitter, and in all places where they had might, reuenge themselves on the Churches, images, priests, and religious houses. To conclude, euery towne thus diuided, prepares a wretched Theater, to act a mournfull and bloody Tragedy. Yet euery one iustifies his cause. Without the C Realme the Prince produceth the Regents letters in an open assembly of the Princes of Germany. Within the Realme, he exhorts them of his party to provide men and money, and by an association made with the Noblemen, and Gentlemen of his party, hee promisseth to employ himselfe for the deliuey of the King and Queene, and for the maintenance of the Edicts, and the Estate of the Realme.

On the other side, the King declares by his Letters Patents, that both he, his mother, and his brethren, are at liberty, forbids all his subjects to arme vnder that pretext: commands them that are armed to surceale, and to retire home to their houses: and by another Edict he commands the execution of the Edict of January, but within the City of Paris and suburbs thereof. But to quite abolish it, hee calls the Nobility the 23 day of Aprill, and declares by Proclamation, the Prince and his adherents to bee seditious and bad D Christians, and that the Prince made prouision of foraine forces to disturbe the quiet of France. It is an example of dangerous consequence, when a people armes vnder colour to set their Prince at liberty: for oftentimes in stead of libertie, they make him captiue. The Queene-mother did easily arme that party which she meant to employ: but great men, who commonly maintain their authority by armes, doe more willingly take them, then lay them downe. She cannot now cause them to surceale, whom shee had armed for this deliuerance: the confusion is too great, their courages are too much incensed, and their hearts puffed vp with many hopes: they must come to blowes, their fingers itched on either side. In the meane time, the heads being gone, and perswaded to preferre E the publike before all priuate respects, they offer in shew, to lay downe their armes, and to retire home to their houses, so as their aduersaries will submit themselves to the like. But to conclude, the companies of men at armes being for the most part armed at Paris, with part of the old bands, the King of Nauarre, the Duke of Guise, the Constable, and the Marshall of Saint Andre (the Protestants called the three last Triumvirs, and in truth they were but three heads in one hood) hauing by an Edict banished the Calvinists out of Paris, take the way of Chasteaudun with twelve thousand foot, and three thousand horse. The Prince was as strong, and euen then would haue ioyned with them: A Andelet and Boucari aboute all others vrged it, but the Regent abused them with fruitles hopes of an accord, whilest the Kings armie grew stronger, both with French and foraine forces.

Hauing thus lost the opportunite of a battaile, the Prince maintaines his armie about two months, with a commendable discipline, without blaspheming, whoring, robbing, or theft. In the end, they lose all patience. Baugency taken by assault, opens the gates to disorders: for this first heate soone past with the French grows cold, money for their pay grows short, and the Nobilitie could not frame themselves to this strict discipline of warre, which the Admirall did practise, being a great enemy to robbing. In many F Provinces, matters went indifferently betwixt the Catholikes, and Protestants: and to giue gave two strokes with one stone, to stay the dissipation of this armie, and to relieue them that might in the end fall, the Prince sent the Earle of Rochefoucault, with some troopes into Poitou, Xaintonge and Angoumois: Soubize to Lyons: Tuy brother to Genlis, to Bourges: Montgomery into Normandy: D'Andelot, to hasten the succours of Germany, and Brigaut into England. These troopes from the moneth of April, vntill the midst of August, did possesse Orleance, Baugency, Vendosme, Blois, Tours, Poitiers, Mans, Angers, Bourges, Angoulême, Rouan, Chalou upon Soan, Mafcon, Lion, and the most part of Dauphine, with many others, not without effusion of blood, spoyleing of Churches, and such infolencies, as the warre doth cause in a country of conquest.

Bourges recovered.

Orleance and Bourges held by the Prince, did much helpe their affaires, but Bourges might easily bee surprisid before it were fortified. The King then (whom the Commanders had drawne into the armie) marcheth thither, and the composition which Tuy made with his Maiesty, put him for a time in disgrace with the Prince. This arme cut off (as the Guisens said) from the Huguenots, inuited the Kings armie to the siege of Orleance, where the Prince and the Admirall were. But the resolution of these two Commanders, and the feare to receive shame and losse, made them passe on to Rouen, where Montgomery commanded with seuen or eight hundred souldiers of the old bands, and two companies of English. The end of September, was the beginning of this siege: a famous siege, by the hurting of the King of Navarre in the shoulder, as hee surueyed the weakest part of the city: whereof he dyed the seuenteenth day of Nouember, three weeks after it was taken by assault, and spoiled. Montgomery lauded himselfe in a gally, but many of the chiefe passed through the executioners hands. On the other side, Lewis of Bourbon, duke of Montpensier, reduced to the Kings obedience, the townes of Angers, Mans and Tours: the Marshall Saint André took Poitiers from the Lord of Saint Gemme, and Henry of Montmorency, Lord of Damuille, incourted the Protestants forces in Languedoc, whilst the Earles of Tende and Suze, by the defeat of Momburn, tooke Cisteron for the King, and Montluc with Bury gouernor of Guienne, put to rout the troopes of Gascons which Duras led to the Earle of Rochefoucault, besieging Saint Lean d'Angeli.

Death of the K. of Navarre.

The Protestants beaten in diuers places.

The ouerthrow of Duras brought the Earle with 300 Gentlemen, and the remainder of the defeated army, on this side Loire, to ioyne the Prince with the Reistres whom d'Andelot brought. This supply made the Prince to resolve to goe to Paris, and by annoying it, to encrease the feare wherewith they were possessed. He marcheth, forceth Pluuiers, takes Elampes, and besiegeth Corbeil: but finding it better furnished with men then he expected, he approacheth to Paris, makes a great skirmish, and beats back the troopes that were come out of their trenches. So he camped at Gentilly, Arcueil, Montrouge, and other neighbour villages, the Queene-mother busies him seuen or eight daies with diuers parleys, during the which, foure and twenty Ensignes of Gascons, and Spaniards arriuing, were lodged within the suburbs of S. James. The Prince then seeing his enemies forces to encrease, resolves to fight with them, before they were all vnited, so as all hope of peace being conuerted with smoke, he riseth the tenth of December, takes the way to Chartres, and resolves to goe into Normandie, to receiue the men and money which came out of England, and by that means to diuert the siege of Orleance. The Constable and duke of Guise march after him.

A notable dream.

Dreames are lies, as we commonly say: yet haue we often tryed those which present themselves in the morning (the spirit hauing taken sufficient rest) to bring certaine aduertisements of that which is to come. The night before the eue of the bataille, the Prince dreames that he had giuen three batailles one after another, obtained the victory, ouerthrowne his three principall enemies, and finally himselfe wounded to the death, haue laid one vpon another, and he about them all, yelding in that sort, his soule to God. And to say the truth, haue we not seen this vision verified by the death of the Marshall of Saint André, which is at hand: by that of the D. of Guise before Orleance the yeare following: and by that of the Constable at the bataille of Saint Denis, and of the Prince himselfe in that of Bascac.

The battle of Dreux.

In the Kings army, they numbered two thousand horse, and nineteene thousand foot. In that of the Prince, foure thousand horse, and twelue thousand foot. They ioyne the nineteenth of December, and without any skirmishes, charge with all their forces. The Princes Suisses lose seuentene Capitaines, with three parts of their troops, which were about three

A three thousand, and endure three charges before they could bee broken. On the other side, the taking of the Constable, the death of the Marshall Saint André, the defeat of their troopes, caused a generall confusion in the Kings armie, if the duke of Guise charging the white cackasses, and the Reistres with fury (whose Pistols had made a great slaughter of his men) had not forced through the Princes hostes, who straying too much from the battell, fell prisoner into the hands of the Lord of Damuille, the which made the victory doubtfull, seeming before to incline to his side. The conflict continued from ten of the clocke in the morning, vntill night, with many charges, there are seuen thousand men slaine vpon the place, on both sides; many hurt, and in a manner, all died, and a great number of prisoners. The King lost (besides his Suisses) the most part of his horse, and a great number of foot. There were slaine of men of marke, the duke of Nevers, killed by one of his household seruants, either by hazard, or of purpose, the Lords of Montbrun (the Constables sonne) d'Annebault, Guiry, la Brosse and his sonne: there were hurt, the Duke of Aumale, brother to the Duke of Guise, Rochefort and Beauvais. Anson a Nobleman of Galeony, whom feare made fly to Paris, and there hee died of griefe. The Prince lost about two thousand two hundred foot, and a hundred and fifty horse, French and Reistres.

Both Generals taken.

This bataille is famous, by the taking of two Generals, the one in the beginning, the other in the end of the bataille, so as the field was left by both parties: but after the retreat, it was viewed, and taken againe by the D. of Guise, and the next day, as it were, recovered by the Admirall, who presented himselfe in bataille. So the Prince had the advantage over the dead, and the honour to haue made his retreat with order: but the duke had the advantage of the victory, for that he lodged vpon the place of bataille, spoiled the dead, and won the Princes artillery, who (a strange matter considering their hatred) supped, and lay all night with the duke of Guise. Doubtlesse, it was a courtesie in the one, and a resolution in the other. By the taking of the two Commanders, the duke of Guise was declared the Kings Lieutenant General in the army, and the Admirall tooke the command for the Protestants. Either had sundry designs. The duke to recover the places held from the King: the Admirall to preferre Orleance with more facility, by the conquest of some places about it: and then to finish his voyage into Normandy, whither the treasure of England called him. So hauing taken Salles in Berry, Saint Aignan, Montrichard, and Sully vpon Loire, he deliuered the guard of Orleance to his brother d'Andelot, with foureteen ensignes of French and Lanquenets, foure of the inhabitants of the towne, and a great number of the Nobility, vnder the conduct of Duras, Beuchamenes, Bussy, S. Cyre, Anaret, and other voluntaries: and tooke the way to Normandy, thinking by this meanes to diuide the enemies forces, who had Orleance for the chiefe object of their armes. The fifth day of February, he camps before it, and the next day hee wins the Portereau, with the slaughter of foure hundred good French souldiers, being abandoned by the Lanquenets, who cowardly left the place they had in charge.

E The eighteenth of the moneth, hee was ready to giue an assault: and making his reckoning to winne the towne, hee writes to the Queene-mother, that within 24 houres hee would send her newes of the taking thereof, and would make the day very memorable, sparing neither sexe nor age: that after he had shroued there, hee would exinguish the remembrance of the towne. But man knoweth not his destiny, nor what shall happen vnto him. The same day as he returned towards night, vpon a little Moile, from the campe to the castle of Coruey, his ordinary lodging, Jehan Polrot, Seigneur of Mery, a Gentleman of Angoulmois mounted vpon a Spanish horse, by his owne proper and private motion, shoots him into the shoulder with a pistoll charged with three bullets, and faines himselfe by flight: but hauing wandred all night, he was taken the next day: soone after, hee was pincht with hot irons, and so drawne in pieces with horses at Paris. The D. of Guise dyed the 24 of the said moneth, and was interred at Paris, with pompe like vnto a King. Henry his sonne being yong of age, was preferred to the place of great Chamberlaine, and Lord Steward of France.

The D. of Guise slaine.

The Admirall, in the meane time, runnes over Normandy, without opposition, and followed by foure thousand horse, hee coopt vp them into their forts, who had had little scope, since the taking of Rouen: namely, the Marquis of Elbeuf, and Armenant, a knight of the Order, molested by the Protestants of Caen, tooke some, and due others.

The money, artillery, powder, with five companies of English, and two of French, which he newly received, came very fitly to reduce the towne, and the strong castle thereof, to his devotion. Monty conquered Honefleu; and the Lord of Colombieres, Bayeux: and by this prize, he amazed the garison of Saint Lo, as they left the place. The Admirall sent Montgomery thither, who was received into Auranches without contradiction. Vire being taken by assault, endured the ordinary rigour of the warre. The Earle went on with his forces, even as the pacquet of peace arrived, which called the Admirall to Orleance. So the 14 of March, he marcheth thitherward: the 18 he entred into Bernay by force, and causeth some priests to be hanged being found in armes perswading the people to resist in a paltry dog-hole. Two dayes after, the Vicont of Dreux takes Aigle, and puts all to the sword that he finds armed. Falsife compounds: Argenton redeemes it selfe for ten thousand franks. Mortagne a great village in Perche (seduced by some indiscreet priests) makes resistance. They force it, and the most mutinous pay for their folly with the price of their lives. The Monkes of Saint Calais had received garison, and ill intreated some of the household servants of the Lord of Coignee: but now he takes a sharpe revenge, and Ceruy surprizing the castle of Mezieres neere unto Dreux, makes the garison for ever after vnable to beare armes. So the Admirall re-enters into Orleance the three and twentieth of March.

At the beginning of the siege of Orleance, the King, his Mother, the Priny Councell, and certaine Deputies of the Court of Parliament at Paris, were come to Chartres, to arraigne (said they) the Prince of Conde. The Duke of Guise had by this meanes given two strokes with one stone: for the losse of the Prince of Condes head, had struck off the Constables. But Dammille hauing the honour to haue taken the Prince in battell, had likewise the honour to preferre his life, by the dispersing of this assembly. Now that the Queene-mother stands no more in feare of the duke of Guises authority, shee reuiues the treaty of Peace begun before his death. For the effecting whereof she holds an assembly in the Isle of Oxen, where the Prince and the Constable assist being yet prisoners. The Constable protests at the beginning, that he will not suffer any peace made with the conditions of the Edict of Ianuary. The Prince craves leave to conferre with his counsell in Orleance. His counsell giues him to vnderstand, that neither the Queene, nor he, can derogate from the Edict so solemnly made: confirmed, and sworne, at the instance of the Estates, and so notable an assembly of all the Parliaments of the Realme.

But the Prince was grieved to see himselfe guarded by a company of horse, and three ensignes of foot, and many Gentlemen had not of long time seene their families. Moreover, they gaue the Prince to vnderstand, that the Articles of the Edict of Ianuary were not altered, but onely to content the Catholikes: that armes being laid aside, they should by little and little obtaine free liberty. So the Articles of Peace drawne in forme of an Edict, were concluded the twelfth of March, and all confirmed in the Kings Councell at Amboise the nineteenth following, verified in Parliament the twenty seuen, and the same day proclaimed throughout the towne by the sound of Trumpet. The executions qualified with the name of Iustice, the robberies, general and private massacres, committed on the persons of the Protestants at Paris, Sens, Amiens, Abbeville, Meaux, Chaulons, Troyes, Bar vpon Seine, Epernay, Sens, Auxerre, Neuers, Corbigny, Aurillac, Moulins, Moudun, Mans, Vendosme, Angers, Craon, Blois, Mer, Tours, Bourgueil, and places therabouts, Poitiers: Rouen, Valongnes, Vire, Saint Lo, Bourdeaux, Agen, and generally in all parts of the Realme, are read at large in the Originals, and would augment this Volume beyond the iust proportion: Time and leisure may hereafter giue all this discourse specified more particularly. Let vs onely obserue the most memorable exploits chanced during these first troubles, from the month of April, in the year 1562, vnto the publication of the Peace.

The Protestants of Meaux exceeding the Catholikes in number, had vntill the end of Iune, continued the exercise of their religion, without any disturbance: then transported with an indiscreet zeale, and ill-advised presumption, grounded vpon their numbers, they fly to the Churches, beat downe Images, and make the priests retire. This insolency made the Court of Parliament at Paris to censure them, and to abandon them to any that could spoile or kill them, without any forme of processe. Therevpon Lithons brother to Montmorency, comes to Meaux, and with the consent of the Protestants, restores the exercise of

A the Catholike religion; and then giues commandement to the inhabitants, to bring their armes into the towne-house. Some obey, others to the number of foure hundred, march to ioyne with the Prince Portian: they charge them, and kill them all but forty, which recover Orleance with much adoe, leaving their wiues to the mercy of the stronger, whereof many were forced to goe to the masse with blowes, many mariages solemnized anew, many children (but without order) baptized againe. The 13 of February 1563 some fugitiues tried to recover the place, but this caused a total ruine of their companions, who remained within the towne, they were massacred, drowned, and hanged, their wiues and children rauished, their goods spoiled, and their houses made inhabitable.

B At Chaulons, des Bordes Lieutenant to the Duke of Neuers, Gouvernor of Champagne, slue many men and women, imprisoned handicrafts men, spoiled their houses, caused mariages to be re-solomnized, and children to be re-baptized. Those of Bar vpon Seine be- came the stronger, but rashly in a place easie to be forced. Some Cannons planted onely against the castle, scattered all within it like vnto Partridges. So the besiegers entring, finding few men to execute their reuenge on, they fall vpon the women, maidens, and children, open some of their stomacks, pull out their hearts, and with a fury (vnworthy doubtlesse of one created after the same image and likeness) teare them with their teeth. Ralet a young Advocate, son to the Kings Proctor, was (a prodigious thing) hanged by his fathers procurement. In the month of Ianuary following, some fifty horse of the garison of Antrain, surprised the towne at the breake of day: and at the first sight this Ralet to the top of his house, then with their pistols caused him to expiate the death of his sonne. The other murderers were murdered, and their spoile spoiled by other spoilers. So the Lord requires the blood of man by the hand of man himselfe.

Saint Edienne being returned from Orleance, with two of his brethren and some others to refresh himselfe, in a house of his neere vnto Rheims, was beset, besieged and battered with the Cannon, by a troop of fiftene or sixtene hundred men, who going forth vpon their word to speake with the Duke of Neuers, who (they said) asked for him, was murdered by his owne Cousin germane the Baron of Cerny, and his two brethren, with sixtene others stabbed.

D A hundred persons of all qualities were miserably slaine at Sens, their bodies cast naked into Seine, their houses spoiled, and (as if it had beene no sufficient reuenge) their Vines were pulled vp. The eleuenth of May 1562, the Catholikes of Neuers called in many Gentlemen of the Country, seized vpon the gates, and three dayes after fell vpon the protestants. Fayette ariues, ransacks their houses, re-baptizeth the children, expels whom he pleased, and so laden with booty, worth fifty thousand Crownes, he retires to his house in Auvergne. Noisat Marshall of the Company of Fayette, entreated them of Corbigny in the like sort. Capitaine Blany surprized the towne few dayes after, and restored the Protestants to the publike exercise of their religion. Capitaine Blosse surprizing the towne of Antrain, stayed the Catholikes from committing the like excesses, as they had done at

E Auxerre. Stephen Blondelot a Priest, and another called the Dangerous, were hanged and shot. Ifferieux (called in by the Protestants of La Charite to take the charge of the town) was let vpon by Cheynon, Achon, and other troops, and finally (being besieged by Fayette) he yeelded vp the towne vpon an honest composition for his partie. This was the tenth of Iune, but the Grand Prior entring, he pulled the Capitulation (being signed) out of Ifferieux hand, and afterwards La Fayette abandons these poore Protestants to spoile and ranisme, like to them of Neuers. The third of March following, the Captains du Bois, Blosse, and Blany re-enter by scalado. Leaving it afterwards in guard to du Bois, who defended it with three score and seven souldiers, and some inhabitants, against an army of foure thousand foot and horse, slue about foure score of them, and forced them to raze the siege.

F Those of Chastillon vpon Loire, standing amidst many difficulties, and in the end spoiled of all their commodities, fortified their little towne, and the fifth of Ianuary endure an assault against the Lord of Prie, kill seuen or eight of his men, and hurt many others: the men defending themselves with stones, and the women pouring boiling water vpon the assailants. In the end, Monterad Gouvernor of Berry besieged it, battered it, and took it by force, killed men and women, young and old, spoiled the towne, euen to the hinges of doores, glasse and bars of windows.

At Gyen.

Gyen maintains it selfe long, the Protestants were the stronger, but the insolency of A Captains and Souldiers, whom the Prince of Conde lent thither from Orleans to refresh themselves one after another, forced many of the inhabitants to retire to Orleans. So the towne remaining at the deuotion of the Kings armie, who camped before it, was subiect to the violence of the stronger, where the Italians amongst other insolencies, cut a young child being alive in two pieces, and with a horrible fury ate his liuer.

At Montargis:

Montargis was the Sanctuary of many Protestant Families, vnder the countenance of René of France, daughter to King Lewis the twelfth, and Duchesse Dowager of Ferrara. The Duke of Guise her sonne in law sends Malicorne thither with foure companies of men at armes, but the prey he fought was safe within the Castle: his fury fell vpon an old B man met by chance, who was slaine and cast into the riuier. Malicorne threatens the Duchesse to bring the Cannon to force her to yeeld the castle and the Protestants that were in it. But the generous resolution of this Duchesse, and the death of the Duke of Guise, stayed the execution of his threats.

At Aurillac.

Bersons, according to the Commission he had from the Duke of Guise to seize vpon the forts of high Auvergne, enters into Aurillac, murders eight men, spoiles the towne and that of Argentat, with some castles, rauishes wiues and maidens, making his account to root out all the Protestants in the Country, if the Edict of pacification had not forced him to surcease. Montars comes to Moulins with like Commission, he expelled out of the towne whom he doubted, then giuing liberty to his troops, they spoiled the houses and farmes thereabouts: he caused six men to be hanged, and five others to be drowned, returning from Orleans with three Merchants of Daulphiné, suffering the hangman to execute them without any forme of Process, whom the multitude deliuered vnto him to be put to death. Thirteen young men of Lisouan were beaten downe in the water the eight of May at Saint Laisne, a village two leagues from the towne, and the ninth of Iuly following, Sarsay seized vpon Lisouan, armed the Catholike inhabitants, drew malefactors out of prison, and filled it with Protestants, who for the most part died, being smothered vnder the ruines of a Tower, of sixtene that escaped, ten saved themselves at Bourges. Vntill the Edict of peace, he spoiled both the towne and country, ransoming some, deliuering others to the Hang-man, which had not meanes to redeeme themselves: D he rauished wiues and maids: and to conclude, exposed these poore creatures to all the insolencies of souldiers. The third of April 1562, those of Mans became masters of the towne. But violence neuer continued long, and souldiers led by a Commander of small credit and little authority, did neuer see their armes prosper.

At Mans:

These men are no sooner armed, but they employ themselves to the beating downe of Images, sacking of Churches: and from the towne they runne to the Villages neere. The commons assemblé, kill such as they meet, and rescue the booty. In the end, an apple of discord diuides them of the towne and the castle: the insolencies of the Captaines and Souldiers amaze the Protestants: the Duke of Montpensier prepares to assaile them, and of three Captaines which command within the towne, two haue intelligence with him. E This being discovered, the towne being also ill furnished, La Mothe Turgueau drawes forth tumultuously eight hundred men carrying armes, leading them through many difficulties into Alangon, who then took sundry parties: some not practised in armes remained there: others put themselves into the troops of the Conge Montgomery, others of the Duke of Bouillon, and the other two Captaines submitted to those to whom they had giuen their words. Thus the Catholikes haue their turne, they were driven out of the towne, and now they re-enter, and full of spleene they spoile the Protestants houses, both within the towne and abroad, eight leagues compass: and without respect of kindred, kill, spoile, and ranfome men, women and children. Some women of good account, some simple people, seruants and chamber-maids, retired to their farmes, or to their friends in F the country, remaine at the deuotion of 500 Harguebuziers, leauied for the guard of the towne and country thereabouts, who forbore no kind of reuenge and rigour. The prisons are filled, they forbid by any meanes to sollicite for them: the accused are not admitted to except against any witness, and for the last act of this Tragedie, about two hundred persons of all qualities and sexes, purge by their mournfull deaths the insolencies of these fift furies. The absent were executed in picture, their goods confiscate that were dead carrying armes: their children degraded from all offices, and declared incapable to succeed.

Crusades continued in Mass.

A succeed. In Villages neere and farther off, about sixscore persons yielded their throats to the reuenging swords of them to whom the change of armes had now giuen the advantage. One Capitaine Champagne, to glut the Pickles in a poole which he had, doth gorge them with about fifty persons. Bou-lardin his Lieutenant fills two trenches neere vnto his house, with fifty or threecore carcasses. La Ferté-Bernard, Sablé, Maine, Loire-Castle, Meuners, Belesmes, and Marigue, had the fields thereabout white with the bones of such as were slaine, whose flesh was deuoured with birds and beasts. The Images overthrowne at Vendosme, the Altars beaten downe, yea the monuments of the House of Vendosme too insolently broken, might not these stirre vp some reuenge? Tou-beat downe (say the Catholikes) the Images, and destroy the reliques of the dead: but we will beat downe as many living Images as shall fall into our hands. The Monkes of Saint Calais second them, and of many Protestants which held their Abbey, they massacre five and twenty or thirty. Some troops which kept the fields, kill the first that passe, stone them and cast them into wells. The Lord of Congnée ioyning with some gentlemen, comes to charge them, kills the murderers, and (except a few which fled betimes) puts them all to the sword: then hee discharge the rest of his fury vpon the Priests and Monkes, and causeth two of the most insolent to be hanged in their Church, yea where the alarum had rung to assaile the Protestants.

Those of Angers become the stronger, yet without any offence to their fellow-citizens, C and make an agreement within themselves: To liue peaceably one with another, vnder the Kings obedience, with obseruation of the Edict of Iannary. This modesty continued from the fifth of April to the two and twentieth. Then they lose all patience, overthrowing the Images and reliques of Saint Samson. The Catholiques rest patient, but they could well choose the time of their aduantage. It chanced that the Prince of Conde required a supply of men and money from the Protestants of Angers. Many Gentlemen and Souldiers march, and by this meanes make their party weake. Puygaillard a Gascon Capitaine, sent by the Duke of Montpensier, enters the Castle the fifth of May, and the next day winnes a part of the towne: then to lull the Protestants asleepe, and to haue them in the end at his deuotion, he grants them free liberty of Religion. But two dayes after, vnder colour of disarming them, they enter their houses. A receiuer of Subsidies and some others bar vp their gates. They found the alarme, their houses are spoiled, and the prisons filled vp with men and women: and after the eleuenth of the said moneth vnto the end of the yeare, about foure-score men were executed after diuers manners. Many women of all qualities were put into sackes, drawne through the dirt, and their bodies cast into the Riuier, and their daughters rauished: some making strong resistance were stabbed with their daggers. And the Duke of Montpensier, hauing published the Edict of the Parliament of Paris, To pursue all them that should be any way suspected of the Protestant religion, many Gentlemen and others about Angers during these furies lost both life and goods.

At Blois. At Blois they were masters both of the towne and castle, but being too weake to encounter the forces of the Duke of Guise, all the men of warre retired to Orleans. Those which remained in the towne, paid for their companions: for besides them that were beaten downe in the streets at the Duke of Guises entry, many tied to stakes, were cast into the riuier, wiues and maydes were rauished, houses spoiled, and as often chanceth in these inuicill tumults, many Catholikes were slaine in these confusions, as liberty giues euery man meanes to reuenge his priuate quarrels. They compaine to the Duke. There is no remedy (saith he) we haue too much people in France. I will deale so, as viriuals shall be good cheape. As if the disposition of seasons were in thy power, oh Duke! or if the earth should desire to be watered with mans blood, to become fertile.

The Towne of Mer was spoiled ten dayes together. Beaupais a Minister of the Church F hanged, some men slaine, some women being rauished did, some of them in the hands of them that rauished them, others of grieue soone after. The foresaid decree was published euery Sunday in places depending on the Parliament. It was a meanes to arme theech, vagabonds, villanes, leud and idle persons: it made the plough-man to leaue the plough and the crafts-man to shur vp his shop: to conclude, it did change the multitude into Tygers and Lyons, and fether them against their owne Countrymen. A troop of these rascals fall vpon Ligneul, hang some men, pull out a Ministers eyes, and then burne him. Another company runnes vpon the marches of Comeri, Elle-Bouchart, Loches, Aizé they burne, and and the neighbour places, beating downe and murdering men, women, and children.

Those of Tours were seized of the towne, but having spared the images no more then the rest, the Duke of Montpensier comes in July, and summons them to yeeld. They had no means to keepe the towne, nor the Prince of Conde to succour them. So they make three Ensignes of foot, and two Cornets of horse, and ioyned with them of Chinon, and Chastelleraud, making a troop of a thousand men of warre. This was but a fire of straw: feuen or eight companies of men at armes, and some cornets of light-horse of the Earle Villars, charge and ouerthrow them, kill some, and carry others prisoners to Chastelleraud: some recover Poitiers, others which had yeelded themselves at the first in this defeat, being sent back to Tours with passports, fell out of Scylla into Charybdis. The multitude receives them disarmed, and beats them downe. About three hundred recover the gates of Tours with running, hoping to find a Sanctuary at their houses. But the people arme, and murder most of these amazed men, cast their bodies into Loire, massacre their companions remaining within the towne, sacke their lodgings, and in this furious liberty, die the River with the blood of their fellow-Citizens, men, women, and children. Chauniguy armes, and by his presence doth countenance this popular insolvency. Bourgeau President of Tours, no Protestant, but onely suspected to fauour their partie, had redeemed his life out of the hands of Clermaux, Lieutenant to Chauniguy, for three hundred crownes, and a basin of silver, but in the end, being murdered with stauces and swords, hanged by the feet, his head in the water vnto the brest, they open his belly, tear out his bowels, and cast them into the river, and placing his heart vpon the top of a Lance, they carry it through the towne, crying: Behold the President of the Huguenots heart. The Duke Montpensier arises, and by gibbets, wheels, and other tortures, plays the last act of this vnciuill Tragedie. The Protestants of Poitiers, being masters of the towne, did not forget to beat downe Images.

A horrible cruelty.

Poitiers.

The Earle of Villars, and the Marshall Saint Andre besiege them. Saint Gemme commanding there for the Prince of Conde, sustaines a furious assault, making the assailants to determine of a retreat, when as Pineau Capitaine of the Castle, practised by the assailants, giues them a signe to returne: he shoots against them that were at the gate, and forced them to leaue the defence. The gate being thus wonne, they come to fight for the market places. The Protestants began now to yeeld to the victors force, when as Mangot a Capitaine of Lodun breaking the lockes of Saint Cyprians gate, makes a way for the Citizens and Souldiers to saue themselves, leaueing the towne and country about, subiect to all the insolvency incident to a country of conquest. Cornellin a Scottish Capitaine, escapes from Poitiers with his troop, and to suppress the peasants fury, greedy of blood and spoile, he layes an ambush, and then he cunningly ioynes with them, and by this stratagem, takes from them all desire to assemble together againe for the like effect. The vnrstrained liberty of armes, made the strongest of all sides to seize vpon their townes, thinking delays to breed danger. But alas, how many pitifull Catastrophes grew by these inciuill and fatall tumults: Rouen was not the last to make tryall thereof.

The first siege of Rouen.

The fifteenth of April 1562, the Protestants seize vpon the towne, enter the Churches tumultuously, beat downe and ruine reliques, images and altars, in about fifty parishes, abbeys and religious houses: the exercise of the Catholique Religion furceased, and the Court of Parliament retired to Louviers. During these broiles, the Duke of Aumale comes as the Kings Lieutenant Generall. Villebon Bailiffe of Rouen, seizeth vpon Pont de Larches, the Baron of Clere, on Caudbec: and so blocke vp Rouen both aboue and beneath the River: the Magistrate ceaseth to administer iustice, the Merchant his trafficke, and the handicraftsman shuts vp his shop: heauy foretellings of a horrible confusion to come. Many difficulties did now presse them of Rouen, when as Mornuillies coming from the Prince of Conde, and slipping cunningly by water into the towne, provides for the souldiers disorders, and for the guard of Saint Katharines fort, prolonging the hope of the besieged. The Duke of Aumale assailes the fort, and tires them with daily skirmishes, but most fatal for himselfe: he loseth at the first charge an hundred men, and the besieged Saints Agnan and Languesot braue Captaines, at the second a great number of men, and two Ensignes carried into the towne. The eleventh of Iuly, the Duke giues a generall assault, and so furious as three Ensignes of the enemies planted vpon the rampier, did so inflame the courage of the besieged, as they ouerthrow both Ensignes and men, pursued them to their campe, and

A and forced them to dislodge the night following, in confusion, with losse of their viuals, munition and baggage, to goe and reuenge the dishonor lately receiued at Rouen, by the taking of Ponteau de Merand and Honfleur. Mornuillies content to haue preserued Rouen, at this time; retires to his house, and leaues the charge to the Earle of Montgomery, called by them of Rouen out of base Normandy. About the end of September, the King, the Queen, and the King of Nauarre come to the army, consisting of sixteene thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides Reistres and Lanqueters: five dayes are spent in skirmishes, but with most advantage to the besieged. The first day, most part of the souldiers goe to refresh themselves within the towne. A Capitaine named Lewis, who had intelligence with the enemy, giues them aduice. They runne hotly to the assault (during these skirmishes, they had made a breach in the wall with five or six hundred Cannon shot) they kill many good souldiers, many pioners, eight and twenty women, and take the place: but with the losse of Lewis his life, slaine by one of his souldiers as he did helpe the assailants to mount. A worthy reward for so notable a treachery. Three hundred Burgeses did runne to the defence: but the fury of the assault caried some to their graues, and others to prison, and made the way easie for the taking of the Bulwarke of Martinville, and the Fort of Montgomery. The thirteenth of October a hot assault was giuen against the town from the morning vntill night, and many men on both sides slaine. The next day, about eleuen of the clocke, they renew the assault, and plant three Ensignes vpon the rampier of Saint Hilary. Montgomery repels them, and driues them backe beyond the trench, killing of his enemies about eight hundred men, and losing of his party, foure or five hundred men, women, and children.

The second siege.

The fort taken.

The King of Nauarre slaine.

The next day was fatal to the King of Nauarre. If I may (saide he to a Nobleman) escape from this siege, I will neuer carry armes more for this quarrell. A certaine fore-telling of the mischief that followes vs, doth commonly touch our hearts. Having visited the trenches, and dined neere vnto the wall without the battery, he was shot in the shoulder as he made water: the bullet being drawne out too late by the Surgeons, and his wound inflamed by his voluptuousnesse, accompanied with a Fever, he gaue his soule to God the seuenteenth day of Nouember following, as we haue said before. In the meane time, the battery continues, many thousands of shot beat downe diuers towers, many Mynes play without effect. The fourth assault was more auailable, the 26 of October. Thereby the assailants win the breach at the port Saint Hilary, they enter in troop, and kill all they encounter, force houses, rauish wiues and maids, and commit all as ordinary in the like accidents. Montgomery vnable to withstand this last violence, saues himselfe in a galley with such as could get in, the rest remaining in prey were spoiled, slaine, drowned, and made prisoners. The Parliament returns three dayes after the taking of the towne, and at their first sitting the President of Mandreuille lost his head: Sogence and Bertheneuille Councillors, and Marlorat a Minister, were hanged, and the next day five Captaines, and diuers Burgeses of the towne. Moreouer, enuy and hatred amidst these popular furies brought in question the Seigneur of Anthor, chief President, and Boisfeger the Kings Aduocate, being Catholics, but enemies to sedition, and wise politicians. In ciuill tumults, the vulgar doth commonly take for essentiall markes of Religion, the insolvency and excesse, which fury and the sufferance of the Magistrate doth suggest.

Rouen taken.

Diepe yielded.

And taken againe.

Diepe serued for a retreat to many Protestant Families, but the ouerthrow of some troops which Briquevaux sent to Montgomery for a supply, and the taking of Rouen, terrified most part of the inhabitants, who being pressed by Aumale and Villebon, were content to yeeld, and to cease the exercise of their religion. Ricardville and Bacqueville had the government: the former of the Castle, the other of the towne. But how many Captaines by indiscretion haue lost both liues and places: Ricardville going out of the castle to see his horses, is slaine, and suddenly the castle is seized on by Caserville and Capitaine Gaston, who going from thence into the towne, take Bacqueville, and restore the exercise of the Protestants Religion vnder the government of La Curie.

Montgomery laboured with all his power to maintaine to Protestants in base Normandy, but he had the Duke of Estampes and Maignon to encounter him. In May, hee had taken Vire, beaten downe the images, and caried away the reliques. The last of Iuly, the Catholics awaked at this first rumour, surprize the Protestants coming from the preaching, reuenge their losses by the death of some, and hurting of others. About the end of August, La Moth, Tibergean, Aunais and Deschamps, sent by Montgomery with six score horse, surpris'd the towne, and spoile both it and the country. The fourth of September the Duke of Estampes comes with eleven corners of horse, they force the towne, kill Aunais, take the Cattle, slay two hundred men that were fled into it, ravish and kill women and children. Tibergean, and many others ransomed their lives: so as generally there was nothing but taking and re-taking of townes, with most cruell and incivill stratagems.

New-hauen delivered to the English.

Britany.

The Vidam of Chartres, and Beauvoir la Noelle his brother in law, having assured themselves of New-hauen, the Vidam going into England, treated with the Queene to succor the Protestants: and for assurance of her men and money, delivered the said place into her hands, with protestation, as well by him, as by the Queene, no way to prejudice the Kings soveraigne authority, nor the estate of the Realm. And shee shall shortly yeeld it without any difficulty. According to the treaty, there arises six thousand English in Normandy, vnder the Earle of Warwicke, and are dispersed in Rouen, Diepe, and New-hauen. After the taking of Rouen, the Reingraue brought his Reistres before New-hauen: but his violence prevailed as little, as fifty thousand crownes did, with a collar of the Order, and a company of men at armes entreated, which the Queene Mother promised to Beauvoir to corrupt him to yeeld vp the town. Britanie continued vnder the moderate government of the Duke of Estampes, both for that the Queene Mother liued in suspence, and entertained both parties, as also for that the factions of Normandy had drawne away the worst affected. Those of Guienne, Languedoc, and other places, made warre against the Images and Altars, ministring occasion to shed the blood of liuely images at Grenade, Castelnauary, and Cahors, where above six score Protestants assembled to heare the preaching, were slaine. On the other side, Bury and Montluc (scourges to the Protestants) reuenged the beating downe of Images throughout all Guienne, with infinite murders, and lamentable spoiles, Duras having abandoned the protection thereof, vpon a commandement which he had receiued from the Prince of Conde, to bring him forces to Orleans, which succeeded ill for him, as we shall see.

Bury and Montluc did runne vp and downe the country to crosse the Protestants designs: and those of Bourdeaux (having too slackly proceeded in an enterprise made against the towne and castles) caused the Parliament to search their houses, and to put them to death, who had not in time retired themselves vnder Duras Ensignes. Montluc incensed especially against them of Agen, tryed all his wits, to bring them vnder his power and command. He had against him the L. of Memy Generall of the war for the Protestants in Guienne and the neighbour country, a sickly man, and not greatly practised in such affaires: for if he had made benefit of the great forces which he had at his command, and would haue beleueed Arpajon and Marchastel, he might in shew haue cut Montluc in pieces, being much weaker of men, who knowing the carriage of his aduersary, wearied him with daily courtes and alarms, to the contempt of the Protestants, which fell into his hands, as he himselfe doth vaunt in his Commentaries, a true portrait and table where we may reade at large the horrible desolations chanced in those countries during the first troubles. In the end, those of Agen seeing their towne vnable to resist the Cannon, make a troop of about six hundred men, and retire for the most part to the castle of Penne committed by Duras to Capitaine Liouran. The next day, the common people of Agen troop together, spoile and kill all they meet: Bury and Montluc flye thither, they execute many prisoners, and such as were absent they hang in picture. Duras not able to diuert this heauy accident, takes the way of Quercy, wins Lauette by force, kills six hundred three score and seven men, amongst the which, nine score and fourteene Priests were found slaine, without any respect of their Order, through this detestable wastlike insolvency. For a counter-change, Montluc comes to bessege the castle of Penne, forceth the place after the death of Liouran, puts man, woman, and child to the sword, and (continuing the course of his prosperity) takes and sacks Castelnau, Marmande, S. Macaire, Bazas, Tonneins, Port S. Mary, Villeneuve of Agenois, the Castle of Duras, and Montlegur, leaving bloody trophies of an vncivill and pitifull victory.

Lezouze.

Lezouze, the chiefe towne of Armagnac, was at the Prince of Condes deuotion. Burgole a Capitaine of Bearne and a Catholike commanded there: who by the taking of Sauterac of Gaure, of Larromien, and of Tarraube, had assured the Protestants of his constant

A stant affection to their party. Montluc sends Capitaine Pierrot his sonne to suppress Bugle. Pierrot treats with Bugle, and reapes the fruits which follow by his parlee. Capitaine Mesmes led two hundred souldiers to fortifie Lezouze: Bugle caught them to stay vpon the way, vnder colour to send them a guard to make their passage easie. And to this intent he speedily sends to field three hundred men at armes, and five and forty Argoletiers, and himselfe leads other troops of foot to Tarraube, that by the weakening of Lezouze, Pierrot might haue meanes with his men at armes, to stop the returne of the troops of Tarraube to Lezouze, and by the same stratagem cuts off the passage for Capitaine Mesmes, leaving him in prey at Roquebrune a poore village, from whence he passed through his enemies, being four or five to one, and retired into Bearne. Moreover, although Tarraube were vnfurnished of meale and water, yet he kept his foot-men therein, that being besieged, they might more easily be at Pierrots mercy, as it afterwards fell out. And to fill vp the measure of his treacheries, soone after the yeelding vp of Tarraube, hee with a brother of his followed Pierrots Ensignes, and against his plight faith, he beheld him to cut in pieces two hundred thirty one prisoners at Tarraube, hang some, and ransom many. Montluc advertised hereof, assembles the Commons with six companies of foot, besiegeth Lezouze, makes a breach, gives an assault in foure places. Brimont gives him the repulse, hauing not with him above an hundred souldiers, a weak number, the which induced him in the end (together with the Q. of Nauars treaty, to whom the town belonged) to depart by composition. Now we must perform our promise touching the exploits of Duras in Guienne: with the first forces he had gathered together, he tried to assure Bourdeaux: but having failed of his designe, he chose the country betwixt the river of Garonne and Dordogne, to re-view his troops. S. Macaire gaue him bullets as he passed in stead of victuals, and kills some of his men. He is offended therewith, assaults the towne, forceth it, and takes his reuenge of the former outrage. Bury and Montluc pursue him, (they knew well that hauing slaine him, all Guienne vnfurnished of a Commander, would be at their discretion:) they over-tooke him neere to Rozan, and charge him at their aduantage, being abandoned by the most part of his company, which were vwarlike, and not capable of discipline. This first checke was sufficient to abandon all: yet the cause whereof he had taken the defence, did summon him once more to trie the hazard of armes. He gathers together what hee can, assembles new forces, takes the way of Agenois and of Quercy, helps them of Agen, reuengeth his injuries vpon Lauferie, as we haue heard, marcheth towards S. Antonin, and there fortifies himselfe with two companies of foot, led by Marchastel. His meaning was to goe into Languedoc, and to ioyne with the Lord of Crusol: But the Earle of Rochefoucault inuities him to the succour of Orleans, and for a guard, sends him Bordet, a valiant Gentleman of Xaintonge, with sixty horse, two hundred Argoletiers, and two Ensignes of foot. These troops consisting of about five thousand men, horse and foot, march to Montauban, there they receiue men, munition, and artillery, and so turne to Xaintonge: in the way they force the Castle of Marcues, take the Bishop of Cahors, and threaten to hang him as the author of a massacre made of the Protestants within his Diocesse: five or six souldiers made satisfaction for this offence by their deaths.

A great error.

Bordet had a spleene against them of Sarlat: they had in this passage slaine two of his Gentlemen. So at his perswasion Duras encampes before it the first of October. Bury and Montluc flye to succour it with a great number of horse, and some eight thousand foot. Duras raiseth the siege, and to lodge at ease, diuides his men into Heudreux, Ver, and other places neere: the rainy weather gaue them likewise some impression and confidence of the enemies temporizing. But they were vigilant, and fearing lesse the injury of the ayre then Duras, they came thundring vpon him. Without doubt when two armies are neere together, the first that makes his retreat giues the other an aduantage. Duras who supposed they had bene but the enemies scours, determined to retire softly, and to lodge his men in safety: when as Bury and Montluc seeing him retire, charge him behind, and finding very small resistance, kill five or six hundred of his souldiers, charge home to the artillery and baggage, kill 1500 seruants, & hang some prisoners, especially Ministers that followed the troops. But the booty qualifying the victors heart, gaue leisure to the first that fled, to set wings to their feet, and by a sudden flight to prolong their liues for some daies: for the most part of them that escaped, were taken againe, and led to Agen, and there hanged on a gibbet set vp expressly, which they called the Consistory.

The battell of Ver, and the second defeat of Duras.

Bergerac.

Bartels are variable, and he is no Merchant that was alwayes, saith the Proverb. Duras gathers together some remainders of this shipwracke, and advertised that Lamoussiere a Capitaine lent by Sanjac to overthrow him quite, did attend him at Embonnet with five hundred men, hee marcheth directly against his enemy, surpriseth him at the breake of day, cuts in pieces both the Capitaine and his fouldiers, reserving three only to cary newes vnto Sanjac, and by this foule slaughter, reuengeth the disgrace which he had lately received : then most of his troops being gone, some to Rochel, some elsewhere, and hauing no man of command remaining, but his eldest sonne, Berdet, Puch, and his brother, with about forty Carabines, and eightene hundred fouldiers, halfe disarmed (his horsemen being gone before, and ioynted with Rochefoucault) hee recovered Orleans and there died vpon the conclusion of the peace. Through the absence of Duras the Protestants estate in Guienne was very lamentable, their bodies and goods left to the discretion of their enemies. Piles a Gentleman of Gascony, hearing of the outrages which Bury and Montluc committed without controule, parts from Orleans (hee came with the troops which Grandmont brought out of Gascony) and surmounting a world of difficulties, in the end hee recouers his house neere vnto Bergerac, and notwithstanding the garison which the Duke of Montpensier had left there, he opens the prisons, and sets all them at liberty that were committed for matter of religion, and then retires to his house.

This new and bold attempt puts the Country into armes : all rise against Piles, who forced to yeeld to violence, withdrawes himselfe, being followed by fifteene horse, and fifteene Harguebuziers on foot : at Montagnac hee surpriseth a Corner of sixscore light horse, commanded by Montcaussin, hee kills their Leader, with foureene others, and puts the rest to rout; and by means of the horse which he recovered there, of good fouldiers hee made profitable men at armes. Piles had left la Riviere about Bergerac, a young gentleman, who (wedding the practice of armes to the study of the Lawes, from which hee was newly returned) became as soone a braue Capitaine, as a resolute souldier : for his first stratagem, hauing suddenly trooped together some twenty fouldiers, and a good number of peasants with flauies, he surpriseth Sainte Roy vpon Dordonne by scalade, cuts the Corps de gard in pieces that was set in the market place, and commanding in the streets many and sundry things, as if he had beene followed by seven or eight hundred men, hee slew Rexas one of Montluc Captaines, his Lieutenant, his Prouost, with fourescore of his fouldiers, and became absolute master of the place. Bury and Montluc chafing at this disgrace, received by an Apprentise in warre, lodge many troops betwixt Bergerac and Sainte Foy. But la Riviere hauing forced through the troop of Capitaine Salé, and a Squadron of horse, made his retreat, passed the Riuier of Dordonne in safety, and went with his troop to ioyne with Capitaine Piles. Vpon the way, beheld a band of fouldiers encounter him being faire from his men, and as he enquired newes of Piles, they overthrow, hurt, and take him. But passing ouer a bridge hee casts himselfe into the water, recouers the contrarie banke, and so saues himselfe at Hymet, a towne of Agenois, whereas Piles prepared for the surprize of Mucidan, the which Montluc thinking to take from him about the end of Ianuary 1563, by means of the Seneschall of Perigord, hee left the vnderaker consumed in his designe, and his troops put to flight. This successe giues courage to Piles : he attempts against Bergerac, and at the second charge enters it the 12 of March, putting three Corps de gard to the sword, and all such as could not in time recouer the Castle. The next day a tower being vndermined, hauing smothered them that were within it, the Castle vnfurnished of munition, yeelds at the victors discretion, who puts them all to the sword. Ah cruell and more then inciuill warre ! What worse vylage could wee expect of strangers and barbarous people, whose inhumanity we willingly abhorre : and doe wee not tremble at the effusion of our Country-mens blood ? In the Countries of Angoulmois and Coignac, the Seigneur of Mirron, by many murders, ranfomings, and robberies, ranshuffing of wiuies and maids, and other oppressions which the war doth vually bring forth, reuenged the excesss the Protestants had committed, in beating downe the images at Angouleme. In Xaintonge, Count Rochefoucault maintained their affaires, but the taking of Poitiers before described, & the defeat of Duras, caused the Protestants to be spoiled at Xaintes by Capitaine Mogere, and the exercise of their religion to be abolished at Rochel, and the neighbour Ilands, by the Duke of Montpensier. But alas, all these disorders and bloody confusions do not counteruaile the horrible furies of Tholouza, & other places of the

A the Parliament of Languedoc. Tolouza is one of the greatest and best peopled cities of the Realme, and at that time the Protestants numbered about five and twenty thousand persons of their Religion, of all qualities, ages, and sexes. After the publication of the Edict of Ianuary, matters passed with great moderation vntill April. A little sparkle doth soone kinde a fire of sedition : and a small cause thrusts the seditious into furie, especially if the Magistrate (ordained rather to restrain the bloody-minded) doth countenance their insolencies. The buriall of a dead body was the Prologue to a horrible Tragedie, whereof the first act was played in the suburbs of Saint Michael, Saint Stephen, and S. Saluador : and so passed the wals, and put all the City into a mournfull confusion. The B Parliament did winke at it, but the Capitols being more modest, employed their authority to quench these first flames, which must needs put all their State in combustion : foure of the most seditious being hanged, and two whipt, did make some satisfaction for the blood and death of such as were wounded, slaine, and cast into Wels. This pursuit makes the people mad. The Protestants, to warrant their liues, and to saue themselves by some good capitulation, seize on a gate, and vpon the Towne-house. The Parliament stormes, calls in the Nobility, assembles the commons, giues authority to their furious armes, and by a generall proclamation, both within the City and abroad, commands them to arme, and to fall vpon the Huguenots, with warrant from the Pope, the King, and the Court of Parliament. Then they kill, they fill the prisons, they massacre many. When they find no holes to hold them, the riuier is heaped vp with carcasses : they cast them aliue out of the windowes, and if they labour to recouer the bankes, they beat them downe with stones and staues. The Protestants shut vp in the Towne-house, and hauing no other hope but to despair of life, resolute to sell their liues dearly. They had Cannon, and with the thunder thereof amaze their enemies, they make many sallies with great effusion of blood on either side. They treat an accord with them : they demand an assurance of their liues and goods, with the obseruation of the Edict. It is rejected : and so this vnciuill and fatal combat continued many dayes. In the end, the 16 of May they grant them, To retire in safety, leauing their armes in the Towne-house. They goe forth towards night. But oh confusion ! it is the best expedient to disarm an enemy with dispensation of conscience, with whom they will keepe no faith. At their going forth they imprison such as they can lay hand on, the rest escape by the gate which they held : some, recouer Montauban, or other places of their partie, others are subiect to the mercy of the peasants and fouldiers lying in the fields. So as about three thousand five hundred persons (saith the Originall) lost their liues in this mutiny.

The Catholiques are now absolute masters of the City : they beat downe the Protestants Temple, and foure dayes together they kill, imprison, and spoile. These broiles and popular tumors haue oftentimes confounded the authors themselves, and the spoile of rich houses is a very dangerous and attractive bait. The Parliament knowes it well, and begins now to feare, lest the insolency of such, to whom they had giuen liberty, should fall vpon themselves. They therefore leaue a sum of money to content the companies, and to void the towne of them. So Montluc and Terrides march against Montauban, Fouqueneux against Beziers, Mirepoix the younger against Limoux. The Court hauing the gouernment without controule, displace two and twenty Councillors that were least partiall, and most suspected with some chiefe men : condemne prisoners, and from the end of May vnto February following, they execute by diuers manners, foure hundred persons.

This massacre of Tolouza, that of Gaillac in Albigeois against eightscore persons, and the approach of Bury and Montluc, had so amazed the inhabitants of Montauban, as they abandon the towne : but the taking of Agen, and the troubled Estate of Bourdeaux (as we haue heard) called away both of them for this time. In the meane time, Arpajon and Marschall putting two thousand men into Montauban, had put new courage into them, when as newes comes that Montluc and Terrides came to besiege them with a thousand horse, and five thousand foot : the which made the Capitaines take a new resolution to goe to Orleans : the people are amazed, feare driues many out in confusion, the drum sounds, they issue forth tumultuously, forsake the towne, and abandon the gates. But which was the better expedient, either to die in defence of their houses and families, or to fall into the hands of the enemy, from whom they might expect no mercy ? The most part being surprised in the fields, were forced to yeeld their throats to their swords that pursued them, others brought to Toloufa ended their liues vpon sundry gibbets: the Capitaines and some few others recovered the towne. The 24. of May, Montluc arrie armies, but being content with some skirmishes, and to haue wasted the come, hee retired to make a greater leape. He returns in September following, with nine companies of men at armes, a great number of voluntary Gentlemen, five and twenty Ensignes of foot, foure companies of Argoletiers, and three of Spaniards, which made twelue hundred men, and thirteene peeces of Artillery. The partie was stronger on either side then at the first, for Duras and Marchastel were entred, vnder hope to lead both the companies and Cannon to Orleans. So as Montluc hauing lost some six hundred men in diuers skirmishes, and refused to fight with Duras, who offered him battell, he retired the second time.

Three pieces of Montauban.

Then Duras and Marchastel leading away the troops, vnsupplied the towne of two great Cannons, and two field Pieces, the which were afterwards lost in the battell of Ver. Montluc aduertised of the estate of Montauban by Fontraine, one of the Capitaines of the towne, hastens thither, offers a scalado, and giues the alarme in three parts. Two hundred recouer the first curtaine, being followed by the two Ensignes of Bazourdan. Laboria borne in the towne and a Capitaine there, beats them back, and with the slaughter of two hundred of their men, forceth them to leave their attempt to winne it by force. The thirteenth of October, they batter it with nine peeces of Artillery, and continuing vntill the 22. of the moneth, he beats downe a piece of the wall. Bazourdan will needs discouer the breach: but being shot in about the left pap, he could not returne with any newes. The next day they giue a furious assault: the more courageously the assailants presse them, the more resolutely the assailed defend themselves, men, women, and children, eury one in his place. Oftentimes they obtaine that vnder the Foxes skinn, which the Lyon cannot effect. Laboria might doe much to draw the Inhabitants to composition. Terrides promiseth him the government of the Towne, vnder the Kings authority, and three companies entertained. He accepts this offer. But his new proceeding brings him presently into suspect, so as hauing no more credit, and the Citizens resolute not to giue eare to any Capitulatation with men, who hauing (say they) no faith, cannot keepe it with any. Laboria followed by his Sergeant, retires himselfe to Terrides campe: from that time vntill the fifth of April, being the day of the publication of the peace, the siege passed in assaults, sallies, and skirmishes, wherein the besiegers lost about two thousand men, with a great number of Capitaines and worthy Gentlemen without any profit.

Carcassonne, Castelnau d'Arny, Reuel, and Limoux were partakers of these disorders. The Protestants of Carcassonne had their exercise in the suburbs. The 16. of March, 1563 the Catholikes hauing taken view of foure or five thousand men, giue an alarm to the protestants assembled in the suburbs: they made them leave the place at the sound of their Cannon, drums and trumpets: they pursue them, kill, hurt, hang, and ransom them. Castelnau d'Arny was subiect to the like fortune, about fifty persons were murdered with the like fury and popular tumult. Those of Reuel hearing of the confusion at Toloufa, saved themselves at Castres, and elsewhere, leaving their families and goods to the mercy of theesues and robbers. Some being apprehended by vertue of a commission granted by the Parliament, were led to Toloufa, and condemned, some to the gallies, others were fined, and some banished. At Limoux they had an aduantage over the Catholikes: but Pomas being entred with tenne companies, and eight hundred Bandaliers, Spaniards for the most part, and the Marshall of Mirpoix being sent by the Parliament, the towne was subiect to the will of the stronger, and suffered the ordinary insolencies of conquerours, spoiles, murders and rapes. He that sees his neighbours house on fire should looke to his owne. So the Protestants of Beziers aduertised of the murder of Fassy, draw some souldiers vnto them, and ruine the images in all the Churches. Beaudin chiefe of the Protestants F troops assisted them, and by the taking of Magalas and Espignan, strong places which did much annoy Beziers, assured the towne to their party. Joyeuse followed by 5000 men, and 12 peeces of artillery, crossed their attempts, and hauing at the second assault forced Lezignan, and taking Montagnac by composition, he tooke the way to Pezenas. Beaudin comes against him, and might easily haue defeated him, but five hundred Crownes, which the Master of his Campe had receiued of Joyeuse, with promise of a thousand more, made him lose about six-score Souldiers, and by the rout of his companies, opened

A opened the gates of Pezenas to Joyeuse. Beziers was ready to receiue a law from him: but the sacke and murder of their neighbours, and the feare of the like vlsage, made them to shut their gates against him, and to goe to field, to force and burne Lignan, with the defeat of two companies that kept it: and then to surprize Seruian, to force the Garison of Cafouls, scale Villeneuve neuere vnto Beziers, and so to preserue themselves vntill the publication of the peace.

Beaucaire feared the like vlsage to Limoux: they therefore obtaine two companies from Nismes. J. Perap a Beauuoisin, with Sernus and Bouillargues led them, they assure the town and castle, ruine images and altars, and then retire, leauing a company for the safety of B their companions. To encounter them, the Catholiques by twy-light bring in a great number of souldiers attired like peasants, and in the night open the gates to fifteene or sixteene hundred men, who coming from Tarafon, separated onely by the Rhone, made their conning famous by blood and spoile. The Protestants recouer the castle, and speedily call backe Sernus and Bouillargues, who returned to Nismes. They turne head: Sernus enters into the castle, and so descending into the towne, surprizeth his enemies, kills a great number, and pardons such as laying downe their armes craue mercy. Bouillargues coming from the rescue of the booty which they caried away, and weary with killing them that fled, he likewise enters into the towne, and puts all to the sword that hee encounters. Thus Beaucaire remained in the Protestants hands, vntill the Edict of peace.

C The like feare troubled them of Montpellier. The proceedings at Toloufa and other places amazed them: they fortifie themselves, raze the suburbs, in a manner as great as the towne, beat downe thirty Churches, and by these ruines make themselves able to sustaine a siege which threatened them. The enemy discharged his choller vpon certaine shot lodging in an old tower ill flanked, a league from the towne, who hauing yeelded to haue their liues saved, were notwithstanding slaine as they came forth. The like chance fell vpon the Capitaine, and twenty souldiers that were in Maguelone, and descreedly, according to the diuine iustice, haueing treacherously fled the Castle. At that time the Lords of Suze and Sommerie, the chiefe of the Catholikes army in Languedoc, had passed the Rofne with about three thousand foot, foure hundred Masters, and three Cannons, with D an intent to besiege Saint Giles, a small towne vpon the Rhone. Beaudin vpon this aduice, parts from Montpellier, he speedily assembles six hundred horse, and eight hundred foot, vnder the command of Bouillargues, Albenas, and Grille: he is aduertised by some prisoners of a disorder in the enemies campe: he marcheth towards them, and chargeth presently. Suze and Sommerie turne their backs, their Capitaines and Souldiers are amazed and run away: Bouillargues followes them that flye: not one makes resistance. Grille falls out like wife, and both jointly doe kill, what by the sword, and water, 2000 men, and win all their baggage, being richly furnished, as to a certaine victory, with two Cannons, (the Culuerin beinge sunke in the Riuer of Rhone) 22 Ensignes, and the Colonels guidon. This victorie makes them proud, and Grille contemning the aduice which was giuen him, suffered E himselfe within a few dayes after to be surprised and taken at Arenasses, to lose an hundred or fix-score souldiers, his troops to be put to flight towards Lunel, Mauguet, and Sommiere, and had it not bene for the arrival of Beaudin, who freed him, hee had remained a trophie to his enemy.

In the meane time Joyeuse (seeing the plague to waste his men daily) retires from the Campe before Montpellier: it was rather to free the inhabitants from ialousie. He had practised certaine intelligences within the town, but the iustice of God brought two of the chiefe Merchants to be a spectacle vpon a scaffold for other crimes: who hauing confessed the treason, euen as the sword hung ouer their heads, ended Joyeuse's practices with their liues.

F His attempts vpon Agde were as fruitlesse, and much more preiudiciall vnto him: for being repulled by Sanglas from a scalado, and two assaults, Bouillargues cut off two hundred and seuentie of his men in his retreat, hauing diuided them into three bands. Hee drew three hundred Catholiques lodged within Avanton, into an ambuscado, slue the most part of them, and soone after seized on Saint Laurent in the Comtat, hee chased five and thirty Italian Lanciers, three score Argoletiers, and a company of foot. But the course of his prosperity was somewhat stayed by the death of Rays, Guidon of his company, and of Capitaine Aisse, who kept the tower of Carboniere seated in the Marshes of Aiguefmortes, and did wonderfully molest the said towne, it being surprized in an Ambuscado, and they slaine the twelfth of Nouember. The death of these men was recompensed with the slaughter of fourescore, surprized and slaine by them of Montpellier, within Bourg, a small towne vpon Rhone, besides a great number that were drowned seeking to save themselves by the said River. This happy successe inuited them to new attempts. A company of the enemies lodged in Agnane, and spoiled the Countrey. Rapin Governor of Montpellier, being followed by five hundred shot, and Gremians troop of horse, awaked them in the night, about Christmas, surprized some asleepe; others in their shirts, slue the greatest number, and brought the rest prisoners to Montpellier. The yeare ended with the taking of Saint Paul and Damiette, separated by the river of Agout, besieged, battered, and within three dayes taken from the Protestants by Pierot Sonne to Montluc, with great slaughter. A Gascon Captaine having slaine a Priest of purpose or otherwise, made them beleue it was the Minister: within few dayes after hee went to Castres, where the Protestants had still the better during these inciuill troubles. Let vs briefly looke into the Provinces of Vinazere, Rouergue, Givaudan and the Countrey of Foix. In April the Protestants of Nonnay become masters of the towne, beginning presently to beat downe images: they opened and publicly burnt the relike which they call of Holy vertues. Doubtlesse, if man could iudge by the present what would after chance, he would restraîne his passions. For the interchange of worldly things suffers most offences at length to find a reuenge. The towne was vnfurnished of armes, and Sarra their gouernor (threatened with a siege) goes forth the 22 of October: the next morning hee comes at the breake of day to Saint Etienne in Forrest (the abundance of armes and harnesse that is forged there, makes the towne famous) sets fire to the Gates, and takes and packes vp such armes as he needed. But oh man! remember that thou shalt bee measured with the same measure wherewith thou hast measured thy neighbour, and whilest thou doest loiter and linger behind with thy souldiers to search houses for the goodliest armes and the fairest women, thou givest thine enemy leisure to prepare thee a potion full of bitterness. Saint Chaumont sent by the Duke of Nemours (who then made warre in Lionnois) encounters him, chargeth and takes him prisoner, huits and kills about six-score men of his troop: and from that time those of Nonnay lay open to many outrages. He gathers the commons together, besiege the towne, waite both men, armes, and a Commander: he enters, sheds as much blood as he pleaseth, spoiles it, fires it, and burnes two and twenty houses: then vpon a brute of the Baron of Adretz approach with stronger and greater forces, hee dislodgeth without Trumpet, and seemes rather to flee then retire.

Vinazere and others.

The first taking of Nonnay.

About the end of the yeare, Saint Martin, by the commandement of the Lord of Crussol, and the Cardinall of Chastillon, then Gouvernors of Guienne and Dauphiné, vnder the Prince of Condes authority, came to Nonnay, repaired the ruines, and provided for the defence thereof, leaving Captaine Proff, le Mas, and Mongroff there. S. Chaumont flies thither with foure thousand men, but vnfit to force places well furnished, hee treats with the Citizens, offers an honest composition as well for themselves as for their strangers. They accept it, the strangers depart, and the same night S. Chaumont causeth or suffereth his men to enter, who forgetting no kind of inhumanity, murder some, others they cast from an high tower, some they burne in their houses, many they make to leape out at the windowes, beat them downe vpon the pavement, stab them in the streets, sell prisoners by the Drum, and for want of buyers they murder them in the place, and burne the houses for want of present money to redeeme them: there were six-score by this meane burnt to ashes. And to fill vp the measure of this horrible confusion, wiuues and maides were barbarously rauished, corne and other things which could not be caried, was scattered about: the heads of wine-vessels beaten out, the wals for the most part beaten downe to the ground, the towers dismantled, and the gates caried away. Bonlieu a small towne neere vnto Nonnay, did accompany it in this lamentable desolation.

The second taking.

In Rouergue, Valsergues one of *Montluc*s Lieutenants, and Captaine of the Garison of Villefranche, hauing wonderfully oppressed the Protestants of that place, and the Nobility of Rouergue, those of Villeneufue, Perrouffe, Froissac, Saignac, la Guepie, Elpailon, Saint Afrique, those of Bressol, Compeyre, Millau, Saint Felix, Cornus, and of Pont Camates, resolved to defend themselves, and by their constant resolution had made frustrate their enemies attempts, if two of their Captains had not by their ouerthrow shaken their

A. their affaires. About thirty men led by Peigre, going out of Millau to refresh Compeyre, besieged by Pessin and others, were cut in pieces, their leader led to Toloufa, was at the instance of the Cardinall of Armagnac quartered aliue. And Saignac, hauing failed in an enterprise he had vpon Villefranche, was inuited in the castle of Granes, where for want of water, hee was forced to accept his life to be saued, and theirs that followed him, being about a hundred souldiers: notwithstanding all but six or seuen were put to the sword.

The Protestants fell like wafe vpon Givaudan, those of Ceuennes, entering into Quesac, burnt the Image of our Ladie, and made a booty of two hundred and fourescore Markes of silver, of the reliques and ornaments of the Church being molten. But this profperitie was like a sheaf of straw, wherein they often confound themselves in their ouer-weening. Afterwards they came before Mendes, and in the end of Iuly, they enter by composition, but they suffer one Copier to change his profession of a Minister to a Captaine, to order the Treasure, and to dispose of matters of warre: who vnder this rash presumption, sends about six-score men to another enterprise, vnder the conduct of a Hosiier of Alby called La Croix, as very a noice in matters of warre, as his pretended Colonel. Treillans the younger, sends part of his men, who surpriseth them in the field, and out of order; and kills the rest of his troop, and hee with the rest of his troupe, rides directly to Mendes: hee enters without any difficulty, carries away the Gouvernour, spoiles what hee pleaseth, and leaues the rest to the discretion of other hands, who laying hold vpon Copier, make him yeeld an account of his vsurped government: notwithstanding some troops of his party rescued him within few dayes after, and brought him backe safe and found with his companions. The Province of Givaudan enioyed then some rest, when as the Barons of Guise, and Saint Vidal, Treillans and others came to molest it. They make a troupe of two thousand men in the beginning of October, to layne with Isseuzet at the siege of Montpellier: but the defeat of their men at Saint Giles, made them to change their designe, and to attempt Floras. Eight men onely commanded by Bossy a valiant souldier of Montpellier, kept it. The besiegers vye both battery, scalado, assault, mines, and parle, and get nothing but blowes. In the end a report flying of the coming of Beaudiné to succour the besieged, they raise their campe with confusion and disorder.

Marshallat, a Castle belonging to the Seigneur of Peyre a Protestant, had another issue. Coffart Gouvernour of Rocoles, besieged it in the beginning of February, and hauing taken it by treason, hee kept his faith with the souldiers like unto Granes, which then was used as a Protester in the mouthes of Protestants. Peyre afterwards incountred Coffart, slue three score and ten of his men, and recovered his house. These confusions continued still euen after the publication of Peace: for the Baron of La Fare hauing tryed by all meanes (saith the Originall) to haue a maide of excellent beauty at his pleasure, besieged Floras the fifth of Aprill. But Beaudiné making hast to succour it, preferred both the virgins chastitie, and the Citizens blood. The Lord of Filleul, Seceshall for the King of Nauarre, in the Countrey of Foix, fed the Protestants with words. The desolation of Toloufa made him to change his copy. So the Wolfe (according to the Fable) hauing sent away the dogges, doth then breake into the fold, and deuoures the sheepe at his pleasure. Hee adultereth such as hee feared among the Protestants (seeing they had beene charged with the beating downe of Images and Altars) to retire themselves: else hee should be forced to imprison them. This terrour chafeth many. Pailles entering into the towne, puts some in prison, and so terrifies others, as they were glad to leaue the towne. Of the prisoners, two were beheaded, two burnt, six hanged, six and twenty condemned to death, ten to the gallies, and the goods of them that were fled abandoned in prey to the souldiers: the other townes of the Countrey terrified with his stratagem, accepted such conditions as Pailles would prescribe them.

Onely Pamiers resisted. The towne belonged to the Queene of Nauarre, and the number of the Protestants was great. Man hath meanes to preserve himselfe from humane forces, but what harbour, what shelter can protect him from the wrath of heauen? Men make warre one against another, and two parties seeke one anothers destruction: but God with the same arme strikes both the one and the other, and it fals vpon whom hee pleaseth. The Catholikes of Pamiers seeke all meanes to oppresse the Protestants, and the the Protestants to crosse the practices of their enemies, when as a common scourge affures them both. The plague comes into the towne, and in few weekes takes away three thousand Citizens. But (a strange thing) of all this great number they did not account above fifty Protestants: so as subsisting in the midst of this mortality, and by this meanes protected from the injuries of their enemies abroad, they succour their neighbours of Castres, kill the Vicont of Seres and his brother, with the greatest part of three hundred men which he commanded, and so disperse the rest, as the way was open for them to recover their houses: where discovering a practice made by some begging Friars, to bring in Pailles and others, they made such a spoile in their Couents, as neuer after were they more seene or heard of. This bloody stratagem amazed the Priests and Chanoins. They saue themselves in the towne of Foix, where they spoile their houses and the Bishops. As one mischiefe follows another, the peace being concluded, in the beginning of May, a furious haile continuing by fits for the space of three weekes about Foix, cuts the corne and all greene things, so as there was no hope of fruit. The Commons mutine, accuse the Clergy, being fled, to be the motives of this remorse, & were ready to fall vpon them. They auoid this popular fury, and retire to Maugency.

Let vs change our Climate, and turne into Gaule Lioinois. The last of April the Protestants were seized of Lyons at two of the clocke after mid-night, without any slaughter but of two men. The Lord of Saul had the first government. Amongst many of the Princes faction which posted thither, the Baron of Adretz (a valiant man, but proud and cruell) seized on the government. The Prince sent afterwards Poncent and Changy: the first to command the horse, the last the foot.

Hereupon the Baron of S. Vidal and other Auernacs advanced, with three or foure thousand men, to wast the cuntry of Lioinois, whilst the D. of Nemours assembled an armie of Bourguignons, Auernacs, and Forensins, for the siege of Lyons. Poncent with five hundred men goes to discover them, chargeth them at the first approach, makes such a slaughter, as by their rout he ouerthrowes their designe, and pursuing his victory, neere vnto Feurs in Foret, he encounters with some troops of horse, which made against him: he chargeth them, persued them to flight, and presently forceth the towne of Feurs, where most of them that fled had faued themselves.

Des Adretz arises, who hauing resisted the forces of Sammerine, Suzé, Carres, Maugery, and others, brought some places vnder his subiection, and amongst others Montbrison the chiefe of the Prouince. But there he blemished the reputation which hee had gotten in Dauphiné, and by his cruelty did violate the lawes of humanitie, and made himselfe odious, the which plunged him into many miseries, as we shall see hereafter. One afternoon hee tooke a delight to see many prisoners leape out of the high tower of Montbrison, amongst the which there were some Gentlemen of account. Soubize comes to Lyons, being sent by the Prince of Conde, with the title of Lieutenant and Gouvernor: and did so politickely handle the violent disposition of Adretz, as he perswaded him to returne into Dauphiné, where hee did goodly exploits. But this decay of his authoritie did presently discontent the Baron: who on this first spleene laid the leuaine of a speedy reuolt.

On the other side, Tanamus, approached with five thousand French, and three thousand Italians, led by the Earle of Angoulé, not with any intent to force the towne, but to hinder the haruest and the vintage. These Italians had many goats, so as in detestation of this horrible medley, the peasants call all their goats among the Carion where they passed. The Duke of Nemours arises, with the title of the Kings Lieutenant general, and for the first fruits of his armes, he receiues Vienna vpon Rhone by composition, by the fauour of the Catholikes: hee kills few, and spoiles much. The taking of this towne shormented their victuals at Lyons. Soubize, to haue meanes to keepe the field, calls backe Adretz and the Prouençals. He brings foure or five thousand foot, and foure hundred horse.

The Duke conceiuing an assured hope of victory by the weaknesse of their horse, encounters them, puts them twice in rout neere to Beaurepaire, but with small losse: and if the conduct and resolution of Adretz, with the advantage of the place, had not fauoured him, he had then receiued a mate. Hauing speedily rallied his troopes, he incampes within two leagues of Vienna, holding the Duke of Nemours occupied with continuall skirmishes,

The siege of Lyons.

The Baron of Adretz arrives.

A misfies, whilst Soubize gathered in victuals. Hereupon a packet comming from Orleans to Soubize, falls into the hands of the Marshall of Brissac. Amongst other Letters one from the Admirall contained: That he must endure the violence of the Baron of Adretz as much as he could, lest of an insolent man he should make him mad. This was a fit expedient to put the Baron into furie. Brissac hauing presently sent S. Sernin to Nemours and Adretz, causeth them to enter into strange practices one with another. Soubize (who was alwayes vigilant both at home and abroad) and had (as the History commends him) spent largely vpon spies, discovers presently their secret intelligences, causeth the Baron to be apprehended, and by the commandement of Crussol and the Cardinal of Chastillon sends him vnder fure guard to Nismes, whereas nothing but the benefit of a peace, which presently followed, preserved him from the danger of death. Notwithstanding the Duke making his profit of the Barons practices, drawes neere to Lyons, and by sundry skirmishes cuts off their victuals. But he that undertakes too much, speeds but ill. At one instant he attempts both Romance and Valence. The whole body of his army was necessary for this designe: and whilst that he seeks to deuoure all at once, he loseth all. He tries all his wits, and employes all his deuices to vanquish Lyons, and vpon hope to be assisted by them of the towne that were of his faction, hee attempts it by scalado in diuers parts, but all in vaine. He is ill serued both within and without, and so rudely entertained by Soubize, as he must now put on another personage. He helps himselfe with the newes of the battaile of Dreux, and proclaimes this victory. But now he finds out a new practice, whereby he hopes to attaine his desire.

Mark Herlin, Receiver of the Impost at Lyons, had been taken in skirmish in the moneth of February 1563. To giue two strokes with one stone, to saue his life or his ranfome, and to mocke the Duke, he giues him to vnderstand, That hee had meanes to doe the King a notable seruice: that they had accustomed to employ him in the guard of the towne, and to trust him with many matters of weight: that if he will grant him liberty, he will watch some convenient time, to giue him entrance at Saint Iusts gate, whereby hee should bring in a sufficient number of men to make himselfe Lord of the towne. We easily beleue that which is plausible to our desires. The Duke accepts this offer: hee frees Herlin, but as if he had escaped of himselfe. Herlin comes to Lyons: imparts it to Soubize, then returns to Nemours, and appoints him the 7 of March following.

The eue before this pretended execution, Soubize plants his artillery in the night, to scoure the streets, lodgeth three or foure thousand shot in the bulwarkes, walls and houses of approach, and appoints Poncent with his troope of horse to follow them. The day being come, Nemours approacheth: they giue him a signe from a small tower. Three thousand foot enters into the suburbs of Saint Iust, and from thence advance vnto the gate, Herlin goes to meet them and brings them in. But being entred by the wicket, he suddenly shuts it. The artillery plays, and two or three hundred muskets and all the other shot discharge vpon them: Blacons, Poyet, Andefroy and Entragues pursue them with six hundred choice Harguebuziers, who defeat them quite: and if the horsemen had made speed, scarce any one had caried newes of this stratagem to his companions. Foure hundred were slaine in the suburbs, many without, and a greater number ended their liues flying to the campe at Vienna and other places. This disgrace did so trouble the Duke, as he continued two moneths sick in his bed, and in the meane time a Peace was concluded.

The first ciuill tumult in Dauphiné, was at Romans. La Mothe-Gondrin, Lieutenant to the D. of Guise in that Prouince, would haue beaten downe a house, whereas the Protestants had heard some Sermons. The Protestants troope suddenly together: and if he had not retired himselfe, they had put him in danger of his life. The second happened at Valence but fatal to the author: the 25 of April was the day of the election of new Counsils and of Councillors at Valence; La Mothe meaning his Pistoll should giue the first voice, and then to haue such named as he pleased, hee sends some horse out of the towne, either to prevent that none should come to crosse his designs, or to cut such in pieces as should seek to escape: he causeth the gates to be shut, enuirones the place of the assembly with armed men: he enters it with a fauchion in one hand, and his Pistoll in the other: the which hee dischargeth vpon a Secretary of his whom he findes there. The Protestants doubting that Gondrin would begin with them: a number of them retired into a house, and resolute to defend their liues.

A stratagem against the D. of Nemours.

Dauphiné.

But

But as they came to force them, they slip out at a backe doore, and recover Saint Felix gate, where discovering Gondrin horse scouring the Plaines, they couer themselves within the gate. These horsemen encountering no man, fall vpon some Countrey-men that came to Valence, and kill some of them, whose bodies are brought to the towne vpon ladders: for with out-rage the people require iustice. The next day being Sunday, the Protestants stirre not: they feared lest by reason of others of their party which came from all parts at the report of the former daies worke, some new tumult should arise. Gondrin commends them, and with sweet words perswades them to goe out of the towne for the exercise of their religion: that in doing so, they shall shew themselves obedient to the Edict. When they are abroad, they discover, or at the least imagine, that they seeke to surprize them: some runne to the gate: others enter the towne, and seize vpon the other gates. Munday morning, the whole party armes, they besiege Gondrin house and fire it, who being retired into the next, he was slaine with six or seuen of his household seruants: his house lackt, and to appeale the multitude, they hang his carcase at a window towards the street. These are the effects which the infolencies of an armed multitude brings forth.

They proceed yet farther: the report of images beaten downe in many other Provinces, transports them to the like infolencies: they chose the Baron of Adretz, chiefe by prouision in Dauphiné, attending a confirmation, or some other certaine nomination by the Prince of Conde. The Baron (to make the entrance of his authoritie famous) sends boldly to the Parliament of Grenoble: that they should thrust out of the towne, the second President, the Attourney Generall, the Aduocate of the towne, the fourth Consull, and some others, whom he termed seditious, and therefore hee threatened to hang them. These men, without either commandement or compulsion, were glad by a voluntarie exile to auoid the Barons threats.

The Protestants thus freed, seize vpon the gates of Grenoble the first of May, enter into the Friers, ouerthrow Altars and Images, plant the exercise of their religion: and for the fury of the towne, bring in a company of foot sent by Adretz, who to encounter Maugiron (that termed himselfe the Kings Lieutenant Generall in Dauphiné) came in the end to Grenoble with a troope of horse and foot. Their first warre was against Images and reliques, afterwards they seize vpon the castles of Bussiere and Mirebell, and burnt the great house of the Catharians, three leagues from Grenoble. Whilest these sayle in full seas with a prosperous winde, behold others suffer a most pitifull ship-wracke. The massacre of Vassy, the Italian troopes of Fabrizio Serbellone, a Bolonois in Auignon, and those of Prouence ioynd with Fabrizio, terrified the Protestants of Auranges neere vnto Auignon, who to crosse the intelligences, which they said these troopes had in Auranges, prote& themselves with six hundred men. Moreover, Fabrizio writes to Sommerine: That seeing he hath an army ready, he should performe a great worke, to bring it speedily before Auranges, whither there resorted daily a great multitude of Huguenots. If they were not suppressed at their first beginning, not onely Auignoa should be annoyed, but also all Prouence receiue great harme. So Sommerine and Suze march against Auranches, and at the first finde good meanes to ruine the towne. Parpaille President in the Parliament of Auranges, had bene taken at Bourg vpon Rhone returning from Lions, where he had bene to make prouision of armes, for whose rescue the troopes of Auranges, being of their neighbour towne runne to Bourg. Sommerine and Suze fortified with many companies of Dauphine and Auignon, besiege Auranges being without souldiers, they batter, make a breach, force it, and forget no kinde of cruelty that the Victors furie doth vitally inuent. All are put to sword without distinction of age, sexe, quality: and by a new kinde of death practised since in ciuill warres, they cast some downe vpon the souldiers Halberds, they burne others, tyed to their hookes in chimneys, they hang men, women, and children at their windowes, they shoot some with their harguebuzes, murder others in their mothers armes: and to finish this desolation, they sacke and burne the towne, castle, palace and Bishops house: six weekes after, Parpaille at the instance of the Vicelegat of Auignon lost his head.

But alas! this was (as they say) but to anger a Horner. The Baron of Adretz studies of nothing but reuenge. Hee runnes, hee cries out, hee formes, and full of indignation and threats, beats Pierrelate, and forceth it in few houres, puts all that he finds armed to the sword, enters in fury into the Castle guarded by three hundred souldiers of the troopes

A of Suze; some he kills, others he casts downe, not one escapes (with the like fury he takes the towne of Bourg. Pont S. Esprit brings him their keyes. He forceth Boulene a frontier of the Conrat, puts the company of Captaine Murellet to the sword, and threatened Auignon: when as newes came that Maugiron was entred by intelligence into Grenoble, where he spoiles, kills and downes. He posits thither, afflictes himselfe of Romans by the way, redueth S. Marcellin to his deuotion, and puts three hundred of Maugiron men to the sword. Maugiron fearing the fury of this man, retires into Sauoy, and from thence into Bourgongne to Tannier, leading with him all those of his faction: and the 26 of Iune Adretz re-enters into Grenoble, settles things in their former estate, and then hee marcheth into Forest, as we haue seene.

Behold strange alterations: Suze and Fabrizio beheld the Barons actions being in safety: his passage into Forest, drawes them not as field. Mambrun makes head against them, and by the taking of Mornas, doth partly reuenge the spoiles of Auranges. Suze will haue his reuenge, and comes to besiege Boulene: but finding nothing but blowes to be gotten, hee goes and spoiles Vaucares, in the County of Menaiffa: and thinking to enlarge his limits, hee meetes with the Baron, who with a fury (without viewing or giuing him leisure to arrange his troopes) doth charge him, defeats him; cuts in pieces the most part of his foot, kills him, with many Gentlemen, and wins his artilerie: but he shall not keepe it long. Then extending his victory, he undertakes the defence of Cisteron, threatened by Sommerine, forceth S. Laurent des Arbres, and Rochemaure a strong place: takes and burnes the Castle of Pont Sorgues, kills all Fabrizio's souldiers that kept it, and the next day surprizeth Fabrizio himselfe, and chafeth him euen vnto the gates of Auignon.

As he continues his course along the river of Durance, and findes nothing to stay the violence of his victories, newes comes of the Prouencals attualt at Gaillon: Hee wades through the river the first of September, chargeth them at the first, kills the most part, and puts the rest to flight. But in stead of going directly to Cisteron, whither hee had sent Mambrun with six hundred men, and the Cannon taken from Suze (he had some spleene against Mauuin, Captaine of Cisteron) he takes the longer way by the Plaines: whereof followed the ouerthrow of Mambrun, the losse of his artilerie, and the taking of Cisteron, as we shall see.

Adretz had left the Councillor Ponai for his Lieutenant at Grenoble: a man more capable of law, then fit for armes. Hereupon Vinay takes an occasion to attempt against the towne. Saint Mauris and La Coche receiue him so roughly, as the death of threecore of his best Spaniards and Italians, at the first skirmish, makes him to leaue Grenoble, to goe burne the peasants houses in the valley of Pragala. In the end, the course of the Barons prosperities is stayed by the taking of Vienne, and of the Castle of Piper, and by the two seuerall ouerthrowes hee had at Beau-repaire, whereof followed this change of sides, and the losse of the reputation and credit which hee had gotten among his followers, as we haue heard. These losses caused the siege of Grenoble, whereof Ponai (being called away by Adretz) had left the defence to La Coche. Six thousand men campe before it. But a goodly designe, and easie to be effected is often made frustrate by the discord of the Commanders. Many heads are the cause that Grenoble holds firme. They assaile it, but slowly: their vituals now growing short, after three weekes siege, presse La Coche to capitulate, when as Captaine Farmier, hauing assembled six or seuen hundred foot, and fourescore horse, passeth the river of Isere, surmounteth the straight of the Mountaine, forceth them that kept it, and aduanceth vnto the river of Drac neere to Grenoble. Meaning to ferry ouer, he sees the passage guarded by three or foure hundred horse, with a great number of foot, and discovers another troope in ambush within the next wood, to charge him behind. He retires, & with a counterfeite feare, makes shew to turne backe: the enemy pursues him, he turns head against them, wades through the river of Drac, chargeth the first he meetes, breakes them, and by the resolution of his passage, in the face of so many enemies, he amazeth all the troope, scattereth and chafeth them with great slaughter: and this vnexpected attualt, strikes such a terror in the campe, as euery one abandons the trenches: euery man flies, and staves not vntill they haue recovered the marches of Sauiouy. Cristof had recovered Serignon and Auranges in bafe Dauphiné. La Coche surprised the Tower of Lempis, in the beginning of the yeare 1563; whilest those of Grenoble viſual their place, and prepared to endure a ſecond ſiege. About the end of February, A there comes againſt them 8000 men, foot, and horſe: two great Cannons, and three field pieces: La Cocbe had to make head againſt them, beſides the citizens, ſix hundred good ſouldiers, nine braue Captaines, and ſome voluntarie Gentlemen, who hauing repulſed the aſſailants at their firſt aſſault, preferred, with the points of their ſwords, both the ſack of the citie, and the blood of their citizens.

Prouence was betwixt the father and the ſonne.

Let vs paſſe into Prouence. The Earle of Tende was Gouverneur and his two ſonnes; Sommerme (ſiſſed of the firſt wife) was Lieutenant for the King in his fathers abſence. Cipiere, being then very yong, borne of the ſecond wife, and the Lord of Cardet of the houſe of Saluſſes, ſonne-in-law to the ſaid Earle, were (as many others did vaunt in thoſe dayes) maſtiues which did defend the Proteſtants troupe. Sommerme, a violent man and too bloody, did ſuddenly incenſe all Prouence againſt them: and being armed with force, he made his government famous by a horrible and generall execution of men diſ-membred, hanged, burned, cut in pieces being aliue, drawne through the ſtreets, caſt downe head-long, ſtabbed, and ſuch like miſeries. The Earle his father, abhorring this generall deſolation, and not able by his authoritie to diuert his ſonne from the wicked proceeding, gathers together what force he can: gives the command of the horſe to Cipiere, and of the foot to Cardet, who by their armes kept all the towne beyond the river of Durance (except Pertuis) vnder their command.

On the other ſide, Sommerme, after the executions of Auranges before deſcribed, C hauing taken muſter of fifty enſignes of foot, and ſome Cornets of horſe, ſeyes furiously to the ſiege of Ciſteron, being full of many Proteſtant families, that were retired thither, and manned with eleven companies vnder the Lord of Beauieu, nephew to the Earle of Tende, and three hundred men commanded by Furmier. The eleuenth of Iuly, Sommerme gives three aſſaults, continued from three of the clocke in the afternoone vntill night. Moſt of the moneth was ſpent in ſkirmiſhes: the priſoners on either ſide finding no mer-cie, nor grace of the ſouldiers. In the end, Sommerme (ſeeking ſome new checke by the hands of Adretz, who had lately wonne the battaile of Vourdas) he went and intrenched himſelfe three leagues from Ciſteron. Cardet approacheth, but hee cannot by any deuice draw his brother-in-law out of his trenches. So the Earle of Tende, diſtreſt for victuals, D raiſeth his campe, puts ſome of his troopes into Ciſteron, and ſends the reſt to Adretz.

ſiege.

deſerted.

Sommerme doubles his courage and force, and the ſeuen and twenty of Auguſt, followed by a hundred and two enſignes of foot, and many horſe, beſiegeth Ciſteron a new, on three parts, and vpon an intelligence which was given him, that Membrun approached to ſuccour the beſieged (as wee haue before ſpecified) Sommerme marcheth againſt him, chargeth Membrun, kills about a hundred and fifty of his men, puts the other in rout, and wins two pieces of Cannon, which he had lately loſt. This victory was to Sommerme a foretelling of good ſucceſſe. The 14. of September, hee ouerthrowes a hundred and forty paces of the wall: he planted two ſmall pieces, to batter the Friers. Three and thirty enſignes of foot, ſupported by a troupe of horſe, goe to the aſſault, and continue it with a wonderfull fury vntill ſeuen of the clocke at night: that powder ſlaying them on either ſide, they fall to ſtones, ſwords, and handy blows: the greater number preſeailing, the beſieged abandon the breach, retiring themſelves with great loſſe, and des Adretz returned into Dauphiné. Senas, Mouans, and other Captaines, ſeeing themſelves vnſuſtained of munition, without hope of ſuccours, charged with a multitude of men, not trained vp in warlike affaires, together with the enemies obſtinate reſolution, they preſerre the ſafety of their liues and perſons before the place: and in the night recouer the ſtreights and deſerts of the mountaine, and ſo come ſafe to Grenoble, from thence they were conducted to Lions, and there liued vntill the Edict of pacification. Sommerme at the breake of day, ſends ſome troopes after them: but the difficulty of the wayes, and feare F to loſe their part of the ſpoile, ſtayed the purſuit. So the victors enter into this abandoned towne, and put to the ſword about foure hundred women and children, without diſtinction of age or religion.

Sommerme is now maſter of Prouence, leauing in all places pitifull ſignes of a bloody victory, whereof the originall notes (as principall instruments) Carcex, Mentis, Flaſſans, thruſt forward eſpecially by Bagarris, Cheſne, Saint Marguerite, and others of the moſt ſeditious of the Court of Parliament of Aix, who with all impuſiue gave libertie to

A to all thefts, ſpoiles, and murthers: ſo as after the Edict of pacification, the Kings Priuy Councell gave Commiſſion to the President Morſan, and ſome Councillors of the Court of Parliament at Paris, to ſuppreſſe ſuch diſorders: who by an exemplarie puniſhment of many, cauſed the following warres to be managed with farre more moderation. But the quality of ſome, and the credit of others, ſaued many heads which were prepared to vomit vp, in open view, the blood which their hands had too prodigally ſpilt.

As for the Duchy of Bourgongne, Tauannes Lieutenant for the King in the D. of Aumals abſence, Ioued ſiluer better then the blood of the Proteſtants, and the Parliament of Dijon hauing by vertue of Letters obtained the firſt of March 1562, forbidden the exerciſe of their religion, Tauannes diſarmes them, puts the chiefe in priſon, forceth ſome to depart with threats, others he expels violently. The Maior and Sheriffs proceed farther: they thruſt forth wiues, maids, and children, commanding the peſants by Proclamation the 7 of Iuly, to ſet vpon the rebels and not to receiue, lodge, nor feed them that are expelled the towne: (a rigour which humanity neuer vſed to the moſt barbarous) they condemne them, as guilty of high treaſon that had caried armes, or aſſiſted them with aide or counſell: and they giue liberty to kill them all with impunity that ſhould hereafter aſſemble in any other places but in their ordinary Churches. This liberty cauſed many thefts and ſpoiles, at Auſſonne, Autun, and Beaune: yet the people are commanded to haue contained themſelues within the bounds of modeſtie. Chalon vpon Saone, Maſcon and Belleuille, ſeized on by the Proteſtants, ſerued them for a time as a Sanctuary and refuge. Membrun commands at Chalon with 500 Harguebuziers: but being ſuddenly beleagured by Tauannes, and finding not the town furniſhed or defenſible, by a dangerous, and (as the Originall ſaith) a deſpicable example, hee left it in prety to Tauannes, and retired to Maſcon.

Bourgongne Duo.

Tauannes goes thither with all ſpeed, and preſents himſelfe at the gates, hoping by kind offers to perſwade the people to receiue him, but he finds no admittance. So hee gathers together all his forces, and the third of Iune beſiegeth the towne. His army conſiſted for the moſt part of Bourguignons of the county, carrying openly red ſcarfes. The beſieged countenance themſelues with this pretext, and make their proſit thereof, to auoid this preſent ſtorme that threatened them. They giue the King to vnderſtand; that it was not reaſonable, they being his naturall ſubiects, and deſiring to liue in peace, vnder the obedience of his lawes, ſhould be forced to open their gates to Tauannes, armed with ſtrangers enemies to the crowne, who is ſuſpected of them for many other great reaſons. This admonition preuailed ſome-what: for Tauannes ſtraight-wayes retired by the Kings commandement, but it was to prepare for a ſecond ſiege.

The firſt ſiege of Maſcon.

Thoſe of Lions ſent Entragues to defend the ſiege. Tauannes makes his trenches, wins the ſuburbs of Saint Laurence, and the fourth of Iuly, beats downe the defences, makes a breach, and viewes it, but to their coſt whom he ſent: So (as if ſome important buſineſſe E had called him into Bourgongne) hee raiſeth his campe, and making his account that the beſieged would follow him, he layes a ſtrong ambuſh: but Entragues had no men to loſe. Maſcon fired from this ſecond ſiege, behold Belleuille is aſſailed. Saint Point with other Gentlemen of Dauphiné came from the ſpoiling of ſome boats laden with the value of 40000 frankes in reliques of gold and ſiluer, which two Sherifes of Maſcon had ſent of their owne authoritie to Lions, to be conuered to their priuate vſes. So the robbers are often robbed. This booty puts them in hope of another. The 28 of Iuly, he comes with 200 horſe, fix or ſeuen hundred ſouldiers, and the common people thereabouts, to beleaguer this little towne: but the night before, two companies parting from Maſcon; were entred into it, by whom the aſſailants being repulſed with loſſe, turned their reuenge F vpon their neighbours cattell. The retreat of S. Point, made Entragues ſeeke to extend the limits of his iuriſdiction. He beſiegeth the Caſtle of Pierrecloze, forceth Maheſat, and ſiue and twenty ſouldiers which commanded there, to yeeld at diſcretion: and cauſeth them to be led priſoners to Maſcon: but this was to feed the Fox, who in the end ſhall eate his pullaine.

ſiege.

During theſe broyles, Poncenat comes to Maſcon, with ſuiſſes and French, drawes forth the chiefe forces, beſiegeth Tourmon, and becomes maſter thereof. But what can the fury of inciuill armes forbear? Clugny forced with the ſame rage, ſees that exquiſit and famous Library defaced: a most precious treasure, which made that Abbey to bee greatly esteemed amongst others of France. Tamames, advertised that Mafcon was vnfortified, and that Enriquez, to please Pencenat, followed his enignes, parts from Chaaons with foure cornets of horfe, and 800 foot, being assured of a practice which he had with in the towne, whilst that his enemies, transported with their priuate affections, imployed their forces elsewhere. The 17 of August, many waines drawne with Oxen, enter by his means that kept the keyes of one gate, being of the intelligence: they passe the first and the second gate: at the third, the first Carter ouerthrowes his Waine willingly, and by this policy flayes the rest. Twenty men coucht vpon their bellies behind a wall in a garden neere adioyning to the gate, runne thither: they kill some, bring in their men, overthrow a Court of guard, and become masters of the towne: the souldiers of Pierrecloux are freed from prison, and cut off heads, armes and legges of the Protestants: they cast many into the riuier, spoile their houses, and ranfome the wealthiest. This Bourgongne returnes to the Catholikes deuotion, and Saint Point had the gouernment of Mafcon, a violent and bloody man, who oftentimes glured his eyes, after his meat, with the mournfull spectacle of such as he caused to be cast into the riuier.

These confusions did pitifully afflict all the Prouinces of this Realme: when on the other side, the heads of both parties, being prisoners, did sollicite the conclusion of a Peace. The Admirall, by ample Letters to the Queene, purged himselfe of the accusation laid against him, touching the death of the Duke of Guise: whereof Peltori himselfe, in the midst of his most sensible torments at his execution, freed him. And the Queene-mother (leaving this thorne in the Admirals foot, that she might raigne among these combustions of the houses of Guise and Chastillon) did cunningly giue two strokes with one stone: for shee made the Prince of Conde beleue, that the restrains propounded vpon the Edict of Ianuary, tended onely to content the Catholikes in some sort, and to open the way for the Protestants to haue greater liberty. Shee pleased the young Duke of Guise with the execution of Peltori, and his aduancement to his fathers offices: and the Constable, by the moderation of the Edict: for he had protested neuer to yeeld to the Edict of Ianuary. So the iudicious Reader may see, by the course of the History, which party did first breake it. But that which did most import Katherine in disarming her enemies, the entertained a discord between two mighty families, whereby she maintained her authoritie.

In the end a peace concluded the 13 of March, gave liberty of Religion to Noblemen, having all manner of Iustice for them, their families and subiects. To other Gentlemen that had inferiour iurisdiction, for them and their families, with permission of the Lords of whom they held. In all Bailiwikes and Iurisdiccions depending on the Parliaments a place appointed for their assemblies, at the election of the Prouince: besides all other places where the exercise had bene since the 7 of March. The Viconty of Paris onely excepted. Euery one restored to his former possition of goods, honours and offices. A generall abolition of all things past for matter of armes. All offences (except robbing) pardoned, and a defence to injury one another, either for warre or Religion. This treaty did please and displease many. It reioyced such as made an account, that this sweet and pleasant name of peace should make an end of all their calamities, and restore euery man to his former estate. It grieved such, as (of three mighty enemies seeing two preuented by death, and the third a prisoner) thought that the gouernment of the State was lawfully false to the Prince of Conde, who by consequence did derogate from his authority, subscribing to so weak and easie conditions of Peace, fore-seeing also, that the secret oppositions of the Parliaments, and the violences of the most murinous (who being armed lay daily some of their men with all impunity) would in few yeares giue cause of new confusions.

So by this Peace, the Germanes were sent home. Elizabeth Queene of England held Newhaue, whereof the Prince had put her in possession, as a pawning and security for the money, wherewith shee had assisted his party. To make a breach betwixt her, and the Protestants, the English must bee chased away by them that had called them in. The King goes thither in person: they likewise vrge the Prince to goe with most of his party, and cause them to make the point. The place is strong, both by Nature and Art: but the fresh-water being cut off, and the plague hauing wasted about three thousand men,

A men, the Earle of Warwicke entred into Capitulation the 23 of Iuly, and the next day yeelded the place to the King. One of the chiefe motives, that induced the Prince to yeeld so easily to these conditions of peace, was the Lieutenant Generall, which hee expected by the King of Nauarres death, and the Queene-mothers goodly promises. But to confirme her Regency, she puts the Prince from all his hopes. She causeth the King to be declared of full age, being yet but fourteen years old: carries his Maiestie to the Parliament at Rouen, makes him protest, That he will not hereafter endure the disobedience that hath been vsed against him since the beginning of these troubles: that his pleasure was to haue the Edict of pacification duly obserued, threatened such as should oppose or make any leagues. And afterwards, by an admonition made in writing, by the Parliament of Paris, touching the Edict of his maiorty, confirming that of pacification, the Queene-mother causeth her sonne to name her Ouerseer and President of his affaires: and for an answer to the Court, according to the instructions of his mother: I doe not meane (saide hee) you should deale in any other thing, but with the administration of good and speedy Iustice to my subiects. Vnderstand hereafter, that you are not confirmed in your offices by me, to be my tutors, nor Protectors of my Realme, nor Gouernours of my city of Paris, as hitherto you haue persuaded your selues.

The King being returned to Paris, the Duke of Guises widow, his children, and kin-folke, came solemnly, and demanded iustice, of the murder committed on the person of the deceased, taxing the Admirall, as the chiefe author thereof. But it was not yet time to suffer these two houses to encounter. That of Guise might receiue as much, or more losse then the other, and Katherine pretended, to make her profit of the first. To auoid this brunt, she causeth the King, to command them to surcease this quarrell, and appoints them another time to aduise thereon. In the meane time, shee honours them with the chiefe charges, and giues them all access and countenance neere his person. The rest of the yeare was spent in the confirmation of many Edicts, touching Ecclesiasticall and ciuill causes, and then was the iurisdiction of Iudges and Consuls among the Merchants erected, and the Notaries of consignment established.

As these things passed in France, the Prelates assembled at the Councell of Trent, provided for the support and mainenance of the Catholike religion, namely, in this Estate. The Cardinal of Lorrain (a man greatly praised in the affaires of the Realme) doth all he can to root out the Protestants. To that end, they find this expedient, that the Kings of France and Spaine should make a strict league, and he of Spaine should giue the French such forces as were requisite for the execution thereof, and in the meane time, they should seeke all meanes to abolish the Edict which allowed the exercise of the pretended reformed religion: that this treaty made for the preservation of the Catholike, Apostolike and Romish religion, should be called, The holy League. The Cardinal promiseth to employ all his endeouours and meanes to this effect, and assures the assembly of the willingness, and good affection of the Queene-mother, and the Lords of the Councell. The chiefe of this league were the Pope, the Kings of France, and Spaine, the Princes of Italy, the Common-weale of Venice, and the duke of Sauoy. Of the Emperor, and the house of Austria they speake diuersly.

So from the beginning of February, they labour to produce some effects. Their Ambassadors come to Fontainebleau, demanded the obseruation of the Decrees of the Councell throughout all France, whereof the reading should be the 25 day of March at Nancy, in the presence of the Ambassadors of all Catholike Princes, assembled to make a general league, against those estates that were false from the obedience of the Romish Church. They require also, that in fauour of the Clergy, the King should cause the alienation of Ecclesiasticall goods to cease, as against the law of God, and preiudiciall to his Maiestie and the Realme. That the Edict of pacification should be disannulled, and heretikes rooted out; namely such as had bene partakers of the duke of Guises murder. Behold new fire-brands to cast this monarchy into the flames of a second ciuill warre. But the fires of the first did yet smooke. And things not being so soone prepared to enter into new home bred combustions, the King answers: That hee hath granted the Edict, as free the Realme from strangers: and that hee hopes hereafter to maintain his subiects in peace, according to the institution of the Church.

In the meane time, such as were worst affected to the publike peace, attempted many things things contrary to the Edict. The Commissioners sent for the observation thereof, had small credin in many places. The Estates of some Prouinces said plainly, that they could no more endure two religions, then two Sunnes: the execution thereof had small or no effect, in places where it was proclaimed: the Magistrates delayed to appoint the Protestants places for their exercises, and by their slacknesse caused many to seeke their dwelling elsewhere, to liue in quiet and safety.

The complaints and discontentments which founded in the Kings cares from all parts, gaue Katherine (vnder colour to lead the King in progresse through the Prouinces of his Realme, and by his presence to end many controversies, which even then seemed to threaten him with some imminent confusions) a goodly pretext of conference with the King of Spaine.

The voyage of Beyonne.

Charles begins his voyage by Champagne, and through Bourgogne comes to Lions, forbidding the Protestants the exercise of their Religion following the Court, yea euen in the townes that were assigned them for their assemblies, whilst his Maiesty should bee resident there. The Protestants were here in great numbers, and might well fortifie themselves againe at need. To take from them all means, they build a Citradell, and the King stirres not before it be in defence. By the example hereof many other townes receiued the like restraint, whilst on the other side, they dismantled Orleans, Montauban, and some others. The Edict of Peace is greatly impugned by an other made at Rouffillon. The King forbids all Iustices to allow the exercise of the pretended reformed religion, but in places specified by the Edict. For the first time, hee banished such ministers as had exercised their charge, in places not comprehended in the Edict: and for the second time, punished them with death. He commanded all priests, religious men, and Nunnes that were married, to make separation, and returne to their couents: if not, to depart the realm, forbidding the Protestants all their Synods, as making Monopoles vnder that pretext, and stirring vp the greatest part of the Realme to rebellion.

Murders of Cognac.

From words they fall to deeds. Those of Creuan in Bourgogne murder many assembled for their exercise, with all inapinicie. And the Kings abience from those places where they were accustomed to see him, caused many seditions, and mutinies: amongst the which, La Courre, Gouernour of Vendosme, a Protestant by profession, was murdered, by the command of Chauigni, Lieutenant to the Duke of Montpensier, as hee sought to suppress some, who vnder fauour of the troubles, had purposely murdered many men, women and children, in the country of Maine, and places therabouts.

Offences.

As this infolency increased, a licentious rage transporting them of Tours, to fall vpon the Protestants of their towne, coming from their exercise, they murder some, hurt others, and with the same rage, bringing their weapons bloody into the towne, they kill, drown, and spoile, without distinction of age, sexe, or quality. The Marshall of Villeuile was sent to suppress the mischief, before it spread farther. Hee was readie to carie himselfe therein, according to the tenure of his charge: but Chauigni opposing by open force, caused all this premeditated punishment to turne into imoake, as if the examination thereof should discontent both great and small, and make things tend to new troubles. In the end, at the importunate suite of the Protestants, who complained of these horrible infolencies, and that they were forced in all places to furnish holy bread at the parish masses, to hang tapistry before their lodging on Corpus Christi day, to contribute to brotherhoods, and such other things: and at their instant suite, not to be forced in their consciences against the conditions of the Edict, the King staying in Dauphiné, commands all gouernours of Prouinces by his Letters, to enterraine and to cause the Edict of pacification to be duely obserued, and to haue a care that no mutinies should grow within their gouernments.

Prison against the Iesuits.

This voyage of Beyonne is famous, by that notable suite of those which with a pre- sumptuous and partiall title, termed themselves of the societie of Iesus, decided in the Court of Parliament, Stephen Pasquier pleading against them, for the Vnicersitie of Paris: a vehement and most grace Advocate of so rare a cause, and Master Peter Parisius for their company: their pleadings are read, and their beginnings, and first entry into France, their advancement, and alskath concerns their sect, is so learnedly exprest in an Epistle of the fourth booke of the said Pasquier, and in his pleading, as it is needlesse to insert them.

This

A This new yeare bred new troubles at Paris, and was likely to haue stretched farre. The Cardinall of Lorraine coming from the councell of Trent, accompanied with his Nephew, and a number of men with Harguebuzes, contrary to the Edict, and followed at hand, by the duke of Aumale his brother, went to Paris. The conclusions of the Councell, and this carying of armes, did much disquiet the Protestants. It is giuen out, that their meaning is to offer them violence: they fly to the Marshall of Montmorency as gouernour of the Isle of France, a wife-man, and louing the publike peace. Hee intreats the Cardinall not to enter in this manner. This request neglected, he resolues to vie his authoritie.

B The Cardinall growes obstinate, and offers to enter with all his force. But the Marshall (as the Kings Lieutenant) opposeth himselfe, being followed by the Prince Forsein, and about forty gentlemen of account. The Cardinall growes amazed, saues himselfe with his nephew in the next houses: and after some dayes of stay at Paris, he goes into Champagne to attend the Kings returne from Bayonne. Hereafter there is nothing but associations, leagues, and conferences. They must be reuenged of this affront. But they find too strong a party: for the two houses of Montmorency and Chastillon (most straightly allied by consanguinity) doe likewise vnite their wils in this defence. The Marshall assisted by the Admirall his cousin, contains the Parisiens in peace, and makes the Parliament and the Kings Councell to approve this act. The Queene-mother (feareing lest this mutinie should hinder the effects of the voyage of Bayonne, and by that means the fulfilling of her designs would be made frustrate) makes the King to command by his letters patents, such as were not yet entred into Paris, not to approach any neerer, and to such as were there, to depart vntill that his Maiestie had ended this quarrell, after his returne out of Gascony.

C Now the Court was full of complaints. The Protestants accused the Catholikes of violence and breach of the Edict. To content them, the Queene assigns them deputies at Tolouze: but they returne without any other satisfaction, but a discouery that they meant no good vpon them. There it was concluded, that all Princes and others, of what qualitie soeuer, (whereof many were very farre engaged by their promise in a certain league made in France without the Kings p'sent) should renounce all confederations, both within and without the Realme, and should binde themselves by oath to the King vpon paine of rebellion. This was the aduce of Montluc. But the difficulty was to draw the articles, for to make a soueraine Prince to enter into association and company with his subjects, Was it not by a pernicious consequence to blemish his royall authoritie, and ouerthrow that which should serue as a fundamentall law, for the quiet of the Realme, and the obseruation of the Edict?

In the end, the King hauing visited all Aquitaine, he arriues at Bayonne in Iune, and thither comes his Sister Elizabeth, wife to King Philip of Spaine, to meet with him, accompanied with the Duke of Alua and others, to the end (said they) that the matter should be lesse suspected, and that their league might take sure hold. But the most cleare-sighted did attribute it to ambition, lest the Spaniard should seeme to vie any submission. How soeuer it were, the holy league was confirmed betwixt the two Kings, by Elizabeth means: For the establishing of the ancient Religion, and extirpation of the new. And for that this Doctrine did extremely afflict France, the Spaniard did promise the French such aide and succours as he could, and the French to the Spaniard (for that hee did see his estate of the Low-countries to hatch a great confusion, which the following ages did bring forth) the like assistance according to his power: but both doe promise ioyntly, to maintain by all means the dignitie of the Catholike religion, to cut off (as much as in them lay) all lets, and speedily to seeke all occasions profitable for this designe, beginning first with the heads.

F This businesse was not so secretly managed, but the Prince of Conde, the Admirall, and other Noblemen of that party had intelligence. They stand vpon their guards, aduertise their men, and for this time preuent surpris. The end of the yeare brought the King home, much satisfied with the ioyfull entertainment his subjects had made him, plunging himselfe with yong brethren, in masks and delights, whilst the Queene his Mother, with her Councillors, gouerned France at their pleasure, and laid plots, which shall soone breed as dangerous stormes as the former. Princes study by their enter-view and league, to kindle horrible combustions in their estates, they give the Turkish armie the better meanes to land in the Isle of Malta, to besiege and take the fort of Saint Elme, lately built by the Pryor of Capoua, and by this victory to make the siege of Malta more easie. Let vs observe three notable things, before we conclude the year. The first was that braue attempt of Pietro, the eldest sonne of Montluc, who weary to liue idle, rigged out some ships, with a good number of Gentlemen, Souldiers, and Mariners, to make a voyage into Affrica: he took and sackt the Isle of Madera, but with the losse of his life, leauing his troope excluded from all returne into France, by the pursuit the King of Portugal made, demanding satisfaction of the outrages done to his subiects. The Earle of Sanzay was sent to pacifie him: and euen then was treated (but without any effect,) the mariage of Marguerite, Sister to Charles, with the said King. The second was the death of Ferdinand the Emperour and King of Hungary, deceased in September, leauing his sonne Maximilian for his successor. The third was that of Pius the fourth, in whose place was chosen to the pontifical chaire, Michel Gesileo a Iacobin, Cardinall of Alexandria, and tooke vpon him the name of Pius the fifth.

The first fruits of this year were very commendable, and if they had giuen hope of the like proceeding, the harvest had bene very happy: but such as trust not but vpon good cautions, take not all kindes of money for payment, growing very suspitious, by reason of the conclusions taken in this voyage. To make it more glorious and lesse suspect, the King calls an assembly at Moulins, of the greatest Personages of his Realme, as well for the government of Iustice, as for other causes concerning the good and quiet of the State, whereof followed that great volume of statutes, of which they rightly say: That they were as iust and holy, as ill observed. Those of the houses of Guise and Chastillon were called. The quarrell of Paris inuited the Marshall of Montmorency, and the Admirall, hauing purged himselfe by oath of the crime whereof they pretended him to be principall motiue (the King had already pronounced him innocent by his letters Patents) the King, the Queene-mother, the D. of Auiou, brother to the King, the Cardinals of Bourbon, Lorraine and Guise, the Constable, the Marshalls of Bourdillon and Vienneuille, the Bishops of Valence, Orlance and Limoges, Thou and Seguier first and second Presidents of Paris, Dais the first of Toloula, Lagueresson of Bourdeaux, Truchon of Grenoble, Le Feurs of Dijon, Fournau the second President of Prouence, and many other Noblemen assembled to that effect: besides the aboue-named Statutes, made the reconciliation betwixt the two houses, whereof followed imbracings, protestations and promises not to attempt any thing whatsoever one against another. But the issue will verifie the saying: that there is no trust in a reconciled enemy.

In the meane time the resolutions of Bayonne appeared manifestly, the moderations they made in the Edit, the infolencies they committed in many places with all impunity, the threats they gaue the Protestants amazed them on all sides. The Prince & Admirall were vigilant, obseruing the countenances of their enemies. The preparations of Spaine againe the Low-countries, made them to foresee that this enterprize would in like sort prejudice their partisans in France. The Prince of Roche-sur-yon had before his death discovered many particulars: they complained, that about three thousand persons had perished of violent deaths, since the Edit, without any iustice, and their complaints had no other satisfaction, but goodly words and gracious letters. To conclude, the winds (said they) which did blow at Bayonne, must needs cause a strange tempest.

So the causes of their discontent some were manifest, others secret, and consisted in the dismantling of some townes, to take from them the meanes, in the building of Cittadels in some places of their exercise: in the ordinarie murdering of their men, in the massacring of men of account without punishment: in the ordinarie threats, That shortly they should not lift their heads so high: but especially in the leauy of six thousand Swisses made vnder a fained pretence, to guard the frontier against the coming of Don Ferdinand Aluarez of Toledo, Duke of Alua (who marched against the Protestants of the Low-country with a mighty armie) whom notwithstanding they caused to enter farre into the Realme, and by some letters intercepted, being sent from Rome and Spaine, they had discovered many practices made for their ruine. And the intelligences they had from one in Court well affected (yet secretly) to their party, that it was decreed in a secret Councell to seize vpon

A vpon the Prince and Admirall, to put the one to death, and keepe the other prisoner: at the same instant to bring two thousand Swisses into Paris, two thousand into Orlance, and the rest into Poitiers: and then by the abolishing of the last Edit, to establish one quite contrarie. All these considerations made the chiefe heads resolute to stand vpon their defence, and to obserue foure things in this new taking of armes. To seize on few townes but of importance. To bring a gallant army to field. To cut the Swisses in pieces, by whose fauour the Catholikes should be alwayes masters of the field: and to chase the Cardinall of Lorraine from Court if they might, as the chiefe firebrand of the confusions which would consume the whole estate. Man purposeth, and God disposeth: and of many resolutions few haue their desired end. The pleasure of God often disappointeth the designs of them which are most practised in knowledge, valour, discourse and wisdom: and some enterprizes little or not at all premeditated, doe often fall out very successfully. For the execution of the first point, diuers considerations had made them to name three townes, Lions, Toloula and Troyes.

But a great designe, imparted after the French manner to many meane persons, and vncapable of such actions, turne them easily into smoke. Not one of them that vnder-tooke the charge could effect it. For the second, the Protestants being first armed, were in the beginning masters of the field, but within six weekes the Catholikes forced the Prince and the Admirall to fly to the Germanes, which the Duke Iohn Casimer brought them, as we shall see. Their proiect against the Swisses was likewise discovered, and the forces which should haue met at an appointed day, failed in their expedition. The fourth succeeded, but it imported least of all: but this separation was but in shew, and not in authority, nor credit.

The King is much incensed against them. He was at Meaux, and prepared to solemnize the Feast of Saint Michael, according to the custome of the French Kings. The Prince approached with 500 horse, and by this attempt forth the King to retire with some amazement to Paris, in the midst of 6000 Swisses, and a good number of horse, the which had bene in danger, if a hundred and fifty horse coming out of Picardy, and the Harguebuziers on horsebacke which attended the Prince, had arised betwixt Paris & Meaux, at the day appointed. At the same time the Protestants party arme on all sides: and this generally taking of armes vnllooked for, with that bold enterprize vpon the Swisses, and the taking of Orlance, Soissons, Auxerre and some other places, had wonderfully amazed the Catholikes. But that which augmented this alarm, the Prince being too weake, loth to engage himselfe in this forest of halberds, pikes and shot, went to lodge with his troopes in Saint Denis, where some others arising, in few dayes made vpon the number of 2000 horse, and foure thousand shot.

The King assembles his troopes, and had already ten thousand men. But this sudden approach to Paris might perswade them, that the Prince expected speedy and great forces, and that he had good intelligences in Court and at Paris. Paris was the chiefe object of his armes. The Parisiens were not accustomed to fast: taking their viuals from them, he hoped of two things to effect the one, either to force them to fight, or to draw his enemies to a more assured pacification then the first. To this end he sends d'Andelot with 300 horse, towards Poissy and Pontoise, to seize vpon the passages of Seine beneath Paris: and other troopes to seize vpon such places as were about the towne. Some companies were sent to ioine with the forces that came out of Guienne, who should come to Orlance, being lately surprised by la Noue. Hee and the Admirall with about 800 horse, and twelue hundred Harguebuziers keepe Saint Denis, and intrench Saint Owin and Auberrilliers, to curbe Paris on that side.

But how could so many excellent Capitaines vnder take so painefull and vnlikely a designe? May an Antassailan Elephant? How many mighty armies haue in former times lost their labours, thinking to effect such an enterprize? To remaine idle, had impaired their reputation. They were suddenly drawne into it, and they must for their honours sake repute that which occasion seemed to present vnto them. Their men being sicke and full of resolution, made difficult things easie. One thing onely stayed the course of their success. Such places as the Prince hoped to surprise vpon Marne and Seine (whether if he should be forced to abandon Saint Denis, he meant to retire himselfe, and attend his Germans) there were two onely seized on, Laigny and Montcreau. On the other side, the the Constable, Lieutenant general for the King in this army, resolved (having increased his troops) to force the enemy to fight. The great advantages he had, invited him unto it. He had fiftene or sixteene thousand foot, and two thousand Lances: hee was furnished with artillery: hee had a commodious place for a battell, and fit to lodge his troops and Cannon. The Parisiens were prest by famine, and were much grieved to see such tenants in their farms. And many cried already against the Constable, as a great temporizer, and as firme a partisan to his Nephewes, as to the King his master.

Saint Denis.

They were to blame: for hee was no sooner aduertised of the error the Prince had committed in dismembred the body of his army, as we haue heard, but he presently embraced the occasion, sends seuen or eight hundred Lances, followed with some shot for their retreat, to discover the certainty of the protestants forces: and the next day, the 10 of Nouember, he goes to field, with all his army, and giues him battell. The Constables footmen, for the most, did little good, and the Princes very much. The horsemen on either side shewed great resolution and courage. In the end the Protestants are forced from the place, and followed about halfe a quarter of a league, and it may be, but for the Constables hurt (whereof he died within few dayes after) they had beene chased more hotly: but the night fauoured their retreat, and parted the battells. To conclude, the Catholikes were masters of the field, and had the spoile of the dead: and by consequence the honour of the battell, which shall be blemished the next day with a great disgrace.

The Princes
excuse.

This advantage seemed to inuite the Catholikes to perfect their victory the next day: but the losse of the Constable kept them within their walls. The Prince attended a second charge, not thinking his enemies would haue taken it for a repulse: hee therefore sends speedily for d'Andelot, who comes to Saint Denis at mid-night, sorry to haue lost his part of the banker.

Having rested a while, the Commanders conclude to make an attempt to abate some of their aduersaries glory, gotten the day before. They bring their small army to field, present themselves before the suburbs of Paris: stand there some houres in battell, and burnt a village and many wind-mills, to vrge them. But no man comes forth. They bury their dead, dresse their hurt men. The Captaines view their Cornets and Companies and will hazard no more. What should the Prince then doe, being encamped before Paris with a few men? The losse of one man did impart him more then an hundred of his enemies: and to stay there were his ruine. Hee dislodgeth, marcheth to Montereau, and there augments his army with the forces that came to him from Orleans and Estampes.

The death of this incomparable old man (but farre more happy in his age, if hee had shed his blood against the stranger, enemies to this Crowne, the which hee had so freely employed, during all the course of his life, and not against his country-men, yea against his owne blood) gaue the command of the royall army to Henry duke of Aniou, the Kings brother, a Prince of sixteene yeares of age, vpon whose head we shall see the Crowne after his brothers deace. He sought the opportunity to fight: his elder Captaines prest him forward, taking the Princes retreat for a kind of flight, and grounding their advantage vpon the great forces newly arriued of twelve hundred horse, and two thousand foot led by the Count Aremberg, one of the famous Captaines of the Low countries. Moreover, if the Protestants did ioyne with their Reistres, the warre was like to continue long, or else to make the chance of a battell doubtfull. But they disswaded him, weighing the importance of their Generall, and the constant resolution of the contrary party: who (said they) had then no other Councillor but Despaire, and no other wealth or riches, but their armes and horfes.

To withstand the leauy of the Protestants Reistres, the Duke of Aumale was sent into Lorraine to receiue the forces which were brought to the King by Duke Iohn William of Saxony, the Marquis of Bade and other Commanders, and young Lausie into Germany, to diuert those of duke Iohn Casimir, which were leauied in the Princes fauor. The Prince had ioynd with the troops of Guienne and Poitou, consisting of eight cornets of horse and three Regiments of foot, vnder fix and twenty ensignes: and advancing towards Lorraine, he forceth Bray and Nogent vpon Seine to open their gates, and to giue him passage, and seizeth on Elpernay vpon Marne, where he assembles the body of his army.

A coole the heat of such as flie to the ayd of strangers, to stay them, and (it may bee) to surpriseth them. Vnder this pretext they begin to speake of a peace, in the which the chiefe of their party are imployed: and the better to conferre (said they) of the points propounded, they agree vpon two suspensions of armes, either being of three dayes. But whilest the Prince thought to enioy the benefit thereof, hee had almost fallen into a pitfall. The Duke of Aniou approached, and the Prince remained neere vnto Chailons, in a bad lodging farre from his troops, and had it not bene for the rout of the Captaines, Blais, Blasfett, and Clery, defeated by the Earle of Brissac during the truce, the Prince himselfe had bene in apparent danger.

A speech of peace.
The truce broken.

B Misfortune is good for something. This fury of Brissac teacheth the Prince not to trust his enemy, but vpon good assurance. And notwithstanding the iniuries of the Aire, and the difficulties of the wayes, leauing the Duke twenty great leagues behind, he makes him to lose all desire to follow him, and goes on into Lorraine to learne some newes of his Reistres, the which hee receiued at Pont a Mousson. From hence Duke Iohn Casimir, the younger sonne of Frederic Count Palatine of Rhine, Elektor of the sacred Empire, being chiefe of this army, protests by writing vnto the King before he enters into France, That he comes not for any profit of his owne, or priuate respect: but only to assist those who assisted for the same Religion, had required his helpe. That if it please his Majesty to assure them liberty of conscience, and free exercise of their Religion, he is ready to retire himselfe.

C Hereupon they renewed their treaty of peace pretended the yeare before. The Queene-Mother comes to Bois de Vincennes, accompanied with the Cardinals of Bourbon, Lorraine, and Guise. For the Prince there came the Cardinal of Chastillon. Hee lets her vnderstand, That to settle a peace in France, the King must receiue all his subiects into grace, impart his fauours and the offices of the Realme indifferently vnto them, and giue them conuenient liberty of their Religion. Katherine answers, that such matches are not to be allowed: that the Prince and those of his party should before all things countermand their Reistres, lay downe armes, and come and yeeld the King a reason of the enterprife of Meaux. The Cardinall replies, that they only defend themselves, that they oppose these succours to all sorts of strangers called in by the Catholikes, and cannot send them backe, but they must presently subiect their throats to their enemies swords: that they are ready to disarme when they shall see the Realme freed from Swisses, Flemings, Italians, and Germanes, which were come to spoile them, and matters restored to their former estate. As for the enterprife of Meaux, their intention was onely to beseech the King (from whose presence the violence of their enemies deuiued them of all access, but by force) to reuoke that cruell sentence, which some determined to execute against all their party, being ready to proue by armes against all those that would maintaine the contrary, that they had neuer any other will against their Soueraigne, but as his most faithfull and obedient subiects.

peace cannot but in vain.

During this negotiation, the Duke of Aniou fought for the commodity which hee had lost to fight with the Prince, and the Prince receiued his strangers with a wonderfull contentment to the whole army, fearing lest the heauinesse of the Germanes, should make them attend long in Lorraine. They expected a hundred thousand crownes at their entry, but they which had so suddenly drawne them to horsebacke, must haue leisure to make money: At last they make a vertue of necessity. And what might not two Commanders, (whereof the one by his natural pleasantness, and the other by his grauity, tempering the excessive cholle of some, and the exceeding suspicion of others) obaine of their men, amongst whom they had so great credit. The Prince by their example summons both great and small: the Ministers in their Sermons moue men, and the Captaines prepare their soldiers. Every one contributes, some for zeale, some for loue, some for feare, and some for shame of reproach. They gather, what in money, plate, chaines, gold and Jewels, some foure score thousand Frankes, and by this voluntary liberality satisfie the first and greatest hunger of their Reistres. Being ioynded, the generall opinion was, to make warre about Paris: an apparent meane to haue a peace. Orleans was their nurse, neither could they from any place euer couer artillery, munition, and money, so commodiously. They therefore take the way to Beauce, and for their first beginning they defeat some troops of Italians and French, that came to charge them in the reuerward vpon their passage of the Riuer of Seine. They force Itancy, and passe ouer the Rivers of Yonne, Loire, and

Cure:

Cure: they draw diuers commodities from all the small townes opposite to their passage, A always assailing and alwaies assailed, and still with the losse of the one party or the other.
Whilst this companie(having the mighty army of the Duke of Anjou opposite vnto them) marched into Beaulieu, they fall to armes in other parts in fauour of their party. Affier, Sipierre, and others in Languedoc, Prouence, Daulphine, and Gascogne, make diuers as-semblies, seize vpon Nismes, Montpellier, and many other places. Ponscat and Verdelay leauy troops in Bourbonnois and Auvergne, whereas the forces of Guienne which marched towards the Duke of Anjou, encounters them, breaks them, and for that time makes their attempts fruitlesse. Moreover, the Duke of Nevers, with an army of fourteene thousand French, Suisses, and Italians, besieged Mafcon, battered it, and tooke it by composition, B but being incourted by fourescore horse, and some foot, issued out of Antrain, vnder the commands of Capitaine Beauvais and Bourgeois, as he aduanced with an hundred horse, to visit the Duchesse his wife, he was shot in the knee with an Harguebuze, which made him lame all the remainder of his life.

Montluc, Pons, the Bishop of Tullus, and many other Catholikes in Guienne, being followed with foure thousand foot, and seuen hundred horse, surprise and kill about foure hundred men, spoile the Isle of Re, attempt to besiege Rochel: but too long delays makes their designe fruitlesse.

In the meane time the Viconts of Bourniguet, Montclar, Paulin, Gourdon, Mouuans, Rapin, and other Protestants, aduanced with seuen or eight thousand men, of the bands C of Gascogne, Prouence, Daulphine, and Languedoc. Saint Heran Gouvernor of Auvergne, Saint Chaumont, Gordes, Vrfe, the Bishop of Puy, Hatefeuille, Brefieux, and others, assemble a troop to stop their passage, and runne as to a certain victorie, forbidding expressly all the neighbour townes, To receiue any one that flies, what liuery sener he beares. The which shall cost them full deare. The Viconts charge these horsemen, kill a great number, and of the chiefe, vpon the place: put the rest to rout, and makes them seeke their safety by flight.
But the Pelants armed with the former prohibition, know no man, neither doe they spare any man, but make of their country-men as great a slaughter as the victor did, & by this indirect stratagem, open the way for the Viconts to recouer Orleanse. Being ariued, they slay the inroads which Martineghe, Richelieu, and others made, euen to the gates of Or-leanse: they take Baugency, attempt Blois, and take it by composition. The Gascons doe not easily forget their hands, and the souldiers of Richelieu, who were retired thither, could not free themselves from the sword.

Hereupon the Princes army comes into Beaulieu. Chartres is one of the chiefe store-houses of corne for Paris, and being taken would much auale the Protestants. Liquieres was made Gouvernor for the King there, and two and twenty companies, fortified vpon feare of a siege with a Regiment of foot. The Prince besiegeth and batters it, but to small purpose: five Cannons and foure small Culuerins prevailed little against so many men of warre, being intrenched with great aduantage. They found out a place of small strength, where a breach gaue hope of victory: but the Lord of Valette, a great Capitaine, E comes to succour the besieged, with eighteen cornets of horse. The Admirall is aduer-sified: and not to faile of his prey, hee made choice of three thousand five hundred horse, marcheth towards them, chargeth Valette, ouerthrowes part of his troops, carries away four cornets, and puts the rest to flight. The Duke of Anjou encamped beyond Seine, and loth to hazard a battell, left Chartres in apparent danger. But Katherine knew how (for so she did vially vaunt) with three sheets of paper to effect more then her warriors with their armes.

A good peace was no lesse necessary then wisht for. The Protestants did generally beleeue, that the Catholikes would disarme with them, and the Nobilitie were particularly moued with a great desire to see their houses (it is a desire whereof we can hardly stay the effects in them that are voluntaries.) Many whole cornets had already taken the way of Xaintonge and Poitou, they would not lose the season of their vines: many other pretend the lacking of their houses, where their presence was necessary: the footmen of some Counties lying farthest off, slip away daily, their purses were empty, and no man paid.
It was in March when as armies are accustomed to goe to field, and their French forces decreasing visibly, had driuen them in short time to stand vpon their defence: their enemies were whole and strong. To diuide their strangers into townes, were to dismember them.

Chartres besieged.

1568

A second peace.

A themselves. These considerations and others, made the heads of the Protestants to accept of a second Edict of pacification, concluded in Loniueau, saying: That those of the pretended reformed Religion, should purely and simply enjoy the first Edict, and that it should be executed according to the tenour, notwithstanding all restrictions, modifications, inter- pretations, and declarations made since the day of the date thereof, untill the publication of this second Declaration made the three and twentieth day of March.

This counterfeit peace caried Iohn Casimir with all his forces home into Germany: the Prince, and the Admirall, with all those of his party, retire euery man to his home. But diuers breaches of this Edict, did suddenly open the gate to the third ciuill war: and whilst B that enery one imputes the cause of this sudden reffrall of armes to his enemy, the effects fall both vpon good and bad. The Catholikes groundeth their discontents, for that many townes refused the restraint made by this last Edict. Sancerre, Montauban, and other townes of Quercy, Viuarets, Daulphine, Languedoc, and elsewhere, would not absolutely submit themselves to his Maiesties good pleasure. Rochel refused to receiue the garison sent by Larnac their ancient Gouvernor: they continued their fortifications before begun, neither did they restore the Catholikes to their offices, goods, nor religion: they armed out ships to keepe the Seas, without the Kings allowance. They refused the ayde and subvention, which his Maiesty required for the affaires of his Realme. Many Captains C of Alba, to draw afterwards (aid they) the Protestants of Flanders into France, and ioint-ly to oppress the Catholike Religion.

The Protestants on the other side complained, That in stead of enjoying the Edict and liberty of their consciences, they gaue them declarations vnder the Kings authority, to hinder the exercise of their Religion: That hauing dismissed their men, both strangers and French, with the least oppression of the people that might be, and deliuered into the Kings hands the townes and strong places which they held: yet they receiued the Suisses, they entertained many companies of Italians, they did distribute their horse and foot into such townes as did most import the Protestants: Tours, Orleans, Amiens, and others, to the end (said they) to take them like Partridges in a net, being retired to their houses. That they sued in the Court of Rome for leaue to sell the temporall lands of the French Clergie, to the value of an hundred and fifty thousand Frankes by yeare, the money to be employed to the rooting out of their party: That this counterfeit peace ruined more of their men, then the rigours of warre: That they guarded townes, bridges, and passages of riuers. These grudgings were openly published, when as another occasion makes them both to speake boldly, and to take armes.

The complaints of the Protestants.

In a manner all the Duke of Anious horse stayed about Paris, with five or six thousand foot, vnder colour to fortifie the guards of the King, the Queene-mother, his brethren, and the capitall Citie: and Tauannes sent towards Bourgongne with many companies, made them suspect that it was to beset and surprise the Prince at Noyers, a little and weak E towne of his owne, and the Admirall at Tanlay, a Castle belonging to his brother d'An- delot. Some acquainted with his practice giue them aduice: they complaine, to the King of the iniustice is done them, beseeching his Maiesty to quench the fires kindled in his Realme by the factions of the Guisens, and to free themselves they take Rochel for their Sanctuary.

This braue prey being thus escaped, Katherine and the faction (sent forth Commissions, and appoint the rendezvous for the troops in Guienne and Poitou. The Duke of An-

Prince her son, (who succeeded afterwards to this Crowne) and the Princess her daugh-

many of the enemies troops are lodged in his way. He sends to discover them; and finding them lodged at large, after the French manner, passeth brauely through them, with the losse but of twenty men, and with the gaine of an Ensigne, and the slaughter of about fourescore of his enemies: and recouers Saumur, whilst that D'Andelot, la Noue, and other Commanders ioyned with the Prince. If the Dukes of Aniou, Montpensier, and Martigues, who assembled men from all parts to oppose a mighty army against the Protestants, had in time fore-seene, that those which d-lodged in so great haste, went to seeke their fortunes farre off, and had fought to crosse their designs, the Prince and all his part had in all shewes beene coopt vp in Rochel. But behold, of poore vagabonds in two moneths they become masters of Niort, Fontenay, Saint Maixent, Xaintes, Saint Iohn d'Angely, Pons, Cognac, Blay, Angoulesme, and are strong enough for the continuance of a long warre. While the Dukes arme, the King begins the warre against the Protestants by the Pen. He declares by his proclamation, that the Edict of Ianuary had bene but prouisionally, vntill he were of full age: that now he forbids all exercise of the pretended reformed religion, in all the territories of his obedience: forfeits both the bodies and goods of them that shall breake it: commands all Ministers vpon great penalties, to depart the Realme within fifteene dayes. And by another, he suspends all officers making profession thereof, from their offices and charges, commanding them to resigne them into his hands within fifteene dayes.

The Protestants make their profit of these Edicts, and send them into Germany, England, and to the Suisses of their Religion, to proue, That they are not persued as Rebels affecting the Crowne, (crimes by the which their enemies would make them odious.) And in truth these Edicts were spurs to hasten the leauie which the Duke of Deuxponts shall bring the next yeare, and for the heads of Dauphine, Prouence, and Languedoc, to goe and oppose the forces of the said Provinces against the Kings army, which was ready to fall vpon the Prince. To this end, Acier, Mouuans, Pierre Gourde, and others, draw forth sixtene or seuenteen thousand shot, but few horse: seeming with this multitude of men to haue vn-peopled all that Climate. But as they did fortifie the Princes affaires on the one side, they did weaken them on the other: for after their departure, the Catholikes seized vpon many places, the which they might well haue held, lodging halfe their forces in them, then marching in troop close and speedily, they might haue arised late where their preference was most profitable and necessary.

But the presumption of equality, doth commonly engender a pernicious ielousie among great men: and the opinion one conceives of his forces, and of his owne valour, with an obstinacy not to yeeld vnto another, is a dangerous plague in an armie. Mouuans and Pierre Gourde, finding themselves annoyed by strait lodging, as they had done till they came neere to Perigueux, they meane to lie more at large at Mensignac, not discovering that the Duke of Montpensier approached, who at his arriual puts in rout two Regiments, and kills a thousand souldiers at their Colonels feet: who selling their liues dearly, forye the Dukes troops, as they could not charge Acier: yet they were amazed by the fearefull report of such as were escaped, who made the Dukes forces exceeding great, beyond all truth, who retiring to Chastelleraud, made the way open for Aciers troops, which remained of this shipwracke, to fortifie the Protestants army, and to make it able, not only to endure the shooke, but to attempt something against the Catholikes. The Prince did muster his army about eighteen thousand Harguebuziers, and three thousand good horse. The Duke had ten thousand foot, beside Suisses, and foure thousand lances: the souldiers of both armies were well experienced in warre.

He that takes not the French in their first heat, they are easily broken: the chiefe sinewes of warre failing, might greatly coole this new vigour: and Winter approaching, withdraw the greatest part of them. The Prince therefore seeks to fight: the number and courage of F his men inuities him. He comes within two leagues of Chastelleraud, and by his approach annoyes the Duke of Aniou: the Duke moued with the like desire, and grieved to see so many men at the Princes deuotion, knowing also that the forces of Germany would be ready to march in their fauour in the Spring, seeks to diuide his enemies power, and to overcome them by peece-meale. Our first motions are sudden, but they doe not alwaies bring forth effects premeditated. To come to a battell, was properly to cut away the sinewes of the Realme, and by their mutuall weakening, to inuite the forraine enemy to the inuasion

A inuasion of this Estate. The soueraigne Commander of battels did shew at this time a signe of his accustomed fauour to this Crowne, taking from both the Generals the sharpnesse of their iudgements, and making them to lose in one day a notable occasion for either of them to preuaile against his enemy, as we shall heare.

The Prince had intelligence, that the Duke camped in a place of aduantage, vnder the fauour of a meadow, intrenched on diuers parts: so notable to draw his enemy to fight, he dislodged, and goes towards Lusignan. The Duke takes the same course, and one not acquainted with the others designs, the Marshals of both Campes meet in a manner at one instant at Pamprou, five leagues from Poitiers, a great village furnished with victuals, and

B in a very good country. They chase and re-chase one another, but loath to dispute this Rendezvous with more hazard, they both leaue it (yet with an honourable retreat of either side) to put themselves in battell, a quarter of a league from the place. The Admirall and D'Andelot his brother, supported their men with five Cornets of horse, set in order vpon a small hill, to keepe the Catholikes from viewing the valley, and to giue them some apprehension of greater forces lodged there. The Prince was a league from thence, and aduanced with great speed. On the Dukes part there appeared seven or eight hundred Lances, commanded by the Duke of Martigues. Being approached within Cannon shot, the Admirall causeth a Captaine of Argoleiters to aduance alongst a hedge, who more valiant then discreet, fals presently to skirmish, and their cornet marcheth to second them.

C Martigues thinks that they meane to fight, and sends forth three or foure squadrons of Lanciers: the Admirall and his brother grieved they had not prevented the indiscretion of their Captaine, who ingaged them to fight vnadvisedly, and contrary to their charge, calls back these skirmishers, and with an assured countenance covers the weaknesse of their troops. Martigues taking a troop of seruants for a battalion of Harguebuziers which appeared behind a village, stayes his Lanciers, and for want of footmen, loseth the opportunity to fight. In the meane time the Ensignes of foot, and troops of horse arise from all parts: the night approaching, gaue them leisure only to skirmish with the Duke of Anious fore-ward. The Dukes fore-ward was too weak to endure the shooke: the Commanders deuise a policy, whereby they perswade the enemy, through fauour of the night,

D that all their forces were present: their Drums found after the Suisses manner, they double their guards, make great fires, cast many matches amongst the bushes, keepe their men close without any skirmish, lest some prisoner should discover the truth, and after they had refreshed themselves, they dislodge without any noise, some marching to Iafeneuil, where the Duke lodged with the battell, the rest to the village of Sansey. So holding one another in suspense, they lose the opportunity of a great aduantage, the first in the Duke, the second in the Prince. Mans counsell without God preuailes nothing, and, The actions of great men, are in his power, as those of the meanest. So saith the Oracle. For the next day many things chanced more by hazard then by counsell. This retreat giues them courage to fight: to this end the Admirall follows them at the heeles, and the Prince marcheth after. There were two wayes; one led to Sansey, the other to Iafeneuil. At the break of day there riseth a great mist, which causeth the Prince to stray: after he had marched two leagues, he finds himselfe in the front of the Dukes armie. Necessity giues him resolution: he puts his Harguebuziers before, which were about twelve thousand and forced to make some shew of fight, salutes the Duke with his Cannon, skirmishes with diuers volleys of shot, sends to learne newes of his fore-ward, and wils the Admirall to make haste.

He had already turned head vpon the noise of the Cannon; but the Sunne setting at his arriual, preventing a generall fight, caused all to passe in sharpe skirmishes, with losse on either side: and after a daies breathing either part retired, the Duke to Poitiers, the Prince to Mirebeau.

F Few dayes after, they both returne to their first resolution to fight. The Duke goes to field and recouers Mirebeau. But he doth not obserue the composition, and giues D'Andelot cause for a reuenge, to cut in pieces the garison he finds in S. Florent, an Abbey neere vnto Saumur. The Prince held Loudun. It was in the Dukes way, and enioying it, he held a fertile Country from his enemies, which might feed his armie a moneth together: and there was no reason the Prince should hazard his forces for the keeping of a weak place. The Duke approacheth: the next day he hath newes that the Prince puts his army in battell alongst the suburbs: he likewise arangeth his: the Cannon playes on both sides, and passeth through their squadrons doing some harme. About four thousand men almost all French, beheld one another in the midst of a champion field, without any advantage, and with an equal courage and countenance attend but the signe of battell. But the outward cold did quench much of this inward heat: the frosts were great, continual mists, and the wayes so slippery, as no man could hold his footing. It was dangerous for the first that charged, the slippery wayes stayed their horses, and the maine ditches (made to diuide the lands) serued them as trenches. So as either of them being loath to hazard any thing (stand firm, beholding one another, expecting when the most rash should begin the charge. Such as goe to the skirmish, either breake or put some member out of ioynt: their fals hurt more then the shot. Three dayes passe in this sort, the fourth the Duke retires to warme his troops benumbed with cold, and for the most part lodged in the open aire (of twenty yeares there had not bene felt so sharpe a winter,) in his retreat three companies were cut off in a village, one of Swisses, and two of French, and the sicknesse falling among the souldiers, diminished both the armies of eight thousand men. This fruitlesse abode caused a generall murmur, and both Nobility and souldiers on either partie did threaten, if they were not lodged in safe and well fortified places, they would provide for themselves, notable to endure the extreme frosts and cold without any effect. The two Commanders agree. The Duke goes to winter beyond the riuer of Loire about Saumur, and the Prince at Thouars, Montreuil-Bellay, and places thereabouts, either hauing some secret practice against his enemy, but with small effect. This retreat gaue the Prince leisure to deuise meanes for the maintenance of the warre. The goods of the Clergy of Poitou were ingaged and sold to them that durst buy them: The Rochelais contribute foure score thousand Frankes, and the Queene of England sent an hundred thousand Angels, six Cannons, powder and shot, for the which shee was paid in Salt, Wooll, and Bell-metall, for the most part at the Catholikes cost.

5. Michael besieged.

The Abbey of Saint Michael alone, amongst all the other places of base Poitou, bridled the Protestants. They besiege it, batter it, and take it at the third assault, and cut foure or five hundred men in pieces which defended it. Martinengus, Entragues, and la Chastre Governors of Guienne, Orlence, and Bourges, beseege Sancerre, giue many assaults, lose many men, and finally tyred with many sallies, leaue this small towne in quiet, D to be hereafter a myrrour of singular patience in the preservation of their liues and families. But those of Sancerre, seeking to enlarge themselves, and to build a fort vpon Loire, suffer themselves to bee surpris'd, lose both fort and some fifty men, and are enforced to shut themselves within their wals.

During the sharpnesse of Winter, and this small surceasing of armes, the Vicounts of Bourniquet, Montclar, Paulin, Gourdon, and others, with seven thousand shot, and some horse, made war, especially against them of Tolouza. Montauban was their chiefe retreat, and experience had lately taught them; That it were better to defend the Province and their Country-men against Montluc and their enemies, then transporting their armes into a strange Country, to leaue them againe in prey. Piles was commanded to perswade them to ioyne with the Prince. At their refusal, he armes twelve hundred shot, and two hundred horse, takes Bergerac and Saincte Foy: passeth into Perigord, burning all the Villages: and to purge the death of Mouuans and Pierre Gourde, hee kills all that were suspected of their overthrow: and so he marcheth towards the Prince.

The Prince had now taken breath, and hearing that the Duke marched towards Angoulême, fortified with three thousand foot, & some horse which the Earle of Tende brought him, and two thousand Reistres led by the Reingraue and Balsompierre, hee retires along the Riuer of Charente, to view the Dukes countenance, and to fortifie the places of his obedience: but with the prejudice of his army. The Duke comes likewise to Chasteauneuf, a towne vpon the Riuer of Charente, and at the first takes a castle by composition, F which was kept by a Scottisshman. The Admirall likewise arriues, followed with seven or eight hundred horse, and as many Harguebuziers: and to hinder the Dukes passage, he lodgeth two Regiments of foot neere vnto the bridge, seconded by the horse: charging them to vex the enemies guards with continuall alarmes, to make them thinke, that all the Princes vanguard was lodged there, and then he retires to Bassac, with the rest of the vanguard. But this commandement wrought no effect. They had forgotten the manner of camping, euery one would lodge, liue, and forage at his ease: so as the

A most part going to quarter elsewhere, and leauing the passage vnfortified of men, make the passage easie for the Duke. The Duke, through the care of the Lord of Biron, repairs the bridge, makes another of boats, and in the night passeth the riuer of Charente. At the breake of day, fifty horse being in guard, a quarter of a League off, discouers the enemies troops that passed, and aduertise the Admirall: (the Prince being a League beyond at Iarnac) the Admirall sends for his men dispersed in their lodgings, to come vnto him, and to make their retreat together, and in the meane time hee attended them at Bassac.

In a great action all delays are dangerous. He spends three houres to attend them, and B might easily haue retired, if his troops had bene ioynd. Hee had nine cornets of horse, and some Ensignes of foot. Montgomery, Acier, and Ponsault were Colonels, whom hee was loath to lose. Being all ioynd with him (except Acier, who could not arise in time with his six thousand shot) he finds all the Dukes army past, making shew by their skirmishes, that that day, being the 13 of March, should not passe without a battell. The Prince was aduanced halfe a league in his retreat, but he was too well bred to see his friends ingaged, and to fight in his absence. Hee turnes head towards the Admirall, with those few horse he could suddenly draw out of his battell: for he camped not, but his armie was dispersed into quarters. The Admirall making his retreat, encounters a small riuer, which could not be passed but in two or three places. Then the Duke sends forth the flower of all his horse, being seven or eight hundred, who at the first, overthrow foure Cornets, take la Noue, and la Loue fighting, vanquish Ponsault, charge D'Andelot, but with the death of Montfalez, and fifteene or sixteene others of account.

The battle of Bassac.

In the end the Prince and the Admirall fee themselves in a manner ingaged betwixt all the Dukes forces and the riuer of Charente: they goe to the charge, first the Admirall and then the Prince, and at the first make them turne their backs that were before them: and now they endured a second charge, more fierce and of longer continuance. But suddenly all the army fals vpon them, their horsemen are in rout, the Princes horse slaine, and he overthrowne vnder him, abandoned by his troops, and prisoner to the Lord of Argence, to whom he had yeelded, but he was shot in the head with a pistol by Montguyon a Gascon, D and Captaine of the Princes guards. A lesson for great men, and a maxime of warre: That a Generall should not fight, but being forced, for that in the losse of his person consists the ruine of his army. This Prince hath left this memory of him, to haue yeelded to noman of his age, neither in courage nor courtesie, eloquent in speech, liberrall, affable to all the world, and a most excellent Commander in warre. The Protestants lost in this battell neere foure hundred men, most horsemen, and few footmen of account: la Tour a Poiteuain Sea Captaine, young Chasteliers, Portant, Chandenier, Melanthere, Brandanier, the eldest of the Bessons, the younger of Tabariere, Barrete, la Mestray, and a great number of other gentlemen of diuers Prouinces, many wounded, and many prisoners: the amazement and disorder being so great, as they could not stye fast enough. Of Catholikes there E died about two hundred, amongst the which were Montfalez, the Barons of Ingrand, and Prunay of the house of Billy, the Earles of Mirandole, of Morette, Montcaure, Linieres, and some others of marke.

The Prince of Conde slaine.

Many Protestants would haue gathered together againe, but they pursued them too neere, and the Reistres arriuing in the pursuit, so hastened them that fled, as night surprized them in the midst of their flight. The Admirall and d'Andelot not able to pacifie the amazement, nor repaire the disorder, tooke their way towards Saint Iean d'Angely: and gaue the rendezvous for them that escaped at Xaintes, whither the young Princes of Navarre and Conde were retired. The body of the army was entred into Cognac. The footmen with their Commanders, Acier, Beaudinot, Blacons, Chellar, Mirabel, and many others, and of the horse, Montgomery, Chaumont, and others. To dislodge them from Cognac, the victorious Duke sends to besiege it: but his attempts against Cognac, his intelligences within Saint Iean d'Angely, and his fruitlesse threats that hee vsed against Angoulême, slayed the course of his victory.

In the meane time the Protestants gather together the pieces of this shipwrack: the Admirall led the Princes to Tonay-Charente, hee tooke view of the horse: Henry Prince of Navarre was declared Generall, and Henry Prince of Conde an assistant, foure thousand masters tooke the oath, d'Andelot gathers the foot-men together, provided for money, and stayed the enemies courtes, when as a burning feuer took him out of this world the 27. A day of May in Xaintes, leaving for ever a surname purchased by him of a Knight without feare. Acier did succeed him in his charge, Beaunau la Noe had his company of men at armes, but the Admirall the care and government of the whole army, with the managing of the chiefe affaires which concerned the Protestants estate. The Dukes army did ouerrunne Xaintonge, Angoulmois, and Limosin, vnder the conduct of the Earle Brissac, Colonell of the Infantry of France. Having recovered Aubierre, and some other places from the Protestants, he attempts Mucidan, being vigorously battered, and valiantly defended. In the end it is burnt to ashes, the castle endures some assault, the most worthy men of the Regiments of Brissac, Montius, and Escars, lose their lines there, and finally Brissac himselfe approaching to view the breach and the defenses, is shot into the head and slaine vpon the counterscarpe, leaving a wonderfull griefto them that knew him, being now but five or six and twenty yeares old, and might in time haue proued one of the valiantest and greatest Captaines of his age. Yet necessity forced the besieged to a composition, to depart with bag and baggage. But the impatience to haue lost their Colonels, and so many braue souldiers, made most of them to be slaine, issuing out of their wals. Piles recompensed this losse by the taking of the Isle of Medoc betwixt Bourdeaux and Rochel, the spoile whereof enriched all his troop. Then Wolfgang Count Palatine of the Rhine, and Duke of Deuxponte, brought vnto the Princes about six thousand Reistres, and five thousand Lanquenets. Ciuill warres alwayes make the way open to a neighbor stranger, the which he durst not attempt without the support of one partie. The difficulty was to ioinne with the Princes being farre off, and without a French conuoy it could hardly be done: but see what chanceth vnlookt for.

Mouy, Lenis, Morilliers, Feguiers, Esprenay, and others, had in the beginning of this third inciuill warre, assembled five or fix hundred horse, and two thousand harguebuziers, whom the difficulty to passe into Guienne had transported into Brabant to the Prince of Auranges; Count Ledenike his brother, and Count Volrad of Mansfield, who having for a time entertained the warre with a variable successe against the Spaniard, passed the Meuse and offered battell to the Duke of Alua: but he sought onely to consume them for want of victuals, whereof they were so scantied, as necessity casting them backe into France, they came to Vitry, and so strucke vp into Germany, and by their arriuall gaue Wolfgang the helpe he desired. Wee must now begin anew. The Duke of Aniou leaues Guienne, and takes the way of Berry, to keepe the Duke of Deuxponte from ioining with the Princes: but it had bene better to haue prevented his entry into the Realme. To this end, the King commits two armies, the one to the Duke of Aumale, the other to the D. of Nemours (neither of them being fortunate in war) both strong in footmen, but weaker in horse then the Germane. They aduance vnto Sauerne: coast the Germane Duke, who crost through Bourgonne, presse him on the flanks, and behind with sundry skirmishes, and oftentimes encounter goodly and fauourable occasions, which they let slip for want of iudgement and good correspondency, the true bond of the brauest exploits that may be practised in warre. But was it not a want of iudgement in those two great Commanders, fortified with twelve hundred horse and four thousand foot sent by the Pope, to leaue La Charite vnfortified of men, knowing well that the Protestants could not passe the Riuier of Loire, without getting by force, or surprizing some of the passages thereon? Wolfgang attempts La Charite, presteth it, terrifies it, and takes it, before that any succors can come, and thereby shortens his way about threescore leagues, where hee must haue passed at the head of Loire, and frees himselfe from a passage full of wood and mountain, whereas the horsemen would haue bene but an incumbrance.

The Admirall could by no means fauour these succours (for he had the Duke of Anious army in front) and holding it as a matter impossible for the Reistres to get a passage vpon the Riuier of Loire, he attended hourly newes of their rout. But aduertised of the successe: Behold (said he) a good signe: let vs make it absolute by our diligence and resolution. So the Princes aduance towards the marches of Limosin, to keepe the Dukes army occupied, whilest that their Reistres marching through the Country performed the funerals of the D. of Deuxponte, who being lately deceased of an ague, left the command of the army to the Earle of Mansfield, and in the end of Iune both the Protestant armies ioynd, the which vnited together made about five and twenty thousand fighting men: and in the Kings,

A Kings, they numbred about thirty thousand. The Country of Limosin is fruitful, and the fertility of the soile forced the troops to lie dispersed, the which might easily cause some surprize: but the Admirall desired rather to prevent then be prevented. The Dukes army camped at Rochelle. To surprize him they march, resolute to giue him battell, and are in view of the enemy before he hath taken any alarme of them.

Three hundred Harguebuziers of Colonell Strassie kept the principal approach to this lodging, being strong both by situation and nature: and happy were they to be lodged in a place of defence. At the first brunt Strassie relieves them with five hundred others who the space of an houre held good against foure thousand of the Princes shot, while the Dukes army was put in battell. This passage being vnease to force, the Admirall sends forth foure Cornets of horse which renew the charge: they breake vp certaine palizados which couered *Strassie*s Regiments, kill two and twenty Captaines, and five or sixe hundred men vpon the place: take their Colonell (without whole resistance the Princes foreward had passed euen vnto the Cannon without any let) put the rest to flight, and nothing but the raine that fell hindred the successe of a great victory, the which was continued the next day by a skirmish against two hundred Italians, and some horsemen of the Duke of Nemours, whereof many slue some,ooke others, and chased the rest, being mounted vpon horses of aduantage fit for such a retreat.

After this encounter, the Duke sent to refresh his troops vntill the beginning of October, in the garisons neere to Guienne: giuing the Princes by this meanes leisure to seize vpon many places, both by force and composition: Tuiers, S. Suplice, Brantonne, Chasteau l'Eueque, La Chapelle, Confolant, Chabannes, S. Genais, and others. Whilest the Duke rested, the Earle of Lude, Gouernor of Poitou, promised wonders; but more in words then in effects. He had five thousand foot, and some cornets of horse, whereof hee had foure ouerthrowne by La Noue, neere vnto Niort: the Princes absence encouraged him to besiege Niort: where Puissault entred in despite of the assailants: hee sustained three assaults and some calamities, forcing Lude after the losse of five hundred men to raise the siege. In the meane time the Princes approached neere to Poitou, and at the first had taken Chastelleraud by composition the 12. of Iuly, and the 21. following, Luignay, D. Coutre, Sanlay, Viuonne, and other small places about Poitiers, to cut off victuals from the towne. At the same time, the subjects of the Queene of Nauarre had their part in the Cake. Terride gouernor of Quercy, had accepted the Commission, to summon the Quee and the Prince her sonne to leaue the party of the pretended Reformed Religion: if not, to invade the countries of Bearne, Foix, and Nauarre. So accompanied with Nigrepelisse, Sainte Columbe, and others, hee had easily reduced all to the Kings obedience, and held Nauarrin besieged, the onely strong place that remained to the Queene.

The Princes send the Earle of Montgomery to encounter him, who with a small army of five hundred horse, and foure thousand foot, forced Terride to raise the siege, and to retire himselfe into Orthez. His men were dispersed, and to prevent him from gathering E them together, the Earle pursues him, besiegeth him, giues an assault, forceth the towne, and makes a great slaughter: and to beat Terride with his owne armes, he suddenly plants the Cannon he found in the towne against the Castle. Terride vanquished with these terrible stratagems, yeelds vpon composition, to depart with their liues and goods: Sainte Columbe, the Baron of Pordiac, Gobas, Tamas, and some others of the Queenes subiects, were excepted in the Capitulation, and as guilty of treason (having seized vpon her places, and stirred her subiects to rebellion) were put to death. This resolute repulse of Terride, and the execution of the aboue-named, did suddenly reduce all the other places to the Queenes obedience, and the Earle hauing manned the townes of his new conquests, came to Nérac, made warre a while with the neighbour Garisons, and so came to the Princes F armie. Let vs see the progresse of their armes. La Charite gaue the Protestants meanes to annoy the Provinces on this side Loire, and taking this place from them, then the Duke of Aumale should recover many commodities to refresh his armie.

To this end he appoints Sanlay, who was yet a Nouice in Commissions of such importance. Yet he gathers together out of the Garisons of Orleans, Bourges, Chartres, Neuers, Gien, and other townes, about seven thousand foot, and five or six hundred horse, besiegeth La Charite, being yet but weakly fortified, changeth and re-changeth his battery, ouerthrowes a great part of the wall, and sends to the assault, the which was so resolutely defended, that of an hundred of the assailants scarce five returned to the campe: and upon a false brute, that the Princes came to succour it, the besiegers display their Ensignes, and without any farther inquiry, recover their Garisons, after a monthes siege, and the losse of about an hundred men. Within few dayes after, Blossi, Bais, and others, disbanded from the campe to visit their families, forsaie the towne, spoile the Country, and by the taking of Douzy, Pouilly, Antrain, Saint Leonard, and other small townes, they made the way open to Berry, Niernois, and the neighbour Countries. The siege of Poitiers was lesse fatal, and of as small successe for the Protestants. The Admirall held opinion to force Saint Maixent, then Saumur, and to fortifie it speedily, to have a passage upon the River of Loire, neere vnto them, and to transport the warre towards Paris in the time of haruest. Poitiers was then very well furnished: the Dukes of Guise and of Mayenne had put themselves into it: many Captaines and companies both of horse and foot shewed a great resolution for the defence thereof, vnder the ensignes of the two young brethren: these great and spacious townes being commonly the sepulchre of armies: yet all these reasons were of no force. The Nobility thereabouts preferring profit before honor, vrged the contrary: That Poitiers was indeed strong of men, but weak of defence, and to be forced: That this place taken, would be the conquest of all Poitou, a rich Prouince, the which would disappoint the Duke of Anjou of an assured retreat. But the hope of spoile was an enticing bait to draw them vnto it: for the more men are within it (said the Nobility) the greater shall our booty bee. Yet the respect of their private profits made them forget the constant resolution of such as had vnderaken to guard it, the great means they had to defend themselves, and their small prouision of artillery, munition, pioneers, and other things necessary for the siege.

In the end, plurality of voices caries it. The Princes lose some weekes before Poitiers. The towne is commanded by hills, which annoy them: but their slow batterie giues them time to fortifie the breach, and force the assailants to make new attempts elsewhere, and with the like successe. Hunger oppressed the Citizens, hauing lost many Captaines, with a great number of souldiers: and the plague afflicted the Princes campe: those within find a good meane for their liberty: and the Princes an honest cause to dislodge. The Duke of Anjou vnderstanding the extremity of the besieged, and that the Protestants armie began to dissolue, propounds two things to the Commanders, either to free Poitiers, or to suffer a place of that importance to be lost, in the which were many of their confident friends. Hee besieged Chastelleraud, and makes a breach: the French will haue the point: the Italians contend for it. In the end, the chance of the dice giues it them. They come brauely to the assault: the French disdaine to follow them, and they within defend the breach. They overthrow the most resolute with a furious volley of shot, and force the rest to retire in confusion, leauing five Ensignes vpon the breach, about two hundred and fifty slain, and a great number wounded, whereof many died. This was the 7 of September. They prepared for a second attempt, when as the Princes taking this second assault for a lawful occasion, raise their siege, where with they were no lesse troubled to depart with their honour, then the besieged were prest with extreme necessity. The Duke hauing no compleat army, and seeing his designe successe, dislodgeth all night, retires to Celle in Touraine, passeth Vienne and Creuse, lodgeth his troops and artillery in a place of aduantage, gathers together all his dispersed bands: and now the way is prepared for a second battell, and a notable victory.

The Princes being aduertised of this sudden retreat, take it for a kind of flight: march all night after them, passe the riuers, put themselves in battell, to force the Duke, or to make him retire to Tours, where the King then remained. Both the armies are in battell: but betwixt them is a small riuier, which makes the country moorish and very vnfit for a generall fight, so as they could not ioyne their battells, and had no meane to bring the Cannon without hazard to lose it. The Duke who was lodged in Celle, a village well intrenched, flanked and gabioned, covered on the one side by a Riuier, and on the other with a wood, could not by any skirmishes be drawne to fight, vntill he had vntied all his forces. The Princes for want of victuals repasse Creuse and Vienne, and lodge at Faye la Vineuse, and from thence (the Country being spoiled, and ill to lodge in) passe to Montcontour, a lodging of aduantage, both for the situation and commodity of victuals. The Duke pursues him, and by his speed deceiues the enemies. His foreward led by Biron meets them

A them vnlooked for at Saint Cere, chargeth Montmorency, who made the retreat with 300 horse, and two hundred Harguebuziers, kills about fifty men at armes, and almost all his footmen, so amazeth the Princes army, as they all begin to wauer, and had not a freight been, where only twenty men might march in front, the whole army had then bene in rout. The Admirall makes halt to repaire this disorder, and by his presence renews their daunted courages. They charge and re-charge twice or thrice at this passage, and not able to bee forced, the two armies campe within shot of Musket, leauing it betwixt both. The Duke had eight or nine thousand horse, seuenteen or eighteen thousand foot, French, Suisses, and Italians, and fiftene pieces of artillery. The Princes had six thousand horse, French, and Reistres, ten thousand Harguebuziers French and Lansquenets, and eleuen pieces of Cannon.

As these armies beheld one another, two Gentlemen following the Dukes campe, present themselves to the first they meet of the Protestant party. Aduertise the Admirall (said they) that he forbear to fight, for the succours newly arriued haue greatly fortified our armie: let him temporize a month only: it is the time the Nobilitie hath giuen vnto the Duke, with protestation to serue him for that time, but not afterwards, then shall hee be forced to a peace to your aduantage. Of two Councils those which hatten to their owne ruine do commonly follow the worst. They aduertise the Admirall herof, he apprehends it, and desires to follow it, so doe the most modest, and that at nine of the clocke at night they should take the way to Eruaux, putting the riuier, that runnes there, betwixt the two armies. Others of a more boyling humour, inferre: That these nightly retreats terrifie them that make them, preiudice their reputations, augments the enemies courage, and that they must doe it only at the point of day. Moreover, this might bee a practice to amaze their troopes, and that comming from suspected persons, accustomed to deceiue, it was also suspected, and to be reiected.

This diuerstie of opinions troubled the Admirall, but see what afflicted him more neerely. The Reistres did mutine for want of pay, the Lansquenets refused to march: three or foure French regiments of the most remote Countries, had already asked leave to depart, many Gentlemen were retired to their houses, and the Duke approached. The Admirall then beseecheth the Princes that were at Parthenay to come to the armie, that by their presence they might containe them in obedience. They bring 150 good horse: But whilst the Admirall labours to pacifie the mutiny of the Germans, two houres are spent, so as the troopes cannot recouer a place of aduantage neere vnto Eruaux, where they could hardly haue charged them.

These broyles appeased, the army takes the way to Eruaux the third of October, and discourages the Dukes which aduanced. They cause the Princes to retire, being yet too young (but vnder colour to conduct them with more assurance, many retire with them) and arrange themselves in a valley, being covered from the Cannon. And vpon the approach of the Dukes foreward (consisting of nineteene Cornets of Reistres in two squadrons marching directly against the Admirall) the Admirall sends to Count Lodowike who led the battell, to send him three Cornets. The Earle obeyes, but he leads them himselfe: who hath no sooner left his place, but hee remains engaged in the skirmish, the which continued three quarters of an houre: the Admirall was hurt in the face, and his horsemen being overthrowne, leaue the field. The battell makes a great resistance, but vnfurnished of a head, it is forced to yeeld to the greater number: part of the footmen are cut in pieces, and part dispersed here and there, the artillery lost, and the ensignes caried away: all fly, euery man saues himselfe. Count Lodowike retires with three thousand horse in one company, turning head still against them that pursued, and recouers Parthenay, the refuge of the remainders of this shipwracke. Foure thousand Lansquenets dyed in this battell, 1500 French souldiers, about three hundred men at Armes, many horses, seruants, and Lackeys of men of marke, Puigresseur, Biron brother to him that led the foreward, and Saint Boncl, Cornet of the Admirals company. La Noue was prisoner againe, with Acier and others: the Reistres baggage was spoiled, that of the French being more aduanced towards Niort and Parthenay, was saued. The Duke lost few foot, but five or six hundred horse, and twice as many hurt, whereof the most part died, as the eldest Reingraue, the Marquis of Bade, Clermont of Dauphine, and few others of quality.

An vnlooked for accident.

Battell of Montcontour.

Seldome

1569

Notable error

Seldome doe we reape the fruits of an absolute victory. The Protestants too often were dispersed: and their horsemen (for the most part Reistres) were discontent for want of pay, and losse of their baggage. A hot pursuit had in shew produced one of these two effects, either their defeat, or their retreat into Germany: two months pay had drawne them vnto it. To leave the remainder of these forces at the Commanders deuotion, was to giue the Admirall meantes (being a wife Commander in warre) together together the remnant of this shipwracke, to repaire his broken vessell, and in the Spring to goe to field with new troups, to spoile diuers Provinces, and in the end to bring the warre to the gates of Paris. Moreover, these daunted spirits would bee soone reuiued by the presence of their Princes, whereas vpon this first defeat they might shue them into some place whereby the warre should be soone ended.

Victories after the battell.

Thus discouraged the most iudicious: but others finding the recouerie of those places easie in this amazement, which the Princes held in Poitou, Xaintonge, and Angoulmois, the Duke follows their resolution, and for the first fruits of his conquest marcheth to Parthenay: but there he finds nothing but the nest, the place empty, and the gates open. The Princes vpon the first brate had recouered Niort, and so Saint Jean d'Angely. The Baron of Mirebeau kept Lusignan, a place sufficient to winne much reputation, yea for a Captaine of no great valour: yet the parles of young Lufac preuailed more with the Baron, then five thousand Cannon shot which the Dukes of Martignes and Aumale spent against Piles, as wee shall hereafter see. Niort being summoned, began to wauer, and May who had the guard of it (being gone forth against some scouts that were approached to the gates, and traitorously shot with a Pistol by Maurenel a Gentleman of Brie, who had newly put himselfe vnder his Cornet, and shall within fewe yeares make himselfe famous by an act equall to the first in treachery, and detestable villany) retiring himselfe by the aduice of the Princess to Rochel, where soone after hee dyed of his wound, the towne being abandoned returned into the Dukes power without any difficultie. Puyauit also leaving Fontenay, the garisons of Chastelleraud, Chaugny, Rochepot, the Caste of Angle, Prully, Cleruaut, and other small places, dislodged together, and vnder the conduct of Briquemault came to make head in Sancerre and la Charité, being let vpon in their way, by the Commons of Berry and la Chastre Gouverneur of the country.

Momburn, Mirabel, Verbelay, and some six or seuen hundred horse of Dauphine, Vignaretz, Auvergne, and Languedoc recouer their houses, vnder colour to prouide for some places of importance in their marches, and to make the way easie, which the Princes pretended to follow, for to winter in Limagne of Auvergne, if they had not altered their designe. We shall see shortly what course they tooke after their defeat. Nismes returns into the Protestants power. An aduenturous souldier, did with a secret fyle, in sundry nights, fyle asunder a grate of iron, which stopt vp a hole at the foot of the towne wall, by the which did flow a fountaine for the benefit of the inhabitants. The passage being made, Saint Cosme, Chaussy, Mingelle, and other Captaines enter, they cut in pieces a corps de gard towards the Carnes gate, force another neere to that of the Crowne, open the gates, bring in their men that remained without the towne; and become masters thereof, to the preiudice of S. Andre being Gouverneur, who hauing no leisure to slip into the Caste, brake his necke leaping over the wall, and his Lieutenant his thigh. Almost Captaine of the Caste kept it almost three months against the towne: in the end being vnurnished of men, some lost by sundry accidents, some dead or languishing of sickness, and a good number oppressed vnder a myne, he yielded to depart with bagge and baggage.

Verdelay better ge: it is as flamefull for Sesja.

On the other side, Sanfuc by vertue of a Commission granted him from the Duke, to take from the Protestants whatsoeuer they held on that side Loire, had taken Douzi a place abandoned, then Noiers by composition, the which was ill obserued: most part of the souldiers were led to Troyes in Champagne, and about threecore passing through the streets were abandoned to the peoples rage. But Verdelay is feared too high vpon the rop of a steep mountain, hauing but one approach. Tarot and some other Gentlemen Protestants his neighbours had lately seized theron, and Blesser, Sarasin, Belanson, and Rimpierre Captaines defended it. Sanfuc makes his approaches with three companies: but at the first the Captaines cut off two companies, kill the Captaines & forty souldiers, the

A the third being scattered in the vineyards retire in the night. Hee returns with greater forces, makes his battery, opens two breaches, giues an assault and scalado, but in vaine: he loseth about 300 men: and the besieged lost Sanfuc with some thirty souldiers: Sanfuc doth change and re-change his battery, he tries another assault, and (as at the first) hee is shamefully repulsed with losse, but not discouraged. Some of his confident friends within the towne giue him aduice, that most of the Gentlemen are gone to field: hee returns with new artillerie, (his owne being broken or crackt) new munition, and new forces. Twelve Cannons begin a long and furious battery, takes away the defences, enlarge the first breaches, and makes the rampars euen with the ground. They giue a general assault: B the siege of La Charité, made the assailants attempts contemptible to the besieged: the more earnest he is, the more obstinate they grow. Three thousand Cannon shot doth nothing abate their courage: contrariwise fiftene hundred souldiers of the assailants being slaine, inflame the Vezelois, they kill the brauest of them vpon the rampars, at the breach and in the trench. Then Sanfuc forced to retire, is contented to blocke them vp in the end of the yeare. Briquemault and Guerchy gouverneur of la Charité, doe afterwards relieue them with some refreshings.

Ciuilt warres are but a perpetual ebbing and flowing of losses and conquests: Poitiers had bene the Theater whereon the Princes had to their ruine played the first act of their tragedy, and now Saint Jean d'Angely must end the victories of the Duke of Anjou. The Duke putt vp with the happy successe of his victories, comes the 16 of October to besiege S. Jean: but he finds not so easie approaches as at the rest. Piles commanded therein, who by sallies and skirmishes, shewes that they must come well armed, and at the first assault he kills many of their Captaines, and of their best souldiers. Montisquieu (he that grew so famous by the murder of the Prince of Condé) died there, but too honourably for him. In the end Baron General of the artillerie, (seeing the resolution of the besieged) did mediate a truce, at the end whereof Piles should yeeld the towne, if within a certaine time succours came not, or an answer from the Princes. The day comes, when as Saint Senerin leading forty horse, doth politiquely deceiue both Sentinels and Guards, and vnder the name of a friend, slips into the towne. So the hostages deliuered on both sides, they begin D againe to play and batter with their Cannon, and the towne-men to carie earth, make rampars, and to shoor with such a fury, as Sebastian of Luxemburg, D. of Martignes, and Governor of Brittain, found this towne fatal to lodge him in the monument of his Ancestors. During this batterie, the Queene would honour the siege with the presence of the King her sonne, being then nineteene yeares of age. But this bred a ieaousie betwixt the two brethren. Charles was quicke, vehement, and somewhat froward: Henry more tractable and courteous: and Charles euen then perswaded himselfe, that his mother would make him recuee a disgrace at Saint Jean d'Angely, to fauour the Duke her younger sonne, whose advancement she made shew to desire. The succeeding yeares will teach vs, that this impression made Charles to loue his brother best, being farther off in the North, then by his presence to enioy the Mothers affections, and to haue authority within the Realme.

Finally, the second of December, after two months siege, the King signed their capitulation: That they should depart with their goods, armes, horses, and Ensignes displayed, and for foure months should carie no armes for the pretended reformed religion. But as this siege is famous for that it was valiantly followed and defended: so is it likewise famous by the breach of faith giuen by his Maiestie. At their going forth, they spoile them of their armes, apparell and money: the Duke of Aumale, and the Marshall of Vielleuille are not able to make good the Kings promise: nay, the D. of Anious presence, cannot restrain their insolencies. They spoile their baggage, they take away their horses, they strip their men. And to increase their villanies, the regiment of Sarrien, being lodged at Saint Leger, halfe a league off, comes ouerthwart, wounds, kills, murders and casts them into the River: and happy is hee that can escape in his shirt to recouer Angoulême, where Piles and some others holding themselves (by reason of this treacherous and vnworthy visage contrarie to the Law of Armes) freed from the conditions whereunto they were bound by the capitulation, went to the Princes to vnderstand their pleasures. The Historic obserues about ten thousand men of warre lost before Saint Jean, five thousand Cannon shot spent, five and twenty, or thirty Commissaries of the artillerie slaine in their charges many many shrunke away, and in the end the campe was diminished eightene or twenty thousand men.

A treaty of Peace.

The army tyred with labour, and prest with want of victuals, and other discommodities, dislodging from Saint Jean d'Angely, gave the Princes leisure to determine of their voyage: and the King retiring to Angiers, aligned the Princes deputies thither, to begin the following year by the continuance of a treaty of Peace begun in the month of November. Beauvais, la Noche and Taligny come thither in February, and returne with another answer to the Protestants, but a liberty to live within the Realme free from search in their houses, and for their safety two townes, which Biron should name vnto them, in the which they might doe what pleased them, not impugning the Kings authority: nor the quiet of the Realme: his Maiestie offering to restore them to their charges, except such as had been dismissed by the order of Iustice, and the money (growing by the sale thereof) received by the Kings commandment: but for forbidding all exercise of Religion, but of the Catholike, Apostolike, and Romish: banishing all Ministers out of the Realme, and requiring them to disarme, to send back presently their foraine forces, and to yeeld vp all townes held by the violence and force of armes. In the meane time posts fly into England and Germany, and to diuert or stay the succours which the Protestants might expect from thence, the brute flies that a Peace is made in France.

The Princes and Admirall thinking they were but deuices to hinder their affaires, every one prepares againe to put on harnesse: their forces were dispersed into diuers Provinces: those about Bourges had an enterprize vpon the towne, by the practice of a souldier, who by treacherie makes them to lose thirty men at the entry, and as many prisoners. So he that thinks to take, is often taken himselfe. The reduction of Poitou, had likewise brought Marans and the Castell of Beauvoir vpon the sea to the Kings obedience. Angouleme and Rochel onely remained to the Protestants. They had lost Lusignan: but Blay, Taillebourg, the Isles of Xaintonge, Marennes, and Brouage, were yet at their deuotion. To try Rochel the King threatens them by his Letters, and by promises he seeks to win Paradailan and Romegas, the Gouernours of Blay and Taillebourg. They answer (saith the History) the King wisely, and Lanfac courageously: You cannot bee more grieved (said Paradailan) to attempt to force me in this place: then I shall be, for the shame, losse and confusion; which I shall cause you to receive, or any other that shall attempt it. Romegas speakes in the same sence. The effect was more to be feared then words: yet Lanfac attempted nothing against them. The Islands had much annoyed the siege of Saint Jean d'Angely; and the Lanqueners escaped from Montcontour, were dispersed there. The Earle of Lude, Puigalliard and la Riviere Puitaille, Gouernours, the one of Angiers, the other of Marans, with eight cornets of horse, and twenty ensignes of foot, force the said Islands, and make such a slaughter, as there remained not about three hundred fighting men.

La Noue the Princes Lieutenant in Guienne, studied to recover Brouage, a place of great importance for the Rochelois, when as the Baron of la Garde attempting vpon Tonne Charente, made both their enterprises to proue vaine. Rochel is now blockt vp on all sides. Lude and Puigalliard had an armie in Poitou: la Riviere Puitaille the elder, held Marans and other places thereabouts: the younger commanded in Brouage. Landsman Vice-admirall held Olone. The Brittons & Bourdelois cut off the Rochelois victuals by sea. La Garde, then Generall of their galleies, did runne oftentimes even into their haven: but to presse them on all sides, he would gladly have beene master of Tonne Charente. La Noue had undertaken the defence thereof, who vnderstanding the Barons practice, so planted his shot, as at his enemies first landing, hee slew their Commanders, and many others, gaue liberty to the slaves, and became master of the galley: and if hee had not too soone transporting them, the rest comming to enter into Charente, and resolute to land, they could not haue escaped death or prison. This gally did afterwards serue Romegas to beat the Catholikes in many places. And if la Garde prevailed nothing by force, his policies were of as small effect. So as he lost his time, men, and money, and did nothing of moment.

Contrariwise, the defeat of some troops at Nouaille by the harguebuziers of La Noue, vnder the leading of Scipio an Italian Ingenger, and the recovery of Marans by La Noue, from Chaparon Gouernour of the place, after the death of the elder Puitaille lately deceased,

A ceased, was the cause of the winning of ten or twelve other places thereabouts, and gaue the Rochelois meanes to enlarge themselves. The spoile of Olone did enrich them, furnished them with forty good vessels, with some armes and Cannon, and a good number of prisoners, and diminished their enemies strength of about 400 fighting men. This reuiving caused Puigalliard and Fernacques to make enterprises vpon Langon and Gué of Nelyure, and by the recovery of Lufon to molest Marans and Rochel againe, if that la Noue had not speedily taken this fort from them that came to seize on it, and slue Sforza a valiant Gentleman, Captaine of a company of Italians, who were come to charge him behinde in his retreat.

B The Tower of Moric, the Castle of La Graue, Talmonde, and the Castle of Chiff, being taken againe by Puigalliard, recompensed the losse of Lufon: and the conquests of Puigalliard, were at the same time crost by Puisault Gouernor of Marans, by the death of Captaine Dante, who scoured all Poitou, by the rout of their company, and wounding in a manner, of all the members thereof, and by the ouerthrow of Chamont and Goulenes, issued out of Angouleme with two cornets of horse: by the death also of Guitiere Gouernour of S. Jean d'Angely: the ouerthrow of young Riviere Puitailé, the route of his men, and the losse of two Ensignes. But the death of Captaine Herbetele, commanding a company of French, and two of Italians, and the defeat of his troopes by Coignes issued out of Angouleme, which then held for the Princes, made the mid-may famous, a season when as the second parle of peace was reuiued.

Time brings many changes, now it fauours the Protestants, reuiues their courages, fortifies their hopes, and the Catholikes are new to beginne, the King was wearied with this variable continuance of warre, it drew his subjects from his obedience, ruined his Provinces, wasted his treasure, and consumed his forces. The Queene-mother, since the enterprize of Meaux, did still nourish in her breast a fire of reuenge. She was wonderfully discontented, that the Protestants in the beginning of the first troubles had so violently opposed against her desire to rule, by the mutual ruine of the one and the other. But there was paine and perill to suppress the heads of the Protestants: many murderers, and many prisoners, offered themselves, but the most part drew backe when it came to the effect. Moreover, the Princes grew waggard and iudgement, they framed themselves to affaires, they began to know the friends and enemies of the Common-weale. And on the other side, many Noblemen of either party, laboured to temper the humors, both of such as were best affected to the publike quiet, and of those that during these viciuall confusions, made a way for their ambitious designs: whilest that Biron and Taligny chiefe Deputies, the one for the King, the other for the Princes, labour about Peace.

Let vs see what course the Princes tooke since the battell of Montcontour vntill the peace. A small ball of snow rowled from a high mountaine, grows great in a short time, and becomes able to endure a great force. So the Councell whereby the Princes resolved to retire farre from the Conquerors armie, did much auile them: for they assured their men, fortified themselves with new troopes, and consumed their enemies, in the taking and retaking of places which they had possessed.

But still the poore people suffer for great menes follies. Aginois and Queray serues now as a good retreat for the Protestants. They finde there a fat and fruitful Country, where by the spoile of the contrarie party, they refresh their persons, and make a new bodie. There is nothing but inroads, spoiles and robbings of the enemy: but there was violent warre against Tholousa, and horrible fires in their houses which belonged to the Court of Parliament. They haue beene (said the Protestants) very violent to burne them of our Religion, beheaded Captaine Rapin, who caried them the Edict of Peace from the King, and to commit many other inuolencies, whereof opportunitie now cries for vengeance. Doubtlesse the Iustice of God doth oftentimes send a wished encounter to be reuenged of an indignitie received. The Marshall of Danuile, La Pallete, and some other Commanders of quality, made some sallies, with diuers variable euent, but not traying farre from their walls for feare of surprize.

Cermain, Oriac, la Faye, Lesbos, Montefranc, and generally all they besiege (except Saint Felix, from whence the Gascons were repulst in the assault, with the losse of fifty men, and the Vicount of Montclar hurt whereof he dyed at Castres) is forced, and the garisons cut in pieces. During the armies abroad in Albigeois, the Princes, ( notwithstanding the crosses crosses of Escars, Pompador, la Vanguion and others commanding three thousand men) A being fortified with five or six hundred horse, brought from Rochel by Beaudin and Ren-ty, send Piles into the county of Rouffillon, where hee did spoile and greatly annoy the Spaniard, whilest the Kings deputies conferred neere vnto Carcassonne, with Teligny, Beauvais and la Chassettiere, who going afterwards to his Maiestie, concluded what wee shal see in briefe. Languedoc, Viuretz & Dauphine, hauing fortified the army with about 3000 Harguebuziers, most of them mounted at the country-mens charge, in stead of those which Menbrun (through fauour of the fort which hee built vpon Rofne right against Pufin) led away to refresh themselves in their country, hauing surmounted the difficulties of the mountaines, and the Admirall being freed from grieuous sicknesse, which B had brought him to deaths doore, at Saint Estienne in Forest, the army comes into Bour-gongne, where being fortified with 1500 light-horse, come from la Charite and the neighbour garisons, vnder the command of Briquemault, they encounter a good occasion to aduance the peace.

It seemed to the Protestants a matter of some difficulty, to obtaine a peace, vnlesse they approached neere vnto Paris: and to that end, the Admirall had suffered almost all his footmen to furnish themselves with horses, and aduanced by great iourneys into the heart of France, whilest his troopes were fresh, and lusty, and free from diseases. But hee had before him, the Marshall of Cossé, the Kings Lieutenant in the absence of the Duke of Anjou: who, to hinder the Princes approach to Paris, seeks meanes to fight with them. They incamped at René-le-Duc, a place not very strong of situation, from whence they thought to dislodge them with their Cannon, whereof the Princes were vnfurnished, and by diuers volles of shot, to make them leaue certaine passages which they held. The Marshall la Valette, Stroff and la Chastre, come with all speed, charge and recharge them, and at the first, they force them from a passage. Briquemault, Marshall of the campe, Montgomery and lenis, endure the shooke; they kill, hurt and take many: and by this firme resolution, make it knowne, that their lodgings are not to be forced. So the Marshall founds a retreat, and the Princes, to whom all stay was preiudiciall, being strengthened with new companies drawne out of Sancerre, la Charité, Antrain, Vezelai, and other places of their party, and furnished with some artillery: they turned head towards Paris. But a truce of ten dayes, stayed all exploits of warre, betwixt them, and the Marshall: while the Baron of La Garde, Puigalliard & Riniere Puitaill, chiefe enemies to the Protestants, laboured to become Masters in Guienne, and the neighbour country. To that end, after they had overcome the troopes of horse and foot, led by la Noue, Soubize and Phoiault, and by a shamefull chafe shut their companies into Rochel, they recouer all the forts and places which had bene taken from them since the surprize of Marans. And the more to restrain the Rochelois, they build a fort at Lufon, vnder the command of Captaine Mafcaron. They hoped this fort should bee a bait to draw the Protestants to field, but hauing built it without contradiction, Puigalliard tries another stratagem. Hee retires his forces into high Poictou, and giues out, that the Princes had gotten a great victory, and that he must by the Dukes commandement, lead away his troopes with all speed: that by a strong ambush and turning head suddenly, hee might charge the Protestants, and defeat them at their first approach. Notwithstanding, La Noue and his companions keepe themselves quiet, giuing their troops (amazed by their last fight) time to take breath, the which causeth Mafcaron to slacke the guard of his fort.

La Noue being aduertised, that the fort was to be forced, goes out of Rochel with foure corners, cleuen ensignes of French, and 300 Lansquenets, which remained: Puigalliard gathers together speedily what troopes he can, which now began to leaue him: and to shut vp la Noue betwixt Marans and Lufon, makes them to march two dayes and a night to Saint Gemme, halfe a league from Lufon, but with one light repast. Here his second policy of warre preuailes as little as the first. He taines himselfe sick, and giues out, that a burning ague detained him in his bed: then vnder colour of the delivery of Rouffiere a Gentleman of Poictou, and others whom Phoiault had lately taken in an encounter: he sends a trumpet to assure them of this pretended sicknesse, and to discouer the strength of the besiegers. But this spy was not cunning enough: he trips in his answers, and by his faintnesse discouers his masters practices. Phoiault extorts the truth by force: then shewing them, that they had to do with men that were toiled and broken with their great march,

A march, they dislodge from S. Gemme, to ioyne with la Noue. Puigalliard is aduertised that the enemy flies, and retires in disorder to Marans. Hee approacheth, enters the Bourg, and finding nothing but the nest, some runne to the victuals, others to the spoile. But they haue a contrarie aduice, That the enemy is neere and in battell. La Noue had lodged his men by the fauour of the ditches, hedges, and bushes, which compasse in the vines of that country, whereas Puigalliard's horse could not passe but by small companies. La Noue commanded to the charge, Saint Etienne and Bruneleire beginne it, against 150 masters, of the chiefe troopes of Puigalliard, and makes them to stagger. Phoiault forceth through them, kills some, and amazeth the rest. Puigalliard and those that were best B mounted, fly vnto Fontenay, foure leagues from thence: the footmen hemmed in on all sides, and broken by the horse, presently giue way, and remaine at their mercy, without mercy, namely, of the Lansquenets, who reuenge vpon them the blood of their countrymen, shed neere to Montcontour: Sixteene Ensignes, and two cornets were taken, 300 old souldiers slain vpon the place, and thirty men at armes, with many Commanders and Officers of Regiments and Companies. Seven or eight hundred prisoners were sent away with white wands in their hands. The fort being valiantly assailed, and yielded by Mafcaron, added foure companies to the victory, and this victory caused the conquest of Fontenay le Conte, from whence the besieged retired to Niort: La Noue hauing lost his left arme in the siege.

C Oleron, Marennès, Soubize and Brouage, yielded to the victors, where as the death of Riniere Puitaill, recompensed la Noue's hurt. So as by the recovery of all that which the King held about Rochel, the Protestants coopt vp the Catholikes within the wals of Saint Iean d'Angely. The Prince Dauphin of Auvergne came into Poictou, to reparaire Puigalliard's losses, and to strengthen the forces of the Earle of Lude, for the making of some new attempt, when as a peace concluded betwixt the King and the Princes, stayed the course of their triumphs, the eleuenth of August, and caused a suspension of Armes, to renewe it againe two yeares after, with a more vnworthy and horrible proceeding.

By this third Edi& of Peace, they had foure townes of safety, Rochel, Montauban, D Cognac and la Charité, to be held two yeares in the Princes names, and the Princes, with the chiefe Commanders of the Protestants, attending the full execution thereof, retired to Rochel: the armies were dismissed, and the strangers conduced into Lorraine. Soone after, the Emperour Maximilian the second, gaue his eldest daughter in marriage to Philip King of Spaine (so the Vncle married his Neece, but the House of Austria hath oftentimes obtained such dispensations) and so our Charles in the towne of Mezières in the end of November, tooke to wife Elizabeth the yonger Sister, a wife and virtuous Princeesse.

There was a Peace concluded, but no full obseruation of the Edi&: whereupon the Princes sent Briquemault, Teligny, Beauvais la Noelle and Casannes to Court. The King at their instance, sent Commissioners throughout all the Prouinces of this Realme. But there were some amongst them, who (not many yeeres before) had condemned the Admirall to be hanged. Amongst others, the Marshall of Cossé, and Proutiere Master of Requests, were at Rochel, to consult with the Queene of Nauarre and the Admirall, about the meanes in general, to maintaine the Realme in Peace: and particularly to treat of a marriage betwixt Henry of Bourbon Prince of Nauarre, and Marguerite of Valois the Kings Sister, and then to conferre with the Admirall touching the warre which his Maiestie seemed to pretend against the Spaniard in the Low-countries, to the protection whereof, he was greatly sollicitated. The Kings good countenance, and the gifts hee gaue to the Deputies, namely, to Teligny, who seemed to be greatly in his Maiesties fauour and F likewise might doe much to perswade his father-in-law to come to Court, makes them at their returne to Rochel, to extoll the Kings singular loue and affection to the Queene of Nauarre, the Princes, the Admirall, and to all the rest of their party, and to assure them by his commandement, that he will not onely maintaine the Peace, but also confirme it by the alliance of his owne Sister, and that he desires to conferre by mouth with the Admirall, touching this new expedition of the Low-countries, and therefore they should make hast to goe vnto him.

And the better to confirme them in this beliefe, the King sends Biron after them with the same charge, and that hee would procure the Queene his Mother, and the Duke of Anjou his brother, to moderate their spleenes and discontents, and would worke a reconciliation betwixt the Duke of Guise and the Admirall. The apparant meane to confirm a publicke concord did please the Admirall, beleeving this marriage should be the ground of a most happy peace, and the Queene of Nauarre feared lest delay should alter the Kings good meaning. But the accomplishment of the marriage was hindered by some lets. The Pope made some difficulty to dispence therewith, as well by reason of the confanguinitie of the parties, (the one being petty-Nephew, the other grand-child of Francis the first King of France) as also for the difference of their religions. The Queene of Nauarre likewise made some scruple of this disparity of religion, of the ceremonies, and of the place of the solemnity. She would not haue the marriage celebrated after the manner of the Catholike Church, and feared the City of Paris, as most affected to their religion, and of long time an enemy to the House of Nauarre.

Contrariwise, the King would haue Paris to be the Theater, where this notable act should be solemnely celebrated in view of the capitall Cite of his Realme, without changing any thing in forme of royall marriage. In the end, the respect of ciuill reason prevailed. As for the motives of this warre pretended in the Low-country: (they were goodly in shew) for besides this hereditarie hatred of the French against the Spaniard, being reuiued by the outrages and warres made in France by Charles and Philip his sonne, the remembrance whereof was yet fresh, they renewed the ancient quarrels of many possessions in the Low-countries, depending vpon this Crowne. Moreover, they pretended new causes, which seemed lawfull to breake the alliance betwixt the two Kings. That his Maiestie had most certaine intelligence of poison giuen by Philip to his wife, the Sister of our Charles, vpon some discontents and filthy ialousies. These reasons had a shew of truth, and the Admirall to the end the French (who cannot liue long together in mutuall concord, and that by a long life of warre breathed nothing but warre) should not seeke some new feedes of ciuill diuision, held it good to diuert this vehement heat against some stranger and nation as farre off. Many necessary considerations fortified this ciuill counsell. The forces of the Prince of Orange, and his bretheren, who spoiled by the Spaniard of many rich possessions both in the Low-countries, and in the county of Bourgongne, had long time sought to recouer it by armes. The credit and fauour of the Low-country men in Germany, by reason of the exceeding cruelty of the Duke of Alua; Lodowike of Nassau, brother to the said Prince, a man of great courage and resolution, prest it forward, and his presence was a spur to the Admirall. Moreover, to the end it should seeme this warre was managed with the Kings consent, his Maiestie did suffer the Prince of Auranges Fleet to ride about Rochel, annoying the Spaniards and Portugals, which sailed vpon that coast for the trafficke of the Low-countries: and for Cont Lodowike, to sell the booty hee had taken from the enemy freely and publicly at Rochel.

So the Admirall, a widower by reason of Charles of Laual deceased in the second troubles, after hee had espoused the Countesse of Antremont in Savoy, at Rochel, and giuen his daughter Louyse to the Lord of Teligny to wife, he comes to Court, relying vpon the Kings assurances, so often confirmed by messengers: and especially by the Marshall of Cossé whom the King had sent to accompany him, presuming the Admirall would giue more credit to the Marshalls words, by reason of their familiarity.

The King receiued him with all Demonstrations of loue (those of Guise leaue him the place, not to yeeld any thing vnto him, but to returne soone after with greater authoritie) and to take from him all ialousies and distrusts which were giuen him from all parts, the King at the first doth recompence the losses which the Admirall had sustained during the former warres, by the gift of a hundred thousand frankes, and grants him for one whole year, the reuenues which his brother the Cardinal of Chastillon enjoyed (being lately deceased in England.) He giues him a place in the Priuy counsell. Doth oft-times conferre with him touching the warres of Flanders, and makes shew to bee governed therein by his aduice and counsell: hee honours him with that plausible name of father, and treats with him so familiarly, as the country tooke this familiarity for a shew of his Masters affection to the Admirall, and the people beganne now to murmur, that Charles not onely fauoured the Huguenots, but would shortly himselfe become

A become a Huguenot. A cunning bait to free the Admirall from suspition by the aduertisements which had beene giuen him to the contrarie. He could now tast no admonitions, his spirit was so transported with the Kings countenance and words.

Doublelesse the wisdom of man failes euen in the wisest, when it pleaseth him that giues it, to weaken the strongest spirits, and (by a iudgement incomprehensible to man) to cast a vayle before his eyes, and to make him vnable to conceiue the iustice and horrow of the iudgement which he meanes to display. For the better aduancing the enterprise of the Low-countries, the Admirall thought it fit the King should make a Peace with Elizabeth Queene of England. They might treat it with a very honest colour, to the prejudice of the Spaniards, Elizabeth was not married, and Henry Duke of Anjou had no wife, the dignity of so high an alliance was honorable for the Duke, and the qualitie of a Kings brother was not to be contemned by a Queene: hauing also in his yong age purchased great glory and reputation. This charge is giuen to the Marshall of Montmorency. But the issue did shew, that besides this negotiation of Peace, their meaning was to abuse both the Admirall and all others whom it was expedient to abuse for the execution of the counsell of Saint Cloud, and by the same practice to send the Marshall farre from Court, lest by his ordinary conuerſing with the King, hauing a good iudgement, and smelling out the complots of this pitifull Tragedy, hee should discouer them to the Admirall his cousin: and by meanes of this new peace, the English in the midst of this indignitie, should be restrained from attempting of any thing in fauour of the Protestants, as it chanced. During this time the Admirall retirates to Chastillon: and in the meane season they prepare a Fleet at Bourdeaux and Brouage, vnder the command of Strossy, Landereau and the Baron of la Garde. The pretext was the warre of Flanders: yet had they expresse commission to attempt vpon Rochel, and by open or secret practises to gett into their owne power.

The Admirall hauing founded the foard, vpon his assurance to the Queene of Nauarre of the Kings singular affection to her and to all her house, in the end shee goes to Blois, where as the Court remained. Hereupon falls out an accident, which made the aduancement of the said marriage more easie: the death of Pope Pius the fifth. Gregory the thirteenth, succeeded him: whereupon the King sent the Cardinall of Lorraine to Rome, to assist at the new election, and to procure of his successor a necessary dispence, for the accomplishing of the solemnitie.

Some letters of the Cardinall of Pelue (sometimes a scullion in the Colledge of Montaignu, and then seruant to the Cardinall of Lorraine during this study, and afterwards growne to be a Cardinall) written vnto his Master, being intercepted by the way, containing amongst other things: That the Court of Rome did wonder greatly at the familiarity the King vsed to the Admirall, during his abode nere his Maiestie: that it was fit to vse such policy, attending the execution of the Priuy Counsell, the which discovered sufficiently that which was generally spoken of throughout all France. This had beene concluded at S. Cloud nere vnto Paris, amongst few, but it was common in many mens mouths: and Lignerolles, Gouverneur of Bourbonois, one of the D. of Anious mignons (for that hee had blabed out some thing which hee had learned in secret of his master) did expiate the rashnes of his licentious tongue, with the price of his blood. But we shall see in our dayes a more strange effect of Gods iustice, for that the last of our Kings of the race of Valois, shall end his life miserably in the same chamber where the fatal counsell had beene held in his presence. Neither could the aduice of Pelue, nor any other, stay the Admirall from coming to Paris as soone as the King: being solicited by his Maiestie, by many and sundry Letters, to conclude fully of the marriage, (besides they treated the marriage of the Prince of Conde, with the Marquesse of Lifle, the yongest daughter of the House of Neuers) and of the voyage of Flanders.

The Queen of Nauarre, to whom this long delay was very troublesome, prepared all things necessary for so famous an act, but she falls sicke of a quotidian fever, the fourth of Iune, eighteen dayes after his arriual, and dyes the fifth day after her sicknesse, growing (said the Physicians) of an extraordinary hardnes of the Lungs, with a great impostume, augmented by the great heat of the season, and her continuall trauell in the time of her health. A Princeesse of a notable courage, inuincible in aduersitie, of a ready wit, iudicious, absolute in her actions, capable of counsell, comprehending things with a great viuacity of spirit, and deliuering her minde with an admirable grace, either by word or writing: of a Iouiall complexion, and very pleasant in conuersation. But happy chiefly in this, that shee left vs a lawfull heire for to inherit this Crowne, to redeeme it out of the hands of the stranger, and to preferue it with happinesse and prosperitie.

Many are amazed at this sudden death, as an assured foretelling of some future mischiefe. The King, the Queene-mother, and all the Kings House shew a wonderfull sorrow: and to take away all suspicion of poison, Charles commands the body to be opened, and to search the causes of her death. The Physicians report, there is no shew of poyson, but her braine was not opened. Some hold opinion, that an Italian, the Kings perfumer presented her with a paire of Gloves, which prevented her from beholding of that pitifull and bloody tragedy, which shall bee shortly acted. The continuall messages sent from Charles, had likewise drawne the Princes to Court, and this death did seeme to aduance the marriage, for she gaue vnto her sonne the kingdome of Nauarre, and now he beganne to enjoy the title of King, and all his mothers succession. The Popes dispensation was necessary, without the which the Cardinall of Bourbon vncle to Henry, who was appointed to marry them, refused to proceed therein. In the end it comes, and the day of the consummation is appointed to be kept the 18 of August.

Beginning of the warres in Flanders.

Isle defeated.

Such were the actions of the Court, whilst that Cont Lodowike, La Noue, Sancourt and Ienlis, to whom the King had giuen chiefe Commissions for the Belgicke warre, had by the taking of Monts in Hainault, drawne all the Duke of Aluaes forces against them. Flusingue had slaine their Gouernour, with the most part of the Spanish garison, and repulst those the Duke had sent to recouer the towne. Many other townes of the Low-Countries followed the like example. Holland and Zeland hunted after their libertie. Beginnings which seemed to draw after them a long continuance of great consequence: and the authoritie the King gaue to the aboute-named to prouide for the succour of Monts, and for the continuing of other like exploits, induced the Admirall to beleuee firmly, that the King embraced this businesse without dissembling. According to this authority, Ienlis led fise hundred horse, and foure thousand foot, whereof the Duke of Alua being aduertised, he surprisid him suddently, defeated his troopes, rooke him prisoner, with many others, and slue many of his men.

The King seemed displeased with these newes, hee sends to Mendauct his Ambassadour of the Low-countries, to procure the libertie of these prisoners: and suffers the Admirall to send such succours as hee could, to ioyne with the armie of Reistres which the Prince of Orange had leauied: hee caused money to bee made ready for the entertainment of the foot, which they esteemed foure regiments, and thirty companies of men at armes. The Ambassadour of Spaine was gone out of France. The Queene-mother likewise playing her part, seemed to be ignorant of the Kings designs, and being informed thereof, shee seemed ready to retire from Court. These reasons did still confirme the Admirall, Teligni, and the rest in that beliefe, that the King concurred with the Admirall in one will, to send the warres farre off into the King of Spaines countries, the which hee had before kindled in the foure corners, and in the heart of this Realme, pretending to entertaine it there, and to maintaine himselfe with the shipwracke of this Crowne, and to seize thereon in time, as the attempt of his designs in our dayes haue testified.

The Marshall of Montmorency returned from his Ambassage, bringing a mutuall league offensive and defensive, with, and against all men, not naming any one: but the marriage whereof hee had charge remained fruitlesse: which made many beleuee that it was but a meere fiction, fit for the season, where they prepared a scaffold, on the which they should soone present a horrible spectacle. The Marshall either not to bee a spectator nor counsellor, or doubting to be ingaged in these publike and private furies, retires himselfe to his house. Rochel was in the meane time beleaguered, souldiers arised hourly, giuing terrible threats against the towne, who beganne to cry to the Admirall for succours. In other townes they heard secret murmurings, which terrified the most cleere-sighted amongst the Protestants. These aduertisements found continually in the Admirals eares. But hee continues alwayes like vnto himselfe, constant in the midst of all motions, and grew resolute against all such as laboured to call him from Court, either by mouth or writing. As for the house of Guise (saith hee) wherof they

A they will put me in feare, the King hath taken order, making vs to sweare before him to continue friends: and as for them of the Religion, the marriage of Madam Marguerit, whom his Matiesse giues not to the King of Nauarre alone, but as it were to all those of the party, to ioyne himselfe vnto them by an indissoluble union, is the finishing of their quiet and safety. To conclude, he will be no more troubled touching the Kings ill meaning, nor the Queene-mothers, the duke of Anious, the Guisens, nor any others.

And that which settles the Admirall the more in his conceit, hee finds the King, (after the death of Stejsmond King of Poland) to effect the pursuite of that Crowne in fauour of his brother. Charles was cleere-sighted in affaires of State; hee was young, yet of quicke B and ready wit, and (if bloody and furious counsels had not peruered him) without doubt he might haue brought forth better fruits, and this Monarchy had been freed from the miseries which haue since ruined it. His brother had great credit generally in France: his mildnesse made him pleasing to his Mother, and his liberalitie, to the people. He desired rather to see him command farre off then neere. And the Admirall, who knew the D. of Aniou to be an irreconcilable enemy to the Protestants, supposed that the King would by his absence settle a firme peace: that Henry being confirmed in Poland, his adherents would grow more milde: that the house of Guise disappointed of this support, would feare the Kings looks, the which sometimes appeared terrible: and that Charles C it wholly vnto himselfe, as already he made shewes of his intent.

The Admirall seeing Iohn of Montluc, Bishop of Valence, a man of iudgement, and practised in negotiations, imployed in this Ambassage, he fed himselfe with new hopes. And contrariwise, Montluc (fore-seeing the imminent storme,) was very glad to be neither a Councillor, nor a witness of the miseries that were like to fall vpon the Protestants. And indeed he had before counselled many of the chiefe amongst them, not to meddle in this imaginary warre of Flanders, but to retire in time to their houses, and not to trust ouer-much in the goodly shewes of Court, considering the enuy of the great, and the ill will of the people of Paris. But thus God confounds the iudgement, and blinds the vnderstanding of such as hee reserves for an example to their posterity. Oh France, D my haire stands vpright, and I tremble, to enter into the relation of so inhumane a Tragedie! And shall wee neuer be satisfied to heare the lamentable and continual slaughter of our countrey men? what man would not be troubled? what minde would not be oppressed with heauinesse and griefe, to see so much blood vnprofitably spilt in our Cities, which should be carefully preferred for the defence of our country against strangers and common enemies? yet let vs passe this dangerous passage: the course of times inuities vs to proceed.

A great number of Noblemen, both Catholikes and Protestants, repaired from all parts, to the solemnizing of this marriage. Those of Guise come, bringing with them a great traine of men of all qualities faithfull vnto them. The water which mooues by little E and little, the birds which houer about it, and the ayre colder then of custome, foretelle a storme to come. So the common murmurings, the stirring of the quarter-masters, and other Captaines of Paris, the Kings guards dispersed through the City, the ordinarie threats against the Protestants, were certaine testimonies, that this marriage should be seasoned more with blood then water.

The day appointed comes: the Cardinall of Bourbon maries the parties vpon a high scaffold, built before the doore of our Ladies Church at Paris. Four dayes are spent in plays, feasts, dancing and masks: the which finished, the King protests to the Admirall, that he will answer and satisfie the Protestants requests. Euery one of their Churches had their Deputies in Court, for many affaires, wherein the Admirals authority was very necessary. They ought a great summe of money to the Germanes, due for their entertainment in former warres: for the payment whereof, the King had suffered them to tax themselves to the fifth part of their estates. The Commissioners and Receiueurs prest the collection, being destitute to make an end of that businesse, the day of payment being past. Hereon the Admirall treated with the Priuy Councill, on Friday the 22 of August, where the Duke of Aniou in the Kings absence was President.

At the rising of the Councill, the Admirall hauing attended on the King, who went to play at Tennis, he retired himselfe to his lodging at dinner time, being accompanied with

fifteene or sixteene Gentlemen : and reading a petition, when as being about a hundred spaces from the Louvre, a Harguebuze shot from the window of a lodging neere by, belonging to Villemur, sometimes Schoolemaster to the Duke of Guise, caries away the fore-finger of his right hand, and wounds him in the left arme. They breake downe the doore of the lodging : they finde the Harguebuze, but not him that discharged it. This was Mauzeuel (vnder a counterfeite name of Bollan one of the Kings guards) a fit man for such murders : who mounting vpon a Genet of Spaine which was provided ready for him, fled by Saint Antonies gate to a place of safety.

The King played, and vpon the first report of this hurt : Shall I neuer haue quiet (said he) shall I daily see new troubles. And casting his Racket to the ground, hee retired to the Louvre, and swears with an execration to the King of Nauarre, and the Prince of Condé (who were come vnto him to complaine of this outrage) to take such exemplary iustice of the offender, his fauours and adherents, as the Admirall and his friends should haue cause to rest satisfied. He presently commands to pursue him that shot (but they goe slowly after him) he appoints three of the Parliament to make informations against the offender, Thou, Morfan, and Viole : hee leaves onely two gates open with great guards, vnder colour to search for such as were priuy to this outrage, putting the whole city into armes. The Queene-mother seemes to be discontented. They do great wrong vnto the King (cries she) if he should suffer this crime unpunished, they would in the end attempt against his owne house. These counterfeite speeches retaine the King of Nauarre, and the Prince of Condé, who had desired leaue to retire themselves, but then they made no more mention of leaving the Court. Charles himselfe, and Katherine his mother, come in the afternoon to visit the Admirall. The Admirall shewes vnto him the miseries which the breach of the Peace would bring vnto France : he beseecheth him to chafe away these murdres, and to maintaine his promised faith : whereupon he was come to Court, and to provide for the preferuation of the Realme. But the Queene-mother knew well how to prevent him, lest he should acquaint the King with some secrets, touching the preferuation of his Estate.

Treachery in a
King.

The King protests againe to bee exceeding forie : that this act toucheth his honour, and that hee will be reuenged, so as the memory thereof shall remaine for euer. Hee persuades the Admirall to suffer himselfe to be caried to the Louvre, for the safety of his person : that it was to bee feared, lest the multitude stirred vp by the authors of his hurt, should fall into some greater mutinie. Hee also aduise the Gentlemen, Protestants, to lodge about the Admirals lodging, lest (said he) that being disperfed through the citie, they should recieue some wrong. But to shew that hee would not forget any thing that might concerne the Admirals safety, seeing the griefe of his wound would not suffer him to be transported, he command Coffeins Capitaine of his guards, to giue the Admirall as many of his guard as he pleased, and to suffer no Catholike to enter. And lest any man should grow amazed hereat, the King writes to the Gouernours of the Prouinces, to the chiefe towne, and Magistrates, That he would take such order, as the authors of so wicked an act should be knowne and punished. And to his Ambassadors with foraine Princes : that they should make it knowne to all the world, that this outrage doth displease him. The Queene-mother writes in like manner, but this was onely to keepe euery bird within his nest. In the meane time the dukes of Aniou and Guise, tooke counsell of that which they had to doe the night following. Saturday in the morning, it is bruited throughout the citie, that the Protestants did threaten the house of Guise. Hereupon the Dukes of Guise and Aumale goe vnto the King, and say vnto him : that of late they haue found their seruice to be little agreeable to his Maiestie : that if he were pleased to see them retired to their houses, they were ready to depart. Goe (saith Charles vnto them with a frowning countenance) where you please, I will haue you at all times, if you be found guilty of the Admirals hurt. So making shew to be discontented, they goe to horse, and many with them, yet meaning to yein Paris.

Paris was a pit-fall to intrap the chiefe of the Protestants : they being dead, the safer sort of that party, would in all likelihood remaine quiet. The time now offered a fit opportunitie of reuenge, the which should not be lost. The counsell was taken after dinner at the Tuilleries, by the King, the Queene Mother, the dukes of Aniou, Neuers, Retz and Taunannes.

The

A The King of Nauarres life, with the Prince of Condes, were put in balance, the wars had beene managed in their names : If they liue (said one) they will serue as an Ensigne, to reuieue those Huguenots which shall remaine in diuers Prouinces, and shall euery day minister motiues of confusions. Contrariwise, the Admirall and the principals being taken away, it shall be easie to restrain these young Princes, not onely not to attempt any innovation, but also in time to winne the Kings good fauour by their seruices : also the indignity of the fact would purchase an insupportable hatred amongst strangers. God disposed the hearts of the Councell to this second aduice, so as they will embrace the Catholike religion, and liue vnder the obedience of his Maiesty. As for the rest (whom the fury of their armes should touch) they might with a goodly pretext, leaue to the ancient quarrell of the Guisens against the Admirall, and take for an excuse, the feare they had left the Huguenots should seeke a reuenge for his hurt. To lay all the hatred vpon the Guisens, they giue the charge of this businesse to the Duke of Guise, they appoint him the meanes, the time, and the ministers of the execution.

The night being come, the Duke calls vnto him the Captaines of the Suisses, and other companies (whom to that end they had drawne into the Citie) and delieths his charge vnto them, which was, to root out the Admirall and all his partisans. He exhorts them to blood and spoile, and disposeth his troops in some speciall places. Then hee giues aduice vnto the Prouost of the Merchants, the Sheriffes and quarter-masters : that throughout all France, the like should be done to the Huguenots as at Paris. That the Palace bell ringing at the breake of day, shall giue the signal : and the mark of these executioners should be a handkerchiefe tied about their arms, with a white crosse in their hats : that they should put their men in armes, and bee at midnight in the Towne-house, to receiue order what they had to doe.

They assemble at midnight, and place many guards in the streets. Some Gentlemen lodged neere vnto the Admirall, rise at the noise of their armes, and the light of their lamps, and going into the streets, they enquire of the first they meet, what this assembly of armed men meant at so vnseasonable a time. A doubtfull answer being giuen them, makes them to repaire to the Louvre, to discover more. Here the guards goe from words to blowes, and fall vpon them. The Duke of Guise parts from the Louvre, accompanied with the Knight of Angoulême, bastard to Henry the second, the Duke of Aumale, Coffersins, Sadaboue, Goas, Attin a Picard, Hausfort an Auvergne, and Besmes a Germane, with some Harguebuziers of the Kings, and all the Duke of Anious Guard. The alarme-bell rings at Saint Germane Auxerrois, and they publish throughout the Citie, That the Huguenots had conspired against the King, the Queene mother, and all the chiefe in Court. Coffeins knocks at the Admirals gate : he enters at two of the clocke in the morning, the foure and twentieth day of the month, stabs him that comes to open it, forceth the doores of the lodging, enters with seuen or eight armed. Besmes a household seruant to the Duke of Guise, offers the Admirall the point of his sword. Hereupon the Admirall being risen

E vpon his sector, and covered with his night-gowne, said : Townsmen, thou shouldst haue respect vnto my old age and infirmities, but thou shalt not way shorten my dayes. Hee thrusts him through the body, and then doubles it on his head : Attin shoots him through with a pistoll : and when as these three wounds were not able to overthrow him, Besmes wounds him on the legge ; euery one of the reſſignes his blow, and thus they cast that body miserably to the ground, whom liuing and in health they durst not looke in the face. The Duke of Guise hearing the noise of their armes in the base Court, enquires if it bee done, and commands them to cast him out at the window : who yet breathing, layes hold on the pillar : but hee butcherly murderers shule him downe headlong, where the duke wiping his face with a handkerchiefe : I know him (saith he) it is the very same : and so spurges him with his foot : then going into the street ; Courage companions, we haue begunne happily, let vs proceed to this rest, the King commands it. An Italian of the household of the Duke of Neuers, cuts off his head, and carries it to the King and Queene mother, which causing it to be embalm'd, sent to the Pope and to the Cardinall of Lorraine, for an assurance of the death of his most capital enemy.

The palace docke strikes, and the people flye to the Admirals lodging like mad men, one cuts off his hands, another his priuy members : and for the space of three dayes, they dragge this poore carcasse with all indignity through the streets : and then they carry and hang it by the feet at Montfaucon. His lodging is spoiled, his household servants murdered. Those which attended on the King of Navarre and Prince of Conde, are driven out of their chambers, (they were in the Louvre, where the King had lodged them, to the end (sayd he) that (those of Guise having the people at their devotion) they should not in like manner feele the effects of their violence) and murdered in the base Courts the Noblemen and Gentlemen lodged in the Admirals quarter, vndergoe the like fortune. The like fury oppresseth the other Protestants throughout the city and suburbs, of all ages, conditions, and sexes, men, women, and children, rich and poore. There is nothing to be heard in Paris, but a horrible noise of armes, horses and harguebuzes: a lamentable cry of people going vnto death, a pittifull complaint of such as cried for mercy, and the pitiless shouts of murderers. The streets are strewd with carcasses, the paucements, market-places, and riuers died with blood. One day alone (by the murderers saying) hath ended the quarrell, which neither pen, paper, decrees of iustice, nor open warre could see determined in twelue years. About ten thousand foules makes this Sunday famous for euer, polluted with the spoiling of goods, and the effusion of their blood that were asleepe, disarmed, and at such a season as they thought themselves most safe. And doubtlesse the horrible catastrophes happened since to our Charles, to his brother and successors, and to the brethren of the House of Guise, in the last acts of their liues, and generally to all this Realme, euen vnto our dayes, forceth vs to confesse; That mans blood violently spilt, when as the manner of it may not lawfully be qualified with the name of Iustice, cannot please his sight, who hath created them to his owne image and likenesse, and fels them dearly to the authors of this effusion.

The fame of this massacre had already passed from the city to the suburbs, and when the Earle of Montgomery, John of Ferrieres Vidame of Chartres, Beauvais la Rôle, Fontenay, and many Gentlemen, lodged in the suburbs of Saint Germaine, perceiving a number of men to crosse the riuer, to make them equall with their companions: they abandon their baggage, goe suddenly to horse, and save themselves with speed, being pursued halfe a dayes journey by the Duke of Guise. But he that should haue brought the keyes of Saint Germaines gate, having mistaken them, gaue them some leisure to get the advantage.

The King lends for the King of Navarre, and the Prince of Conde, and gives them to vnderstand, That having bene croit many years with a continuance of warre, hee had in the end found an assured meane to cut off all motives of confusions to come: that by his commandement they had slain the Admirall (the pernicious author of forepassed troubles:) that now they did the like to others in the City, that were infected with the poison of heresie, and the ministers of his wickednesse: That he remembered well the discomforts he had receiued by their two meanes, making themselves the heads of a troop of desperate men: That now the cause and opportunity gives him meane to beee revenged of such outrages: but notwithstanding he doth pardon their offence, by reason of constancy and their young age, believing that all had bene committed, not by their fault and counsell, but by the Admirall and other wicked subiects, who now haue suffered and doe suffer a iust punishment due to their deserts, so as hereafter they repaire their faults past, by fidelity and obedience; and renouncing the doctrine of their prophane superstition, they cleave to the Catholike Religion, and returne into the communion of the Church: That hereafter hee will haue but one Religion within his Realme, euen that which he hath receiued from his Ancestors: That they should aduise whether they would obey him in this point, if not, let them resolute to yeeld their heads to the like punishments of their companions.

The King of Navarre beseecheth his Maiesty to remember his promise, and the alliance lately contracted, and not to force him in the religion which hee hath learned from his infancy. The Prince of Conde answers: That the King hath giuen his faith to all them of the Religion; and that he cannot perswade himselfe he will breake so solemne an oath. As for the obedience (saith hee) you require of me, I haue faithfully performed it vnto this day, neither will I hereafter stray in any thing from my duty. But as for my religion, my Liege, I am resolute to continue constant and (with the hazard of my life) maintaine it to be true: you haue granted me the exercise thereof, and God hath giuen me the knowledge, to whom I must yeeld an account, leauing my body and goods to the disposition of your will. This resolute answer puts Charles into choller, who full of threats,

A threats, gives the Prince but three dayes liberty to aduise, whether hee would soone lose his head vpon a scaffold. In the end, both abjure the doctrine they followed, and by the intercession of the Cardinall of Bourbon their Vncle, they obtained pardon of the Pope, and were receiued into the bosome of the Church.

After the massacre, those of Guise, according to the conclusion of the Councell, should retire themselves into some one of their houses out of Paris, and Charles should expressly charge and command the Gouernors of Prouinces and Townes, to obserue the Edict of peace, and to punish the breach thereof severely, to the end the people of France and their neighbours, should impute all the fury of this massacre, to the ancient quarrell of those of Guise, with the house of Chastillon. But the foulness of the fact might heape vpon them and their posterity, the hatred of all men, with whom humane society and vertue is in recommendation. For they had not spared an infinite number of learned men, of reuerend old men, honest virgins, honourable matrons, women with child, chaste maidens, young schollers, and little Infants hanging at the breasts of their mothers. Arming themselves therefore with the peoples loue, they resolute to goe out of Paris, handling the matter so politely, as they cause the King to auousch all that had beene done. So Charles writes other Letters to his Ambassadors and Gouernors, aduertising them, That the tumult which had happened concerned not religion, but the preferuation of his Estate, his House and Person, against the practices of the Admirall, and some other seditious persons; who had joyntly conspired his death, his Mothers, and his brethren, and therefore he would haue his Edict of pacification religiously obserued. Yet if any Huguenots (moued with these newes of Paris) should assemble in armes, they should root them out, as perturbors of the publike peace, referring the surplussage of his will, to the credit of the bearer. And the better to authorise this approbation, the sixteenth twentieth day of August, Charles with his brethren assits in Parliament, all the chambers being assembled, where sitting in his seat of Iustice, he declares openly, that those things which had chanced in Paris, were done by his owne proper motion and commandement, yet making no mention of the cause. Christopher of Thou, the chiefe President, commended his zeale in the name of all the companie.

The Admirall
accused of conspiracy.

D But to what end did he write the contrary the next day to his Officers and the Magistrats of Townes; That to his great griefe the Admirall his cousin, and some others of his party, had bene slaine at Paris: commanding them to prevent all mutinies and murders, and to proclaim, that euery man should remaine quiet in his house, without taking of armes, or giuing any offence: and to giue order that his Edict of pacification be exactly obserued: and yet the same day to publish a declaration of the former tenure, containing, that by his expresse commandement, the Admirall and other his complices had bene slaine, not for matter of Religion, but to prevent the execution of a wicked practice made by them against the Kings person, the Queens-mother, his brethren, the King of Navarre (this was for a colour of excuse, to such as would obiect, Why then was this Prince saved from shipwracke, and it may bee for loue of him, the Prince of Conde his cousin) and generally against their Houses, and the House of France?

Doubtlesse there was small likelihood, that a little troop of men, dispersed some in the suburbs, others within the citie in small numbers, should presume to attempt any thing against the Estate. Charles had both night and day his ordinary guards, French, Swisses, and Scotchmen: the most of the Princes, Noblemen and Gentlemen of the Realme were in Court to honour the marriage. Those which had accompanied the King of Navarre and the Prince of Conde, had no other armes but their swords: and for a gage of their innocency, had brought for the most part their wiues, children, sisters and kinsfolkes, studying only to shew themselves at the Tilt and Tourney.

F The accusation made no mention of time, place, or adherents, neither of the means, or any witnesses of this conspiracy. If it had bene plotted since the Admirals hurt, three hundred Gentlemen vnarmed, which had accompanied him, could they haue effected any thing vnder a Commander, tied by both the armes, and ready to see the one cut off by the aduice of the Physicians and Chyrurgions, in a mighty city, and against about three score thousand men, ready to be opposed at the first alarme? Moreover, the King of Navarre and Prince of Conde, who had bene still present at Councels, would they haue belied their honors and Houses with so great an infamy? And if their innocency had freed them from the common danger, the consultations of the Admiral and his followers, A had they not bene very childish at such a time, in such a place, among so many natural French-men come with him, who had neither goods, kinsfolke, pleasure, nor content without the Realme? Besides, if the Admirall were suspected of this attempt, might they not have committed him presently to a safe prison, informe of his practices, and take such conclusions as the crime might deserve according to the lawes? To conclude, admit the Admirall after his hurt, or else his friends had giuen forth some bad speeches, must the same punishment deuoure so many persons, who conuerfed onely with their books and papers, with their trafficke, and with their worke, so many women, who dreamed but of their huiuswifery, so many virgins and infants, whose age and condition kept them from the conference of any counsell?

As for the attempt against the King of Nauarre, that accusation is friuolous. Had not the Admirall him in his power, for the space of three yeares? what benefit should he reap by his death? Haue they not conuerfed long together with an humble and sincere respect of the Admirall towards him, and a perfect loue of the sayd King to the Admirall: but omit all other reasons that might refuse this slander: let vs onely obserue the testimony which Montluc giues in the seuenth booke of his Commentaries, vpon this subiect. The Queene-mother (saith he) did me the honour to write vnto me, that they had discovered a great conspiracy against the King and his Estate, the which was the cause of what had happened. I know what my beliefe was, it is not good to offend ones master. The King did neuer forget how the Admirall made him retire in haste from Meaux to Paris: wee lose our iudgements suddenly, and doe not dreame that Kings haue greater hearts then we haue, and doe sooner forget seruises then offences. And a little aboue: My Lord the Admirall was ill aduised, to thrust himselfe into Paris, to shew that hee gouerned all. I wonder, that so aduised and wise a man should commit so grosse an error. He payed dearly for it: it cost him his life, and many more.

The particularities of such as during this horrible butchery haue shed their bloods for Religions sake, at Meaux, Troyes, Orlance, Bourges, la Charité, Lions, Tholouza, Bourdeaux, Rouan, and other townes, in villages, and in the open fields, as they sought to saue themselves without the Realme, haue bene obserued in other workes that are extant, and the blood of these murdered persons, which amount to aboue thirty thousand, hauing dyed the earth, and made the waters red, haue cryed so loud, that the heauens haue continued their vengeance ouer great and small, for so many yeares, as there remains scarce any one of the authors of this violent fact. Britan and Picardy remained reasonably quiet: Champagne and Bourgongne shed little blood, through the policy of them of Guise, that all the blame might light vpon the King (as also they had saued many of the chiefe Protestants in the midst of the fury of this Parisien euil-song.) In Auvergne Saint Heran put more money into his coffers, then he shed blood in his gouernment. In Dauphine there were some murders committed. In Prouence, the humanity of the Earle of Tende restrained the hands and swords of the bloody-minded.

In the end, the people (glutted with the blood, and cloyed with the spoiles of the murdered Protestants) grow quiet, and the King appoints an extraordinary Iubile with general processions, where his Maicesty assisted, with the Queene his mother, his brethren, and the Court, of purpose to giue thanks to God, for that which had so happily succeeded. There were yet some thornes stuck in Charles his feet: Rochel, Sancerre, Montauban, Nismes, Aubenas, Millaud, Prius, Mirabel, Andure, and other small townes of Viurets and Seuennes serued as a Sanctuary for the Protestants that were escaped, to keepe them from danger. Rochel was not to be dealt withall, and it seemed that industry and secret practices should preuaile more then open force. Strussy and La Garde will relieue the inhabitants with men to keepe it, and vn furnish them of victuals, requiring a quantitie to refresh their army. But they had men enough; a great number were fled thither, and many protestant Souldiers whom the hope of the voyage of Flanders entertained in the kings army, slip hourly into their towne. Their priuiledges likewise did free them from garison, and as for victuals, they had for their prouision, but could not spare any. Strussy and La Garde spent both time and money in vaine about Rochel: they therefore send Biron vnto them for their Gouernor, with expresse commandement to receiue a garison. They answer, That they cannot beleue that that charge comes from the King, who commanded the strict

A strict obseruation of the Edict, and grants them the vse of their ancient priuiledges vnder his obedience. And for a testimony they produce the Kings Letters of the 22 and 24 of August, whereby his Maicesty layes the motives of the sedition vpon them of Guise, saying, That he had much adoe to preserve himselfe in the midst of his guards in his Castle of Loure. As for the reasons which made them to avoid all the surprises and baits of such as Biron sent to treat with them, they vsed the means which pollicie wisdom doth usually furnish in such accidents: offering notwithstanding to accept Biron, so as the troops may be retired from thence; the exercise of their Religion to remaine free, and that hee bring no forces into the towne.

B Biron summons them by vertue of his authoritie, and vpon refusall proclaimes warre against them: and euen then, vnder colour to giue the army at Sea meanes to disperse it selfe, he labours by all meanes to cut off their victuals and prouisions, and to weaken them of their men. The King by his Letters parents of the 8 of October, calls home all that were fled out of diuers townes; saying, That as a good father of a family he had pitie of his poor subjects, being out of their houses: and for not comming did seize and declare their goods forfeit. Yet the excuses which the King made vnto the Pope, to the Duke of Alua, and to the Ambassador of Spaine, that the brutes of the Belgicke warre, and all the former counsels had tended to no other end, but to the ruine of the Huguenots: that his intent was to liue in peace and good correspondency with the Catholike king: and the Commissions he had sent to the Gouernors of Prouinces to degrade all Protestants from their Offices and publike charges, although they were ready to renounce their Religion, except such as advanced to meane offices, were continued by the King, abjuring according to a forme set downe by the Colledge of Sorbonne, and to search for all Protestants, that during the troubles had had the command of armes, or townes of warre, made this repeale of Charles to be wonderfully suspected.

Hereafter they vie all acts of hostilitie against the Rochelois: such as they know to be of the towne are kept prisoners, and put to their rancome: ships that failed towards the port were flayed: all merchandize belonging to the Rochelois seized & confiscated. They therefore hasten the succours which the Count Montgomery, the Vidame of Chartres and others prepared for them in England. The 25 of October they set sail, but not able to approach, they returned backe. Those of Sancerre hauing refused to receiue a Gouernor and Garison from the hands of La Casstre Gouernor of Berry, were beleaguerd in the beginning of October: Cadaillet Groome of the Chamber, and the Kings Huntsman, very well knowne in the towne, as an ancient seruant to the Earle of Sancerre, was sent to conferre with them: he brought the inhabitants to that point, as some desiring and others refusing the Lord of Fontaines being a Catholike, his brother surprised the Castle by the meanes of some inhabitants, who shut themselves into it with him: but the resolution, and the greater number of the Protestants displaced them within foure and twenty houres, as Fontaines came to their succours. So as La Casstre prepares now for open force, whereof wee shall see the progresse in the beginning of the following yeare.

This vnworthy and strange proceeding against the Protestants, had made the French name hateful to strangers, especially in Poland, and did much trouble the negotiation, in fauour of the Duke of Aniou. Moreover, the Protestants both within and without the Realme, layd plots which in short time might produce dangerous effects. To make the Bishops negotiation more easie, and to crosse the proiects of others, they obserue hereafter some forme of iustice against any that were found after the fury of the massacre. Brique-mailli a Gentleman of threescore and ten yeares old, and Causigner Master of Requests vnto the King, (both inward friends vnto the Admirall, and of great reputation) were of the number. They threaten them with an extraordinary torture, if they set not downe vnder their hands to haue conspired with the Admirall, the death of the King, his brethren, the Queene mother, and of the King of Nauarre, promising them pardon, if they demand it, in aduowing that wherewith they are charged. Wee will neuer (saith they) accuse innocents, nor our selves for so execrable a crime. The Commissioners not able to extort from them any such confession, they were both by sentence of the Court, as guilty of high treason, vnworthily hanged the 27 of October, in the presence of the King, Queene mother, her two other sonnes, and the King of Nauarre. To the same execution was added the like decree against the Admirall. His body had bene taken from Mountfaucon and fe- rectly cretely buried, the which the greatest fearch of his enemies could neuer discover. They A therefore make the forme of a man, dragge it through the citie, and then caufe it to bee hanged. Moreover, the King commands by his Letters Patents, That those of the pretended Religion should be maintained in safety in their houses, bodics, goods, and liberty of consciences. And to excuse what was past, they cast abroad many libels, defaming the memory of the Admirall and his followers. They giue new charges to the Ambassadors being in Germany, Poland, England, Suifferland, and other foraine countries, to iustifie the actions of the King and Catholikes, to the confusion and dishonor of the Admirall and his partie. But all these proceedings were meanes to discover the iniquitie of their pernicious counsels.

For the intent of this Declaration in fauour of the Protestants was presently discovered by the tenor of the Letters which the Duke of Guise did write vnto his wife, the day that Brigveman was executed: The King (said he) hath decreed in Councell utterly to root out this sedition vermine. But few would be taken, and the practices against the Prince of Aunages and others being discovered by this Letter, vanished into smoake.

In the meane time, they continued their attempts against Rochel: and Effars being chosen chiefe of the war for the Rochelois, having taken one of the Baron of la Garde galleys, who had approached too neare vnder colour of bringing a Letter to the whole body of the towne, caused Biron to publish the Kings Letters patents, giuen the sixth day of the month, and to make open warre to the Rochelois. But Charles was not willingly drawne C to armes: he sees well that he had kindled a fire which hee should not quench when hee would. He now tries the last stratagem. La Noue sent home by the Duke of Alua, after the taking of Monts in Hainault, had great credit among the Protestants, as one of the chiefe Captaines which remained. The King solicites him to be a meanes to bring the Rochelois to composition. The impossibility of the thing, (answers he) and my conscience, will not suffer me to advise the Rochelois to offer their throats to them that will cut them. Yet the Kings authority makes him to accept of this charge: but rather with an intent to serue the Rochelois, and to retire himselfe from Court, then to hurt them of his religion. After he had giuen an account of his Ambassage to Biron, who was then at Saint Iean d'Angely, he returns to Rochel, where he performed his duty so well and carefully, as they D acknowledged him for one of the chiefe instruments of the preservation thereof during the siege.

A COUNTE

Then appeared there a new flarre in heauen, hauing the forme of a Lozenge of four points, and continued (beginning the ninth of Nouember) the space of nine moneths, in-moueable (by the saying of the Astronomers) the first three weekes resembling that which serued as a guide to the Wisemen that came out of the East to worship Iesus Christ in Bethlem. The nineteenth of the said moneth, the King by another Edict, called home all his subiects to their houses, vpon paine of losse of their goods, and solicited the Protestant Suiffes, to chafe away such as were fled to them for succour. But the Ambassadors instance was of no force, and the taking of Sommiers by the Marshall of d'Anuille from the Protestants, the persuasions of Gourdes to draw into the bofome of the Catholike Church Monbrun, Mirabel, and Les Digueires (who euen then made shew of a most valiant, most wife, and most happy Captaine for their party, and shall hereafter haue a good share in our History) the assurance he gave them, That the King was resolved to suffer but one Religion within his Realme, with all the preparations for the destruction of them in diuers Provinces, tooke from them all desire to returne.

Seeing then that no Edicts can draw them home to their houses, and that Rochel, Sancerre, and other places (being threatened) prepare for defence, they must at the least take from the Protestants such refuges as they haue within the Realme. To shut vp Rochel, Biron enters into the Country of Onis, in the beginning of December, with seven cornets of F horse, and eightene Ensignes of foot. Those of Sancerre runne yet at liberty: but the opinion of their chiefe Commanders, that they would attempt some other thing, and the vaine presumption they had of the situation of their hilly place, made them the more negligent, both to furnish it with victuals, and to repaire the necessary fortifications to endure a siege, against the which they should haue foreseene the small hope of succours and the constant resolution of the assailants. Let vs consider of these circumstances, and prepare our selues to see the greatest resolution of men, led by Captaines to whom the necessity

A necessity of the time, gave more credit, then their beginning gave them authority. Martignen, Pilard, Martinhé, La Fleur, Chaillois, Moutauban, Busillon, Paguelon, La Mine, and Dorinal commanded there ouer 650 men, and for Colonnell they had Andrew Jonneau Bayliffe of the towne. An hundred and fifty strong labourers in the Vines, wrought great effects with their slings (which were called the Pistols of Sancerre) for the seruices vpon the wall in assaults, scaldos, and sallies.

In Ianuary La Chastre Lieutenant for the King, in the government of Berry, and Gene- rall of his army, came before it with about 500 horse, and 5000 foot, sixteene Ensignes of Pioners, and a great number of peasants gathered together: at the first hee offers a reasona- B ble composition to the besieged, if they will accept it. As the beginning of this Generall was courteous, so was the proceeding of the besieged inciuill, disdainfull, and contrary to the law of the Nations. They retaine the Drum, and make no answer. To make his approaches, La Chastre builds a fort about four hundred paces off the towne towards Pon- tenay, another vpon the way of S. Thibault, a paliado in the field of S. Ladre: intrenched the approaches and wayes about the towne, planted ten pieces of artillery in the field of S. Ladre: and sixe others at Orme au Loup: (it is a high mountaine vpon the South side of Sancerre, which commands the towne) he shoots against the walls and houses at ran- dom: and spends in two moneths about six thousand Cannon shot (and yet the besieged lost not above five and twenty men) giues an assault, but with the losse of many that were C slaine, and a great number hurt.

The 13 of March, La Chastre, by a second battery in three diuers places, beats down the defences both of towers and wal, makes a breach of about three hundred paces, giues a general assault, presents a scaldos on another side, mynes and saps on the third, that the Sancerrois (wearied with so many difficulties) might shrinke vnder their burthen. But well assailed, and well defended, the besieged with the losse of seuenteen soldiers, not only repulse the enemy, but also make them leaue about threefcore of their most resolute men slaine in the ditches, about 200 wounded to the death, and as many maimed for euer; this cooled their heat, causing them to change this hasty fury of Cannons and assaults, into a longer, but more violent warre. They make many forts nearer vnto the Towne, and D notwithstanding the sallies and ordinarie skirmishes of the Sancerrois, they furnish them with artillerie and men, sufficient to cut off all reliefe, so as being shut vp on all sides, they begin to want ordinarie victuals in the beginning of April: they eat their Affes and Moyles, then fall they to horses, Dogs, Cats, Mice, Moles, and Leather, and in the end to Parchment, Hornes, trappings of Horses, Girdles, and wild roots. And in the end of Iune, three parts of them had no bread to eat; some make it of flax-seed, others of all kinds of herbs mixt with bran, beaten and ground in Mortars, and others of straw, of Nut-shells, and of Slates: greafe and tallow serued for pottage, and frying; yea, some (a strange thing and neuer heard of) laboured to incounter the cruelty of their hunger, by the excrements of horses and men. But a horrible thing to see, the 19 of Iune, a labourer in the Vines E and his wife satisfised their hunger with the head and intrails of their yong daughter about three yeares old, being dead in languishing, giuing no other graue to the members of this poore carcase, but their bellies. But the Magistrate aduertised of this inhumanity, did for examples sake shorten their dayes, finding them guilty of other crimes: neither were they forced hereunto by any extremite, seeing the same day they had beene relieued with pottage made of hearbs and wine, whereof there was store in the towne. To conclude, fourefcore men dyed by the sword at Sancerre (saith the History) but of hunger both within and without about five hundred. And euen now the King began to see his threats to take effect: I will make them (said he) eate one another. They were hopelesse of all humane helpe: such as they sent out for succours, either fell into their enemies hands, or F died by the sword, or returned no more, or could not re-enter. So as they could not hope for any helpe, but in despairing of helpe, when as the providence of God brings them a strange and farre-bred Nation, to giue them the libertie of the fields, and the vse of bread.

The Estates of Poland had chosen Henry Duke of Aniou brother to our Charles for their King (as we shall see in the end of the siege of Rochel) but with a promise and oath taken by the Bishop of Valence, and Lansac in the name of the King, their Master: That all the townes and persons in France molested for the cause of Religion should be set reli- bertie.

bertie. At the request thereof, the Ambassadors of Poland, this poore people languishing for hunger (yet resolute to die one after another, rather then to fall into their enemies hands, who threatened them with a generall massacre) the 19 of August they obtained of La Chastre in the Kings name: To depart with their Armes and baggage: impunitie for such as would remaine still, permission to dispose of their goods, promise to preserve the honour of women and maidens, and to pay La Chastre 400000 francs by the Inhabitants that were absent. So La Chastre entering the last of the said moneth, dismantled Sancerre, beat down some houses, tooke away the Clocke, Bels, and other marks of a towne: but the other points of the capitulation, were reasonably well observed: the Bayliffe Jonneau was massacred the 12 of September neere vnto La Chastres lodging.

Now follows one of the most memorable sieges that hath been in many ages. A siege where many of the Commanders, and most part of those, which were noted to haue forced the Admirals lodging, began the butcherie, and committed so many murders at Paris and else-where, came to seeke their graves. The Kings army was held to bee 50000 men by land and sea, and therefore pieces of artillerie. The besieged had a good number of Gentlemen and horsemen, eight companies of Inhabitants, nine of strangers, one of the Mayor, one of voluntaries, consisting of twenty Musquetiers, five and twenty armed with corselets of prooffe, and thirty Harguebuziers: the two thirds thereof, were Gentlemen, and such as had charge in the former warres. Yet the mildest way is the best. And therefore Biron in the beginning seekes some means of an accord: but the Rochelois discouraging every day some new practice, beleueed that their preservation consisted in distrust. And a gentleman being in Rochel, reuealed the intelligences which Biron had with him for the surprizing of the towne, hauing already drawne into the towne some souldiers of Pai-guillards and S. Martins companies, and was ready to draw in the most resolute Captains, if the Mayor and Councill had not held it more fit by a small exemplary execution, to breake off a great and dangerous enterprize.

To encounter the enemy, La Nove is chosen chiefe of the forces within the town, without any diminution of the Maiors rights and authoritie in other things. Manigomeris succours could not passe: La Nove sends new Deputies into England to the same end, but the league confirmed of late years betwix our Charles and Q. Elizabeth, now againe renewed by the baptism of the Kings daughter (whereof Elizabeth was God-mother with the Empreffe) seemed to withdraw the affection which was wont to come from beyond the seas for the reliefe of the Protestants, whilst the sallies and dayly skirmishes at Rochel, inflame both the one and the other: where by the reason of the nearness of the retreat, they doe greatly wast the number of the assailants.

The Duke of Aniou comes to campe

The eleventh of February the Duke of Aniou comes to his armie, accompanied with his brother the D. of Alençon, the King of Nauarre, the Prince of Condé, and the Dauphin of Auvergne, the Dukes of Longueville, Bouillon, Nevers, Aumale and Guise, the young Earle of Roch-fou-cault, the Grand Prior, and many other Noblemen, bringing with them a great traine of men, who for the most part would haue beene grieved, they should haue taken this Sanctuary and succour from the Protestants. This siege was great, and seemed to be of long continuance. Euery man runnes thither, euery one will haue his share. They prepare things necessary for the battery, and in the meane time make many skirmishes: before they come to their greatest force, the Duke sollicit the Gentlemen and inhabitants by Letters, containing both promises and threats. They humbly shew vnto him the necessitie of their defence, knowing no fitter means to preserve their liues against the enemies of the Peace, then to oppose force against violence, & to retire themselves into well fortified places, vntill it should please the King to provide for a lawfull assembly of the Estates, & a free council. The King on the other side, protekting of his sinceritie in matters lately passed, and laying the fault of the outrage hapned vpon the pretended conspiracie of the Admirall and his partisans, hee summons the Rochelois to open their gates to Biron, or to any other hauing charge to enter into the towne, as they ought to maintaine his Royall authoritie, and so to order it as the place may be no more at the disposition of mutines. Which doing he grants them exercise of their Religion, with the like liberty as he had granted by his Edict of pacification, and withall he takes from them all hope of succours from England.

Biron, Straffy, Villeguier, and the Abbot of Gadaigne, carie the Kings promise to the Rochelois.

A Rochelois: which now neglected, hee would neuer bee perswaded by any intreaties or requests, considering how much the King abused himselfe vnto his subiects. They shewing the equity of their defence, and the tyrannous iniustice of the Baron of La Garde and others, accept the Articles offered by the King: but they request that the Edict may not only be maintained for their priuate respect, but also generally for all of their religion in France. But these were words without effect on either side. The Rochelois are aduertised, how the enemy approacheth with two and thirty pieces of battery, and that after dinner they should keepe them in skirmish. They prevent them, they fall forth at noone, kill and hurt in one skirmish of six houres, an hundred and fifty men, amongst the which were many Captaines. La Nove had two horses slaine vnder him, three Captaines, five souldiers, and twenty hurt. Thus their courages are set on fire, and the battery begins: the one prepares to assaile, and the other to defend. The chance fell vpon Claude of Lorraine D. of Aumale, vnto the Duke of Guise, slaine behinde a gabion, with a piece planted vpon the bulwarke of the Euangile: and the Town-men issuing forth at the end of the battery, kill many, and coole the enemies heat.

The Duke of Aumale slaine

In the beginning of March they try againe, whether they may winne the Rochelois without combat. They offer them the exercise of their Religion within their towne, but abolished in all other places of the Realme. Those of the party might haue held them for double-dealers. One day of parle was more hurtfull vnto them then many weekes of warre. They resolute therefore to prefer a iust warre before a dishonorable and doubtful peace.

The battery is renewed: about 13000 Cannon shot spent in that moneth, shakes both the fortifications and wals: many skirmishes are made: euery one studies to surprize his enemy, and La Nove (seeing his presence of no import to the besieged, where hee must yeeld all, or in a manner all, to the popular government) comes to the Dukes army, where he effected more in fauour of the Rochelois being absent then present, as they afterwards confessed. The ordinarie sallies of the besieged wasted the Dukes troopes dayly, losing in few weekes about twenty good Captaines. The battery continues in April, and with such violence, as a long wall from the old fountaine vnto the end of the bulwarke of Euangile, was beat downe to the ground, the bulwarke vngarned, and the Tower of Cognes beaten downe. In the evening the enemy casts a bridge of wood into the trench, advancing euen vnto the bulwarke, they come to the assault, and win two casemats. But they dislodge them from the one with the Cannon: from the other, with a furious charge: some of them remaine for a gage, the rest saue themselves by flight. Two hundred rondaches and Corselets passe by their bridge of wood, and the Cannon playing without intermission, seemed to keepe the besieged from their defence. But the women and maids, running with an incredible resolution to cast wildfire and stones, inflamed the courage of the souldiers. They kill and wound, and in the end force them to abandon the trench, but they lose about threescore men, and some Captaines.

The Rochelois endure nine assaults.

E Hereafter there is nothing but thundring of the Cannon both by land and sea, furious assaults, showers of shot, planting of ladders, ruines of bulwarkes, saps and mynes, most fatal to their authors: and vntill the end of May all the attempts that might bee deuised in a mighty and obstatinate siege. On the other side, men, women, and children, without feare, endure the rough charges of the enemy, fill vp their breaches, ouerthrow the first that mount, beat back their enemies into their trenches, follow after them, and fight with variable successe: but most commonly to the advantage of the town-men, hauing endured nine assaults no lesse courageously, then valiantly giuen.

Victuals began to grow short in the towne, the Cannon continued the battery dayly, the number of the souldiers decayed, they had no means to refresh them, and many retiring themselves, bred an amazement in the towne. Some of the chiefe win many men to their wils, and already there were three hundred men, who weary of the warre, will haue a peace of what price soeuer. Others deuise to seize vpon a gate to depart when they please. These murmuring and diuisions cause new parleys, the D. of Aniou being desirous to retire with honour. But before the Ambassadors of Poland arriue, they must first resist their last force. The 12 of Iune the assailants giue a fierce assault, at the little breach neere to the old fountaine: About an hundred or sixscore Gentlemen mount with targets and courtelas, some get to the top of the mount, and view the trench and the countermines gabioned gabioned within the trench. A volley of shot overthrews fifteene or twenty vpon the place, and makes the rest retire. The Duke himselfe is in danger, but the providence of God refused him for a more exemplarie end.

Face of Rochel.

As he beheld the breach made at the old fontaine, a souldier shootes at him from the towne: but De Vin the Master of his horse, seeing the fire in the cocke, steps before him, and with the willing losse of his life saues his masters. In the end the Ambassadors of Poland come the 17 of Iune, to carie away their new chosen King. God vseth this meanes to deliuer Rochel, being vn furnished of victuals, of munition for the warre, and of many hundreds of their men. The King by his Articles of Peace made in forme of an Edict, grants to them of Rochel, Montauban, Nismes, and other townes which had maintained themselves, free exercise of their Religion, and to others permission to liue in their houses without search, to solemnize Christnings and Mariages after their manner, without any greater assembly then ten persons besides the parents: but the said exercise was forbidden in Court, and ten leagues round about. Another meanes did greatly ease the besieged, the diuision in the Dukes campe, and the aduertisements they received from their friends following the armie. So the end of this siege, being of exceeding charge, and the graue of about twenty thousand men slaine in skirmishes, encounters, surprizes, assaults, and dead of burts, hunger and diseases, caused the King to make great designs for the repairing of many errors, into the which the priuate ambition of some, abusing the youth and the violent passions of this Prince had drawne him: but too late for him, for hee sees his Realme inflamed with the same fire, which they perswaded him should haue beene wholly quenched with the blood that was shed at S. Barthelemyes, and the warres of ciuill diuision vterly extinct. So the feeling hee had in himselfe of these actions whereinto they had drawne him, shall soon lodge him in the graue of his Predecessors.

The other exploits of warre done elsewhere in diuers Prouinces of the Realme, require some place in our History. The Baron of Serignac, a wife man, vertuous, and louing martiall discipline, with some others of Quercy, Foix, and the neighbour Prouinces, haue caused Montauban to resolute to armes, goe to field with their troopes, put a garison into Terride, whereof Serignac named himselfe Baron, tooke Buzet vpon Tar, three leagues from Tolousa, by scalado, assure themselves of Villemer, seize vpon many other places, fortifie those they had held during all the former troubles, assure the passages, then at an assembly held at Realmont in Albigeois, they made a diuision of their charges & governments. The Vicount of Gourdon had a part of Quercy towards Cadenac; and Serignac the other towards Montauban and Gascony; the Vicount of Paulin, Lauragais; the Vicount of Panas and his brother, Rouergue; the Vicount of Caumont, the County of Foix, and the mountaine country.

They were equall in their commands: but to auoid ieaousie, they decreed that one of them wanting succour, the other Commanders should succour him with all their forces, and be commanded by him. So they all retire to their governments, every one giues order for the preservation of their estates. Serignac occupies some neighbour places, then hee campt with two thousand shot, and some horse before Monricou, makes a breach, giues three assaults, and one scalado, and is repelled with losse. Piaule and Reauille make him receive the like disgrace, and kill many of his men. But he is reuenged to the benefit of one of his Captaines, besieged in a Village with fourecore men, hee slue about two hundred men, and put the rest to flight.

The Earle of Villars, Admirall of France and Licutenant for the King against the Protestants in Quercy, and the Countie thereabouts, gathers together his troopes, dispersed into garisons, besiegeth and taketh Saint Geniez in high Quercy, caries away the Lord of the place, notwithstanding the composition made to depart with their liues and goods, who was sent prisoner to Cahors. It is better to hunt after off, then near at home. The pursuit of many, against whom hee had made cruell warre, brought him to a scaffold, as a spectacle and triumph to his enemies. Brissenet in high Rouergue had a capitulation better observed: but the Admirall lost in counter-change, in the moneth of May, Soreze, Montequion, two leagues from Tholousa, Lodeue a Bishopricke, and rich in the mountaines of Languedoc, and Mas Saintes Puelles, neare to Castelnau dary. The Marshall d'Anville did likewise arme against the Protestants six Cornets of horse; and

The siege of Sommiere.

A ten thousand foot, with foureteen pieces of battery, pretending to besiege Nismes, and then Vazez, but the surprize of Sommiere, neere to Beziers and Montpelier, called him from his enterprise. He besiegeth it, makes a breach, and giues two assaults, which were defended to the losse of the besiegers. The Earle of Candale, brother-in-law to the Marshall, arises with an hundred horse, and twelue companies of Gascons, who desire to haue the force-ward at the first assault: but with the losse of three hundred of the most resolute. This cheeke amazeth the Earle. What fooles are we (saith he to the Marshall his brother-in-law) to cause our selues to be beaten, murdered and slaine, for their pleasure, who haue murdered our kinsmen, friends, and will one day pay vs with the same money?

He had reason, and the issue will teach vs soone the effect of this true diuination. And if the Marshall of Montmorency had been present this fatall 24 day of August, the same fury had interred him with all his house vnder this common ruine, as many others, yea Catholikes suffered the like violence by the practices of their priuate enemies, to whom the time and force gaue meanes to reuenge their priuate quarrels vnder another pretext. There were foure moneths already spent at this siege, about 5000 Cannon shot had beaten the wals of Sommiere to powder, victuals failed, and the besieged demanded nothing but composition. But the Marshall would haue it by force. He exhorts his brother-in-law to reuenge the death of his Captaines and Souldiers, who suffers himselfe to be persuaded, but as he goes resolutely to the breach, performing the duty of a braue Commander, and of a resolute souldier, he sees the place couered with a great number of his men, and himselfe in the end overthrown dead vpon the carcases.

This hens-rout might haue been the sepulchre of many more, but Grenian (to whom the honour of the taking and keeping of Sommiere is chiefly due) after they had performed the duties of valiant men, accepted the composition was offered by the Marshall: To depart, their Drums sounding, ensignes displayed, their matches light in the cocks, with seven dayes liberty to carie away their baggage, and to retire where they pleased. So the Marshall seeing the resolution of them of Nismes, and hauing lost two thousand and five hundred of his best men, dismissed his troopes, & proceeded afterwards against the Protestants, by seizures and sale of their goods within his government. The Admirals armie had another successe. Terride, Flaignac, and generally all which the Protestants held beyond the riuier of Garonne, recompensed the losses he had received. But Causade stayed the course of his victories, and made him vnable to doe and thing worthy of fame. La Motte Puiols kept the towne with six hundred Harguebuziers, and the repulse the Admirall received after a great losse of his forces, caused in the end the ruine of his armie, the which the Vicount of Gourdon shorned of a company at the passage of Dordonne, chasing the rest which marched to the siege of Rochel. The King of Nauarre had lately invited his Subjects of Berne to returne into the bosome of the Catholike Church. They answered their Prince with excuses, thinking it proceeded from some other motion then his owne: and protest to other Churches of that party, to perseuer and maintain themselves with them in the same religion: See now the effects of their protestations. The Baron of Grandmont, marcheth into Berneto plant the ancient religion. They troope together within the Countie, retaine him prisoner, and cut the most of his men in pieces. Saint Romaine was chiefe of the Protestants in Viuzarez, Montbrun in Dauphiné. The first held Villeneuve, the last seized vpon Orlperre, Serres, Meuse, and by diuers courses became terrible in the Diocesse of Die, and the neighbour mountaines.

These new broyles thrust their neighbors into like reuolts: and the King who thought by the abolition of the Edict, of the year 1570, at the least by the departure of his brother into Poland, and a Peace granted before Rochel, to enjoy an assured rest, finds himselfe incumbered with new and generall combustions. Those of Quercy, Languedoc, and their neighbours, planting an order and rule for the warre, and the administration of Justice, protest against this Edict, tearming it captious, and a forerunner of new massacres. Our capital enemies (saith they) the authors of fore-past disorders, remaine the enely counsellors and gouernours of the King and his estate: all the Churches of France, and deputed of the publicke exercise of Religion solemnly granted: and now by this Edict abolished: all the contents of this last pacification, and whatsoever else is promised vnder that words without effects: it is a generall abolition of what is past, the authoritons are abol-

ued, and no mention made of any iustice to be done against them: All Ecclesiasticall discipline being forbidden vs, they will plunge vs into Atheisme. This tractate is but coloured by some private persons without any generall aduow; whose approbation cannot prejudice the vniuersall body, neither ought they to yeeld to any thing without the common consent of our Churches. These complaints and protestations caused them to assemble at Millaud, and afterwards at Montauban, and there diuiding Languedoc into two gouernments, they make Montauban chiefe of the one, and the Vicount of Paulin Gouernour in that part; and Nismes of the other, for the nearer of Seuennes and Viarez, vnder the command of S. Remaine: but both subiect to the authoritie of the Estates of the Country, who gaue them counsell, and furnished them with money, being chosen in either gouernment of the worthiest men of the country, yet in such sort, as the particular estates of euery Diocese, did in matters of importance, confer by their Deputies with the Estates of the whole gouernment; and according to their conclusions, the gouernour shall cary himselfe, and receiue money from their hands. To fortifie this order, they decree: That the souldiers should be content with their entertainment, without spoiling of the country: that the townes and villages of the contrarie party, should bee taxed and forced to contribute for the entertainment of garisons, to the end their labour and reaping of their fruits might be free. The reuennues of Benefices was appointed to make a stocke of money, to be employed in their greatest affaires, the which they had leisure to effect: for the election of the King of Poland busied the Court and Councell in feasts, dancing, C and pleasures. So they man many places, from whence they might at need draw forth almost 20000 men, and by seizing on the Clergy lands, and the contribution which came from all parts, they weaken their enemies. Many Catholikes otherwise discontented, growing familiar with them, and beginning to ioyne their forces together, lay great designs, which shall soone breake out in all parts.

Matters thus handled, giue a beginning to the first troubles in France: but before it brake forth, the Protestants of Languedoc sent their Deputies to the King. They humbly thanke him for the affection he had seemed to haue to the maintenance of Peace within his Realme, and necessary means to restore an estate threatened with imminent ruine: they protest of their obedience, but they beseech his Maiestie not to finde it strange, if they assemble to preuent the pernicious attempts of wicked Councillors, who by their fraudulent and violent practices, had induced him to declare himselfe, both by his mouth, and his Letters Patents, to the great blemish of his reputation among strangers, the Author of the massacre committed at Paris, the which he had few dayes before disauowed. That they cannot beleue he should willingly condiscend to so bloody effects: and the feare they had to fall into the like, forced them to seeke all means they could to warrant themselves, with the losse of their companions blood so vniufully shed.

They request therefore: That for the effect of the Peace, those of the religion should in those Townes they held, and in two others of euery Prouince, chosen by four Deputies, haue Garisons entertained at the Kings charge, the exercise of their religion free and publike, to all such as would demand it, the obseruation of their Ecclesiasticall discipline, the buriall of their dead, without distinction of times, and of Churchyard: the exemption of contributions for the Ceremonies of the Romish Church: reception of their children into Colledges, vnder Tutors of their owne religion: Legitimation for such as should be borne of the marriage of Priests conuerted to their doctrine. Erection of a new Court of Iustice in euery Prouince, composed of Iudges of the same Religion. The Tithes which they paid to Priests, to bee referred for the maintenance of their Ministers. Punishment of the authors, councillors, and executioners of massacres, as theues and disturbers of the publike quiet. Moreouer, they demand, that the Admirall, with all those that had bene murdered, and that were then liuing, should be reputed to haue bene, and to be faithfull seruants and subiects to the King and his Estate, innocent of rebellion, and guiltlesse of conspiracy. A nullity of all acts made against them as calumnious: Restitution of goods, honours, and offices, to the heires of them that were murdered: Abolition of all infamous monuments, and generall processions instituted in memory of so execrable a day.

These were the principall points of their propositions, amongst other Articles concerning the gouernment. But they treated partly, as humble seruants, partly, as armed subiects,

A iect, like vnto such as begge for almes with their swords in their hands. And as a new alteration flies easily and suddenly from one Prouince to another, so those of Prouence, Dauphine, Lionnois, and others, ioyne with the first: and by the mouth of a Deputy, present their Petition and admonitions to the King. The King sends him to certaine Commissioners, to conferre thereof: and promisseth, that after hee had conducted his brother out of the Realme, he would doe all things necessarie for the contentment of his subiects.

This hardy resolution taken in Languedoc and the neighbour countries, made our Charles to change both his countenance and his speech. He sees well, the more he halted, the more impatiently they did beare his brothers departure: namely, the Queen mother,

B the Duke of Guise, and the Clergy. Henry himselfe desired rather to beare the title of Duke of Anjou in France, then King of Poland: neither was he greatly pleased, to make so long and so crosse a pilgrimage. His most confident seruants would willingly haue discontented the Polonois in their answer, either to haue sent them away ill satisfied, or to winne time vntill the Spring. But there was no remedy: Charles could no more containe himselfe amidst the complaints which came from so many parts of his Realme, but sometimes giues out threats against them which had abused him, making him beleue, that after the execution of the foure and twentieth of August last past, hee should raigne free from confusions. Strangers reproach him openly with the irreparable wrongs hee had done to himselfe and to his subiects: and accuse him, that in stead of a father, he had

C bene a butcher, and a hang-man of his people, or at the least taxed his honour with this title, by the induction of the principall authors of this horrible disorder. The delays of his brother displeased him. Henry by his first affabilitie won the peoples hearts. The affection which Charles noted of long time in the mother, to his aduancement as her best sonne, the credit which the house of Guise had in him, or at the least seemed to haue, and the hope which the Clergy grounded vpon his authority (they had already recompensed these agreeable seruices which he had done them, with a present of three hundred thousand Crownes, and had much augmented it, if Rochell had been taken) made him to bee suspected and fearefull to the King his brother, who euen then would willingly haue found the means to chastise such, as vnder the shadow of his name, had opened the way

D to so great iniustice, and such enraged furies. But during these garboyles and confusions of affaires, he found not any one of his Councillors of State, that did teach him to dissemble, and to containe himselfe, vntill that opportunity should giue him means of reuenge. So his complaints and threats were carefully obserued, and bitterly digested by such as it concerned. The Queene-mother, not able any longer to deferre the departure of her sonne Henry. Go (saith she) my sonne, you shall not continue long there. And as Charles goes before vnto the frontier, pressing his brother to follow him, he is suddenly staid by a great sicknesse, at Vitry in Champagne, giuing occasion to his most confident seruants to thinke, that about two attended the issue of his infirmities: and to speake disgracefully of the Queene-mother, the new King, and their trustiest seruants,

E whereof some retired from Court, and went to shroud themselves in Brittany, seeing that the vigour of the Kings youth, had expelled the venome of his disafe, by his head, necke, and visage. The King of Poland building vpon his mothers promises, departed in the end of October, being assured of the loue shee bare him about the other two. She feared the humors and threats of Charles: and Francis D. of Alancou did not greatly affect the House of Guise, neither had hee approved the massacre. The male-contentes, who with a lesse odious name called themselves Politicks, find credit with him, thinke him fit to reduce the affairs to a better course, and make him to repine at the small account is held of him: they let him vnderstand how small a proportion was allotted him for his maintenance: the distrust they haue of his faith, the opposition of the Queene-mother,

F to keep him from the Lieutenantcy of the Realme (who gaue the King to vnderstand, that by means of his male-contentes, he might stir vp some factious mutinie hauing the forces at his command) the search was made of him, and the means which were offered vnto him to restore the Realme. Katherine was well acquainted with these practices, but she cunningly makes her profit of them all, during the Kings sicknesse, to avoid the danger when the pleased, and to ruine one by another at need, as hereafter we shall see, they will do their best. During these alterations, those of Languedoc fortified themselves. To keepe them at a stay, vnder hope of some content, they appoint a generall Parliament at

at Compeigne : the Princes prepare the remembrances, some Deputies were on the way with instructions and Commissions, to speak boldly, namely against the authors and counsellors of murders. The Queene-mother and her followers fearing the touch, obtaine a reuocation of the States; and labouring at the first to pacifie these deputies by promises and words, in the end they change their countenances, they vie threats, and doe so terrifie them, as they returne home onely with a vaine hope, to receiue satisfaction shortly to their demands, and permission (especially to them of Languedoc) to assemble againe for the drawing of new Articles, concerning the preservation of themselves and their associates: the which they did afterwards at Millaud in Rouergue, and those of Rochel entred into association with them, forced vnto it by the practices and deuices of Paigardard, Landereau, the Baron of La Garde, and others, attending to surprize them: but ended with the yeare, and the liues of some that vnderooke it, being publiquely executed.

The fourth troubles, begun with the massacres, had some respite by the peace of Rochel: but now this last conspiracy discovered, and the practices to surprize them of Languedoc, with the secret leauies of men, to assaile them suddenly, giues an entrance to the fifth. The Protestants alledge for the ground of their arming, the infinit outrages which haue beene done them within few moneths, and send aduertisements and admonitions to the Princes, Nobility, the Parliaments, and the Estates. The Male-contents, and such as were most inward with the D. of Alancou, foreseeing the shortesse of the Kings life, yet not daring to complaine of it, but in shaking of the shoulders, and holding downe the head, sollicite him to get the Lieutenant general, to represent the Kings person; or if they will employ him against them of Languedoc, that he should seeke to saue the Realme from the violence of such as by the death of Charles, and the absence of Henry would seeke to seize thereon. He makes request vnto the King, being at S. Germaine in Lay, and the King doth acquaint the Queen Mother, and the Marshall of Montmorency with the dukes desire. To deny the Duke his request (sith the Marshall were to doe him wrong, and to call his sufficiency into question, seeing the same place had been giuen to the D. of Anjou without demanding it. But the Queene-mother, and those of Guise, desired it rather for the D. of Lorraine, whom soone after hee called to Court: and in the meane time seemes to beleue, that they be practices of the Marshalls of Montmorency and Cossé, at the persuasions of the King of Nauarre, and the Prince of Conde, to the end the Kings furie might ruine both one and the other.

She therefore takes counsell to assure her selfe, and to ruine such as would follow any other party but her own: and euen then did she trouble the Kings head with an exceeding feare and distrust of his household seruants. The Duke of Guise would gladly haue vnder-taken the House of Montmorency: but it was to no purpose, if all the foure brethren were not taken in one net. The Marshall of Anuille was in Languedoc, and determined to ioyne with the Protestants: yet the death of the eldest might make the rest easie. So the Duke of Guise one day picks a quarrell in the bafe Court of Saint Germaine with Ventabran his household seruant, and for a slight cause, being resolved to kill him, hee draws his sword. Ventabran flies directly to the Marshall of Montmorencys chamber, which hee finding shut, he mounts higher to that of the Constables Lady and widow: where finding Thore, hee slayes, and there receiues some blowes, but it was flatlings with his sword. This tragicke act (turned to a iest) sent the Marshall out of Court: but hee shall soone returne to receiue a great disgrace. The Duke of Alancou resolves likewise to leaue it, and to leade the King of Nauarre with him: but the execution was of great difficulty. To aske leaue would breed too many scruples and iealousies in the Kings head: to goe without leaue, was to accuse himselfe of some plot, and to be pursued as a fugitiue. Hee therefore stirs not, but lets passe a troope of two or three hundred horse; assembled in Normandy, to fauour (as the common brute was) the Duke of Alancous retreat, or as others would haue it; (but without any likelihood) to murder the King, his Mother, and his Councell. This leaue terrified the Court, and brought it to Paris: they presently charge the Duke of Alancou, and the King of Nauarre. To purge themselves, they publish a Declaration the 24 of March, touching the fact of S. Germaine: they protest of their good affection to the Kings, and they offer their seruicis against all Rebels.

Hereupon the Marshall of Montmorency is perswaded to come to Court. Hee is no sooner arriued, but they appoint him the Bastile for his lodging, and for companions in prison

A prison the Marshall of Cossé, La Mole, Cocornas, and Tourtay, seruants to the Duke of Alancou, whereof the three last lost their heads at Paris, culpable onely to haue beene acquainted with some of their masters Councels to abandon the Court.

During these broyles in Court, the Protestants and their associats make their profit in Viarez, Daulphine, Languedoc, and Poitou. And the Marshall d'Anuille, hauing by Letters surpris'd, discovered the practice against him, conferred now with Saint romaine Gouernour of Nismes, but seizing on Montpellier, Beaucaire, Lunel and Pezenas, hee giues the Protestants some cause to suspect his designs. The Politicks of Poitou haue ioynd with La Noue, seize vpon Saint Maixant, Melle, Fontenay, Lusignan and other places. The C. checke fell vpon the Normans: Montgommery, Lorges, and Galarçon his children. Columbiers, Sey, and others with troopes of horse and foot, had secretly taken Saint Lo, Carentan, and Valongues: but Matignon and Fernaques ioynd with the forces of the Count Thorién, (who already camped before Saint Lo) shut him into Danfron, a weake place, and ill furnished, with threecore horse, and fourecore Harguebuziers. They batter the Castle, make a breach of sixe and forty paces, and hauing beene vigorously repulsd from a sharpe assault, the Earle abandoned by his people, (whereof the most part were gone to his enemies, and the rest wauering, being vnfurnished of munition, water and succours, perfwaded by the Lord of Vassé (for he held it farre more honourable to dye vpon the breach, with a pike in his hand, then to fall into the Queene-mothers power, to end his dayes ignominiously on a scaffold :) he did but capitulate (but not without a grieuous apprehension of Columbiers, desiring rather to dye vpon the breach, then to serue as a spectacle at the Greue at Paris,) to depart with their liues, and to carie away some furniture with their swords and daggers: vpon condition notwithstanding, to remaine some time in the hands of Matignon, and Vassé, kinsman to the Earle, with surety of his life. A captious and fraudulent composition: the obseruation whereof must needs be broken. The Earle goes forth, and was led away by Matignon and Fernaques at mid-night: but his company remaine at the enemies deuotion, who force the Castle, kill some, spoile the rest, & put them al to ransom. Then Vassé appointed by the two Commanders, led the Earle to Paris: where since we did see him gore a mournfull scaffold, and expiate by his death (to the Queenes content) that of King Henry her husband. In the meane time the Duke of Montpensier made warre in Poitou, but slowly: and except the Cattle of Talmont which hee tooke from the Protestants by composition, hee did not any thing worthy of memory.

The taking hereof was encountered with two great disgraces, the one neere to Sainte Hermine, in the defeat of his company by Sainte Estienne, Captaine of Fontenay, (who slue many Gentlemen: led away fiftene or sixteen prisoners, got great store of baggage, and the Dukes plate:) the other at the siege of Fontenay. Some thinking to reuenge a disgrace, doe oftentimes increase it. Hee got nothing but blowes, with the losse of the most resolute of his troopes: and then an honest colour, the Kings sicknesse, called him from this siege, to attend new Commissions and forces. At that time the Prince of Conde did recreate himselfe in Picardy, wearied with the tymoyles of the Court. Being aduertised of diuers practices layed to seize vpon his person, hee flies into Germany; with Thorién, ill beloued by reason of the Marshalls of Montmorency, and d'Anuille, his brethren, and the counells giuen to the duke of Alancou. Being at Strasbourg, hee exhorts the Protestant Churches, to rely vpon his loue and zeale for their reliefe, and Thore perswades his brother d'Anuille, to open his eyes, and to embrace the occasion that was offered. This Marshall held the Wolfe by the eares: for on the one side, the Protestants of Languedoc might greatly crosse him, if hee had banded his forces directly against them: and on the other side, he feared the King, and the Queene his mother, who to keepe him in awe, caused his eldest brother to bee safely guarded, as a sure pledge for his yongers actions. Hee must therefore assure himselfe on all sides, and according to the course of the market, entertaine both the one, and the other, expecting a Catastrophe of this strange and horrible tragedy, which was acted in Court.

The King declined in the meane time, and decayed visibly in the prime of his age; and since the King of Polands departure, hee seemed more changed in minde, then in body, being incensed especially against the authors and counsellors of the massacre (as he made knowne by his speeches, to some of his Court, being enemies to iniustice, and by Letters written out of the Realme) for whom he prepared a strange potion, if the providence of A God had not referred them as scourges and ministers of that punishment he meant to inflict vpon this Realme, to the end that seeing him afterwards to cast these rods into the fire, we should confesse: that it is not now alone that hee sheweth himselfe the gardien and Protector of this Monarchy. At that time Charles lay taken both hand and foot, his chiefe seruants were dead, disgraced, and absent. The motives of new troubles did much disquiet him. He did foresee insupportable feeds of combustion in the coloured captiuitie of his brother, and brother-in-law: in the imprisonment of the two Marshals: in the exile of the Prince of Conde, in whose fauour the Germans began to arme. He sees his subiects cruelly armed one against another, and the fire of diuision ready to waste the Realme. B His infirmities had some intermission during winter, but in the end, after hee had languished the moneths of February, March and Aprill, tormented with many pangs, hee kept his bed: and the thirtieth day of May, he slept his last sleepe, in the Castle of Bois de Vincennes, after great effusion of blood, which issued out by all the passages of his body, the last two weekes of his sicknesse, during the which he endured all the violent assaults and combats which the vigour of youth might suffer in the extreamest pangs of death. His successor could not come so soone from Poland. Katherine therefore to assure his authoritie during his absence, had obtained on the nine and twentieth day, letters of Regency from the King, directed to the Gouernours of Prouinces: and the better to fortifie this nomination, to restrain the Princes of the blood, and to maintaine her selfe in the midst of confusion, she causeth Letters Patents to be sealed by the Chancellor of Birague, her seruant, and by this meanes doth abolish the fundamentall lawes, the order of the Realme, the priuiledges of Princes, the authoritie of the generall Estates, and the prerogatiue of the Parliaments. C

Charles was born the 27 of Iune 1550, and began to raigne the 5 of December 1560. A Prince of a very actiue disposition, inconstant in his thoughts, violent in his enterprises, impatient, ready of conceit, the which he did expresse in good tearmes, a diligent obseruer of other mens natures, cholericke, secret, a dissembler, cruell and a blasphemur. But let vs impute these vices and others, not to his naturall inclination, but to his gouernours and schoolemasters, amongst the which the History doth especially note Martignes and Lesser, D who with the consent of the mother corrupted this yong Prince, and made him take the habit of Vices and infections, wherein they dayly plunged him. They might haue pruned this yong plant better, to haue brought forth better fruits. At the beginning he was open, courteous, studious, sober, and little giuen to women. His speech was pleasing: hee loued musick and poetry: we reade yet good Verses compiled by him in French. But the pleasure of hunting transported him wonderfully, and the blood of wilde beasts, which hee slue with singular delight, made him with long continuance, as it were greedy of mans blood.

But let vs tremble in this death, vnder the Iustice of Gods iudgements, who suffered (after lo horrible a butchery committed and commanded during his raigne) him to bee surprized with a great debility in his latter dayes, to wallow in his owne blood, vomiting it out pittifully by all the conduits of his body, as a iust iudgement for him that barbarously shed it, throughout all the Prouinces of the Realme. Doubtlesse God loues not the Prince that thirsts after his subiects blood; for the subiects blood is the very blood of their Prince.

HENRY the THIRD,

The 62. French King.

T is a great comfort vnto mee (saide Charles some few houres before his death) that I leave no heires males lawfully begotten, for leaving him yong, hee must endure many crosses; and France hath need of a man. But alas! we shall now see one advanced to the Crowne, whereunto the fundamentall law of State and Honour doth call him, instilled with a confused beginning, and afterwards by an Edict of pacification, to reduce and retaine his subiects happily in their obedience, vnder a raigne as lasciuious and voluptuous as the other had bene cruell and bloody: vntill that the House of Guise (seeing the King barren, and his successor confined in shew beyond the riuer of Loire) shall discouer their ambiri-on, and cause (but in the end with losse of the liues of two of the chiefe motives of confusion) the people to breake out into a blind, vaine, and treacherous rebellion, being too ready to second the ambitious designs of great men, and to runne at random vnder the libertie of a turbulent raigne, and for the last scene of this Tragedy, they stirre vp a monstrous Monke, traitorously to murder him, and by his death to extinguish the name of Valois, and vnwittingly to set the Crowne of France vpon the head of Henry, the first of the branch of Bourbons, whom wee shall see happily called from beyond the riuer of Loire, miraculously to take the helme of this Estate, and valiantly to encounter the dangerous attempts of his enemies, who had already proclaimed a triumph before the victory; wisely to quench the fires of diuision kindled in his Realme, and to raigne most happily, and by the admirable fauour and blessing of heauen, to gouerne his people in concord; D peace and loue. This is the man whom France had need of, to pacifie the diuisions both of great and small; to restore their general and priuate ruines; and vnder so gentle and milde a command, to preserve them from the proud Empery of Strangers. Doubtlesse France cannot be gouerned but by a Frenchman, as we shall see, hauing obscured the beginning, progresse, and pittifull end of this Prince, vpon whom depended the estate of this great and mighty Monarchy.

Posts fly with speed to carie newes to the King of Poland, of the death of his elder brother, whilest the Queene-mother (attending his coming) made a truce with them of Poitou, to the end shee might with lesse opposition supply the warres of Normandy: and to stay them of Languedoc and other neighbour Prouinces, she perswaded the Duke E of Alençon and the King of Nauarre, to advertise them of the death of Charles, and solicited the gouernours to write vnto the new King, touching their zeale to his seruice, and desire (vnder her regency) to obserue the like fidelity to him, as they had done to his Predecessors. Matignon laboured in the meane time to take Saint Lo and Carentan from certaine Gentlemen Protestants, whom the breach of faith to the Earle of Montgomery, had made resolute in the defence of such places as they held.

Colombiers hauing escaped from Danfronç, puts himselfe into Saint Lo with a small troope of men, where hauing endured three assaults, and slaine nine or ten of the enemies Captaines, with three hundred of their men, in the end hee is stricke dead with a shot: the which daunted his souldiers, who (vnfurnished of a Commander, F that might encourage them with the like authoritie, toyled with long fighting) leaue the breach, and in their retreat abandon both the place and the liues of two hundred men, to the mercy of Matignons souldiers, to make satisfaction for the death of their companions. Carentan might likewise haue interred many Catholikes vnder the ruines of her walls: but Guise and the chiefe of his company, seeing themselves alone in Normandie without any hope of succours, went out by composition on horsebacke, with their swords, and the souldiers vpon condition to serue the King where he should imploy them.

Confirmation of the Queens regency.

Hereupon Letters Patents come from Henry, entitling himselfe King of France and of Poland, dated the 23 of Iune, bearing confirmation and amplification of the Queene-mothers Regency and government of the Realme. Having therefore taken the oath of all the Gouvernors, and published the Kings Letters Patents; to make way for her sonnes returne out of Poland, the cause for the Nobilitie, assembles the foot, makes leaues of Reistres and Suisses: sends to the Prince Dauphin sonne to the Duke of Montpensier, and to Gordes (who made warre in Dauphine): That they should doe their best endeavours to ruine the country which the Huguenots held: and chargeth the duke of Vwez, and the Lord of Joyeuse, to be watchfull over the Marshall D'Anville, with whom shee had small credit in Languedoc. The imprisoning of his elder brother, the exile of the two younger Mern and Theré, and the Regents letters being intercepted, had incensed him: yet did he swim betwixt two streames, and maintaining himself betwixt both, he did nothing trust the Catholikes: and not louing the Protestants, hee applied himselfe vnto them as he had need of their helpe. These proceedings bred some ielousie in them of Tholouza: but especially the truce he made with the Protestants; the assignation he gave for the assembly of the Estates of the Prouince at Montpellier the 2 of Iuly, and the ordinary residence he made in that towne. So this Parliament by two Decrees of the 19 of Iune, disallows the truce, forbidding all persons within their iurisdiction, to goe or send to these pretended Estates, appointed without the Kings permission, vpon paine to be declared rebels, and breakers of the lawes.

Moreover, the Protestants (perswaded by this truce, which gave them some hope of peace) began to allow of their Gouvernours actions: and (notwithstanding the aduice of some who condemned this association, as threatening the ruine of their party by this conjunction) they vnite their forces with the Politikes, offensive and defensive against all that would assaile them. These enjoyed some rest, whilest that Montbrun cuts in pieces a regiment of the Prince Dauphins forward, and covers the bridge of Royans with foure hundred of the brasse of his amie, slaine vpon the place. For a reuenge, hee besiege Alais a small towne, batters it, makes a breach, gives an assault, and is repulsed: but the besieged being vnable to maintaine it, retire into the Castle: the Prince surpriseth them, casts some downe headlong, and burnes the rest that were within it. Oile was the second of his triumphs: but Lauran stayed his course. The successfull fallies of the Towne-men, and the ordinary courses of Montbrun, who descending from Lorient, did still keepe the Prince in alarm, makes him to raise his siege, and to put his men into safety.

In Viuaraiz.

In Poitou.

The Protestants being freed on this side, they were fortified on the other, by the taking of Vessaux, a small towne in Viuaraiz by Bochevade. Perigourde takes Chalençon, and S. Romaine Nonnay for their part. La Noue (not to approoue *Katherine*s regency, but rather to second the Prince of Condes forces which were prepared in Germany) was at truce with the Regent, for the months of Iuly and August, in the Prouinces of Angoulmois, Poitou, and Xaintonge. But the Regent hoped to subdue the Protestants of the said Prouinces, before her sonne should arise. For the effecting whereof, shee assembles men from all parts, to surprize them suddenly: that being rooted out, the King should haue nothing to doe with them of Dauphine and Languedoc. So the D. of Montpensier, Chaugny, Puigailiard, Richelieu, Bussy of Amboise, and other Commanders, meet at Saumur with ten thousand men, and eighteen pieces of artillery. The Protestants fly speedily to armes: those of Lusignan in the beginning of Iuly overthrow the Gentlemen of Poitou: and those of Fontenay nere vnto Nantes, overthrow 500 Harguebuziers, almost all younger brothers of the Gentlemen of Britany.

surprised.

These two checks thrust the D. to the siege of Fontenay le Conte. Saint Estienne, commanded there, with about twenty Gentlemen, and foure hundred souldiers, who after some fauourable fallies, hauing valiantly maintained two sharpe assaults, and one scaleade, the sixteenth of September, after fifteene dayes siege, beginning to treat of the composition before in question: behold Captaine Massefrouffe, either through feare, or desire to provide for himselfe, or being too confident, for that they were vpon termes of capitulation, gives entrance to some of his acquaintance: the rest runne thither by heapes, they force the breach being ill guarded, and become masters of the towne: they kill some souldiers, ran some others, strip the rest, and chase them away with a white wand in their hands:

A hands: but they vse the towne with lesse rigour then a place taken by assault. The Baron of Serignac, otherwise called Terride, recomenced this losse at the same time by the surprize of Castres in Albigeois, and the slaughter of two hundred Italians being in garison: and Langoyran Gouvernor of Perigueux for the Protestants, by the absolute defeat of two hundred Harguebuziers, whereof sixe onely escaped, to cary newes to the rest of their partie.

Then Henry escaping secretly out of Poland, approached the Realme, where his new crowne attended him, desiring a farre off to ruine the Huguenots and to plant the onely Religion of his Fathers throughout the whole Realme. There is no sin so great (said the B Emperor Maximilian vnto him) as to force mens consciences: and such as thinke to command them, supposing to winne heauen, doe often lose that which they possesse on earth. The like admonitions were giuen him in all places, in Austria, Venice and Piedmont: they exhort him in all places to pacifie the troubles of his Realm. But comming to Lions, they cause him to commit a great error, in making war in stead of peace.

The new Kings arrival.

The Queen mother, the Dukes of Guise and Neuers, the Marshall of Retz, the Chancellor Birague, and some other new-bred Frenchmen, disposed of the affaires at their pleasure in the secret Councils of the Cabiner. The King did willingly giue them authority (and what might be expected of men who gladly would people France with new Colonies of Italians, Lorrainers and Piedmontois) carrying onely to Court Ladies, from the C which he had beene sequestred almost a yeare, with this nation which is lesse lasciuious then ours. These pernicious Councillors cause him to protest by sundry proclamations of his loue to the good of his subiects, and to abolish what was past, so as they lay aside armes, deliuer him all his townes, and lue quietly in their houses, without any feare, constraint or molestation for matter of conscience. A policy practised by them, to entertaine the fire of ciuill dissention, to rule in this confusion, and to fortifie a third party, which in the end we shall see will oppresse the King, & bring the Realme to a very miserable estate. The Protestants stood then the more vpon their guards: they are full of ielousie, distrust, doubt, and feare. All those Proclamations made no mention of liberty of their Religion, neither of a Parliament, for the politike government, nor of a national Council, for matters of conscience. And what was it to grant vnto the Rochelois liberty of conscience, and to forbid the exercise of their Religion for a certaine season, but to keepe their party at a gaze, whilest by their great preparations which were made in all parts, they should be able to put a mighty army to field, to ruine them without hope of rising?

III Council.

So they arme on all sides, especially in Poitou. The Baron of Fontenay (afterwards Lord of Rohan in Britany) being followed by threecore gentlemen and six hundred good souldiers, puts himselfe into Lusignan, which the Duke Montpensier threatned, and according to the leisure he gave him, he provided for the fortifications and all things necessary to maintaine a memorable siege, which might by the meanes of some succours consume an army before the Castle. About the beginning of October, the Duke encampes before it, and with a battery of about 2300 cannon-shot, thinks to draw the besieged to a composition. They importune them, but they answer, they will attend a general peace for all them of their religion. He spends 1250 cannon-shot more, makes a breach, gives an assault, and is beaten back with great losse. Five daies after, the besieged fallly forth, and to reuenge the blood of 7 young gentlemen, 16 souldiers, & 20 that were hurt at this first assault, they cloy 5 cannons, fire their powder, kill 9 captaines, and many souldiers, bring away many ensignes, and retume laden with spoiles, armes, and prisoners. This disgrace caused him to rest all November. In December, the duke fortified with 1200 Reistres, and 600 French foot, presseth Lusignan againe, & batters down a mill which did furnish them with meale. So (their hand-mills not able to suffice) they began to want bread. To enle the mind of some superstitious mouthes, they craue a passport for some Gentlewomen and other persons vnfit for the war, to retorne to their houses, or other places of safety. But the hatred this Prince did beare to the Protestants, had more force in him then the ordinary courtesie which Frenchmen beare vnto Ladies. He supposed the wiues and children should bee an vrgent sting to draw their husbands and fathers to yield speedily. Now their horses serued them for food, the souldiers (almost starued) took away the bread violently as they caried it from the ouen: they break into many houses in the night, to seek for victuals, they had no wood but moueables and the ruines of houses, ill clothed, ill shod, ill lodged, and no cleane linen, toyed with continuall trauell, to defend themselves both aboue and vnder ground, to frustrate the mynes which the Duke caused to be made, two of the which in their ruines buried many of the assailants, and gaue the besieged courage to continue firme in their resolution.

The 23 of the moneth they begin to thunder with eigheteen cannons and foure culuerins, and the next day they continue the same fury with fise and twenty peeces. After dinner they come to the assault: the showers of musket-shot coming from sundry flanks, makes the enemy retire, and to leaue the breach full of dead bodies. The greatest force was against the ravelin of La Vachery, which being won by the assailants, makes them retire to the Castle that had it in guard. At the first port of the Castle euery man did shew his resolution: all fight in the midst of the thunder, fire and smoake, and fise houres together dispute it with a doubtfull and bloody fight. In the end, both the one and the other (being tired with so furious an assault) take breath, the besieged remaining masters both of the towne and Castle, being reduced to fourescore cuirasses, and foure hundred and fiftie harguebuziers, resolute to lue and dye both in the defence of the place, and of their quarrell, hoping that La Noue would find means to send them some reliefe.

Lusignan yielded.

Not courage, but force failed them. So as Fountainay, the fise and twentieth of Ianuary, accepted the Articles of composition which the Duke offered vnto him by Colonnell Servien: himselfe and his gentlemen to depart with their armes, horses and baggage, the capitaines and other Commanders, euery one with a curtall, if they had any, their armes and baggage: the souldiers with their Harguebuzes, their matches out, and their Ensignes wrapt vp: the gentlewomen, and all others that would depart, to bee conducted in safety to their houles, or else to Rochel. Thus it was concluded. This siege caused aboue twelue hundred men to be slaine, a great number to be maimed, and ruined a mighty army. They endured aboue ten thousand Cannon shot, with many assaults, and lost fise and twentie Gentlemen, and about two hundred souldiers. And the Duke for a memory of his losses, caused the castle of Lusignan to be razed, being in former times one of the goodliest fortresses in Europe. Such conquests were of more difficulty in Dauphine: the Protestants had more places, and more Capitaines at their deuotion. Poussin, Liuron, Prinus, and others did greatly hinder the traffike of Marfeilles and Lions: and some running into Piedmont had charged the Kings baggage returning from Poland. To reuenge these insolencies, the King sends the Prince Dauphin to besiege Poussin: eigheteen thousand men besiege it on either side of the riuer of Rhone, in the beginning of October: fourteene great Cannons batter it, and make a breach: Rochegude and Pierregourde, defend it with a wonderfull slaughter of the enemy, and so terrified the rest of the army, as all were ready to truste vp their baggage: but suddenly the wall shaken with the artillery, and ouercharged with earth cast vp for the trenches within the towne, falls downe to the ground. So the towne lying open, and the ruines not to be repaired during the siege, the place being too strait, Saint Romane, after many inroades and sharpe skirmishes, enters into it, and iudging that in the end it would be forced, he drew out of it, men, women, and children; and putting them into Prinus in safety, hee abandoned and left Poussin to the besiegers mercy, who entering by heapes, spoyle, sacke, burne; and make the place desolate: and by the taking thereof, they recouer a part of Viuaraz; Grane, Loziol and Roinsat (being vnable to endure the Cannon) made easie the approaches of Liuron. But let vs view the estate of Languedoc.

Estate of Languedoc.

The Queene mother, and those of Guise, desired infinitely to dispossesse the Marshall D'Anville of his government, for he crossed their aduancement with all his power, and stayed them from proceeding (as gladly they would) against his elder brother being a prisoner. But yet if he had not fortified his estate with the Protestants party, who were then strong in Languedoc, hardly could hee subsist amongst so many and so mighty enemies. He therefore in open assembly of the Estates at Montpellier, ioynes himselfe with them, and according to the declarations lately published by the Prince of Conde, and the people of Languedoc, he sets downe the causes of this his new and forced taking of armes. The Vicount of Turenne his sisters sonne, doth likewise publish his, of the same substance. Thur and Mau brethren, and the Earle of Ventadour (brother in law to the said Marshall) ioine with him. The Duke of Alangon seems to fauour it: but the event will shew, whether it were fraudulent, or with a sincere intent.

This

A This report amazed the Court, and to stop the course thereof, the Queene-mother doth presently, by gracious letters, inuite the Marshall to some agreement. But giuing the Protestants but a simple liberty of conscience, she debars them of the publicke exercise of their religion. The Marshall protests of his affection to the common good of this Realme, and shewes the like desire to be in his associates: but withall he shewes, that the Councellors, who by that horrible and infamous massacre the foure and twentieth of August, had caused the deceased King to breake the last Edict of pacification, governing at this day the helme of the affaires; it was very difficult to settle a firme peace, the which cannot subsist, vnlesse the exercise of both religions may be indifferently allowed within the Realme.

B So this treaty of peace remaining fruitlesse, the Queene-mother changeth her countenance, and labours by diuers practises (but in vaine, the alliance being yet too fresh) to sow diuision betwixt the Marshall and his associates, and yet by sundry messages continues this pretended parlee of a generall peace in France. But it could not bee concluded with such conditions as the King required: that all his townes should first be yeelded vnto him without exception; and then would hee grant his subjects peace. The Prince Dauphin, hauing left the command of the Kings army to the Marshall of Bellegarde, he comes in the middest of December to campe before Liuron. Reffers a gentleman of Dauphine commanded there, with about foure hundred men, but full of resolution and great valour, in

C a hilly place, strong of situation, but then of no fame amongst the other townes of Dauphine. Fourteene companies of the Kings guards; eleuen Ensignes of Suisses, twelue Ensignes of Harguebuziers, Prouencals and Dauphinois, nine Ensignes of Piedmont, three hundred men of the old bands, foure companies of men at armes, and eight cornets of Reiffres besiege it on all parts. Two and twenty great peeces of battery, planted in three parts, doe batter it, and after eleuen hundred Cannon shot, make a breach of fise hundred paces. The Marshall was not satisfied with this ruine: he will haue all battered downe, and with a generall ruine fill vp the trench. They make a greater breach with a new battery of foureteen hundred cannon shot. He recouers the trench, and makes defences for his men. All this doth nothing amaze the besieged: but contrariwise, to shew that they haue

D force to defend themselves, and that they must haue great dexterity and resolution to take them: they tie to the end of a pike, a horse-shoe, a paire of mittens, and a cat; they lift vp the pike, as if they would say; Marshall, this Cat is not taken without mittens. Such was the estate of Liuron, when as the King solourning at Auignon, being distrest for money to supply his exorbitant charge and prodigality, Charles Cardinall of Lorraine (labouring the marriage of Henry with Lemise of Lorraine, daughter to the Earle of Vaudemont his kinswoman, and to furnish this exorbitant and stately pompe, aduising the King to sell for an hundred thousand crownes in benefices) was surprisid with a fever, and falling from a fever into a frensie, he died the 23 of December, in the midst of a cruell tempest, and violent whirlwind, which vncovered the houles, and loosened the barres of iron in the Carthusiens Couent, in the suburbs of Auignon.

Liuron battered with a second siege.

Cardinall of Lorraine died.

E Some impute this death to the smelling of a certaine precious purse which was giuen him full of rare peeces of gold, with the Queene mothers priuity: whom the foresaid treatie of marriage, which the Cardinall did practise, made remember the crosses she had suffered after the marriage of Francis the second, her eldest sonne, foreseeing that this new alliance tended but to restore the Houle of Guise to the same authority they had enioyed vnder the reigne of the said Francis. Others did attribute it to the blowes the Cardinall had giuen himselfe vnder colour of deuotion, in the company of them that bear themselves in the sharpest time of winter. Others applied it to the iust iudgement of God vpon this Prelate, who drawing all his greames, and all his meanes from the Clergy of France, would yet perswade the King to so pernicious an alienation of goods appointed for the vse of the Church, whatsoever it were. Notwithstanding the strict familiarity which the Queene mother had with the Cardinall, yet did she giue this testimony of him after his death; that the three and twentieth of December a most wicked man was dead. And the people both far and neere said; that this extraordinary storme in the ayre, noted that this man, hauing by cursed practises filled his houle with exceeding wealth, sacke and torne France in peeces with intestine warres, did then feele the iust reward of his actions. Doubtlesse such as the life is, such is the end.

Whilest

War in Languedoc and Dauphine.

Whilest the King becomes a new brother of these tormentors of themselves, otherwise called Penitents, and the Court busied sometime in the processions and ceremonies of this new brotherhood, the Estates of Languedoc, fallen from all hope of peace, battered Saint Giles neere to Aignion, and became masters thereof, the Courtiers making no shew to succour it. Montbrun on the other side keeping the field with his horse-men, did still catch vp some that were farthest from the campe. But Liuron was a Churchyard for the most hardy of the assailants: cuery man defends his goods and his life: men, women, and children, all labour in the fortifications, to repulse their enemies, and vnder the command of La Hay (a young Gentleman about three and twenty yeares of age, valiant and pleasing to the souldiers of Rosses, hauing bene slaine at the breach with Fiancity and Bellier Captaines) threw the ruines of the wals with carcasses, cast many into the trenches, dead, wounded, and languishing: and finally, (after many assaults, and infinite Cannona- does, fortified with two and fifty Souldiers) they force the enemy to found a retreat, and to couer themselves from the shot, pikes, swords, stones, and such armes as necessity could yeeld to the besigged. Thus those of Liuron withstood the fierce assaults of their enemies: the armie diminished, and a certaine discomfiture wasted most part of the Piemontois, crept in amongst the other Nations: when as the King iudging of the rest by this small towne, found that he must seek out some other means to reduce his subiects to obedience: who were so resolute to arms, as a simple offer of liberty of conscience might soon make them fall away. Many conquests cause but sleight triumphes. A more stateely crowne attended him his coronation called him, and the taking of Aiguemortes, a sea towne and of great importance for the Protestants, invited him to stay the course of their prosperity by some negotiation of peace.

Henry therefore packing vp his baggage, the thirteenth of Ianuary, and approaching neere to Liuron, stayed some houres in the campe. Here the souldiers cries and exclamations against him, and especially against his mother, gaue him to vnderstand, that the horrible disorders and vnworthy government of the latter yeares, had withdrawn that loue and reuerence to their Kings, for the which the French Nation had bene so much commended: and so altered the minds of the greatest part, as their iust griefe transported them beyond the bounds of reason and modesty. Ah murderers! (cried they with open throat) Dyon shall not stab vs in our beds, as you haue done the Admirall and the rest. Bring vs those Mignons with their ruffes and perfumes: let them come to looke on our wines, they shall teach them whether it be a prey easie to carry away. A lesson for a Sovereigne Prince, that if any diuerty of religion diuide his subiects, yet is he a common father to them all. As no reason doth allow of the sonnes ingratitude to the father; so all lawes doe abhorre the inhumanity and impiety of a father to his children.

The Campe being dislodged, the rest of the Piemontois repasse the mountaines. The Dauphinois ashamed of the disgrace they had receiued at Liuron, disperse themselves here and there: some cornets of Reistres follow the Marshall of Rez into Prouence, the rest with the Suisses are giuen to the Duke of Vzez, to make warre in Languedoc: a government wherewith the King had lately honoured him. See alterations. The duke of Vzez is now armed against them, for whose protection hee had often fought during the former wars, and the Marshall D'Amville lately their capitall enemy, now supports them. Thus great men play with Religion, fitting themselves to that party which they thinke may most auaille them whatsoeuer it be: and the people is still the anvil, whereon all sorts of hammers strike. But the Marshall did little remember the obseruation of the Articles sworne in the association. And dissolutions creeping in amongst the Protestants, could not but preface a speedy ruine of one of the parties, or of both together. Yet he entreated himselfe with them. So likewise did the Duke of Vzez, and protesting that he would make no warre but against the Marshalls faction, hee promised to reconcile all the Protestants to the King, if they would sequester themselves from the Politikes their associates. But he would haue bene glad, that in ruining the one party, they should haue ruined themselves. During these contentions betwixt the Marshall and the Duke, the King was crowned at Rheims, the fifteenth of February: and soone after hee sent home Elizabeth of Austria (widow to Charles the ninth) to the Emperour Maximilian her father, but with a lesse traine then her quality required. Then hee married Louise the daughter to Nicholas Earle of Vaudemont in Lorraine, who they supposed should haue been the wife of

A of Thore the Constables youngest sonne. Practices of the Queene-mother, to maintaine the authority hee had gotten in France, about a Daughter in law of meaneer quality then her selfe: and to fortifie her selfe with them of Guise, against the Houses of Bourbon and Montmorency.

This marriage should haue caused as chaste and as vertuous a bed on the Kings behalfe, as the was chaste and vertuous whom he had now espoused. And it seemed the dissolutions and excesse of Court were come to their height in the reigne of Charles the ninth. But hereafter both King and Court (for the subiects doe frame themselves to the Princes humour) plunge themselves into more horrible dissolutions, then the best Schoole-master of corruption and filthinesse could inuent.

The Court is drowned in delights and excesse: but they are at blowes in Languedoc, Viuaraz Dauphine, Perigueux, Auvergne, Xaintonge, and elsewhere. D'Amville hath an enterprize vpon Beziers: but hauing failed, he employed his forces against fourscore ten and villages thereabouts. He takes Alais, a towne and castle: and the Duke of Vzez, Saint Ferreol, a small towne neere vnto Vzez, to annoy his subiects, and to force them to acknowledge their Lord. The forces on either side encounter often, fight, and by their common defeats weaken one another, whilest the Protestants keepe the stakes and view the sport. Those of Viuaraz surpris the towne of Beys and the Castle of Pouffin, and kill the Captaine and his garison. Montbrun runs through Dauphine, and becomes master of many places. The Vicont of Turenne adds to the victories of his part, Perigueux, Brioude, La Gaillarde, Vzerche, and some other places.

The Xaintongois and those that lay neere vnto Rochel, began to hold vp their heads, and to goe to armes. The Prince of Conde filled all his party with great and speedy hopes. All rise, all dreame of new forces. They must therefore deuise by some practice to quench this great flame which was like to set the whole Realme on fire. Katherine amazed with this prosperous successe, hastens the Deputies of the Prince of Conde, of Xaintonge, of Dauphine and Languedoc: they come to Paris the tenth of April, they present Letters to the King from the Prince and Marshall, and demand free exercise of their religion throughout all France: new Chambers in the Parliaments for the administration of Iustice, punishment of the murderers, ease of imposts, a free assembly of the generall Estates, and an assurance for the entertainment of the pretended peace. Fifteen dayes are spent in disputes, words, and discourses.

The King promisseth to content them all: but he will haue them referre these demands to his will. Finally, he grants vnto the Protestants, to remaine where they pleased within the Realme: safety for their persons without any search for matters of conscience, liuing in peace and modestly vnder the obedience of his Edicts: exercise of their Religion in those places they held, except at Montpellier, Castres, Aiguemortes, and Beaucaire. The like priuiledges for Lords of fee, for themselves, their household seruants, and all other in their houses. And as for other Gentlemen that haue no such fees, exercise for them and their families, but without townes and suburbs, ten leagues from Paris, and two leagues from Court. Too weake articles to content them who saw their affaires so successful, or to stay such as seeking innouations were transported with future hopes. The Councell feared it: neither were they other then words without effects. And vpon refusal made, to giue vnto the Deputies a copy of the Kings answer to the Petition and Articles presented by them, to the end they might shew them to the Assembly of the Confederates, the treatie vanished into smoake, and serued onely to bring forth mooues of new confusions. Rochegade begins in Viuaraz. Those of Lions had recovered Andance, a small towne vpon the Rhine, and fearing lest Nonnay would likewise be lost, he marcheth to supply it with men. Vpon the way he encountreth the enemy, chargeth them, and puts them in rout, but he gets a great and a deadly wound.

This death, and the approach of the Duke of Vzez to the siege of Beys, troubles them of Viuaraz more then before. Pierregorde succours them, and with the ayde of an hundred and fifty men giues means to the Gouernour of Beys to defend the towne against the Duke that besieged it, vntill the beginning of May. The Duke hauing left it, they within the towne issue forth: they kill about three hundred, and nothing slayes them but the resistance made by the Suisses, from carrying away or cleying of his Artillery. If the Dukes forces and threats preuailed little against these men, his money and promises did leffe. Hee shippes his Artillery vpon the riuers of Rhone, raiseth his campe, and by the houses which hee burnt to ashes, hee gets the ill will and curse of the people both farre and neere, for that he grew so bitter against them, whom lately hee defended so courageously.

Sedition at Marseilles.

These parties thus diuided, bred new seditions. At Marseilles the people being risen against the Customers and Toll-gatherers, runne to the Custome-house, take their books of accompts, registers, waights, and measures, and cast them into the sea. Some other townes of Progence followed this example. Some, called the shauen, (being a troop of malecontents, shauen after a certaine manner to be knowne) arme against treasurers and receiueurs. The Baron of Alemagne, Ozeon, Establon, and other heads of the Protestants, held Lourmarin, Riez, Seine, and some other small townes in the Prouince. To conclude, there are so many factions, so many parties, as one destroyes another. The Lord of Vins goes to field, and reduceth to the Kings obedience all these last conquests, except Seine, and some other places thereabouts. Montbrun, on the other side, made his forces fearefull in Dauphine, but his too great lenity to his fouldiers, made him to purchase much ill will and many enemies. Chastillon, a village, neere vnto Die, strong by reason of the Castle, did annoy it. Francis of Bonne, Lord of Des Diguers, (who commanded in those parts), resolueth to pull this thorne out of their foot. Gordes Gouverneur of Dauphine for the King, makes haste to crosse his attempt. Montbrun poseth thither, through the mountaines, and descending into the plaine, he chargeth Gordes thrice. The night comes and ends the conflict, Montbrun hauing lost eight men, and Gordes six and twenty.

Des Diguers approacheth in haste, but the next day, the thirteenth of Iune, Montbrun not satisfied with this aduantage, forceth his enemies to fight, and puts them to rout: Gordes saues himselfe within Die. Two and twenty Ensignes of Suisses which hee had drawne from the Duke of Vez after the siege of Beys, performe wondrous feats of armes: they make it good, and rather die then giue backe: but they are encountered by a generous resolution, who no lesse couetous of glory, then they were enemies of a shamefull flight, strewes the place with nine hundred carcasses; cary away eightene Ensignes, and by the death of Freulich their Colonell, and of sixtene braue Capitaines, Montbrun wins an absolute and famous victory. Du Bar and Gouernat his Lieutenants, second him by the defeat of the whole company of the Earle of Beine. Such is the daily change of humane things, which makes him by a pitifull catastrophe to fall suddenly, who lately seemed to be raised vp to the highest degree of honour. Gordes being prest within Die, calls for all the forces of the country. Montbrun charged the first that shewed themselves, in a straight: whereof part being slaine, and part flying, they giue the alarme to the whole armie. But whilest the Argoletiers of Montbrun are busie at the spoile, a huge troop of horse environ him, where (vertue yielding to the multitude) after a long conflict, they force through his troops. His men being disperfed, flic, some here, some there. Himselfe thinking to leape a ditch, his horse fals and breakes his thigh. So being forced to yeeld, Rachefort his cousin, and Frche, who commanded the troops, sweare to saue his life, and cause him to be caried to Crest. He lost in this hot skirmish two and twenty men: Du Bar amongst the rest, a braue and gallant young gentleman: the others lost two hundred, whereof some of them by their great valour, left a wonderfull grieft to them that suruiued. Two and thirty prisoners were taken with Montbrun, the which were freed for their ransomes: but he being arraigned by the Parliament of Grenoble, (after a double charge from the King and Queene-mother) not according to the law of armes, but as one guilty of high treason, ended the remainder of his life vpon a scaffold, whom already the grieft of his hurt had halfe mortified. The History commendeth this Gentleman to haue bene valiant, modest and iust, not couetous, no exaor, but (as we haue noted) too milde to his fouldiers, who for an vnderfetter reuenge of his death, did afterwards commit wonderfull spoiles about Grenoble.

Des Diguers
chiese in Dauphine.

The wisdome, valour, age, and happinesse of the Lord of Des Diguers, hath since giuen good testimony, that they had reason to chooseth him to succeed Montbrun, and to be Lieutenant to the Prince of Conde. For the first fruits of his government, hee restored martiall discipline, as much as the time would suffer him, preiuded for the Garisons, and by composition, surprises, and force, brought many new conquests to the party.

Xaintonge was likewise dismembred by the enterprises and ordinary courses of two parties.

A parties: Among others, Landerens had gotten the Isle of Ré: but losing it the same day, he gaue the Rochelois means to enlarge their limits. Such were the confusions which diuided both the Progenies and the affections of this Realme.

But the time now calls vs to a strange consideration, happened either by policie and of purpose, or else accidentally, as it chanceth often in worldly affaires, whereof the wife of this world can make their prouident commodity, to draw forth all such fruits as mans wisdome giues them hope to produce at all euents. But he that sounds the bottom of mans heart, laughs from aboue and when he pleateth (euen when as man dreames not of it) hee confounds the wisdome of the wife, the foolies in their folly, and the malicious in B their owne malice.

The Duke of Alanson seemed to liue in great familiarity with the King, since his returne from Poland into France. Katherine said, that this reconciliation of the two brethren was the meane to maintaine the Realme in peace. But the counsels, practices, and negotiations, tooke another course then was expected. The Prince of Condes affaires prospered on the other side the Rhyne. Those of Languedoc preferred the defence of their liberties with the hazard of their liues, before the yoke of a doubtfull and dissolall peace.

Wherefore to ruine at once the generall forces of the Protestants, which threatened most dangerous effects to come: the Court (a good Schoole-mistresse of dissimulations) must take another accustomed habit. Doubleste Katherine gaue many of these instructions to her children: and the issue will shew vs, that there were many of her deuices in the managing of the following affaires. Suddenly the Duke of Alanson itemes discontented. He cannot (saith he) haue iustice of the outrages which were done him in keeping him prisoner: they disdain him; those of Guise are preferred by reason of the Queene their cousin the Kings wife; his presence seemes offensive to the King, who can endure no companion, nor any great man neere him. Thus it is bruted in all parts, that the Duke of Alanson is in very bad termes with the King. These horre-leeches of the Court, who by publike troubles aduanced their priuate affaires, buzzed in his eares: hee beleues them, and many of the Nobles ioyne with him: the King and Queene mother, and the Council seeme to be amazed therat: In the end he leaues the Court, the sixteenth of September, and meeting many Gentlemen halfe a league from Paris, hee repairs to Dreux: thither repaired daily vnto him new troops of the Nobility of both Religions, and amongst many, some inward seruants to the Queene mother, namely, Bussy of Amboise, a bloody, wicked, and a furious man.

This departure causeth new broiles and murmuring in Court. Every man thinkes, euerly man speaks according to his owne imagination or desire. Some beleue verily the two brethren are at discord: that the Duke not able to endure the brauadoes of them of Guise (whom he abhorres and loues not, as the authors of publike confusions) goes to ioyne with the Protestants and Politikes, to augment his portion, and by their common E forces to plant a peace in France. Most of the Protestants were filled with pleasing hopes, promising themselves a golden world vnder this pretended Reformer. But the cleare-sighted remember what was past, and by the present estate iudge of the future. They know well the strong and variable humour of the Mother: and say that shee vseth the dissembling of her children as a Last for all feet: that hauing preuailed little with the Lyons skinner, she will now put on the Foxes: that she finds the Duke fit to intrap them, seeing that both Protestants and Politikes seeke him jointly, to vndertake their quarrels, and to make him their head: that being young and of small iudgement, neither greatly careful of Religion, or the reformation of the State, there was no likelihood hee should runne this course without their instruction, who had kept him so long in their power.

F Thus men discouraged: but wee commonly beleue that for certaine, which we most desire: all other aduice is reiected. They hope from the Duke of Alanson both the lastty and the protection of the Realme. He to maintaine so commendable a reputation, giues an account of his actions by a publike declaration, protests to employ his forces, munities and life, to banish the troublers of the publike quiet, to pursue iustice for all robberies, thefts, murders and massacres, to restore Noblemen, Gentlemen, and others, being prisoners or wrongfully banished, to their goods, offices, and honours, to abolish all taxes, imposts, and extraordinary subsidies, to maintaine the ancient lawes of the Realme; to defend defend the Nobility and Clergy, in their privileges, freedoms, and liberties, and by a generall and free Assembly of the three Estates, to confirme a good, firme, and sure peace in France: he takes all naturall Frenchmen of both religions into his protection, and (vntill that a holy Councell may decide the controversies which diuided their soules) he exhorts them to liue in brotherly loue, and to suffer every man to enioy the exercise thereof. This declaration is followed by Letters to the Prince of Conde, the Marshall D'Anuile, to the Earle of Ventadour, Vicont of Turenne, and to the chiefe amongst the Protestants: the most part of them receive leaues of paper for an vndoubted oracle. Whereof some said, they should shortly haue all things at their will: but it was without effect and contrary to promises.

Germane succours promised to the Prince of Conde.

The Prince of Conde laboured then for great succours in Germany. This publication comes happily to dispose Frederic Elektor and Cont Palatine, to make a league with him: That they should not lay aside armes vntill the King had giuen the gouernment of Metz, Thoul, and Verdun, to duke Iohn Casimir his son, the places and reuennues depending on the said Bishopricks for the entertainment of necessary garisons vnder the Kings authority, and free exercise of the reformed Religion: That the King should giue him an honourable entertainment, and to the Protestants of Languedoc an annual pension of six thousand crownes: and a mutuall protection both by the heads of Germany and France, to do their best endeavor for the good of France. All this must needs feed the people with hope to preuentall future troubles. But the Prince had some horse-leeches about him, who emptying their companions purses, filled their owne coffers with golden Crownes: and the Protestants employed many persons in the affaires of their Religion, who had neither faith, piety nor religion.

The Court was wonderfully disquieted. The King sends many postes to the gouernors of Provinces, conuies them to keepe their faith, accuseth the Protestants and Politiques, to haue withdrawne his brother from him, forbids his subiects to giue any ayde, fauour, or support to the Duke of Alençon: calls the Gentlemen together, and besides his bands of Ordinary, he makes new cornets of horses, and for their entertainment hee imposts new taxes. And to moue the people, and retaine them in obedience vnder the shew of deuotion and piety, he ordaines processions, fasts and prayers, and makes vowes and pilgrimages. But being returned to the Louure, the Ladies, and his little dogges (which hee kept very daintily) made him to forget the care of affaires, and to leaue the managing thereof to his Mother and some Councillors.

The Queens mother goes to the Duke of Alençon.

She makes a iourney to the Duke her sonne, to reconcile him (said she) vnto the King. But the suspicious held, that her going was to furnish him with new instructions: that being declared Generall of these troops, both foraine and French, and of diuers Religions, and hauing ratified (as he did soone after) an accord made with Casimir, she might agree at her pleasure with him, and so disappoint the great designs of the army. After this parle the Duke marcheth into Poiçou, the Earle of Ventadour comes vnto him with three hundred horse, and twelue hundred Harguebuziers: many great Noblemen and Gentlemen repaire vnto him.

The protests of the House of Guise for a third party.

During these confusions, the Duke of Guise and his House deuise to lay the foundations of a third party, the which we shall soone see breake forth. For the present, hee assembles twelue hundred masters in Champagne, vnder the Kings authority, and Stressly twelue thousand foot: the Duke of Vzev sends vnto them the rest of his horse, and the Duke of Montpensier sends his troops of Poiçou.

The Marshall D'Anuile had required some cornets of Reistres from the Prince of Conde, to fortifie him in Languedoc: but seeing these last designs had called away the Kings forces, to keepe the Germane army from entering: the Councell decreed, that attending Casimirs coming, these Reistres appointed for Languedoc, should goe to the Duke of Alençon, being already chosen to be their chiefe and Generall. This did weaken their party, and the first check brought the most part of his Councillors into a bad reputation, and confirmed the Protestants in the ieaiousies they had conceived of the Duke of Alençon. There led these troops, being about fifteene hundred: some French Gentlemen ioynd with him, with five hundred shot. The Dukes of Guise and Mayenne, Biron, Fernaguez, and others, compassed them in. Some retire and cry for money: some fight, imitating the French; but the greater number preuailes. Hasting the Colonell, with his

There led the remainder of this shipwracke to the Duke of Alençon, being taxed as a bad man of warre, and not capable of counsell. This wound is a ladder for the Duke of Guise to climbe to wonderfull credit with the Catholics: the Kings actions both publicke and priuate beginne to displease him. The King (say they) takes his ease, and drownes himselfe in delights and pleasures: his brother troubles all France, and the House of Guise beares the burthen of the affaires of the whole common-wealth. And vpon these fauourable repinings, the Duke hereafter grounds most terrible designs.

Murmuring against the King.

His forces were not able to encounter the power of Casimir. The King therefore calls for Mansfield, Schomburg, Bassompierre, and other Colonels, who promise to bring him eight thousand Reistres within fixe weekes, giuing them three hundred thousand frankes downe, and fourteene hundred thousand when they were entered. The King was wonderfull needily: all was spent in vnprofitable sumptuousnesse, and vnworthy dissolutenesse: and part of this money could no where be so easily found as in the Parisiens purses. To induce them thereunto, they obtaine Bulls from Pope Gregory the thirteenth, and foure Churches appointed within Paris to obtaine pardons for many yeares, vpon condition to ayde the King, to root our heresies. And to draw the Parisiens by others example, they giue it out, that Piennes sold his inheritance to lend the King foure hundred thousand frankes: and that the Italians of Paris did furnish the like summe: and the Duke of Neuers, the Cardinal of Ferrara, Gondi, and Birague, nine thousand frankes. Neither the first nor the second bait, could make the Parisiens to bite. They say, that within fifteene yeares their Citie had contributed twelue millions of gold, not comprehending the loanes and extraordinary imposts leauied at Paris, and throughout the Realme: that these ciuill diffentions waste both their men and money: they beseech him, that (according to the notable aduertisements of Saint Lewis, to his sonne and successor) hee would maintaine his subiects in peace and concord, by the bonds of piety and iustice. Hee must haue money, and not words: and that by force, seeing loue cannot preuaile. Paris therefore is suddenly inuested with garisons: the King of Nauarre at Saint Cloud, the Duke of Guise at S. Denis, the Duke of Neuers in the suburbs of Saint Germaine, Biron at Montmarre, the Marshall of Rez at Pont Charenton, and Bois de Vincennes. Thus the Parisiens are restrained of their viuals, and force extorts from them the money, which kindnesse could not win. In the meane time the pretended Reistres were farre off, and Duke Casimir marched with the Prince of Conde.

To diuide the Duke of Alençon from these two heads, and frustrate the designs of the Prince of Conde, the Queens mother comes againe to the Duke: she treats a suspension of armes for six moneths: and during the same, she giues him for hostages, the townes of Angoulême, Niort, Saumur, Bourges, and la Charite: and for the Prince, Mezieres. The King doth ratifie this truce: but the Gouernors of these places, for the most part refuse to yeeld them: neither will the Prince allow of it, for already there marched tenne thousand horse, six thousand Swisses, two thousand Langquenets, three thousand French Harguebuziers, with foure great pieces of battery, and sixteene leffe, the which threatened to make their passage easie. This army made chiefeest account of the money which Languedoc should furnish, and the Marshall D'Anuile had promised the Prince to meet them with good troops, & to bring the pay vnto the army: but no man appeares, neither is there any newes of money. An affront which then had made them yeeld to any passable conditions of peace, if they had beene offered it in the beginning of these first confusions, and might haue transported the men of warre beyond the bounds of modesty and reason, if by a good and commendable discipline the Prince had not restrained the souldiers insolencies.

The Queens mother second voyage to the Duke.

A Gamester stay for the Prince of Conde.

At their entry, those of Langres (seeking to crosse their passage through their territories) did presently see the Reistres to spoile all, to load their carts, and to burne the neighbour villages to ashes. Those of Dion made some sallies; but they were first to some: others were content to salute them with their cannon, shot into the ayre. Citreaux, Gilly,

1575

The Reistres begin to marche.

Gilly, a Castle depending on the said Abbey, and Nuis a small towne in Bourgongne, were the first conquests of the Reistres, the Prince, and Lansquenets: where they learned by the slaughter and spoile which was made at Nuis, how troublesome a thing it is for a Prince (enemy to blood and spoile) to be mastered by the greater number, being strangers in his armie.

At Loudron the Reistres threaten the Prince to take another party, if he give them not ready money. Having contented them with hopes and good words, the armie passeth Loire, marcheth directly to the River of Allier, and takes Vichy by composition, a small towne vpon the passage. Thus these strangers did forage, whilst the King by a proposition of truce, gave hope of a future peace: and to prevent surprisles, he studied to fortifie the places about Paris, whither the whole army threatened to come: for the effecting whereof he finds his ordinary lett, which was the want of money. The Parisiens remembred with what violence the King had lately forced them to yeeld to his demands: they now promise for their contribution fourteene hundred thousand frankes.

The Queen mother pursues this suspension of armes, the furnishesth the Duke of Alençon with very exquisite meats, sends him his great horses, and causeth them to be proclaimed traitors, that would not yeeld to the Duke her sonne: amongst others, the inhabitants of Bourges and la Charite, offering Tours and Blois in exchange of the said towns. Those of Guise have their designe apart. He speaks boldly, that France hath no need of a truce: that they will fight with their foraine foe, and vpon this hope published, they build the projects which we shall see them shortly to vndertake. Amidst these common diuisions, a new confusion troubles the Court.

The King of Navarre escapes from Court.

The King of Navarre, vnder colour of hunting, escapes from Paris with a small traine: and writes to the King from la Fere in Picardy (a towne belonging vnto him) That the apprehension of a new captiuitie, and the ordinary slanders of his enemies, are the causes of his retreat. The King excuseth himselfe, and would haue him retorne: but hee had the fields at liberty. And seeing this proiect will not preuaile, he must trie another. Some bad Councillors, which gouerned the Prince of Conde, aduised him to passe the River of Allier, and speedily to ioyne with the Duke of Alençon, leauing Duke Casimir on the other side the river, who should follow his ordinary march.

In the meane time the Duke of Mayenne attends them at the passage with the Kings army. This trick left the Reistres to the slaughter: but Casimir an aduised and courageous Captaine, lodgerh his men with aduantage, and attends the enemy. The Prince discouraging their designe, turnes towards them, and makes the Kings troops retire to their lodging. The Auvergnacs fearing lest this army should passe the rest of the winter vpon their marches, make them to take the way of Bourbonnois, giving them an hundred and fiftie thousand frankes. Here began the first parle of peace: and to this effect Letters and instructions were sent into Guienne, Languedoc, and Dauphine. Charoux a little towne in Bourbonnois, besides money lent, payed the charges of some dayes that the army stayed there, whilst they made question to yeeld.

The Duke of Alençon crieth at Protestants
army.

The eleuenth of March, the duke of Alençon comes to the plaine of Soze, where in a generall muster they numbered thirty corners of Germane horse, ten of French, seuteene ensignes of Suisses, seuen of Lansquenets, eight of French, and the Prince of Conde, deliuering the white cornet into the Dukes hands, according to the articles of their Capitulation, he was solemnly proclaimed General of this mighty army. The King in the meane time, with the Queen mother, and their Councillors, omitted no practises to corrupt Duke Casimir, and to breake the treaty betwixt the Prince and the Duke. On the other side, the French, Reistres, Suisses, and Lansquenets, demanded nothing but battell, or to march towards Paris: but the duke of Alençon was already assured of the best part of his demands: and the armies without any memorable exploits of warre, did only spoile and destroy France.

At length the Queen mother seeing matters almost brought to a desired end, comes to the army the seuen and twentieth of April, where after diuers ambassages and contestations, she granted in the end to duke Casimir a company entertained of an hundred men at armes, forty thousand frankes yearly pension, and two thousand crownes for the entertainment of a certaine number of horses. In consideration whereof, he did renounce the Article concerning Metz, Thoul, and Verdun. That of eleuen million of Frankes that

A that were due vnto him, he should receiue two millions within six weekes, and a sufficient pawning of Jewels for the rest, and the reuenues of Chastell Thierry. The Duke of Alençon should haue for his part, Aniou, Touraine, and Betry, for an increase of his portion.

The Prince of Conde should haue the gouernment of Picardy, the towne of Peronne for his abode, and two hundred souldiers in garison, free exercise of the pretended reformed religion throughout the Realme, attending a free and generall Councell: Chambers in the Parliaments of both religions; for the administration of Iustice: and at Montpeller for Languedoc, leauing them eight townes in guard, for the assurance of these articles, and of other persons: Aiguemortes and Beaucare in Languedoc, Perigueux and le Mas of Verdun in Guienne; Nyons and Serres in Dauphine, Issoire in Auvergne, Seine, with the great Tower, in Prouence. Restitution to the King of Nauarre, Prince of Conde, Marshall D'Anuile, and diuers others, of their goods, offices, and honors, which they enjoyed before the foure and twentieth of August 1572. Moreover, the King did auow by a solemne declaration, That the Massacres of the said yeere had bene committed against all right and law of armes. He ordained, That the children of such gentlemen as had been murdered; should be freed from all charges of warre: and such as were no Gentlemen, should be eased of subsidies for six yeares. He disannulled all iudgements giuen since the decease of Henry the second, in hatred of Religion: and lately against the Politicks. Hee freed the Admirall, and all others murdered, from infamy: restoring their children to all their goods. He restored La Mole, Cocornas, and others, executed or condemned for contempt, to their honors. He aduowed the taking of armes by the duke of Alençon and his associates, as taken for his seruice, giuing him the towne of La Charite for two yeares. He appointed a Conuocation of the Estates at Blois, in November following. He cleared the Marshals of Montmorency and Cosse of all accusations, held them for innocents, restored them to their former liberty, and acknowledged them for faithfull seruants to the King and officers of the Crowne. The Edict contained many other articles depending vpon the former, and was allowed by the Parliament of Paris, the 14 of May.

So the Queene mother granted much to many, to give nothing to any, but to the duke her sonne, who alone got more then all the rest together. Also Duke Casimir had no sooner turned his backe from France, but they began to find this peace to be counterfeit, being made onely to disarme them, and to diuide the Countersides. The Prince of Conde did first feele the breach of these promises. They deny him his gouernment of Picardy: some seize vpon Peronne, and put in practice a strange piece of worke. Diuers enterprises vpon the Princes person, make him to leaue the Duke of Alençon, and to retire into Guienne to the King of Nauarre, whom those of Rochel receiued into their towne, with much honour and great triumph, the eight and twenty of Iune. All such of his traine as they suspected, were excluded.

Vpon deniall of Peronne, the King granted to the Prince the towne of Saint Iean d'Angely: but the inhabitants had a watch-word, and a mutuall oath (after the example of a priuate league made by threecore Gentlemen of Poitou, who would haue no exercise but of the Catholike religion) to maintaine one other, and not to give access to any one, of what Religion soeuer, to the end their quiet might no way be disturbed or molested: The Prince seeing himselfe to haue this repulse, hee caused some Captaines to enter secretly, and then assured himselfe of the place. It was then found very weak for the assurance of his person against so many enemies as sought his death. He therefore discouers a certaine practice against him, but fatal to the author alone.

In the end of October he takes Brouage, a strong place neere vnto Rochel. The Catholikes murmure against him, and accuse him as a disturber and breake of the peace. Contrariwise, he demanded iustice against them that had seized on Peronne, as troublers of the public quiet, and guilty of treason: The Protestants likewise complaine vnto the King, That in diuers places they are disquieted in the exercise of their religion granted by the Edict: That many Preachers moue the people to sedition: That the Chambers of both Religions are not erected: That iustice is denied them: That both great and small bandie against them. And they produce ample and certaine proofes of these complaints and grieues.

These of the House of Guise studied to discouer those terrible proiects which they had long hatched. The cloake of Religion was a plausible and fauourable pretence to ad- uance uance the designs of their pretensions. They had of many yeares (especially vnder Francis the second) disparted of their beginning, and of the rights which falsely they pretended to haue vnto this Crowne. Charles and Henry were become odious: the first by his violences, the last by his dissolutions. Francis Duke of Anjou, (for hereafter he shall carie that title) had lately troubled France, and was taken for a turbulent Prince: a title vnplesant to the people. The diuision for matters of conscience, seemed sufficient to keepe backe the chiefe Princes of the blood: the rest were weak both of age and power. Those of Guise in the meane time, had neither forgotten bounty, courtship, nor shew of zeale in piety, to winne the Catholickes hearts. The Queene Mother vied them for a purpose, that by the mutuall ruine of the one and the other, shee might maintaine her authority.

But their fauours within the Realme were not auailable. The Protestants crossed them infinitely: they must seeke a foraine support. They find it fitly at Rome, and in Spaine. The Pope gouernes Catholick consciences, and great men doe still find in Religion a wel coloured pretext to trouble the State. The King of Spaine feared, lest the peace of this Realme should breed him warres. The Prince of Auranges, and many townes in the Low-Countries cast themselves already into the Kings protection, against the Spanish tyranny. They sollicite the Duke of Anjou instantly, and propound conditions vnto him, which make him to open both eares and mouth: and already many Gentlemen and Captaines armed for this quarrell. So both the Consistory at Rome, and the King of Spaine might well countenance these designs, grounded especially vpon the defence of the Catholike religion: the one for the zeale he caries to the rooting out of heresie: the other for the profit he reapes by our common diuisions.

And therefore those of Guise send their Agents to Rome, with instructions, and shew, That by the negligence of Kings issued from the House of Valois, descending from the line of Hugh Capet (in the which there appeared none but were dull, or hereticks) the Catholike religion decayed in this Realme: whilst that the Race of Charlemagne honored with the blessing of the Romane seat, which subsidies not but by that Race (from the which they will make the world beleue, that they are defended in the direct masculine and lawfull line) remains despised, although it be ready to serue the Church faithfully, and that there liue at this day Princes of that Race, commendable for their vertues, ready to spend their blood and meanes, to augment the dignitie of the Church, and for the destruction of hereticks. And therefore they beseech the Consistory to approue and fauour their designs. Their chiefe designs were to ouerthrow the succession brought in by Hugh Capet, in the full assembly of the Estates, and to make the naming of a successor subiect vnto the said Estates: to cause the Princes of the blood, that should oppose against the decrees of the Estates, to be declared incapable to succeed vnto the Crowne. And the residue, of what quality soeuer, Noblemen, Gentlemen, and others, degraded of their dignities: the money growing of their confiscations, to bee employed for the warre, and their bodies to be executed. A reward to be appointed for them that should root out such as could not be apprehended. To make the Estates protest to liue and die in the faith, set downe by the Councell of Trent. To cause it to be signed in the open Parliament. To reuoke and disannull all publike Edicts in fauour of the Protestants and their associates, and to pursue them to the death that should hinder the extirpation of heresies. To cause the King to reuoke the promises made vnto the Protestants, and to prescribe a certaine time vnto their associates, in the which they should present themselves before the Ecclesiasticall Iudges to be absolved, and then to be sent vnto the King, to purchase pardon of the crimes committed against his Maiestie. To cause the King to name a Lieutenant general, a Prince capable, of experience, and fit to encounter the rebellion of Princes, that should seeke to hinder the effect of the precedent articles, and who neuer had had part, society, nor communication with Hereticks, to whom both he and his ancestors had cuer bene professed enemies: and to require his Maieity to honour the Duke of Guise with that charge, being indued with all the perfections requisite in a great Captaine, and worthy of that Commission. To cause Iudges to be appointed to examine the crime committed by the Duke of Alençon, declaring himselfe chiefe of the Hereticks, authorizing the exercise of heresie: and forcing his Lord and brother to augment his portion. To cause the said Duke to come to the Court, with the King of Nauarre and Prince of Conde: and by ordinary

A ordinary and extraordinary forces, to seize vpon the Duke, King, Prince, and all others that had accompanied them, and followed them in their enterprises. To cause such Captaines as the parishes should giue to the Duke of Guise, to put all Protestants, their adherents and complices, to the sword, both in the country and in walled townes. To subdue by force or intelligence the revolted Prouinces: to be masters of the field, to blocke vp the townes that were opposite, and to put all to fire and sword that would make head against them: and after this goodly and infallible victorie, hauing wonne the loue of the Clergy, Nobility, and People, to take exemplary punishment of the Duke of Anjou and his complices, then by the Popes consent and permission, to put the King and Queene into a Monastery, as Pepin his Ancestor did in former time to Gilderic: and for an acknowledgement, and in fauour of the Romane Sea to abolish the liberties and priuiledges of the French Church.

These high and great proiects were hearkned vnto, receiued and fauoured in the Court of Rome, and from that time those of Guise did not cease to dreame of the meanes to aduance the effects. But this was to reckon without their host. They haue compassed some of their conclusions, but the end proued quite contrary to their intents: wherein we admire a most singular prouidence of the King of Kings, whereby he hath vnto this day miraculously balanced, and in the end by his singular grace settled the Estate of this Realme. The Articles of this association were first drawne at Peronne in Picardy: but disguised with goodly shewes, to blind them that would examine them more exactly: which were to maintain the Law of God, to restore the holy seruice thereof: To preserve the King and his Successors in the Estate, dignity, seruice, and obedience due vnto him by his subjects: To restore vnto the Estates of the Realme, their rights, preheminences, and ancient liberties.

And for the execution of these articles, a certaine forme of oath was propounded, including paines of eternal damnation to the Associates, that for any pretext whatsoever should withdraw themselves from this League, and a bond for such as should be enrolled, to employ their goods, persons, and liues to punish, and by all meanes to raine the enemies and perturbers thereof, and to punish them that should faile, or make any delayes by the authority of the head, as he should thinke good.

This done, there was nothing but Postes carrying the first newes of their designs. They cast many libels throughout the Cities, in many good townes: they murmure that they are too much supported by the Edict: they practise to set on fire brands to kindle a new warre: and vnder this plausible and commendable rule of the name of the Church and diuine Service, the people (a firmament to nourish civil diuisions) giue care to such as seeke to thrust them into mutiny. The King was daily advertised of new complots. He found that this match did kindle a fire of perpetual combustions within his Realme. On the other side, he hated the Protestants, and would raine them by degrees, but not by such instruments as wrought without his authority. His mother likewise hated them to the death, and greatly desired the ruine of the heads, being well content that these confusions should still diuide the French, so as holding the staffe in her hand, shee might reuise her children, and maintaine her authority, make warre, and giue peace whensoever she pleased. Thus the cause of the Duke of Alençon to come to Court, and the King by entertaining his subjects of both Religions, in hope of better concord, by meanes of this reconciliation: and to cut off all new factions, he deferred the general Assembly of the Estates vnto the 15 of December following. He presumed likewise, that all his subjects, by hearing the ruine of townes, the desolation of Countreies, and the spoile of strangers, would gladly prefer the entertainment of a peace solemnly sworn before the continuance of warre, and by this meanes, he should prevent all turbulent persons, and bridle the Protestants, whom he meane to consume otherwise, then by open warre: whereby neither his predecessor, nor he himselfe had gotten any honourable triumphs.

The day (appointed for the Estates) comes, the King himselfe begins it. Hee lamenteth the calamities of his Realme, whereof the tendrage in the which his brother and himselfe were in the beginning of these civil warres, may well iustifie them, that they were the authors and motives. He professeth to haue no designe nor desire, but for the quiet of his people, whose milities he would redempt with the price of his blood: he desires the assembly to assist him in his holy resolution. To deuide some meanes for redressing the lands of the Crowne, engaged for about an hundred millions of gold : to vnite themselves firmly together, to root out all seeds of partialities, to reform abuses, establish iustice, and to restore the Realme to the ancient dignity. Birague the Chancellor adds the rest : but the two main points of his speech were to iustifie the Queen-mothers government, and to demand money. Peter d'Espinae Archbishop of Lions; and the Baron of Senecy are Speakers, the one for the Clergy, the other for the Nobility; and both conclude a publicke exercise of one onely religion in France. Peter Verforis, Advocate in the Court of Parliament at Paris, Orator for the third Estate, insists especially for the vnion of all the Kings subjects in one religion, but by mild means, and without warre : he beseecheth the King to maintaine his people in peace, to reconcile his Princes, and exactly to examine the bad government of his treasure.

The King seemed to encline only to alter some articles in the last Edict of pacification, and not to abolish it quite : but he was needy, and feared that wherewith they threatened him : That no man would assist him, but vpon condition to make warre against the Huguenots. Thus the perswasions and promises of the Clergy and Nobility, prevailed more then those that preferred peaceable proceedings before violent ; making him resolute to armes, to root out all other exercise of religion but the Catholike, to banish all Ministers, Deacons, and Officers of the pretended reformed Religion : and yet to take all his other subjects of the said religion into his protection, attending, that by better instructions they might be reclaimed to the bosome of the Church. But the King of Navarre, the Prince of Conde, the Marshall of Montmorency, d'Anville, and other Noblemen both of the one and the other Religion, had well foreseen these conclusions, and refusing to assist at this pretended Parliament, concluded a nullity of all that should be decreed to prejudice the Edict of pacification, protesting that they were resolved to maintaine themselves in the rights, liberties and freedoms which the last Edict had granted them : That the troublers of the publicke quiet, and the sworn enemies of France, should find them in a iust defence, and they should answer before God and Men for all the miseries that should ensue thereby. For answer, it is ordained, that men should be sent to winne some to the Catholike Church, and all to the obedience of the Kings new Edict, tending to maintaine the Romane Religion, to root out all other exercise, to defend the King, and to preferre his people. The King thought by this opposition to stay this new faction which fortified it selfe daily. It was a great indiscretion to countenance an association and league, which vnder the ashes of the last warre, being yet hot, couered the coales of a generall flame. The King of Navarre beseecheth the Estates, by the Duke of Montpensier (who was sent vnto him) not to infringe the Edict of peace, and to suffer then of the Religion to enioy that which had beene so solemnly granted. He offers to submit himselfe, if they will shew him how he erres : But hee intreats them, that in a matter of so great importance, they will giue him time to thinke seriously thereon, and to attend the opinion of an Assembly of those of his Religion, and of the Catholikes associates, which shortly shall bee made at Montauban.

The Prince of Conde answers more sharply : That he doth not acknowledge them that are assembled at Blois, for the Estates of the Realme; but a conuenticule of persons corrupted by the sworn enemies of the Crowne, who haue solicited the abolition of the Edict, to the ruine and subuersion of the Realme; That if they had beene lawfully called, he would haue assisted for the sincere affection he beares to the Kings service, and the quiet of his Country : That he will neuer giue his consent to the counsels of the authors of so many confusions which he foresees, whereunto he hath already knowne the Kings disposition to be repugnant, and a friend to vnion ; being the sure and principall meanes to preferre his Crowne : That he hath alwayes honoured the Clergy and Nobility, and will maintaine them with all his power : but he pities the people, whom these pretended Estates of Blois seeke to ruine.

The chiefe of the Politiques protest, That they do not cleaue to any other Religion then that of their fathers : but as touching a generall peace, they cannot allow of this resolution : To take from the Protestants the publicke exercise which had beene so solemnly granted them. The Duke of Montpensier (being returned) perswaded to haue the Edict confirmed. The third Estate presented a new petition vnto the King, beseeching him to vnite all his subjects in one religion, but without violence. Doubtlesse a king may wel ruine every priuate

A priuate man, but not all mankind in generall. One succeeds another, and the children, (whose age and innocency doth naturally free them from the rigor and violence of armes) doe inherit the humours, passions and quarrels of their fathers.

The Protestants jointly beseech the King, not to suffer this assembly (which they cannot allow for a generall Parliament) to consult vpon the point of Religion due vnto a free Councell. The Estates (said the King) should neither be free, nor generall, if I should make this prohibition. And as they may demand what they please, so may you doe the like; and I promise you in the word of a King, and of an honest man, that whatsoever I ordaine, shall be for the contentment of all my subjects, and the quiet and peace of my Realme. In the meane time they consult how to leaue money for the warre. The King giues notice to his Governours, and publisheth by his Letters patents; That he is resolved to grant the Estates their requests, touching the exercise of one onely religion. And Villequier is sent to the Princes of the Empire, to diuert some from their affections to the Prince of Conde and his adherents : and to obtaine from others a leaue of Reistres. Thus the warre begins in Guienne.

The King of Navarre attempts vpon Marmande, a town of his government, but without effect. The Duke of Mayenne comes for the King : and whilst he is the strongest in field, he batters, takes, and sackes, Thone-Carante, Marans, and other places thereabouts. During the Parliament, the Deputies of the Low-Countries came to demand succours of the King, and the Duke of Aniou for protector of their liberties and priuiledges, against the tyrannous government of the Spaniards. He is now declared the Kings Lieutenant generall. They giue him a mighty army, with the which (contrary to the oath taken by him in the obseruation of the accord and promise past with the Prince of Conde and the Duke Casimir) he besiegeth and takes La Charite by composition, and Yssaire in Auvergne by force, where the blood of the inhabitants, shed without pity by the Duke of Aniou, confirmed the Protestants in the bad opinion they had conceived of him.

Rochel crossed the practices of the contrary partie : whose happy exploits caused the Duke of Mayenne to send forth a Navy to sea, vnder the command of Launac, which presenting it selfe before the Isle of Ré, retired, seeing the Islanders resolved to fight if they approached. The Rochelois, to encounter them, arme seuen ships, those of the Islands five, and entreat the Estates of Holland and Zealand, vpon good assurance to ayde them with some great vessels, to withstand the force of this Fleet. The Nobility, by their example, inuite all others, and of all qualities, to charge themselves willingly for the maintenance of this army. The Duke of Mayennes first conquests make him proceed. And to make his enterprises vpon Rochel more easie, he comes before Brouage the 22 of Iune. It is a small square towne built in a marsh recovered out of the Sea, fortified during the third peace, & at that time ill furnished with men, victuals and munition; and besides, ill beloued of the Islanders about it. Those of Rochel, whom it doth greatly import for the preservation of their Estate, did greatly endamage the assailants, and cut off about 600 of their men in E short time. But a diuision happened, and was cunningly maintained betwixt the Nobility and the Rochelois : the Prince of Conde hauing (vnder the conduct of Clermont Admirall for the Rochelois) lost some vessels, being runne aground, the rest being dispersed, and thereby the Isle of Oleron lost ; the Kings approach to Poitiers; the supply of Suisses in the campe ; Launacs comming into the Rode of Chef-de-Bay neare vnto Rochel (where he burnt one of their principall ships, and tooke another, but without the losse of a man,) the death of Sere chiefe of the besieged, slaine with tenne or twelue others in a fall by night; the number of sicke and hurt which they had to feed, the ruine of their forrs, the enemies approach, the want of victuals, and the threats of the Duke of Anious comming, who would intreat them as he had done the inhabitants of Iffoire : all these considerations made them enter into capitulation, by the which they departed on the 28 of August with their armes and baggage, leauing the place at the victors deuotion.

This happy successe should haue made the Duke of Mayenne aduance with his armie; but the progresse was dangerous for the Kings Estate : who to maintaine himselfe must proceed after another sort. His manner of life was contrary to the violence of armes: hee was of a soft and delicate nature, impatient of labor, a friend to rest, feasts, dancing, & other pleasures, which peace brings to them that are giuen to delights. So the peace which had beene plotted during the siege of Brouage, was concluded at Poitiers, and was receiued

in the end of September, with so great ioy of either party, as the Prince of Conde caused it to be proclaimed by Torch-light in Rochel the same night it came: although it were not so beneficial for his party at the first. This last Edict cut off some articles of the former: made no mention of strangers: left their consciences free, yet without exercise, but in townes and places whereas then it was publicly vsed in Gentlemens houses that had high Iustice and Sees, in what assemblies they pleased: for others of meane qualitie, a certaine number, and in euery Baillywicke a fit and commodious place for the publike exercise of the pretended reformed Religion. So the proud designs of the Duke of Guise were made frustrate for this time, and stayed for some yeares, vntill that by the death of the Duke of Aniou, we shall see them reuiued, but in the end to the authors confusion. B

The partialities and leagues made within the Realme, in the which many, both great and small, had farre engaged their goods and reputations, were the cause of great difficulties, in the execution of the Edict. Those of Languedoc especially (from whom the Mar-shall d'Anville had estranged himselfe) did ioyntly, with the other Prouinces, sollicite the King of Nauarre, to obtaine an explanation of many ambiguous and doubtfull articles. So a whole yeare was spent in instances, pursuits, and declarations.

The conference at Nerac betwixt the Queene mother and the King of Nauarre, decided many difficulties: but their spleenes could not be so easily tempred, and sometimes in one Prouince, sometimes in another, the Edict was diuersly and many wayes broken. The most fastidious were very loath to lay aside armes: The Politiques did daily diuide themselves from the Protestants: the Protestants fought to keepe themselves from surpris-es, and full of distrust, maintained themselves quietly in the midst of many stormes which threatened them. C

As for the King, experience hath now taught him, that the power of man cannot force mens consciences: that spirituall diseases must haue spirituall cures: that faith is not planted in the heart by violence: that we must attend from heauen the conseruation of them that are strayed, and that the Prince is a patterne whereto his subiects willingly conforme themselves. He therefore shewes himselfe in publike, for a mirror of reformation and pietie, and as a testimony that his greatest desire is to conforme the diuisions in his Realme, he builds many Monasteries, Chappells, and Oratories: vndertakes many pilgrimages on foot: confirms the Brotherhood of Penitents, erects the Order of Hieronimites, is daily conuersant with the Capuchins and Feuillants, called Iesuits; and by their instructions & directions erects many Companies; he carries a Crucifix and Beads in procession, with a whip at his girdle; he causeth many bookes of deuotion to be printed. And to conclude, he leads a life more besitting a Cloyster then a Royall Court: and following the example of Lenu the eleuenth his Predecessor, hee institutes the Order of the Knights of the Holy-Ghost, binding the to conditions which carie a strickt bond to the Church of Rome. D

He pretended to giue diuers blows with one stone: to vnite great men by an inuolable concord and amitie, for the good of themselves, the State, and their country: To please the Clergy-men, and to lead all the Clergy in a leash: to winne the peoples hearts who are fed with shewes: to suppress the grudging and the ill will which the intolerable oppression of his subiects bred, to remedy the extraordinary expences of his Court in vniual excesses, and for the entertainment of a number of minions and horse-leeches, to whom they must rather weigh then tell money: but chiefly to pull downe the Protestants, to vndermine them, and by this lure of worldly greatnesse, to withdraw the chiefe heads, who could not attaine to this high and stately degree of Knighthood, but in renouncing of their Religion. E

Henry (for trumpets of his deuotion) had the Fathers of the Capuchins, Feuillants, and Iesuites. Dom Bernard Feuillant, and Edmond Auger a Iesuit, gaue him publicly in their Sermons, and priuately in confessions and companies, the testimonies of the most religious Prince, the most courteous, and the most carefull to vnite his subiects, first in their obedience to God, and then to him, that euer France hath knowne in many ages. But wee shall see in the end most of their tongues sold for money; and others, who making profession to come into the Pulpit to instruct the people, shall basely contradict and controule these goodly Oratours, and by a contrary language, suborne the peoples affections, subuert their senses, and as it were with little linkes of gold, draw them after them, tyed by the nose, tongue, and cares. F

Mortues of rebellion against the King.

A The feasts, masks, stately mariages, sumptuous pastimes, and the new impositions to maintain them, led the first dance of rebellion. The Queene mother, and those of Guise, seeing the King drowned in these delights of Court, did willingly entertaine him in that humour, that either busying himselfe to number his beads, or to tread the measures of a dance, they might hold the reines of gouernment, and dispose of affaires without trouble. But he knew well the ambition of these men. He was iealous of his royall authority, and in the midst of his delights and pleasures, their presence was suspect vnto him. He was more pleased with the familiarity of meane men, whom hee had advanced to exceeding greatnesse: and still he set some minion in sentinell, to watch if they should attempt any thing against his royall dignity. Those of Guise are not idle, they watch for occasions, they receiue such as are male-content, they practise men of their owne humours and dispositions, and fit for their designs: and can cunningly promise cure and help for those vicers and forces which the people of France doe generally complaine of.

These first discontents of subiects, oppressed with insupportable charges, and the impatiency of the Clergy, who see their enemies to enioy a summe and solid peace, which did newly strengthen and close vp that old wound which had lately imbrued all France, made them easily to reuiue the league of Peronne, and vnder two goodly pretexts (religion, and the ease of the people) to discouer the designs which they had long before conceived. All encounters made the way easie both within and without: within, their hearts disposed to reuolt: without, the Spaniards greatnesse, who had now invaded the Realme of Portugal, and by this vsurpation had a great meane to disperse his Indian gold in France. And the Duke of Aniou made war for the Estates of Flanders and other vnited Prouinces, which had called him to free them from the tyranny and domination of the Spaniards. But these discourses belong to the Spanish, Portugall, and Flemish Historiours, and may not enter into this Volume, which inuies vs to an end.

The last Edict (as the former) accorded some townes vnto the Protestants, for hostages and sureties of his word, during the terme of six yeares. Now the King summons them to deliuer them, seeing the time prefixed was almost expired. But the peace had bene so often broken, as so short a time could not quench the fire-brands of warre, nor giue a full execution to the Edict. To content them, the King grants a prolongation for the retaining of these townes for some yeares. This grant serues the Princes of the league for a new motiue of troubles and disobedience. They giue it out generally, That the King fauours Heretikes, and that he will bring in heresie. They consider not, that he could nor but by force (the event whereof was doubtfull) recouer the said places, being strong and peopled with numbers of Protestants. The King of Nauarre sees as farre off, that the heauens are ouer-cast, and foresees that this storme doth threaten his Estate with a horrible tempest: they sollicite him to ioyne with this party: they make him goodly offers in shew, but all was but to lull him asleepe, or to cast vpon him all the causes of the future miseries, and to make him more odious and detestable. He giues the King intelligence thereof, and puts him in mind of the aduertisements hee gaue him in the year 1576, vpon the treaties of the league in Spaine and at Rome. He sees this myne is ready to breake, and that it is now time to think on his affaires. He assures himselfe of the amities and friendships of England, Denmark, and Germany. E

But suddenly there falls a new accident, which breaks vp all the banks that restrained the ouer-flowing of the League. The Duke of Aniou, whether his riot in the Low-countries, or grieue to see his designs ouerthrowne, or the wicked practices of Salcedo (drawn in peeces since by foure horses) or some other secret attempt against his life, had shortened his dayes; he dies at Chasteau-Thierry. Whatsoeuer it were, such as were employed to see this man tortured, and to discouer the secret intentions of his master, were afterward vnworthily entreated, and ransomed by the chiefe of the league.

This death aduanced the King of Nauarre one degree. The King suffers the Court of Parliament to receiue the Roses in May, that were presented vnto him, (according to the custome of the Princes and Peeres of France) in quality of the first Prince of the blood, and first Peere of France. Most part of the Realme cast their eyes vpon him, as the Sun-rising.

This on the one side doth amaze the authors of the league, and on the other side, it presseth them to trie their fortunes now, whilst the King remains alone of his Line, XXX without without hope of issue, and the King of Nauarre saue off, as it were exiled, and in shew excluded from euer passing the Loire.

They assemble the heads of their House at S. Denis, and presently make the seeds of their counsels to appeare in Picardy, Champagne, and Bourgogne. They make the towns to abhorre the Huguenots yoke, which (say they) the King of Nauarre prepares for them. They talke not of the King but with contempt: they cast forth Libels and shamelesse Pasquils: they disgrace him in companies as a Sardanapalus, and idle Chilperic, drunk with prodigalities and dissoluteness, and for a third crowne (his deuice shewing that hee attended the last in heaven) they were ready to shau his crowne, like vnto a Monke in a cloister. The people being corrupted and drawne from their obedience, by the disorders of the Court, suffer audacious mutinies to creepe into their hearts. But let vs in few words see the conception, the deliury, and the growing of this league in Paris, which shall cast forth store of branches into all the quarters of the Realme. Roche-blond a Citizen of Paris, a turbulent and factious man, the first Tribune of this League, encouraged by some great men, and supported by the chiefe ministers thereof, ioynes with Preuost the Curate of S. Seuerin, Bucher Curat of Saint Benoist, and Lanney a Chanon of Soissons, sometimes a Minister, but fled from Sedan for adultery. These foure Arch-leaguers hauing banded all their wits to ruine the House of Bourbon, and to aduance that of Guise, fow a pernicious seed of rebellion throughout the City, and frame a petty Councell of the chiefe Citizens, who take the charge of the sixteene quarters of the city and suburbs, to practise all they could, and to entertaine them with discourses, grounded vpon the malice of the time, full of chifine, heresie, and tyranny. This petty Councell, compounded of Roche-blond, Compans a Merchant, Cruce a Proctor, La Chapelle, Lanchart a Commissary, and Buffy le Clerc a Proctor, brought their deliberations and projects to the grand Councell, which consisted of Doctors, Curats, Preachers, and other men of marke.

In short time they make a great brotherhood, and finding themselves strong, they aduertise the Duke of Guise, of the affection of good Catholikes of Paris (that is the name which the Leaguers challenged to themselves) and their zeale to the preferuation of Religion, and the rooting out of the contrary, and the ruine of tyranny. Hee conferres with his brethren, and sends both to giue and to take an oath in an Assembly held in Rheims place, at Paris. Then the most factious are sent to the townes and Prouinces of the Realm, with good instructions, to ioine new confederates to their body, vader a pretext to fight against heresie and tyranny. Then might we haue scene the chiefe pillars ouerthrowne that support a Prince, loue and authority: and hatred and contempt to supply their places. The Preachers publicly in all places did tearme the King a tyrant, and fauourer of heretikes. The people did applaud them: and from this deadly hatred which they had conceiued against the King, his Councell and fauourites, sprang that fury which was soone after disperfed ouer all the body of France.

The better to countenance this league, they present it to Pope Gregory the 13, that hee might blesse it, and declare himselfe the Godfather, as made for the ornament and support of the Catholike and Apostolike Romane Church. Gregory was well pleased they should attempt any thing against the Huguenots: but he did not approue those popular rebellions which were made against a most Christian and Catholike King, neither would he be the firebrand of a war which he could not quench. And so hee sent the Deputies backe without any answer. The League impatient to attende the resolution of Rome, layes open his designs, and makes them plausible, causing one of the chiefe Priests of the blood to be an actor, and to cary the bable. They publish, that the King (dying without children) hath no heire nor successor but the Cardinall of Bourbon, a Prince broken in years, without hope of issue, or to suruiue the King, who was found, lusty and young. But they secretly season the simple peoples minds, with that vniuist vsurpation of the Capets, vpon the heyres of Charlemagne: they print books, cast forth diuers libels, yea some Preachers make it the text of their Sermons. Two principall fire-brands inflame the League. The Assembly made by the King of Nauarre and the Deputies of that party at Montauban, to resolute of the meanes to maintain themselves, if the League (abusing the Kings name and authority) should seeke to offend them. And the voyage of the Duke of Elspemont to the King of Nauarre, to confer priuately with him in the Kings name.

A King of Nauarres forces against them. They seeke to preuent him, and to that intent they send forth many Commissions: but left any should controule them, they cloak them with the Kings name, wherewith they maintain themselves to be well allowed, as a thing done for his Maiesties seruice. The King in the end of March disauowes them, and forbids all leauies of men of warre. To iustifie themselves and their rising, they publish the moieties of the Cardinall of Bourbon (who notwithstanding serued them but as a cypher) with the Princes, Noblemen, Townes and Catholike Commonalties, to oppose themselves against heretikes. That they had condemned the resolution of the Estates, to make warre against heretikes, and to disannull all Edicts made in their fauour. That the succession of the King of Nauarre (whereof he hath conceiued a great hope since the death of the D. of Aniou) would cause great confusions within this Realme. That preparations were already made both within and without. That by an accord made at Madebourg the fifteenth of December last past, the troops of the King of Nauarre, the Prince of Conde, the Queen of England, the King of Scots, the Count Palatin, the Dukes of Saxony, Pomerania, and Wirtemberg, of the Landgrau of Hesse, the Swisses and other Protestants should jointly enter into France, before the fifteenth of April next following. That the Huguenots would not yeeld vp the townes which they held for the assurance of the last Edict of peace. That there is great abuse in the prouision of offices, in the leauies of money, and in the inuention of excessive imposts.

C Then they complaine of the minions in Court, who abusing the Kings name and bounty, keepe the Princes and Noblemen that were truly Catholike, from all access to his Maiesty, perswading him that it is necessary for the preferuation of his Estate, to diminish their authority: they braue the Nobility, dispose of governments in fauour of their followers, waste the treasure, oppress the people, restrain the liberty of Iustice, ruine the Clergy with tenths and extraordinary charges. And then they declare, That theiust motions, and the suddenesse of the mischiefe had thrust them into armes: the small credit they had with the King, hauing no other meanes to let him vnderstand their complaints: and in the end they protest, that their taking arms was only to restore the Church of God to her true and ancient dignity, vnder the exercise of one Religion throughout the Realme and Commonwealth: To restore the Nobility to their honour and freedome: to ease the people of extraordinary charges inuented since the reigne of Charles the ninth, and not to employ the money leauied thereby but for the Kings seruice: to require the King to provide for his succession against the publicke and priuate calamities, which the pretensions and contentions for the same might cause: and to chafe from Court such as abused his fauour and authority. In the end, they protest and vow, not to lay downe arms vntill their proposition be fully executed: and that his Maiesty had preuented the danger, the feare whereof hath made them to take armes. These false impressions had wonderfully incensed the people: but when as they talke to them of a Synode held at Montauban, and of a Diet in Germany, where they plotted to suade France, and to chafe away both Made and Priests: they take the words of these passionate men for Oracles of truth. They presse to enter into the League, such as demanded nothing but change, bankrupts, men indebted, malefactors, wicked and notorious persons.

To conclude, such as had need of ciuill war to liue vpon the Common, follow the Guisens Ensignes: the double pistolets of Spaine begin to shine, the Capitaines arme and goe to field. But the Huguenots are at Rochel, in Languedoc, Guienne and Dauphine: and they goe to seeke them in Picardy, Champagne, Bourgogne and Provence. Marcellus is surprised the ninth of April, by the practices of Daries the second Constall: but suddenly recouered, and Daries hanged. Mandelot seized on the Citadell of Lions the second of May. Orleans shuts her gates against the Duke of Montpensier, sent by the King, to assure himselfe of the towne. The other townes rise: the factious worke, and the army of the League marcheth towards Paris: every day they are fortified with some new troupee, and every day some towne declare it selfe enemy.

The King in the meantime made no warre but by writing, thinking by mild and gentle meanes, to pacifie them that spake too proudly. Hee shewes by his declaration, the zeale he hath alwayes borne to the Catholike Religion, and the necessity that forced him to a peace, finding all the Estates of his Realme tired with the calamities past: that peace was the only meanes to vnite his subiects in one religion, to establish iustice, to reforme abuses

claration.

1585 and manners, to ease the Clergy, honour the Nobility, and to free the people from oppression: that he giues no benefices but to Prelates indued with learning and piety. The Nobility should be reconciled, leaving their spleene and distrusts. The people freed from deuouring warre, should care their bread in peace: and yet many both impudent and rash, more hypocrites then religious, gather by this peace, that he secretly fauours heretikes: the which neuer entered into his thoughts. That he neuer fauored the succession of a King, who may preiudice the Catholike religion. But to vndertake a quarrell for the royall succession, whilst he is yet aliue, and in hope to haue issue: that were to distrust of Gods bounty, and (as it were) degrade him from the estate wherunto God hath called him. That hee hath honoured (with the greatest and worthiest offices of the Crowne) those Princes that B complain to bee debarred his fauour. (And indeed the Duke of Guise was Lord Steuard of France, Gouvernor of Brie and Champagne, and euery one of the same House advanced to a government.) Then hauing promised to restore the Church to her beauty, to giue content to the Nobility, and to ease the people, he entreats, coniuers, exhorts, and commands all Clergy-men, Gentlemen, Parliaments, and Townes corporate, to separate themselves from that which may hinder so holy an intention, to abandon all leagues and associations, and to vnite themselves vnder his obedience.

The King of Nauarres declaration.

Moreover, the King writes to the King of Nauarre, That he should containe himselfe with patience, to the end the people may know whom to blame, as the motiues of these new combustions: assuring him of his loue, and that hee will neuer forget his interest: as more then his owne: against them who (vnder goodly shewes) attempt against his person and Crowne, to make them great with his losse, and the whole ruine of his Estate. The King of Nauarre obeyes, and letting passe all occasions to arme, he protests notwithstanding, That (seeing the sword ready to strike his Lord and Brother) he will prevent the danger.

A great error
of State.

And whereas he is accused of heresie, he answers; That he was borne vnder the toleration of two religions in France: that hee will caue that wherein he was bred, when by a lawfull Councell they shall shew him another truth then that which he beleues: and therefore he is no heretike, nor yet relapse, seeing he was not fallen from his first opinion. That he is no enemy to the Catholikes, for that when the Edicts had granted liberty of conscience, he presently laid downe armes: that in all places hee maintaines his subiects in the same liberty as he found them after the decease of his mother: that at the pretended accord of Magdebourg, which the Preachers of the league publish in their pulpits, as an imaginary assembly, and fit to be spoken by a Montebank, the deceit appears plainly in that they name (in the extract published by them) the Ambassadors of the Elector Palatine, and of the Prince of Auranges, whereof the Elector was deceased aboue a yeare before the terme they specified, and the Prince slaine at Delfe foure moneths before: that hee hath requested of the King a prolongation of the townes which hee holds for assurance of the last Edict; and will deliuer them before the time, so as the League lay aside armes, and yeeld vnto the King the places they had seized: that whereas they declare him incapable of the Crowne, it toucheth him very neare, yea doth he thinke least of it, hoping that God by his bounty will long preferue the King, for the good of his Realme, and will giue him issue, to the griefe of all his enemies. That those which by their declaration terme him desirous of the Kings death, a troubler of the State, and an enemy to the Catholikes, haue falsely and wickedly lyed, beseeching the King to giue him leaue to end this quarrell with the Duke of Guise, one to one, two to two, or ten to ten: without further troubling himselfe or afflicting any of his people: but no man vndertakes this lye, no man accepts of this challenge. Against this first insolency of the league hee should oppose other armes then a pen; another Cuirasse then a Penitents weeds; another countenance then doubtfull and trembling. The authority of an assured brow, the constancy of a manly courage, a resolution fit for a royall Maiesty, should haue dispersed this warre of Gyants, and suppressed these malicious Legions. But the Queene mother (accustomed to sit in a troubled dreame) winkt at the Duke of Guise. She was well pleased with these broyles: she was contented the Duke should terrifie the King, to make him abandon the Protestants, and to force him to banish his new minions from Court, who had brought her in disgrace with the King her sonne: (he had now sequestered her from a great part of the affaires, he held her as it were confined in her houses without the Loure) to the end she might be fought vnto, to

auoid

A auoid the blowes of him that was ready to strike. Her ambition moued her thereto, rather then any desire she had to aduance the Duke: to crosse both the King and Duke, and to bring disorder and confusion into the State; and to stand alone in the middle of these furious tempests.

1585

The League might easily haue bene ouerthrowne. In the beginning they had but a thousand horse, and foure thousand foot in field, and the greatest part knowing that these troubles concerne the King and his Estate, retired themselves in time. Most of the townes wauered betwixt obedience and rebellion: some remained in their fidelity, the rest might haue been assured with small force. But Katherine terrifies him most of all. You haue (saith she) to doe with the Pope, the Emperor, the King of Spaine, the Duke of Sauoy, with some Princes of Germany, with the Catholike Cantons of the Suisse, who renounce your alliance, and with all the House of Lorraine. They number sixe and twenty Prouinces, and great Commanders in this party: your best townes are engaged, all are resolute to hazard goods, persons, and liues, to laue religion from shipwracke. Thus this poore Prince is terrified: hee thinks the Duke of Guise is at his heeles, and holds the Capuchins cloister to be more safe for him then his Loure. He is not the same man that vanquished his enemies at Iarnac and Montcontour, hee wants courage, he desires nothing more then to purchase the Dukes fauour: and promifeth, that for a peace hee will giue them a good part of his kingdom. The Duke of Guise, a Prince of great experience, discreet, valiant, and worthy to be numbred amongst the brasse Captains, knows the King is full of feare, and sees that the lustre of his armes shines ouer all. His courage swells through the Kings childish feare: he continues his course, and begins to hope for more then hee had pretended. He therefore demands much, and his request ioynes his owne priuate interest with the publicke: he beseecheth the King to make an irreuoicable Edict, for the extirpation of heresies, to take away the townes held by the Huguenots by force, to renounce the protection of Geneva, to allow of their armes, and to ioyne his vnto theirs. Which was as much to say, of a King to make himselfe a partizan.

The Duke of Guise fortified
by apace

The King makes a counterfeit peace with them, and by his Edict of the 18 of Iuly, reuokes all other made in fauour of the Protestants: he commands their Ministers to depart the Realme, and to all his subiects within 6 moneths, to make profession of the Catholike Religion, or to auoyd the Country. Hee approves the Leaguers armes, as leauied for his seruice, allowes of their pretexts, and by secret articles concluded at Nemours, contents them in all matters; onely with this condition, To leaue the League, and instantly to lay downe armes: a trap whereby they should in the end be taken. As for their security, they left it to the Kings good pleasure; yet would they haue in their powers, the towne of Chalons, Thoul, Verdun, S. Disier, Reims, Soissons, the castle of Dion, Beaune, Rue in Picardy, Dinan and Concq in Britany: they caused to be payd to the King 200000 crowns, and two third parts for the strangers which they had leauied: they had a discharge for a hundred six thousand three hundred and forty crownes, eight solz, and three deniers, which they had taken vpon the generall receipts. They obtained an hundred thousand crownes to build a Citadell at Verdun: and entertainment for guards on horsebacke for all the Princes of the League.

To conclude, the extorsions, robberies, burnings, profanations, and other insolencies which such armes draw after them, deuoured more flesh in three moneths than this warre continued, wasted more far, and sucked more blood from the poore people (for whose ease they had so often protested to haue taken armes) then the ordinary charges could haue consumed in many yeares. This outrage was the cause of seuen and twenty Edicts, to discharge those millions of gold which this fury had wasted, to the peruerting of Iustice, policy, and the treasure.

A rash enterprise ruines it selfe when it finds resistance, but if the attempters find that they are feared, their impunity growes confident. This peace had made a great breach in the King authority: but they had extorted it by force, not three dayes before hee had proclaimed them rebels and guilty of treason: they might then easily iudge, that he would hatch an egge whereof should spring some notable reuenge. Doubtlesse Henry determined it: but the three brethren, who were the chiefe Architects of this conspiracy, kept themselves apart, and could not be caught in one net: and to maintaine themselves, they had no better expedient then by armes. They make the King resolute to war against against the Protestants: they shew him the facility thereof, three mornings (say they) will end it: We have the assistance of all Christian Princes, the Germane forces will march no more for the King of Navarre, a poore Prince, without money and without credit. The Queene of England shall have worke enough to resist the Spaniards attempts (the Spaniard prepared then that great army against England, which wee shall see dispersed with small resistance, like a puffe of winde) and their strongest places will parlee at our first approaches.

Warre against the Protestants

Let vs make warre (saith the King) against them in Gods name. I will entertaine three armies: one in Guienne, another about mine own person, and the third vpon the frontier, against the strangers whom the Huguenots expect out of Germany, there wants nothing B but money: the charge amounts to foure hundred thousand crownes a moneth. I haue by your aduice broken the peace (saith he to the best of the Clergy, of the Parliament, and of the Citizens of Paris, being assembled at the Loure) assure me now of means to make warre. And afterwards he said to the Cardinall of Guise: The heads of the Clergy are they which haue most importuned me to warre: it is no reason I alone should beare the charge of that which redounds to the publike. I assure my selfe you will not faile to assist me. And to the first President (notwithstanding the Parliament had lately verified the Letters patents, whereby the King condemned the authors of this rebellion as traytors) I haue found so much zeale and affection in you, to cause mee to reuoke the last Edict of peace, as I assure my selfe you will find reasons sufficient to perswade them of your faculty C to forbear their entertainments, so long as the warres shall continue. And then to the Prouost of Merchants he said: The city hath shewed it selfe most affectionate to the breach of the Edict: they must be as willing to contribute to the charges of the warre. Good presently, and assemble the body of your city, and make mee an imposition of two hundred thousand crownes.

Without doubt every one of these was very willing to haue warre, but loath to feele the discommodities it brought. They begin to find that the most prejudiciall peace is better then the most triumphant and victorious warre. Yet the League will haue war: and euen they, whose forefathers were wont to carry it beyond the seas into Asia, Africa, and to the end of the world, doe now nourish it in their owne country. But the authors thereof could D not stand but in the midst of a generall confusion.

The King of Nauarre seeing this cloud ready to breake vpon his party, complains that the King without consideration of the priuate interest he hath in this last resolt, hath made a peace with his enemies, and hath armed them with his own forces and authority, against his Estate, his blood, and himselfe. He layes open by a publike declaration, the causes which moued the League to take armes, the vanity of their pretexts, the fruits which all France may expect by the treaty of Nemours: & then with the Prince of Conde his cousin, the Marshall D'Anville (hereafter Duke of Montmorency, by the death of his eldest brother, and in the following reigne Constable of France) and other Noblemen, Gentlemen, Prouinces, Townes and Commonalties of both Religions, he protests, by a lawfull E and necessary defence, to maintain the fundamentall lawes of Families, and the Estate and liberty of the King and the Queene his mother. Was it not sufficient for these Princes to haue the King and League against them, but they must bee charged with a new assault from beyond the mountains? Sixtus the fifth, a more violent man then his Predecessor, casts out his lightning against these two Henries, King of Nauarre, and Prince of Conde: he excommunicates them, degrades them and their successors from all dignities, namely their pretensions to the Crowne of France, expels them their Countries and persons in prety to the first that should seize on them.

and of no effect.

The Court of Parliament finds this act to be rash, insolent, strange, and farre from the modesty of former Popes, and sayes vnto the King, that therein they find nothing like to the Apostles successor. The Registers of the Court, nor yet antiquity did not teach them, that the Princes of France were euer to seeke iustice at Rome, or that subiects did euer take knowledge of their Princes religion. Seeing then the new Pope, in stead of instruction, studies nothing but destruction, and that he changeth his sheepe-hooke into a fearful fire-brand, to ruine those vnto whom he should winne vnto the Church, the Court could not admit of this Bull, so pernicious for all Christendome, and derogating from the Soueraignty of the Crowne of France. The Princes likewise protest against the said Bull, F and

1585

A and appeal from it, as abusive and scandalous, vnto the next free and lawfull Councell: they will proue (sayd they) that Sixtus the fifth, calling himselfe Pope, terming them heretikes, hath falsely and wickedly lyed. This opposition was set vp in Rome the sixth of Nouember. Thus the Parliament grew resolute against this Bull: but it yielded easily in other matters which did but impair the affaires. For the fifteenth of October they allowed of the Kings Declaration, which imposed confiscation of body and goods, against such as without the warrant of the Catholike Princes had opposed their forces against the League: and reuoked the terme of six moneths granted by the Edict of Iuly, to fifteene dayes after the said Declaration.

B To crosse this Edict, the King of Nauarre, by a Declaration of the last of Nouember, doth seize, and giues commissions to sell all the fruits, rents, reuennues, mouables, debts, and all other profits whatsoever, of the inhabitants of towns, where the Edict of Iuly, touching the six moneths, and of October, touching the abbreuiation to fifteene dayes, had bene received, published and executed: and likewise of Gentlemen and others carrying armes with the Leaguers and their adherents: as also of the Clergy resident in the said townes, or contributing for their party, and to let out their lands to them that would giue most. His words and deeds were all one: for presently his people lay their hands to work. Saint Mesmes keeps the Marshall Matignon in breath. Lanaul chargeth him in Xaintonge, and raiseth the seize of Taillebourg, where the Ladies of Tremouille (the mother and the C daughter) were besieged. The Vicont of Turenne ouer-runes Limosin, and for a gage of his inroad takes the Bishopricke of Thules. The Duke of Mercœur, on the other side, thinks with two thousand men to doe wonders in Poictou: but there must be a proportion betwixt him that forceth, and him that he meanes to force. The Prince of Conde makes head against him, and not only driues him from Fontenay, but also makes him, for his better safety, retire farre into Britany with losse and disgrace. Being freed from this incumbrance, he besiegeth Brouage, and had already brought it to that necessity, as the most resolute were ready to yield when as newes came vnto him, that three Captaines, du Halot D seruant to the King, Le Fresne enemy to the Earle of Brissac, Gouvernor of Angers, and Rochemorte, partisan to the King of Nauarre, had seized on the Castle of Angers, one of the strongest places of the Realme, guarded by a Capitaine and twelue fouldiers. The enterprise was well made, well executed, but not so well continued: for du Halot came too soone into the towne, protesting that he had taken the Castle for the Kings seruise. They detain him prisoner, and besiege the castle, whither the whole country comes.

Angers.

At night they demand to parlee with Fresne. He as ill aduised as the first, comes forth vpon a little bridge. A Harguebuzier makes an offer to shoot at him: Whereupon hee seeks to returne: but Rochemorte with his company, fearing to bee forced by the multitude that came running, drawes vp the bridge. Le Fresne hangs by the chaines to pull it downe: but the townsmen cut off his hands, and he falls into the ditch, where he was slain by a Sagge they kept there. du Halot was presently executed within the Towne.

E These two being dead, they demand of Rochemorte for whom hee holds? For the King of Nauarre, said he. Hereupon they cast vp a trench against the Castle, attending the Duke of Ioueuille the Kings brother in law. During these broyles and troubles Rochemorte (slumbering one day in one of the windowes of the Castle) was there slaine with a Harguebuzier shot.

The Prince aduertised of the surprize of the Castle, and of *Rochemorte*s answer: but not of that which happened since, leaues Brouage: and to oppose sufficient forces against the League, he marcheth with about eight hundred masters, and twelue hundred Harguebuziers on horse-backe, passeth Loire at Roissiers, betwixt Saumur and Angers, chargeth home to the suburbs, forceth some barricadoes, and spends a whole day in skirmishes: F but he hears no newes from the Castle, neither for the alarme in the towne, nor the noise of his troops. No man appears: no answer, no signe is made: the actors were buried in their enterprise, and sixteene fouldiers remaining, had already capitulated. Doubletise too much courage, and too little consideration (a dangerous oversight in any great Commander) had engaged the Prince on this side the Riuer of Loire, amongst many armies of enemies, hauing no bridge at his deuotion, without boats to repasse, or any hope of succour. Then that cheerefull hope which had brought that little army, turns into confusion and disorder: for the Duke of Mayenne had passed the Loire at Orleans, with fifteene hundred died horse; Reistres and French, to cut off the Princes way, if he repassed the water. The Duke of Epipertion and the Marshall Biron kept Beausse towards Bonneauelle, to meet with him. La Chabre had drawne vp the mills and boats, and kept the passages of Loire. The D. of Joyeuse matched at his backe. Entraques Gouverneur of Orleans came to crosse him, and all the commons did rise.

On the other side, the Princes troopes were tyred. Hee failes of two or three passages vpon the riuer, whereof he made account, betwixt Blois and Amboise. The amazement encreaseth, and his number decreaseth: such as had friends in Beausse, Dunois, Perche, Vendomois, or Mayenne, steale away. The Lord of Rohan (advising him not to thrust himselfe into an apparent ruine) had turned head towards Britany. All the foresaid enemies forced would within few dayes charge him. Being neere to Vendosme, he leaues the chiefe charge of the retreat to Clermont, and Saint Gelas; ordereth the companies; provides for his household seruants, and at eleuen of the clocke at night, he parts, accompanied with the Lords of Tremouille, Auentigny, and few others. Finally, after infinite toyle and dangers past, he recouered the Ile of Grenzee, lying in the English Seas, and so London, being receiued by the Queene with all honour and fauour he could desire: and then by her commandement accompanied with a good number of the Nobility, and men of warre, in ships well appointed, he repassed the Seas, obtaining a sufficient conquest to haue saved himselfe, and a rich spoile to haue returned with his head to Rochel, rather then to the Greue or the Hales at Paris.

Saint Gelas; Bois-Duly, Aubigny, la Tiffardiere, and some others, are commended to haue wisely preferred these broken troops neere to the forest of Marchenoir, diuided into small companies, of twelue, and fiftene, whereof (notwithstanding the townes of Orleans, Blois, Amboise, Tours, and others therabouts, were straitly guarded) many repassed the Loire. Saint Gelas and others, taking the high way to Paris, crossed many companies dispersed in Beausse, and hauing wandered long in the forest of Orleans: in the end they passed the Riuer neere to Gyen, and at last recouered Rochel, where the Prince, the chiefe of the army, and the most part of the troops were already in safety.

The lightnings of Sixtus, and the second Edict of October had wonderfully moved the King of Nauarre. Now he complains to the Clergy, to the Nobility, to the third Estate, and to the Parliament of Paris, of the breach of the last Edict of peace, and that they had caused the question of succession to a King yet liuing, to be decided at Rome; that they would make a Prince of the blood of France subiect to the Pope; that they suffer the Consistory to giue that which belongs not vnto it; and that the Pope disposeth of Realmes and Principalities at his pleasure. Then he sheweth the miseries which this vnciuill warres will breed: he exhorts them, not to serue as instruments to the Leaguers, to ruine the King and his Realme. And finally, seeing they are so ill aduised, hee protestes as before: That both he and his, will vse all lawfull meanes, to resist the violence of their enemies, and cast all the miseries that shall ensue vpon the authors thereof.

Strangers deale earnestly in the cause. The Princes of Germany make intercession to the King, at the King of Nauarre instance, that he would be perswaded, at the humble petitions of his neighbours, and that opening his eyes at the teares, and his eares at the complaints of his subiects, he would maintaine his owne good, quiet, honour, and faith, his Crowne and reputation, and preserve a body wounded vnto death. But those of Guise kept him in awe.

He speaks not but by the mouth of the League. I make and change (saide hee vnto the Ambassadors) my Ordinances as necessity doth require, for the good and quiet of my subiects: and leaue the care to all soveraigne Princes, to gouerne their people as they shall thinke fit. I haue the feare of God liuely grauen in my heart: neither will I doe any thing against the honour of my confidence, and the fatherly care I haue of my people.

This pleased the League: they are now on horsebacke. The Duke of Mayenne marcheth with about two thousand horse, French and Reistres, twelue regiments of foot, and six thousand Suisses. He must bring the Princes of the blood prisoners to Paris in triumph, their Captaines chained, and couer the fields of Xaintonge, Poitou, and Guienne with their slaughtered souldiers, returne victorious, and bring to the King the conquest of all the places that made resistance. But what exploits? what triumphs? The wrath of God ruines his men in those Countries. Hee besiegeth, batters, and takes some filly places, Intercession of foreign Princes.

The Duke of Mayenne army.

A places, which are scarce noted in the French Mappe, as Montignac, Beaulieu, Gagnac, Castels, and Saint Bazille vpon Garonne: Montegur, Castillon, Puynormand in Periguenx, and the most part by composition, (but badly obserued) leauing behind him Figeac, Cadallac, Cajor, the Houles of the Vicont of Gourdon, Montfort, Bergerac, and Saint Foy, places of importance, all held by the Protestants. The difficulty of passages, the ouer-flowing of Riuers, the vehement cold, the continuall raine, want of money, munition, victuals, and supplies of men, with-draw him from this warre, to goe and winter at Bourdeaux, there (in the midst of his lousies) to make some enterprife vpon the castles, to the prejudice of the Marshall of Matignan. So the most of his souldiers (detained long without either honour or profit) disband of themselves, and the Duke brings from this voyage a more famous spoile, the heyre of Caumont, being but twelue yeares old, to giue her to one of his sonnes. He had before time done better in Daulphine, where keeping his faith inuoliable, he had happily preferred his reputation and credit. Indeed hee then liued onely vnder the Kings lawes and obedience, and now he spends much time, labour, and money to effect little in Guienne. In the meane time the Prince of Conde renewed the warre, assisted notably by the Earle of Laual, and Saint Gelas, who commanded about foure hundred and fifty men, and by the new conquests of Dompiere (a castleneere vnto Saint Iean, belonging to the Marshall of Rez, where the booty repaired the losses late suffered by the souldiers) of Royen, a strong place neere vnto Brouage, of Soubize, Mornac in Alleuort, Mondeuis, and others, defaced the griefe of the former crosses. In the midst of these prosperities he tooke to his second wife, in Taillebourg, the sixteenth of March, Charlotte-Katherine of Tremouille, sister to Claude of Tremouille Duke of Thouars, &c. by whom hee had Henry of Bourbon Prince of Conde, the first Prince of the blood at this present, and first Peere of France.

Within few dayes after, Tiercelin with his regiment of about six hundred and fifty men, returned from an enterprife which Saint Luc the Gouvernor of Brouage had made (but in vaine) against the Ile of Oleron. The Prince aduertised of his passage, follows him, with La Tremouille his brother in law, La Boulay, Auantigny, and some thirty others: hee chargeth them in the reere, neere vnto the suburbs of Xaintes, and kills thirty or forty of his men: the rest put themselves in battell through the fauour of the hedges and the high way. The Earle of Laual comes gallopping, with about fife and thirty horse of his company, which had bene lodged a little from thence: and seeing the Prince and the rest of his company ingaged in the combat, he goes directly to the Colonels Ensigne, covered with a battalion of pikes: he breakes them, fights with him that caried it, puls it from him; puts him to flight, kills threecore souldiers vpon the place, and chafeth the whole Regiment. Tiercelin saved himselfe, carying to Xaintes a hurt in the arme, and many others being maimed. Tremouille had a horse slaine vnder him: and some were hurt, but the Earle lost Sailli and Rieux his brethren. Tanlay was lately deccased of sicknesse at Saint Iean: and himselfe surprised of a feuer, and wonderfully grieved for the losse of his three brethren, followed them to the grane within a few dayes after, and all foure were interred within the Castle of Taillebourg.

But what did the King of Nauarre in the meane time? He hath vtill now maintained himselfe vnder the obedience of the Kings commandements: hitherto there hath bin nothing but mutuell writtings, Edicts, Declarations, commandements; directions to the officers of the Crowne, for the execution thereof. Hereafter hee displays other armes then paper and inke.

The Marshall of Matignan had besieged Castles in February: the King flies thither with about three hundred Masters, and eightene hundred Harguebuziers on horse backe: hee raiseth the siege, disposeth of his affaires in Berne: comes to Nerac, and assures the town: F passeth the Garonne at Saint Bazeille (notwithstanding the Duke of Mayenne, who lay within twoleagues of his passage) crosseth Prigord and Angoulmois, and so comes into Poitou, where the Marshall Biron, with about twelue hundred horse, and foure thousand foot, molested and troubled the Country neere vnto Rochel, and besieged Marans. The arrivall of the said King, and the resolution of the besieged, commanded by La Jarrige, made the Marshall to passe the riuer of Charente, and to leaue Marans to the free exercise of both Religions. The King of Nauarre went to Rochel to visit the army at Sea, and by a palisado, to keepe in them of Brouage.

The death of foure brethren of Laual.

The Cardinall of Lenoncourt, and the President Brulart, were sent the yeare before A from the King, to assure the King of Nauarre of his Majesties love : and to exhorte him againe to vnite himselfe to the Catholike Church, as well for the good of his conscience, as also to make his way to the succession of the Crowne more easie: to shew vnto him the causes that had moued him to breake the peace, and to intreat him to yeeld the townes of suredty. The time would not suffer these propositions to take effect: but contrariwise, after the example of the league (saide the King of Nauarre) we should demand better townes.
So the Ambassadors ended their charge, beseeching the said King, to enter into some treatie, wherein the Queene mother should deale to his content, so as he would stay the leauy of Reistres, Lanquenets and Suisses, which Clermont, Segur, and Guitri, had procured. B
He accepted of this conference, the which breeds a truce in the end of the yeare, but with protestation, not to stay the good will of such as in so important an occasion, and extreme necessity, had gone to field: that (raising the Kings authority troden vnder foot, by the breach of his Edict) they might persueue him from the foraine inuasion of the League.
He was better affected to a good peace, then to a bad truce. But the Queene mother telling him that the King would make no peace nor truce with him, vnlesse he would become a Catholike, she made this conference altogether fruitlesse. She lets him vnderstand, that this change would make his condition more free, more assured, and more fit for his calling:
that his conseruacion would bring him in grace with the King, leauing to court a Maior of Rochel, whom he did not command absolutely. But this Prince had his eares too much beaten with this proposition, and could not yeeld thereunto, but by due forme, which was by a holy and lawfull Councell. And the Duke of Neuers, thinking to adde some more perswasive reasons then the rest of the Assembly: You cannot (saith he) leaue any impact there. (A Prince doth what he will, when as he wills nothing but what he ought. You haue reason (answered this Prince, being free and of a quicke conceit) for me haue no Italians amongst vs.

The Queene mothers conference with the King of Nauarre.

This conference bred a ieaiousse among the Parisiens. They were more inclined to a reuolt then euer. The Duke of Mayenne aduertised that the Queene mother advanced towards the King of Nauarre, to mediate an accord, he makes haste to Paris to reproch the King, that this negotiation was contrary to his Edict: that such a peace could not be good, breeding effects in Religion contrary to the tranquility of Catholike consciences.
Being ariued there, the six Arch-leaguers impart vnto him their secret articles: to sup-presse heresie, reforme the Court, and the insolency of Mignons; and for a fallall wound to the Estate, to seize vpon the Kings person. He allows of these Comcells, and sounds their desires, but finds the execution difficult. So the Rats in the Fable found this expedient to be very good, to be aduertised of the Cats approach, and to save themselves, to hang a bell at his eare: but none durst vnder take to doe it. The Queene mother aduertised of this desperate humour, tooke her way to Court. Her arriuall, with the irresolution of the Commanders, left the Parisiens wauering, in the midst of so dangerous an enterprise. The Queenes departure kindled the warre in Poitou. The King of Nauarre goes to field, takes Chisay by composition, say say by assault: forceth Saint Maixant to yeeld:
redueth Fontenay to his obedience: besiegeth Mauleon, and during the battery takes it by escalado.

The King of Nauarres exploits.

Des Diguieres
in Dauphine.

They of Dauphine seeing all Guienne in armes, would not be the last to make it known that they had interest in this cause. Des Diguieres perswades himselfe that he shall reduce this Province to the King of Nauarres deuotion: with this designe hee caused Iohn Baptiste Gentil (issued from the noble Family of the Gentils in Genoua) to come from Fleuerac in Geauadan to Serres, a man prompt in warlike conceptions, hardy in enterprises, and happy in executions: and commands him, if it might be, to deslowe the Virgin of Dauphine. This Virgin was the Towne and Archbishoppicke of Ambrun, for during the ciuill warres all the townes of Dauphine had beene held by the Protestants, except that, being built on the toppes of a Mountaine, and fortified with a Citadell by the Duke of Mayenne. Gentil views it by night, and reports that there is meanes to take it. They march with three hundred horse and nine hundred Harguebuziers during the longest nights of winter, when arising by foure of the clocke in the morning, they find the town in armes, and the inhabitants ready to entertaine them, for one of the townsmen had flit from the troops, resting that night at Chorges, & giuing aduertisement to Gessin gouernor

A of the place. Notwithstanding all this, Gentil advanced with Corbiere, la Riviere, Masse, Bagard, and other Captaines. Des Diguieres follows him with Saint Ian his cousin, fifty men armed, and fifty Harguebuziers, Morge commanding the rest, and Parbault the shot.
The Sentinell hearing the noyse of their armes, cries, Who is there? It is (saide Gentil) Monsieur Des Diguieres that comes to petard you. The Petards worke their effect. And the third blow they enter into the base Court of the Citadell, pell-mell with them that are afflicted, they force them to quit the place, and to fye vnto a plat-forme towards their cannon. They chase them, kill some, and force the rest to cast themselues desperately from the wals into the towne. They of the dungeon defend themselves courageously.
B Gentil threatens to blow them vp with his Petard, the which hee planted at the doore of the store-houfe where their powder lay; whereat they grew amazed, and yeelded to haue their liues saued. Gessin intrencheth himselfe to stop their descent into the towne, but day being come, it was forced, and he being retired into a tower of the Archbishops palace, made his composition to haue his life saued. Thus the Virgin in Dauphine was deslowed.

Ambrun
taken.

The taking of Ambrun opened the passage of the mountaines of high Dauphine, and the towne of Guillestre gaue entry into Piedmont. Gentil views it, and vnder takes it in the hottest of the inhabitants alarme, hauing made many fires in their dirches and raelins, to discouer such as should approach. Foure Petards force three gates, and break down
C a draw-bridge; the townsmen fight valiantly to hinder their entry, they kill and hurt many; Pranieres Lieutenant of Des Diguieres had a dangerous blow on the head with a stone, yet they were forced to receiue a law from the stronger.

Guillestre
taken.

Saint Iulian a good place in high Viuares was also surprisid by Gentil at the instance of the Seigneur of Chambauld. Montfaulcon in Vellay was more painful, for their guide hauing lost his way by reason of the darknesse of the night, they could not arriue before the breake of day, but there happily fell a great mist to couer their approaches. The Sentinels were euen then gone downe to assist at the opening of the gate: when as behold an vnexpected thunder of Petards taught the townsmen, that a place enuied is in great danger when as the guards leaue their wals at the breake of day.

D These happy exploits did winne Capitaine Gentil much reputation. From henceforth they attempt not any thing but they desire to haue him a principall actor. The Earle of Chastillon desired to reuiue that which hee had vpon the towne of Puy in Auvergne, whereof he had failed by the bad conduct of Capitaine Saint Martin (otherwise called Villaret of Geauadan) who through indiscretion or otherwise, had left some wax in the touch-holes of his Petards, so as they could not take fire at need, yet had hee happily let them to without any discovery, so as the Earle being discontented, returned with all speed with nine hundred foot, and foure hundred horse. Whilest he treated with Gentil touching this attempt, he had some lett which stayed him in Languedoc: during the which Gentil had leisure to goe and view Lions, the capricious inhabitants hauing newly demanded E that Citadell: which hauing found pregnable, Chastillon, Des Diguieres, and Chambauld, ioyne their troops together vpon a pretext to besiege Nonnay in Viuares, perswading themselues to cary it vpon the assurance which Gentil gaue them, if the King of Nauarre had not commanded Cont Chastillon to goe and ioine with the army of Reistres, who made preparation to muster vpon the plaine of Strasbourg, and Gentil to accompany him to open safe passages as should be needfull.

Whilest the King of Nauarres armes prosper in Poitou, and the Duke of Mayenne treats with the leaguers at Paris, and the mouth of his mutinous Preachers, disgrace the Kings authority with the people: the Duke of Guise continues to make war against them of Lametz, the which he had begun against the Duke of Bouillon, from the first beginning of the league. Sedan and all that principality serued as a retreat for the neighbour Protestants, and as a port for strangers to enter into France. These are the pretexs wherwith he couers his designs, but he had another principall motiue: from Sedan the King had intelligence of all that was practised in Champagne and Lorraine, in the yeare 1585. When he sees himselfe master of Douzy, Rocroy, and Raucourt, he passeth the Meuze, and enters into the Soueraignty of Sedan, afflicts the Countymen with all the cruelties that war could imagine, whilest the famine presseth them within the towne. To diuert this storme which threatened Sedan, the Duke of Bouillon causeth Schelandre Gouernor of Lametz, Duke of Beaullon chief of Germane

army.

to set vpon Verdun, a towne on the frontiers of Champagne, which had tumultuously run into the league: the Duke of Guise runnes to succour it, and by his absence giues the duke of Bouillon meane to succour Sedan. Thereupon the Queene-mother, at the request of the D. of Montpensier, vncle by the mothers side to the Lord of Sedan, procures a truce for fifteene dayes, betwixt the two Dukes, during the which the enterprise vpon the castle of Iametz, for the Duke of Guise, prouing fatall for the vndertakers, disposed their wils to a second truce of a month.

This fell out happily: for the Germane army, wherof he was named Lieutenant General vnder the Duke Iohn Casimir (who substituted in his place the Baron De Onaw, the minority of the Elector Palatin nephew and pupill to the said Duke, hindring him from marching in person) prepared to make their musters in the plaine of Strasbourg. So the Duke of Bouillon goeth into Alsacia with foure hundred horse, and eight hundred Harguebuziers to make them aduance: and the Duke of Guise, comes to the King to Meaux, to receiue (said he) his Maiesties commandements, in so great and so important a cause: but in effect, to complaine, that since the reuocation of the Edict of peace, he had followed the warre against heretikes with small fauour, as the King had suffered them in their houses to enioy their goods and estates peaceably: That in stead of selling and employing them to their ruine, he caused the reuenues of the Cardinall of Pelleue to bee seized on (a man borne in France, but Espaniolized at Rome) for that in open Consistory hee had veruiously maintained the iust motives of the taking of armes by the Catholike Princes against the Huguenots: That this warre had more aduanced the Mignons then ruined the Heretikes, and that the money raised by the subvention of the Clergy, serued to entertaine the said Mignons, that neither the Kings Councell, the Parliament of Paris, the inferior Iudges, nor the Prouost of Paris had sworn this last Edict. That the towns which had demanded the extirpation of heresie, and the reuocation of the last Edict of peace, were treated like enemies. That he had caused the Citadels of Lions and Maicon to bee beaten downe, surprised that of Valence, disgraced Brissac, Cruilles, Gessan, Entragues, and others, and peruered the assignations, which he had giuen him, to bee repaid the money the which he had disbursed in this last leauy of men of warre.

But the King knew well how to counter-balance these complaints of the League, with their owne breach of the Articles of Nemours. He had well obserued, that their insolent passions aspired to some greater designs then the articles made mention of. Those of Guise had demanded towns of assurance against the Protestants in those Provinces where they were not at all to be feared. The Duke of Aumale had newly surprised Dourlans and Pondormoy, but he had failed of Bouillon through the fidelity of S. Maria. They had lodged in their Citadell of Vitri Le Francois an Italian at their deuotion, and tooke an oath of many Gouvernours to hold their places for the Duke of Guise.

But the Kings meaning was to liue and reigne: yea though he did buy a good peace to the contentment of both parties. But the contrary designs of the King of Nauarre, and the Duke of Guise, could not bee reconciled: and hee had no meane to subsist betwixt both, but must leane to the one or the other side, nor oppress the one without raising of the other. To conclude, not daring to shew himselfe a King, he suffers all the chiefe of the league to become counterfeit Kings. He exhorts the Duke of Guise, not to expose the Estate in prety, to procure the contentment of his King, the liberty of the Clergy, the dignity of the Nobility, and the peoples ease, by other meane then that which destroys the honour of the Soueraigne, spoiles the Churches, sucks the Gentlemans blood, and driues the people into despaire: and inuires him vnto peace, by promises of aduancement for his House and party. But a warlike mind will haue nothing but war. The Duke could neither endure the search nor the cure thereof. Thus peace is banished. The Duke seeks all meane to ruine the Huguenots: and beseecheth the King to stop the army of strangers, which were euen now vpon the frontier, that they might not returne into Germany, with a victory ouer France, and a triumph ouer the Catholike Church.

Still must this venerable pretext of Religion serue to colour the wicked passions of men. Hee procures many Commissions, especially for his brother the Duke of Mayen in Dauphine, for the Duke of Ioyeuse in Poictou, and for himselfe against the Protestants army.

If the King had not shewed the like care on his part, the people would haue said, that as long

The Duke of Guise complains of the King.

The King complains of the Duke.

The King desires peace.

The Duke will haue warre.

A long rest doth dull the courage of a horse, so since the Duke of Ioyeuzes marriage, the pleasures and delights of Court, and the solitarie life of Vicennes, had much decayed his accustomed generosity. He therefore diuides his forces into three armies. The first at Chaumont in Bassigni, consisting of five and twenty companies of men at armes, twelue ensignes of foot in the Regiment of Esclapaux, six of Ioannes, six of Gie, with many other blanks signed for other commissions, at the will of the Duke of Guise, who encamped this army with foure hundred Lances, and two thousand Italian foot, sent by the D. of Parma; and the Duke of Lorraine, (suffering himselfe as the eldest of the House, to be carried away with the vaine hopes that were giuen him, of a good portion in the pretended succession of Charlemagne) held also goodly and great forces vpon the frontier, at the D. of Guises deuotion. The duke of Montpensier commanded the second, at S. Florentin, neere vnto Troyes: the King with his presence honoured the third at Gyen, stretching along the Riuer of Loire, to keepe the King of Nauarre from ioyning with his strangers on this side the Riuer. The duke of Ioyeuzes presuming of an assured victory, lead another army into Guienne against the King of Nauarre, and the other heads of the league, armed euery one of them by himselfe.

The army that came for the Protestants, consisted of five thousand Reistres, five thousand Lansquenets, twelue thousand five hundred Suisses in three Regiments, eleuen cornets of French, ten companies of Harguebuziers on horse-backe, the which in all were about thirty thousand men. The King of Nauarre assembled his forces in Gascony. The Prince of Conde, the Count Saiffon, the Vicont of Turenne, the Count of Rochefoucault, the Lord of Tremouille, and others, made great preparations. The Lord of Chastillon gathered an army in Languedoc: Des Diguieres held himselfe ready to passe at need.

Thus this poore and miserable Realme, is ready to serue as a prey to people differing in tongue and manners. Without doubt men iudge of the offence by the punishment. The witch-craft and diuination (whereof some make open profession) blasphemy vnpunished, lust, dissolution, prodigality, ambition, discord, and cruelties: but above all, impiety, licentiousness, atheisme, superstition and iniustice, the root of miseries which are crept into France, haue filled vp the measures of her iniquities: and now she is ready to drinke euen vnto the lees.

In former ages the Court was a Schoole of vertue for the French Nobility, now it abounds in dissoluteness, disorder and excess. The most modest grew insolent, the excess of great men breed it in the meanest. And doe wee wonder if the same scourges, whereby the fearful wrath of God iustly kindled, haue ruined more flourishing Estates then this, doe now waste our fields?

The army of strangers euen now enters into Lorraine, whose errors at their entry will cost them deare that commit them. The Duke of Bouillon is young, little respected, and ill obeyed. Cleruant, Guitri, Beauvais La Noie, Digines, Montlout, Vezines, and others assist him, but most of them are more fit to cary an ambassage, then to vndertake a charge. The chiefe of Germany is but a meane Gentleman, valiant out of doubt, but too weak for so great a charge, hauing no reputation but what he hath gotten vnder Duke Casimirs authority.

In the beginning of August, discord (a dangerous plague) bred a great confusion in their proceedings: the Duke of Bouillon would haue employed this army to victual the places of his Soueraignty: the General of the Germanes desired to haue a Prince of the blood to march before him: the Reistres, and Suisses lose a goodly occasion at Pont Saint Vincent, to fight with the league, who made a shew to ioyne with them: the Lansquenets are commended to haue resolutely cast themselves into the water, to passe and come to battell. Some would spoile Lorraine, others would cary their reuenge into the heart of France. The Germanes choole the way along the Riuer of Seine, and so to passe into Picardy. The French had more reason: that they must ayme at a passage ouer Loire, and fauour the King of Nauarres approach. In the end, the way of Loire was refused. They fire some villages in Lorraine: the Countries lying vpon the passage are wasted, the army findes neither mills, nor ouens standing, which bred a general discontent amongst the Reistres and Suisses. As the army passed through the country of Barre, and Giniuillois, newes comes that the Lord of Chastillon is beset in Greffille in Lorraine, with four hundred horse, and fifteene hundred Harguebuziers: the Duke of Bouillon makes halt to vantage him. The Earle of La Marche his brother so toyles himselfe in this action, that hee falls sicke, and dying, leaues the conduct of the fore-ward to the Lord of Chastillon: the army is turmoyled with continuall raine, they want victualls, and the grapes and other fruit being not ripe, breed many fluxes: yet did they surmount all these difficulties, and hauing passed the riuers of Marne, Aube, Seine, La Cure, and Yonne, they approached neere vnto Loire.

The army approaching to ioyne with the Prince of Conde, the garrison of Perreufe being abroad, caried away some Reistres: the Earle of Chastillon sent to demand them by captaine Geniil, and vpon refusal, threatens the Towne with the rigours of warre.

The Admirall (said they) was more dangerous then his son, yet passing neere vnto vs with great armies, he neuer had the heart to besiege vs. Poore soules, who trust in the strength of their armes, and the bounty of their walls; and yet haue no meanes to resist the violence of an Engine that is portatiue. Chastillon causeth the Regiments of Languedoc to march. The Lords of Mouy, Montlour, Eternay, Lieramont, Rully, Langres, Brofles, and others, doe accompany him. They plant about one thousand eight hundred Harguebuziers at the defences of the ports, to shoot as soone as the Petard had plaied. Geniil prepares his rouling bridges and makes fast his Petards through the fauour of the night: they beat downe the ports and draw-bridges, and at the sixth blow they become masters of the towne; where they retire their Reistres, and suppress their insolvency that spake so proudly, teaching the Inhabitants that the law of armes doth bind them to answer for their actions whom they bring for in their guard.

Here the Reistres and the Suisses make a second complaint: the King of Nauarre appears not, the water is low, but the Kings forces are lodged vpon the riuers side, and threaten to fight with the first that shall approach: the ruine of the strangers army was to keepe the King of Nauarre from ioyning with them: and therefore, the duke of Ioyeuze staied the said King with an army, strong with men, munition, artillery, and other meanes. For their first exploits, the King of Nauarre had defeated some companies which had advanced too farre into the country. And Charbonniers and Beri remaining with their regiments at La Mothe Saint Eloy (being beaten by the fauour of the captaine of the castle, who lent some peeces, to breake their barricadoes: against the oath which he had giuen, not to commit any act of Hostility) were defeated by Ioyeus troops.

The taking of Saint Maixant, was the second of his triumphs: Touche-Charente the third: both by composition. But the defeat of the companies of Pucilhet, (where some being taken after the fury of the fight, others yelding vpon their enemies faith, were in a manner all insolently slaine in cold blood) together with the foule warre at Saint Eloy, shall bee dearly sold vnto the victors, who hauing added the Abbey of Maillezay to his first conquests, he left Laurdin to command the army, and returns to court, to demand a triumph of his victories, and a supply of greater forces, the plague hauing much wasted his army.

In his absence the King of Nauarre defeated three of his companies of men at armes, took their cornets, and many gentlemen prisoners: pursued Laurdin vnto La Haye in Touraine: chased the Duke Mercœur, and by the conduct of the Vicont of Turenne, tooke all his rich baggage: then at his returne he received the troops which the Cont Saiffons brought, and those of Normandy led by Colembiers.

This respite gaue the said King meanes (as we haue noted before) to gather together his forces in Gascony, and so to ioyne with his army in Xaintonge. On the other side, the Duke of Ioyeuze, supplied with horse and foot, repasseth the Loire, and with twelue thousand fighting men, comes to encounter the King of Nauarre. The King of Nauarre had two riuers to passe, to come to Xaintonge, Drougne and L'Isle.

The Duke of Ioyeuze, drunke with prosperity of a hasty aduancement, who of a private Gentleman was made a Duke, and of a Duke, brother in law to the French King, and charged (but not so much by the King, as by the League, whereof hee was a partizan, hauing married the Queenes sister) to giue battell at all euents, would cut off these passages, presuming that hee which passed first, should haue an aduantage ouer his enemy.

The battell of Coutras.

- A The King of Nauarre knew it well: yet, did he not lose any time in curling his haire. The nineteenth of October, accompanied with the Prince of Conde, the Cont Saiffons his brother, the Vicont of Turenne, & other good Commanders, he takes his lodging at Coutras, to passe the riuier of Drougne at a ford. The Duke supposing to haue him at his deuotion betwixt two riuers, giues the Rendez-vous to all his forces the next day, betwixt Roche-Chalais and Coutras, and there made choise of his place of battell to his best aduantage, halfe a league from Coutras. Being lodged there, the King of Nauarre commands the Duke of Tremouille to passe the riuier and to lodge at Chareudon two little leagues from Coutras. He doth it, and then sends the Baron of Saint Surin one of his Captaines of light-horse with his company, to learne certaine newes of the enemy. Soone after, he brings him word that he marched directly to his quarter. About midnight, the Duke takes the field which hee had viewed at his going to lodge, whither hee was no sooner come, but Bellegarde Gouverneur of Xaintonge (who led the Duke of Ioyeus fore-ward) comes vpon him with five of six hundred horse and 400 shot on horse-backe. He aduertised the King of Nauarre that the whole army aduanced, and by the aduice of Vinans Master of the campe to the said horsemen, hee retires slowly, turning fill head towards the enemy, and skirmishing with them in many places. This hee did of purpose; for by this stratagem he kept the enemy occupied vntill eight of the clocke in the morning, and gaue the K. of Nauarre meanes to passe the Riuier with his troops and Cannon, and to make choise of his place of battaille. The King of Nauarre and his souldiers, had sweet more in skirmishes, then in Tennis-courts, and did take more pleasure in the dust of their enemies chafe, then in feasts. The inequality of the number doth not amaze them. He marcheth before: resolues his men to fight, makes them to fall on their knees and pray to God, puts his horsemen into foure squadrons, his owne, that of the Prince, the Earles, and Viconts. The souldiers inflame their courages by mutual skirmishes, and reproachfull speeches: from words they goe to blowes. The King of Nauarres arillerie thunders first, at eight of the clock, and at the first volley sweeps away seuen Captaines of the regiment of Picardy. The Dukes answers him, but without effect. The ignorance or malice of canonicus hauing planted it so low, as it fell vpon a little hill betwixt both armies. The Dukes horsemen led by Laurdin, Saint Luc and Captaine Mercœur, discharge their first fury vpon the Duke of Tremouille as the first obiect of their armes, and being double in number, they passe through them at the first charge, and overthrow Vinans Master of the camp (who was fore hurt) with some others, like vnto a violent streame which ouerturnes all that it encounters.
- And whilest that the Duke of Tremouille (hauing rallied his men together) went and planted himselfe before the King of Nauarres troops, who marcht to the combat, they encounter the Vicont of Turenne, who aduanced to second the light-horse-men. They kill his horse with their Lances, and put his troope in disorder. But hee is remounted before the enemy could doe him any more harme, being loth to quit his part of the cake for so light a checke.
- The Duke presuming by this first good hap, to obtaine a totall victory ouer three chiefe heads of the House of Bourbon, aduanceth resolutely, flanked with two hedges of armed men to charge with the Lance. The four Commanders and the Colonell of the light-horse march euery one in the head of his troope, first easily they pace, then they trot, and after in their full carriere. They charge and breake them. This conflict (which consisted for the most part of leaguers) was almost as soone dissolved, as it was resolved on: it beganne at nine of the clocke, and at ten not any of the Dukes men had any offensive armes: some are overthrowne, some taken, and some seeke their safety in flight. The victors pursue them three leagues, and strew the fields with men, horses, and armes. The Duke of Ioyeuze retired towards his footmen and artillery, his horse being hurt in the thigh with a shot, hauing not any one with him but Breze who caried the white Corner; wandering thus in the midst of the field where the battell was fought, a Gentleman followed him, with whom another ioyne was. They take him and demand his name; the which hee tels at the first summons. Five or six other men at armes arise as they were leading him to the King of Nauarre, and seeke to take this goodly prize from them. In this contention one of them foreseeing, that if the prisoner were once in the Kings hands, hee should be in safety, and they frustrate of their pretensions; or (as some say) reproaching reproaching him with his breach of faith at Saint Eloy, and at Croix-Chappeau, against the company of Peulhies, he shoots him behinde with a Pistol through the head, whereof he fell dead to the ground, losing both life and meanes, to try with the rest with what moderation and clemency the King of Nauarre could yfe his victories. It is a pittifull thing for great men to fall into the hands of petty companions, who neither can nor will respect their qualities.

His brother S. Sauveur, Breze who caried the white corner, Rouffay the younger brother of Piennes guidon to the Duke, the Earles of Suze, Gauvelo, & Ambieux, the Lords of Fumel, Neufui the elder brother of Perigord, young Rochefort, Croisset, Gurat, S. Fort, guidon to Saint Lue, du Bordet his ensigne, de Vaux Lieutenant to Bellagard, gouverneur of Xaintonge, Montignis Ensigne, Tiercelin master of the campe, Pluvial, La Brangery, Campels the younger, La Vallade, Baculard, with many other Capitaines, and a great number of men of account and qualitie, with about halfe of the army, made the battell of Courtras famous by their deaths, as the most memorable of all that have beene giuen for religions cause in France. Many rich prisoners, and a very rich spoile. All his cornets taken, his Cannon caried away, and his baggage seized on. At their returne from the pursue, thanks were giuen to God vpon the place of battell died with blood, and couered with carcases. But that which honoured the King most: in the midst of this so commendable a moderation of this victory, hee shewed himselfe no lesse milde and courteous to the prisoners and the wounded, then wise and valiant in heate of the fight. Hee caused the dead to be buried, cured the wounded: sent home almost all the prisoners without ransom, gratified most of the Commanders, caused the Ensignes to be deliuered to Montignis above the rest, commended him to haue behaved himselfe valiantly in the battell: where-by he began to purchase fauour with the King of Nauarre, and afterwards got great reputation with him for his valour and fidelitie, when as hee vaited both crownes into one.

The Prince of Conde, at the first charge had a blow with a Lance on the side, and being ingaged vnder his horse, it did so preiudice his health, as the griefe thereof did soon hasten him to his end. This is the greatest losse of the Protestants army in this combate, in the which there was a very small number slaine, and not one of account. The K. of Nauarre is now freed from the snares that were laid for him: now he aduanceth towards the head of the riuier of Loire: and giues aduice of his designe to the array of strangers, which then was in Hurepois about the lands of the Lord of Chastillon.

The King camped vpon Loire betwixt Cosne and Neufui, and by aduice of the Duke of Neuers hee cloyes the passages with trees, stones and other hindrances where the horses should passe. The second cause (next to God) of the ruine of this armie, to whom they thought the King at his entry would haue presented a blanke to prescribe what they pleased. The Duke of Guise followed them at the heeles, and the Duke of Mayenne on the one side: and yet both of them could not keepe them from surprising of some small townes to refresh their armie. But when as they see themselves frustrate of all hope to ioine with the King of Nauarre, or to passe the riuier of Loire, that they must either retire, or march forward to meet with the King of Nauarre, or ingage themselves farther within the Realme, to seeke bread for themselves, and forage for their horses, or else march on the left hand and wander into vnkowne countries, they grow amazed, they murine, they faint.

Some Frenchmen attempt La Charité: but their enterprize succeeds not. In the end they lead the army in Beaulieu, where they should find meat both for man and horse. The seuen and twen-tieth of October they lodged at Vimorri, and places thereabouts, neere to Montargis. To take from them this lodging, the Dukes of Guise and Mayenne (taking aduantage of the passages of the riuier of Loing) come at supper time with fiftene hundred horse, and fise thousand foot, and charge the Baron Donneau, being lodged in Vimorri with seuen or eight cornets of Reistres: but they had almost verified the saying of the King of the Epirots who vanquished the Romane army; We are vndone if we get such another victory, for three hundred horses of baggage, the Barons two Camels, and the death of fifty fouldiers with an hundred seruyants, was not sufficient to recompence the blood of forty braue and gallant Gentlemen, and two hundred good fouldiers slaine vpon the place by the Reistres, who speedily repaired to their cornets, whilst the Dukes

A Dukes men were busie at the spoile. The Duke of Mayenne received two pistoll-shot on his caske by the Baron, and in exchange, the duke gaue the Baron a wipe on the forehead, with his Courtlas, but with small hurt.

The Duke of Guise failing failed to surprize the Reistres lodging at Vimorri by the Lions force, he now imployes the Foxes subtilty, and the malice of a treacherous man who heretofore had vowed so great affection and fidelitie to the King of Nauarre; who iudging another by himselfe, and not able to imagine that so treacherous and detestable a thought should euer harbour in the heart of a French Gentleman, whose quality should be free from all treason: had sent instructions to the Duke of Bouillon Generall of this armie, touching the seruices which he expected from this Champenois. As the Duke attended newes hourly, behold he comes to the armie, he addresseth himselfe to the Earle of Chastillon, intreats him to giue him access vnto the Duke of Bouillon, and presenting vnto him a piece of a crowne which had been broken for his credit, he grieues that vntill that time he had not meanes to produce any effects in fauour of the King of Nauarre, for whose seruice hee would alway be ready to imploy both his wit and blood; that hauing no meanes vpon the frontier, for that the Duke of Guise would neuer suffer him, nor his company to abandon him; he had now good opportunity to deliuer the towne & castle of Montargis into his hands. If he thought it fit to aduance the cause, the Duke of Guise hauing lodged him with his company in the Castle, and left two companies in the towne to fortifie the Inhabitants. If this (said hee) will not serue, I am not resolued to returne any more, but to retire my armes, my equipage, and some fouldiers of my intelligence, and then come vnto this army and so vnto the King of Nauarre. The Duke of Guise hauing not thought it fit that Pau should play his part vpon the frontier, and hauing failed in his enterprize against the Baron of Onaw at Vimorri, heooke the way to Estampes in shew to defend the way to Paris. But hee had purposely plotted this stratagem of Montargis, foreseeing that this place lying conuenient for the Earle of Chastillon being neere vnto his house, he should be principally employed therein: And that as he had ruined the father at the Parisien Mattens, the 24 of August 1572, he would also make the sonne companion of the same fortune.

D The Duke of Bouillon, the Generall of the Germanes, the Earle of Chastillon, and the chiefe of the councill holding it not conuenient to neglect this encounter, they commit the execution to Chastillon. Hee returns Pau, and giues him Saint Laurent his Steward to goe into the towne and castle to discouer the truth. But the Traytor had giuen order the fouldiers should lie close, if happily they should send any one to visit. Saint Laurent reports, that they saw no cause of suspicion, beleueing that Pau meant sincerely: and Pau for a gage of his fidelitie, promising to remaine in the hands of such as Chastillon should please, vntill the place were wholly at his deuotion, they thought he could not giue any greater assurance. But to continue himselfe voluntarily an hostage and caution for a disloyal and treacherous disservice, was it not wilfully to ruine both his life and honour vpon hope of an vncertaine recompence? Thus great men play with the liues of men, as with tennis balls, not caring how to hazard them, so as they will become instruments and ministers of their passions.
